NOTWITHSTANDING a rule printing advertisements in a separate part of the paper, allowing nothing to go on the reading pages the publication of which is paid for, we make an exception in the case of the Pacific Water Company, and print their prospectus in the most prominent place, even giving it the benefit of this editorial notice. Several reasons urge us to this. Aside from the public utility of the scheme, the plan proposed is so sensible that the only wonder is that it had not been thought of before, while its ingenuity is apparent at a glance. Personally we have no interest in the establishment of this new water company, nor do we bear any ill-will towards the Spring Valley, the Bensley, or the several other new water companies proposed. But the one to which subscription is invited in the annexed prospectus affords such eminent advantages in cheapness and in the abundant supply which it promises, that we would be derelict in duty did we not urge the public to come forward and subscribe liberally. One thing must be taken into consideration, and that is the advantage it has over the Spring Valley, in the fact that its reservoir cannot be tapped by the Bensley without an immediate discovery of the deed. The only objection to be urged against the company is that it bases its operations in the clouds. But are there many joint stock companies, mining, mercantile, or manufacturing, that rest on a much more stable foundation? A guarantee of the success of the enterprise will be found in the list of well-known capitalists and citizens who have been invited to act as directors, and who will probably consent, since their names are always foremost in every scheme that promises to contribute to the public welfare, entirely regardless of their own individual benefit. But we will allow the prospectus to speak for itself:

PROSPECTUS

—OF THE—

PACIFIC WATER COMPANY.

A SUBJECT of vast importance to those interested in the permanent welfare of any great metropolis is that of an abundant supply of pure water; and to no city in the world does the remark apply with more force than to San Francisco. With an almost boundless future of wealth and prosperity before us, the experience of the last year has abundantly shown that our water supply, from ordinary sources, is but limited, and, with the rapid growth of our city, must soon become entirely insufficient.

Modern engineering skill has exhausted itself in bringing to our doors the hitherto needed supply of the indispensable element; but the greatest skill cannot create water where none exists; and it was reserved for science to turn to practical account one of the most beautiful operations of nature.

With these facts before him, the originator of our plan has endeavored to guard against the evil that must in time effectively check our prosperity; and so complete has been his success, that we are enabled to guarantee a superabundant supply of the purest and softest water, were the population of San Francisco to increase one hundred-fold.

It would be difficult to give full details of the plan in the limits of an advertisement, but enough can be stated to show its entire feasibility.

It is a fact perfectly well known to navigators, that water-spouts draw up the sea-water into clouds or vaporous bodies, and that rain descending immediately from the clouds so filled is no longer salt water, but fresh and sweet. This phenomenon is caused by a peculiar faculty of absorption, which it is not necessary to describe, by which the water-spout, by a natural process, takes up only the moisture, and is enabled to reject the saline particles.

It is apparent, therefore, that the quantity of fresh water thus attainable is limitless as the ocean itself; but two difficulties present themselves in the way of bringing these scientific facts down to the basis of general utility: the first, to create water-spouts at pleasure; the second, to control the vast bodies of water so produced; and to the solution of these problems, our inventor has devoted the last ten years of his laborious life.

After repeated experiments necessarily made at great risk to human life, from being carried on in the closest proximity to, and in fact upon the very edges of the most violent water spouts, it was discovered that the power of suction, so to speak, was caused by strong electric currents passing from the ocean to the clouds, bringing the two into close affinity, and causing the beautiful spiral motion so much admired by those who have watched these interesting phenomena from a distance.

This electric current can be produced at will by means of a powerful galvanic battery which may be placed upon, and operated from, an ordinary fishing boat—the only drawback at this time being that it has not yet been thoroughly tested in very rough weather. This, however, is an obstacle that will undoubtedly be overcome in time, and meanwhile we hope to answer all necessary purposes during the calm, smooth weather with which we are so abundantly favored.

Having thus settled the question of the supply, an apparently insuperable difficulty arose as to the mode of storage and distribution; and for these we are obliged to fall back upon the engineers; we can only fill the reservoirs that they furnish. We can place any required quantity of water at any designated spot, but more than that we cannot at this time promise.

Some five years since, our inventor succeeded in filling his aerial reservoirs from electrically-created water-spouts, but like many great discoveries, his bade fair to be useless, owing to his inability to direct the movements of his reservoirs after they were filled; and it was reserved for a San Francisco peculiarity to remove this difficulty. It is now thoroughly demonstrated that the well-known summer winds of this section, are but currents of air, rushing in through the Golden Gate to supply the vacuum caused by the rarification of the atmosphere under the burning sun and absence of moisture on the plains beyond us. Upon this hint, and the principle that nature abhors a vacuum, our discoverer boldly acted, and soon had the satisfaction of knowing that by this means he had the power to move his vast aerial reservoirs at pleasure, and by the application of his electric current, elongated for the purpose, he could arrest their progress and bring them sufficiently near to the earth's surface, and also retain them in any desired position until their contents were exhausted.

It is not proposed to build reservoirs or lay down supply pipes; we will content ourselves with supplying others with water in large quantities and at wholesale prices. We need no legislation, and will be but at trifling expense; a couple of fishing-boats, a dozen galvanic batteries, are all the machinery required. The discoverer, however, expects, and with justice, to be remunerated for the time and toil he has spent in bringing this matter to its present state of perfection; and for this purpose the formation of a joint stock company with a limited capital is proposed.

It may be as well, however, to remark at this time that the discoverer and his immediate friends are possessed of abundant resources to put their plan into practical operation, and mean to do it, but they are unwilling to enter upon an undertaking that will confer such vast results without giving to all an opportunity of participation.

The following well-known citizens, to whom enquiries may in the meantime be addressed, will be invited to act as DIRECTORS.

Louis McLenn,	W. C. Ralston,	Lloyd Tevis,
H. F. Teschemacher,	Frederick Billings,	George H. Howard,
H. Carlton, Jr.,	A. B. Forbes,	W. M. Lent,
A. L. Tubbs,	J. G. Kittle,	Jonathan Hunt,
J. B. Thomas,	J. B. Newton,	J. G. Bray,
John O. Earl,	Asa T. Lawton,	S. J. Hensley,
J. Whitney, Jr.,	John Wightman,	Edward Martin,
L. Sachs,	L. B. Benchly,	James De Fremery,
A. Seligman,	O. F. Giffin,	M. P. Jones,
William Sherman,	Moses Ellis,	D. Stern,
William Alvord,	Thomas Bell,	S. M. Wilson,
Charles Mayne,	R. S. Fretz,	D. J. Oliver,
Erwin Davis,	A. B. McCreary,	Jahez Howes,
P. L. Weaver,	William F. Babcock,	F. W. Brooks,
Samuel C. Bigelow,	John Parrott,	I. Lohman,
Herman Michels,	John Sime,	R. M. Jessup,
H. L. Dodge,	Joseph A. Donohoo,	William E. Barron,
H. L. Goldstein,	J. G. Kellogg,	Samuel Knight,
H. Hansmann,	G. W. Beaver,	A. C. Henry,
Morton Cheesman,	Elie Lazard,	A. J. Pope,
H. M. Newhall,	William Sharon,	J. C. Wilmerding,
W. Norris,	Adam Grant,	Peter Donahue,
Edgar Mills,	Alpheus Bull,	Eugene Casserly,
D. O. Mills,	A. G. Stiles,	Hall McAllister,
A. J. Bowie,	Robert Roxby,	James Bell,
Henry S. Dexter,	John Bensley,	F. A. Woodworth.

THE SWEET LITTLE MAN.

DEDICATED TO THE STAY-AT-HOME RANGERS.

NOW, while our soldiers are fighting our battles,
Each at his post to do all that he can,
Down among rebels and contraband chattels,
What are you doing, my sweet little man?

All the brave boys under canvas are sleeping,
All of them pressing to march with the van,
Far from the home where their sweethearts are weeping,
What are yon waiting for, sweet little man?

Yon with the terrible warlike moustaches,
Fit for a Colonel or chief of a clan,
You with the waist made for sword-belts and sashes,
Where are your shoulder-straps, sweet little man?

Bring him the buttonless garment of woman!
Cover his face lest it freckle and tan:
Muster the Apron-String Guards on the Common,
That is the corps for the sweet little man!

Give him for escort a file of young misses,
Each of them armed with a deadly rattan;
They shall defend him from laughter and hisses,
Aimed by our boys at the sweet little man.

All the fair maidens about him shall cluster,
Pluck the white feathers from bonnet and fan,
Make him a plume like a turkey-wing duster—
That is the crest for the sweet little man.

Oh, but the Apron-String Guards are the fellows!
Drilling each day since our troubles began;
"Handle your walking-sticks!" "Shoulder umbrellas!"
That is the style for the sweet little man.

Have we a nation to save? In the first place
Saving ourselves is the sensible plan—
Surely the spot where there's shooting's the worst place
Where I can stand, says the sweet little man.

Catch me confiding my person with strangers!
Think how the cowardly Bull-Runners ran!
In the brigade of the Stay-at-Home Rangers
Marches my corps, says the sweet little man.

Such was the stuff of the Malakoff-takers,
Such were the soldiers that scaled the Redan;
Truculent horsemaids and blood-thirsty Quakers,
Brave not the wrath of the sweet little man!

When the red flails of the battle-field threshers
Beat out the continent's wheat from its bran,
While the wind scatters the chaffy seceshers,
What will become of our sweet little man?

When the brown soldiers come back from the borders,
How will he look while his feather they scan?
How will he feel when he gets marching orders,
Signed by his lady-love? sweet little man.

Fear not for him, though the rebels expect him—
Life is too precious to shorten its span;
Woman her broomstick shall raise to protect him,
Will she not fight for the sweet little man?

Now then, nine cheers for the Stay-at-Home Ranger!
Blow the great fish-horn and beat the big pan!
First in the field that is farthest from danger,
Take your white-feather plume, sweet little man!

—Holmes.

JOHNSONIANA.

ABOUT a hundred years ago Dr. Samnel Johnson occupied a position in English literature such as no other man ever held before or since. He was the Jupiter Tonans, the superior divinity of the world of letters, infinitely above everybody else. Such at least was the place accorded to him by many illustrious men. His dictionary was regarded as an unparalleled and unequalled work. His Lives of the Poets was another most important contribution to the standard works of the language. His poetry, his romances, his political pamphlets were all good in their way. He was the centre of a clique, with the greatest painter, the greatest tragedian and the most versatile literateur of the day for his satellites. The man whom Reynolds, Garrick and Goldsmith worshipped could be no common man. Through the later part of his life he was surrounded by men who took note of everything he said, and after his death the world was flooded with Johnsoniana. But now Samuel Johnson has sunk to a very moderate position. His dictionary is an antiquarian curiosity; most of his poets have been completely eclipsed; his tales, verses and political writings have lost all interest, and, instead of going down on our knees before his dictatorial decision, we merely laugh at him for his conceit and foolish prejudices.

Many good things are told of him, and the following are a few examples:

A WOMAN said, "Ladies are most pleasing when engaged in conversation."

Johnson.—"No, madam; I think they are most pleasing when they hold their tongues."

Smith.—"I wonder what pleasure those drunken men can take in making beasts of themselves."

Johnson.—They get rid of the pain of being men."

SOMEBODY said Foote had been kicked in Ireland. Johnson said:

"He's rising in the world; when he was in England, nobody thought it worth while to kick him."

WHEN Johnson was a youth he wrote, on a piece representing a battle between pigmies and cranes, the following conplet:

Down from the guardian boughs the nests they flung,
And killed the yet unanimated young.

A COUPLE of ambitious blue-stockings visited Johnson, and one of them addressed him in a long and bombastic speech which she had committed to memory. He listened to it all, and, when it was finished, said, simply, "Fiddle-dee-dee, my dear."

A SCAMP, who came from Jamaica, having died, Johnson said: "He will not, whither he is now gone, find much difference, I believe, in either the climate or the company."

SOMEBODY commended the following line:

Who rules o'er freemen should himself be free.

Johnson replied:

Who drives fat oxen should himself be fat.

THE following is a burlesque written by Johnson on ancient ballads:

"Hermit hoar, in solemn cell,
Wearing out life's evening grey;
Strike thy bosom, Sage! and tell
What is bliss, and where the way?"

Thus I spoke, and speaking sighed—
Scarce repressed the starting tear,
When the hoary sage replied:
"Come, my lad, and drink some beer."

WE have a triumphant piece of logic in the followiug lines:

If a man who turnips cries,
Cries not when his father dies,
'Tis a proof that he had rather
Have a turnip than his father.

A YOUNG woman met Dr. Johnson soon after the publication of his dictionary and complimented him for omitting all obscene words. "So ho," said the old bear, "the first thing you did was to look for them."

SWIFT would say, "The thing has not life enough in it to keep it sweet."

Johnson—"The creature possesses not vitality sufficient to preserve it from putrefactiou."

TWO DIALOGUES IN IMITATION OF JOHNSON'S STYLE OF CONVERSATION.

JOHNSON AGAINST GARRICK.

Dr. Johnson and Sir Joshua Reynolds.

Reynolds—Let me alone, I'll bring him out. (Aside.) I have been thinking, Dr. Johnson, this morning, on a matter that has puzzled mo very much; it is a subject that I dare say has often passed in yonr thoughts, and though I cannot, I dare say you have made up your mind upon it.

Johnson—Tilly fally! what is all this preparation? what is all this mighty matter?

Rey.—Why, it is a very weighty matter. The subject I have been thinking upon is predestination and free will, two things I cannot reconcile together for the life of me; in my opinion, Dr. Johnson, free will and foreknowledge cannot be reconciled.

Johns.—Sir, it is not of very great importance what your opinion is upon such a question.

Rey.—But I meant, only, Dr. Johnson, to know your opiuion.

Johns.—No, sir, yon meant no such thing; yon meant only to show these gentlemen that you are not the man they took you to be, but that yon think of high matters sometimes, and that you may have the credit of having it said that you held an argument with Sam. Johnson on predestination and free will—a subject of that magnitnde as to have engaged the attention of the world, to have perplexed the wisdom of man for these two thousand years; a subject on which the fallen angels, who had yet not lost their original brightness, find themselves in wandering mazes lost. That such a subject could be discussed in the levity of convivial conversation, is a degree of absurdity beyond what is easily conceivable.

Rey.—It is so, as you say, to be sure; I talked once to our friend Garrick upon this subject, but I remember we could make nothing of it.

Johns.—O noble pair!

Rey.—Garrick was a clever fellow, Dr. J.; Garrick, take him altogether, was certainly a very great man.

Johns.—Garrick, sir, may be a great man in yonr opinion, as far as I know, but he was not so in mine; little things are great to little men.

Rey.—I have heard you say, Dr. Johnson—

Johns.—Sir, you never heard me say that David Garrick was a great man; yon may have heard me say that Garrick was a good repeater—of other men's words—words put into his mouth by other men; this makes but a faint approach towards being a great man.

Rey.—But take Garrick upon the whole, now, in regard to conversation—

Johns.—Well, sir, in regard to conversation, I never discovered in the conversation of David Garrick any intellectual energy, any wide grasp of thought, any extensive comprehension of mind, or that he possessed any of those powers to which great could, with any degree of propriety, be applied.

Rey.—But still—

Johns.—Hold, sir, I have not done. There are, to be sure, in the laxity of colloquial speech, various kinds of greatness; a man may be a great tobacconist, a man may be a great painter, he may be likewise a great mimic; now you may be the one and Garrick the other, and yet neither of you be great men.

Rey.—But, Dr. Johnson—

Johns.—Hold, sir; I have often lamented how dangerous it is to investigate and to discriminate character to men who have no discriminative powers.

Rey.—But Garrick, as a companion, I heard yon say, no longer ago than last Wednesday, at Mr. Thrale's table—

Johns.—You tease me, sir. Whatever you may have heard me say, no longer ago than last Wednesday, at Mr. Thrale's table, I tell you I do not say so now; besides, as I said before, you may not have understood me, yon misapprehended me—you may not have heard me.

Rey.—I am very sure I heard yon.

Johns.—Besides, besides, sir, besides—do yon not know—are you so ignorant as not to know, that it is the highest degree of rudeness to quote a man against himself?

Rey.—But if you differ from yonrself, and give one opinion to-day—

Johns.—Have done, sir; the company, yon see, are tired, as well as myself.

T'OTHER SIDE.

Dr. Johnson and Mr. Gibbon.

Johnson—No, sir; Garrick's fame was prodigious, not only in England, bnt over all Europe. Even in Russia I have been told he was a proverb; when any one had repeated well he was called a second Garrick.

Gibbon—I think he had full as much reputation as he deserved.

Johns.—I do not pretend to know, sir, what your meaning may be, by saying he had as much reputation as he deserved; he deserved much, and he had much.

Gib.—Why, surely, Dr. Johnson, his merit was in small things only; he had none of those qualities that make a real great man.

Johns.—Sir, I as little understand what your meaning may be when you speak of the qualities that make a great man; it is a vague term. Garrick was no common man; a man above the common size of men may surely, without any great impropriety, be called a great man. In my opinion he has very reasonably fulfilled the prophecy which he once reminded me of having made to his mother, when she asked me how little David went on at school, that I should say to her that he would come to be hanged or come to be a great man. No, sir, it is undoubtedly true that the same qualities, united with virtue or with vice, make a hero or a rogue, a great general or a highwayman. Now, Garrick, we are sure, was never hanged, and in regard to his being a great man you must take the whole man together. It must be considered in how many things Garrick excelled in which every man desires to excel; setting aside his excellence as an actor, in which he is acknowledged to be unrivalled; as a man, as a poet, as a convivial companion, you will find but few his equals, and none his superior. As a man he was kind, friendly, benevolent and generous.

Gib.—Of Garrick's generosity I never heard; I understood his character to be totally the reverse, and that he was reckoned to have loved money.

Johns.—That he loved money nobody will dispute. Who does not? But if you mean, by loving money, that he was parsimonious to a fault, sir, you have been misinformed. To Foote, and such scoundrels who circulated those reports, to such profligate spendthrifts prudence is meanness and economy is avarice. That Garrick, in early youth, was brought up in strict habits of economy, I believe, and that they were necessary, I have heard from himself; to suppose that Garrick might inadvertently act from this habit, and be saving in small things, can be no wonder; but let it be remembered at the same time that if he was frugal by habit, he was liberal from principle; that when he acted from reflection he did what his fortune enabled him to do, and what was expected from such a fortune. I remember no instance of David's parsimony but once, when he stopped Mrs. Woffington from replenishing the tea-pot; it was already, he said, as red as blood; and this instance is doubtful, and happened many years ago. In the latter part of his life I observed no blameable parsimony in David; his table was elegant and even splendid; his house both in town and country, his equipage, and I think all his habits of life, were such as might be expected from a man who had acquired great riches. In regard to his generosity, which you seem to question, I shall only say there is no man to whom I would apply with more confidence of success for the loan of two hundred pounds to assist a common friend, than to David, and this too with very little, if any, probability of its being repaid.

Gib.—You were going to say something of him as a writer—you don't rate him very high as a poet.

Johns.—Sir, a man may be a respectable poet without being a Homer, as a man be a good player without being a Garrick. In the lighter kinds of poetry, in the appendages of the drama, he was, if not the first, in the very first class. He had a readiness and facility, a dexterity of mind that appeared extraordinary even to men of experience, and who are not apt to wonder from ignorance. Writing prologues, epilogues and epigrams he said he considered as his trade, and he was, what a man should be, always and at all times ready at his trade. He required two hours for a prologue or epilogue and five minutes for an epigram. Once at Burke's table the company proposed a subject, and Garrick finished his epigram within the time; the same experiment was repeated in the garden, and with the same success.

Gib.—Garrick had some flippancy of parts, to be sure, and was brisk and lively in company, and by the help of mimcry story-telling, made himself a pleasant companion; but here the whole world gave the superiority to Foote, and Garrick himself appears to have felt as if his genius was rebuked by the superior powers of Foote. It has been often observed that Garrick never dared to enter into competition with him, but was content to act an under-part to bring Foote out.

Johns.—That this conduct of Garrick's might be interpreted by the gross minds of Foote and his friends as if he was afraid to encounter him, I can easily imagine. Of the natural superiority of Garrick over Foote, this conduct is an instance: he disdained entering into competition with such a fellow, and made him the buffoon of the company, or, as you say, brought him out. And what was at last brought ont but coarse jests and vulgar merriment, indecency and impiety, a relation of events which, upon the face of them, could never have happened, characters grossly conceived and as coarsely represented? Foote was even no mimic; he went out of himself, it is true, but without going into another man; he was excelled by Garrick even in this, which is considered as Foote's greatest excellence. Garrick, besides his exact imitation of the voice and gesture of his original, to a degree of refinement of which Foote had no conception, exhibited the mind and mode of thinking of the person imitated. Besides, Garrick confined his powers within the limits of decency; he had a character to preserve—Foote had none. By Foote's buffoonry and broad-faced merriment, private friendship, public decency, and everything estimable amongst men were trod under foot. We all know the difference of their reception in the world. No man, however high in rank or literature, but was proud to know Garrick, and was glad to have him at his table; no man ever considered or treated Garrick as a player; he may be said to have stepped out of his own rank into a higher, and by raising himself he raised the rank of his profession. At a convivial table his exhilarating powers were unrivalled, he was lively, entertaining, quick in discerning the ridicule of life, and as ready in representing it; and on graver subjects there were few topics in which he could not bear his part. It is injurious to the character of Garrick to be named in the same breath with Foote. That Foote was admitted sometimes into good company, (to do the man what credit I can,) I will allow, but then it was merely to play tricks. Foote's merriment was that of a buffoon, and Garrick's that of a gentleman.

Gib.—I have been told, on the contrary, that Garrick in company had not the easy manners of a gentleman.

Johns.—Sir, I don't know what yon may have been told, or what your ideas may be, of the manners of a gentleman. Garrick had no vulgarity in his manners. It is true Garrick had not the airiness of a fop, nor did he assume an affected indifference to what was passing; he did not lounge from the table to the window, and from thence to the fire, or, whilst you were addressing your discourse to him, turn from you and talk to his next neighbor, or give any indication that he was tired of your company. If such manners form your ideas of a fine gentleman, Garrick certainly had them not.

THE LITTLE MAID AND LAWYER BROWN.

"They say," little maid, quoth lawyer Brown,
"I'm the cleverest man in all the town."
"Heigho!" says she,
"What's that to me?"
"But they say, little maid," quoth lawyer Brown,
"You're the prettiest maid in all the town."
Says she, "If they do,
What's that to you?"

"They say, little maid," quoth lawyer Brown,
"I'm the richest man in all the town."
"Heigho!" says she,
"What's that to me?"
"But they say, little maid," quoth lawyer Brown,
"You ought to be dressed in a finer gown!"
Says she, "If they do,
What's that to you?"

"They say, little maid," quoth lawyer Brown,
"That John Hodges is an awkward clown."
"Heigho!" says she,
"What's that to me?"
"But they say, little maid," the lawyer said,
"That you and Johnny are going to wed!"
Says she, "If they do.
What's that to you?"

MY FORENOON WITH THE BABY.

SOME fiend created ill-timed and ill-fated benevolence in my heart. Satan is like scrofula, he always seizes a man by the weakest part of his constitution.

"I'll tell yon, Aunt Fanny," I said, under the impulse, with the joyous smile of one who brings relief at a crisis, "go you to church with uncle and the boys. You must not lose this fine day. I'll take eare of the baby."

Aunt Fanny looked at me with some little doubt.

"Oh, yes," I said, with a calm and confident dignity, "of course I can. Just as if a man of my size couldn't take care of a baby for three hours! Besides, I know exactly what to do. I've seen you do it more than a hundred times. And children always like me."

If my Aunt Fanny had but this only one darling, she would have seen me in—Hackensack, before she would have done it.

"Well," said she at last, "baby's a dood yitty ting, (warn't oo, baby?) and I'll put him to sleep before I go; perhaps he won't wake up until we get back. I'll try for once."

So my small cousin was nicely arranged in some mysterious but clean white garments, the details of whose arrangements I did not see, and donated with (as they say about gifts to infant colleges—ergo, why not to infants, though the phrase be insufferable?—a bounteous repast of—from—by, in short, the maternal fount: I thank you, Mr. Micawber!) and soothed with gentle oscillation and oft-repeated chanting of that wondrous ancient rhyme of magic song, which commences with an allusion to our country's flag, to wit:

"By-lo baby bunting," and thus was the young immortal prosperously dismissed within the realms of dream-land. Then my Aunt Fanny adorned herself with speed, and forthwith the old, lean, overworked farm-house horse shambled down the sun-shiny summer road towards the church, two miles and more away. As she stepped over the threshold, she looked back for an instant, and some shadows flitted indistinctly across her face. Was it presentiment?

Human prosperity is a deceitful thing. I passed half an hour in profound quiet, reading by the window. I had been perusing a sermon from that stately work, Theology Explained and Defended, in a series of sermons, by Timothy Dwight, S. T. D., LL. D.

I was in a sort of paradise, with a little angel for my companion; and as I gazed upon the sleeping child, I felt "no end" of benignity, universal friendship and pure delight, in having attained to the honor of so lovely an office of superintendence.

"Yah!"

Thus remarked my darling Sammy, suddenly waking up and writhing about and digging in a helpless, wavering manner, at his eyes with his fists.

I mentioned that some fiend had, doubtless, inspired me with benevolence. As early as I can calculate, it was now that the said fiend did, in my opinion, leave me and enter into that baby. As the above-mentioned suggestion about Sammy's exceptional disposition arose in my mind, an expression of confusion appeared upon my face—I remember it accurately. This Sammy perceived as I arose, and, with what I fancied an unexceptionable demonstration of parental rapture, approached the cradle of my chubby and innocent companion angel.

"Ah, oo. pooty, yitty ting. Did he want to tum and see his tuzzen? So he should."

I appeal to every mother's heart; is not that a first-class blandishment? I can't print the affecting drawl that I put into it, the recitative style and portmonte di voce with which I garnished secundem artem. But as far as types will show it I contend that the very mother of Moses, if you like it, couldn't have turned out a more superior article of verbal endearment.

The baby listened with some complaeency to my dulcet tones, and encouraged by my success I thought it proper to communicate to him the peculiar circumstances which rendered me his guardian for the time. Thus, therefore, to him, I said:

"Ah, pooty! Was oo muzzer gone oo church? Es ee was! An lef oo wiz oo tuzzen Feddy (my baptismal name is Frederick). all es morning? Aa-a-a-a, ketcher, ketcher, ketcher. Ha-a-a-a prrrrrrri, jiggle, jiggle!"

Not being satisfied with the expression of Master Sammy's minute features during the first half of this address, I began somewhat to doubt my ability to communicate with him in language half baby and half English, and therefore repeated my statement as above, in pure baby as near as I can judge pointing to him in a free and jovial manner during the words, "Aa ketcher," etc., making a kind of swoop at him with outspread fingers during the remark, "Ha, prrr," etc., smiling very sweetly at the word "jiggle."

As I said, in despite of the profound theory and masterly execution of this manœuvre, I did not perform it without a secret and embarrassing apprehension. The evil spirit in the child—for no human baby could have failed to respond to such affectionate reproaches—perceived this hidden mystery of mine, and took instant advantage therefore, namely: by returning, not demonstrations of reciprocal affection, but what I may truly call demonstrations of anger unmingled except with fear and aversion. While I spoke and struck out my paws at him. (for I will admit my gestures may have been susceptible of that interpretation,) Master Sammy preserved an ominous silence, a grave and attentive expression, and entire quiet, only opening his eyes and likewise his mouth. But no sooner had I ended than he looked hastily about after his mother. She not being forthcoming, a species of fearful contortion passed over his visage—his mouth opened to an extent unparalleled in my experience, occupying a space that left no room for the rest of his face, which was, therefore, shrivelled or heaped up together in a little pile of wrinkles in the region of the nose—no eyes whatever being visible, and only two little pink holes indicating the "smellatory organs," as Mrs. Baggles hath it—and from this preternatural orifice he discharged such a shriek as really hit me on the forehead and knocked me straight up again into a frightened perpendicular.

I think I stood, astounded and incapable of action, for a minute. And really, now that I am retrospecting the thing, in what a fix was I? Well-meaning, but assuredly ignorant young bachelor that I was, how was I calculated, either by nature or by art, for assuaging the dire alarms of an unweaned child—much more for dealing with such an instance of precocious demoniac possession as this? Confuro te would not tell on a baby, nor by-lo baby bunting on an imp.

All, that, however, I had no leisure to consider, and Quintus Curtius did not show more nerve and hardihood in riding into that crack in the ground of the Roman forum than I did in stoutly bending me to the task of quieting Sammy. I may safely say that in the wild and fearful struggle which followed, all the resources of an active mind, a vigorous and healthy body, (masculine,) and an excellent disposition, were nobly devoted to the work, and if it failed, it was an attempt beyond the powers of any mere man.

I picked Sammy up, in the first place, and carried him to the window, jumping him up and down as I went, and aiming to divert his mind both by action and by speech.

"Poo itty fello; was ee tired sleepin' in his tadle? Did ee want to turn and see ola cock-a-doodle-doo and all ee biddy hens? Da, see um. Urk, o-r-r-k, a-chackle, chaekle. Ducky go quaek, quack, quaek!" Shriek continued; nurse tries another class of impressions, and jumps him vigorously up and down, accompanied with a noise similar to the following: "Ha ti deedle deedle dum dum, tidy I widdlety widdlety widdlety, quee quee quee, poor little fella, ha, ha, ha."

"Full well I laughed with counterfeited glee," hoping that a genial sympathy might create a smile upon the "open countenance" of Sammy. Vain hope! All my jumbling only served to modify that surprising and steady yell, by introducing a kind of pulsation or measured emphasis upon it. My words might as well have been wasted on a Fourth Warder in a row at the polls; and my hollow merriment, although its merits as an imitation did, in fact, make the baby stop a minute, catch breath and look at me, did no more. His face curled up again, and out came the yell.

I had observed, upon lifting Sammy from the cradle, that he seemed to stiffen himself in a somewhat writhed attitude, as if to resist my purpose. He now began to squirm in a manner rather alarming, so I fancied it might be about to indulge in the pleasant diversion of a fit. All at once I reflected that he must be hungry; that very possibly both screeching and squirming might be referred to that cause. I accordingly placed the little one, still indefatigably howling in a manner that would have exhausted a Mohawk war chief in three minutes, in his cradle, raked some live coals out from the buried kitchen fire, warmed some milk in an old tin cup, watered and sugared it according to the regulations in such a case provided, put it in the "suck-bottle"—as I believe it is called—took a small precautionary pull at the preparation myself, finding it a perfect nectar for lukewarmness, and proceeded to invite Master Sammy to partake, so to speak, of the festive bowl.

Lying yelling, on his back, with eyes close shut and mouth wide open, he heeded not the seductive viand. I half lifted him, but he wouldn't look. I jerked some drops into his mouth, as "Job" peppered vinegar or tomato catsup through a cruet cork at eating-houses—but he appeared not to perceive it. I cautiously inserted the bottle into his mouth, until the tip of the sucking thing, whatever they call it, fairly poked upon his epiglottis. He only gagged, writhed and yelled on. Evidently he was not hungry;—I put away the bottle.

The business grew dreadful, Sammy began to purple, and I to feel blue, but still he continued that ear-torturing cry. I looked about me in forlorn and hopeless perplexity. There was a rattle—one of those coral things, with half a dozen sleigh-bells on it—and a penny whistle. I shook the former and blew the latter, in an industrious, but rather imbecile way, near Sammy's phiz. I might as well have used the same means to scare a lioness robbed of whelps, or a New York city alderman nosing out a job. I lifted the infant, who stiffened himself again at my touch, almost into a stony arc, and shivered as a dying fish will sometimes do in the captor's hand, and with a feeble effort to preserve further the benignity and universal friendship which I had flourished so largely, and which I felt growing thinner and thinner, I sang to the child the inevitable "by-lo baby bunting," and then, "now I lay me;" also the affecting ballad of "The Three Little Kittens," and as my stock of truly juvenile literature gave out at this point, I proceeded with "Rise, my Soul," and one or two other hymns. These efforts were all in vain; I felt as sheepish as if I had been caught trying to sing a tornado to sleep; and my voice died away as I tried to raise the square-built strains of old Amsterdam, like those of "the monk, her son, and her daughter, the nun," around the coffin of the wicked old woman of Berkley, in a quiver of consternation.

It was at this point of my long-tried patience utterly failed, and with a sudden revulsion of wrath, I found myself, mentally speaking, slung around into a position of absolute opposition to this terrific child, of positive anger and spite, not entirely unmixed with fear. I perfectly recollect that precisely as I was feeling myself carried away by this impulse, Sammy, who lay in a stiffened attitude, with his head well back over the one arm, opened his eyes a moment. As I am a living man the pestilent infant winked his left eye at me! Never tell me there wasn't a devil in that baby.

Well, it occurred to me in this new frame of mind, that possibly I might intimidate the child, or simply out-yell and overwhelm it by sheer superiority of vociferation. So I held him up by both arms on my knees, looked right down his ugly little red throat, and gave him in a style that would have electrified the whole British navy. It didn't discourage him at all. I tried the "Pirate's Glee," containing some fearful chromatic whining, which I made the most of, but to no end. Then I degenerated. I am afraid, into mere mindless, ignoble spitefulness; and opening my mouth again, I spent some ten minutes in a series of the most hideous, complicated and disgusting yells that probably it ever entered into the heart of man to conceive, until my throat felt as if I had a peck of teazles poked into my lungs and pulled out again. Great Cæsar's ghost, what a baby! He never flinched, nor "bated a jot of heart or hope." He yelled away as peaceable as if nothing had happened.

"A wet sheet and a flowing sea,"

But as for me, this finished me. I fancied that under these frightful discouragements, my intellect was beginning slightly to waver. King Herod came into my mind. I thought of the great bed of live coals in the old-fashioned kitchen fireplace. Not altogether free from uneasiness as to what I might be led to do, I put Sammy into his cradle, and shut the kitchen door.

But I quickly grew ashamed of this. Dignified indifference, I remembered, would suit me better. Besides, I recollected having heard that letting babies alone would stop their crying when everything failed. I think it would—when they had yelled themselves to death. So I erected a little fortification in the middle of the floor, of pillows and blankets, ensconsed Sammy within it, stuck his rattle in his hand, took up Dwight's Theology, and sat down by the window to read.

I had no perception of the flight of time. For what I know, Sammy squalled there for a week. Once, with a grim smile, I started up and emptied about half the milk out of the bottle, that I might permit it to be supposed he had fed to that extent. I had also presence of mind enough left to shape a scheme as equivocation wherewith to elude the necessity of confessing the facts of the morning to my respected aunt. Otherwise, the period which supervened is a miserable blank in my recollection, nothing more except a yell. It was some time in the distant future—as regards my reading of that ominous delineation of the abodes of the wicked—that the sudden noise of stamping feet, rattling wheels and mingled voices, smote upon my ear and waked me from a kind of awful stupor. Before I had composed my countenance, my Aunt Fanny entered the room, glanced at her voeiferous progeny, and bent a keen and suspicious look upon me. I fairly bowed before her—an abject being—as miserable as if I had been taken in the act of stealing sheep from my best friend. I knew I had a hang-dog look, and felt, to use a certain figurative expression, "like a boiled owl."

"Well, Fred," said she, in her sharp, decisive voice, "how do you get along?"

"Well," I said, feebly, "pretty well on the whole. He cried some latterly, but on the whole I think he enjoyed himself."

Did I lie? I don't care much if I did. But I think he did enjoy himself.

As the people came trooping in, Sammy was apparently diverted by the noise, and "ceased firing"—that is, the devil went out of him because there was no further chance to torment me. He was soon in the enjoyment of his stated means of support, and seemed to appreciate them fully.

"Rather hungry," said my Aunt Fanny, when he had been dining strenuously for half an hour, and looking queerly at me.

"I am sure," I answered, "I gave him quite a lot of milk. It's half gone, at least."

No lie there. I did give him quite a lot—quite a small lot. But I have always labored under the impression that my Aunt Fanny suspected that the proceedings had been a little irregular that morning. I let her think so. I didn't care to press the subject much.

I've speculated often upon the causes of that failure of mine, for it was a failure. I did everything the right way—but I invariably fall upon my demoniacal possession. No other solution is possible.

WITH BROTHER BROWN.—At a conference meeting, held in one of the Western States during the great revival season of '58, were present, among others, brother Brown—a weak, shy, but a good man, considerably "forehanded," and a childless widower—and sister Ames, a strong-minded spinster, somewhat loud of voice and fluent of speech, who, report said, was not adverse to the thought of securing the control of brother Brown and his fine house and farm. In due course of proceedings, brother Brown was called on to relate his experience. As usual, he was humble and slow of speech. "He had very little to say—could not speak to the edification of his brethren and sisters—the time would be better occupied by others. For his part, he felt that it became him to be silent, and that his place was behind the door of the sanctuary." And so he sat down, and sister Ames was soon called on to speak. She, too, was humble and subdued; had little to say, and that in a low tone; concluded by remarking that she felt "her place was to sit behind the door with brother Brown." Not even the solemnity of the occasion could prevent the meaning smile that run round that circle of grave faces.

SYDNEY SMITH cites a French traveller, who was much given to the use of declaiming upon common-place subjects, and says: "He goes on, mingling bucolic details and sentimental effusions, melting and measuring, crying and calculating, in a manner which is very bad if it is poetry and worse if it is prose. In speaking of the modes of cultivating potatoes he cannot avoid calling the potato 'a modest vegetable,' and when he comes to the exportation of horses from the Duchy of Holstein, we learn that 'these animals are dragged fragged from the bosom of their peaceable and modest country, to hear in foreign regions the sound of the warlike trumpet, to carry the combatant amid the hostile ranks, to increase the eclat of some pompous procession, or drag in gilded car some favorite of fortune.'"

THE LARK AND THE POET.

A YOUNG bird rocked on an apple spray,
A-trilling a little lay,
Not full-grown was the yellow coat
Wrapping his slender throat,
And the piping notes had not grown strong,
But trembled in the song.

A school-boy cried with thoughtless glee,
"I will try my skill on thee;"
And the apple blooms with blood grew red,
Where the poor heart quivering bled.
Now, sad winds through the branches mourn
For the song that died unborn.

A poet sat in a solitude,
Playing a faint prelude—
Snatches of tunes and faltering words,
And one or two grand chords—
And angel lips to his young ear bent
As he touched the instrument.

A critic, skilled, and learned, and strong,
(But who never sang a song,)
Aimed a cruel arrow carelessly
As the shy strain floated by;
It brushed the whispering spirit's wing,
It broke the best and finest string,
And sent the young heart sorrowing.
And angel songs, that the poet heard,
Never found tune or word.

EMILIE LAWSON.

THE COUNTESS DIANA.

[TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH OF MARIO UCHARD.]

CONTINUATION OF CHAPTER XXIII.

AFTER this remark, we walked out. Bastien locked the stable-door; five minutes afterwards we were in our carriage.

"Where are we going to?" this devoted companion asked me.

"First to Montherme, then perhaps to Germany—I don't know where."

"All right. What is this all about?"

"To find the Countess, to take her out of Placide's hands, while I fight a duel with my guardian, whom I shall kill."

"Ha! ha! there is work enough, but to serve you I will do anything: dispose of me as you wish."

"We reached Montherme at one o'clock at night. Bastien had laid his plans.

"If the Countess is here," said he, "we will find her by daylight."

He led me down street after street, until we reached a common-looking hotel. "Knock hard," said he to me, "they are dull of hearing."

I knocked; no one replied.

"A good sign, they are cautious," continued the smuggler; "my friends are here."

In his turn, he rapped in a peculiar manner on the door, and gave two or three shrill whistles. The door was immediately opened and we entered a low, smoky room. The landlord rubbed his eyes as he shut the door.

"Any of my comrades here?" continued my companion.

"Three," replied the old fellow; "the Alsatian, the beggar, and Constance.

"Call them, and tell them to hurry."

The landlord obeyed, and an instant after the wooden stairs creaked under the feet of men, among whom I recognized two of the smugglers that I had met at the Wild-boar's Glen.

"Now," said Bastien, "bring our carriage into the court-yard with as little noise as possible, and put the horse in the stable."

As soon as the landlord was gone, "Are you at liberty?" demanded my guide of his companions.

"Well, that depends," replied one of them.

"That word means, 'Yes.' To work, then! you can render me a great service."

"If that's the case," said another, "speak—you are among friends."

"Thanks. Let us start; I will explain everything on our way."

I had a gleam of hope. One could attempt anything in an enterprise like mine, with such men, whom a constant struggle with the law had accustomed to every ruse.

We went out silently: a hundred yards from the house Bastien held me back.

"If you will take my advice, M. André," said he, "you will leave us now, for, to-morrow, you will need steady nerves and a light hand."

"What does that matter?" replied I, "I have perfect confidence in my cause."

"I beg of you follow my advice. Besides, you can do nothing here, and you embarrass us. We have certain signs that my comrades would not be willing for you to know. I give you my word that if the Countess is in town she will be in safe hands by daybreak. Do not delay us while night is yet with us."

Although convinced by such reasoning, I quitted them with regret. It was arranged that Bastien should acquaint me if the slightest trace was found of either Placide or my god-mother.

My good lawyer had given orders to await my return; a supper was ready. I drank a glass of water, and threw myself all dressed on the bed, so as to get rid of an officious valet. But in my excited state I could not sleep. As soon as I was alone, I began walking to and fro in my room. I opened the window; I listened to the slightest sound, hoping that something would tell me of Bastien's success. Poor Diana! where was she at this hour? what torments was she not enduring? My inaction maddened me. I was in despair at having quitted the smugglers; that at least distracted thought. For four hours, I waited thus, anxious and breathless. I saw the day dawn. People commenced to move about the street; they passed by, indifferent or joyful, without a sign that they had heard of some midnight adventure. The cold of the morning overcame me. Time after time, I tried to leave my sad position. I returned in spite of myself to the window from whence I could see the messenger who was to bring me despair or joy. At last Bastien turned the corner of the street. By his discouraged air, I saw that he was unsuccessful.

"The Count is alone at Montherme," said he to me, on entering; "the Countess has not been here."

"That is impossible," exclaimed I. "You are mistaken, you are misinformed."

"I am sure of what I say," continued he; "the Count returned at three-quarters past eight to the house of the Baron de Pages. You know he always stays there when he comes here; he has not been out, and neither Placide nor the Countess have joined him. We are acquainted at all the hotels; no travellers arrived last night, and for a final and certain proof, I have seen the gate-keepers, among whom I have friends. I spoke to the men who have been on duty for the last twelve hours; you know they examine all the carriages that enter the town. They know the Countess and Placide well, as he comes to town very often: the coupé has not entered by any of the city gates, I guarantee."

"Where have they taken her!"

"Don't despair, M. André. Constance and the Alsatian are on guard before M. de Pages' house, watching your guardian. If he comes out to go and join the Countess, why we have him. They will not hesitate to pick a quarrel with him in front of the house to which he is going to prevent him from entering. I sent "The Beggar" to Maufert; he will follow, if it be possible, the track of the coupé from the chateau, which probably did not take the high road—it's a chance!"

"Bastien, you see my uneasiness. On your life save her, save me!"

"Compose yourself; we have eyes and legs. Ah! I forgot—last night, an hour after us, Martin, your guardian's servant, arrived here in a cabriolet with a valise; he is also at M. de Pages'; we will have him. Now you know all; so I must leave you, for if the Count leads us to his prison, it will be well for me to be on hand to reassure the Countess. We will carry her off, if that is necessary. Anyhow, I will see you before you leave; I will have time to tell you something."

"I leave you the horse and buggy. Take this money and pay your men liberally."

I gave him four or five thousand francs in gold that I had about me.

"But for yourself," he said to me, "will you keep nothing for yourself?"

"For what I have to do, I have plenty of money; besides I can write to Granger. Go, and remember that my life is in your hands."

"Count on me. But on your side, M. André, no faltering—no foolish generosity, for he will profit by it. Are your nerves steady?"

"Oh, fear nothing. I will kill him as I would a snake, without pity; for the happiness of my godmother depends on it."

He left me; the arrangements that he had made bade me hope again. Diana could no longer evade such a thorough search. Almost reassured about her, I began to think of myself. The Count was a rude adversary. I had often seen him use a sword, and a fight between us would be no play. I tried my muscle; I was satisfied at the examination. The excitement sustained me, and I experienced no physical fatigue. I rang for breakfast. The servant soon entered, followed by Granger.

My old friend met me with consternation plainly depicted on his countenance, and I was obliged to affect a stoicism which was far from my heart, in order to soothe his alarms.

"Then you do not know the decision of the Assembly yesterday?" said he to me.

"I can guess it: I lost my case, and I have been censured. Well! it is only one game lost, that's all. Console yourself, my dear Granger, and give me your friendly hand, that I may press it in gratitude for what you have done for me."

"See here, my child; there is a mystery in all this. What took place between your guardian and you last evening?"

"Excuse me, but I cannot tell you."

"The doctor said that you feigned madness."

"That is true."

"Then you are not mad?"

"No, I am not mad; but to some eyes I must be so for a time—at least until I have delivered some one who is in great peril."

He understood me, without doubt, for he asked no more questions.

XXIV.

M. DE MAUFERT arrived at eight. He pretended not to know of my ride the night before; he was almost courteous in speaking to me, and never did his impassibility appear so implacable. I was ready; the carriage was at the door to take us to the railway station. I embraced Granger, and we went down stairs. As I passed the kitchen, I perceived Bastien. He asked me for a light for his cigar, and I stopped.

"Everything is going on well," said he to me quickly. "I was afraid that he would take Martin with him, but he remains; we have him, and the old rabbit will probably lead us to the warren. The Alsatian goes with you, to follow the Count when he returns—if he comes back. Aid him, do not let him lose sight of you; make use of him if you have need of him. If the luck is on our side, as I hope, when you come back here go to the inn and there will be news for you."

My guardian was already in the carriage; I took my seat near him, and we drove off. I remarked with astonishment a valise on the front seat belonging to me.

"There is your baggage," murmured the Count.

"Is it permitted me to ask you where we are going?" said I, stiffly.

"To Carlsruhe."

I bowed in silence. I thought we were going very far, but it delighted me, because it left an open field to Bastien. The choice of this place seemed perfectly apparent: the Count had friends there—among others, Col. de Jonval, Diana's uncle—and for this remarkable duel he would want a discreet second.

We reached the station. I was still more surprised at finding a car reserved for us, a luxury little in keeping with the avaricious spirit of M. de Manfert. But I thought that he probably intended making me pay the expenses of the trip. A few steps off, I recognized my friend, the smuggler, dressed as a well-to-do farmer. He took up his position in the car next to ours.

The cars started. M. de Manfert, still silent, unfolded his newspaper. I could not help admiring his perfect coolness. I stretched myself out in one corner, and abandoned myself to my reflections. It was certainly a strange thing, this mortal combat between my guardian and myself, but fate had determined it, and I must be either the victim or the victor.

About noon the train stopped at an eating-place.

"Will you take your breakfast here?" said the Count; "we do not dine until we reach Carlsruhe."

He left the car; I followed him. I soon saw the Alsatian coming along, and he seated himself next to us, in order to hear everything we said; but M. de Maufert did not utter a word. I imitated him. As I was entering the car a rumpled paper was slipped in my hand. I walked off a few steps and read: "The conductor is a friend; tell him all you wish me to know, and where you are going."

The bell rang. "All aboard, gentlemen," said the conductor, and, turning to me, asked, "Where are you going?"

"To Carlsruhe," replied I, in a low tone of voice.

"Is that all?"

"Yes."

We started. Soon, overcome by fatigue, I fell asleep and did not awake until we reached the frontier. It was dark when we arrived at Carlsruhe. Col. de Jonval, no doubt informed by telegraph, was at the depot with his carriage. I got ready to leave them, and told my guardian that I could be found at the Hotel d'Angleterre.

"No, no; come with me," he replied imperiously.

By his tone of voice I saw that he feared an evasion. I was about replying in a bitter tone, when the Colonel invited me to his house in such terms that a refusal would have been rude. All this passed so quickly that I had not time to think of the Alsatian. We had hardly started, however, when the thought seized me that he would lose trace of us, for we were going at a rate fast enough to defy the stoutest legs. I leaned carelessly out of the window; we were in a retired street. I saw no one; no carriage followed us.

This contretemps worried me; how would Bastien be able to keep sight of us? I hoped for a moment that he had heard me say Hotel d'Angleterre, and that he would go there; but that was only a vague hope. To complete my distress, we were rapidly quitting the town and supposing the man was following us, it was not probable that he would overtake us. The Count conversed with M. de Jonval on indifferent subjects. I saw plainly that a letter had explained everything. The Colonel never mentioned Diana's name, though she was his niece. At last our driver stopped before a handsome house. While waiting for the gate to be opened, two or three light blows against the carriage attracted my attention; then, as the horses turned, I perceived a man under the shadow of the wall. I then recognized the signal that Bastien had used the preceding night to open the door of the inn. My smuggler has accompanied us, without doubt, occupying the place of the footman, who had remained at the station to take care of the baggage. Delivered from this care, I breathed again. We got out before a porch supported by columns, and I followed my host. He led us to the rooms prepared for us. I remarked that to reach the room intended for me it was necessary to pass that of my guardian, and there was no other way. I could not help smiling at such a tender precaution.

"Supper is ready," said the Colonel to us; "I will wait for you down stairs."

A quarter of an hour afterwards, we entered an elegant dining-room, where German cleanliness was united with Parisian luxury. The dishes which covered the table reminded me of the happy days at Heidelberg; but I was almost immediately recalled from my abstraction, by the entrance of a young lady, whose resemblance to Diana was striking.

"Herménégilde," said M. de Jonval, presenting me, "Baron André d'Orbach."

I replied awkwardly to her graceful and timid bow. I could not help blushing at the sound of her name, remembering how brutally I had refused her hand.

The supper was a very silent one; an indescribable embarrassment seemed to hang over all the party. Mlle. de Jonval sat next to me, and two or three times I saw her eyes fixed on mine, with an indescribable expression of sadness. I imagined that she knew of the projects formed by her aunt, and my embarrassment increased at the sorrow I saw expressed in her face.

We went into the drawing-room where a bright fire blazed. My guardian and the Colonel seated themselves on a sofa and conversed in an under-tone; Mlle. de Jonval took some embroidery and seated herself near them. I thought that I ought to remain quiet, so I took my place near a table covered with albums, and looked them over mechanically, examining my rejected bride, whom I imagined, from her name, resembled the Canoness. I could no longer see in her that resemblance to my god-mother which had at first attracted me. She was nevertheless charming, and her face expressed great goodness; but with her eighteen years she seemed older than Diana, and I searched in vain on her brow for that poetic halo, the recollection of which I kept in my heart.

Tea was brought in; she served it. M. de Maufert and his friend came forward. My reserve threatened to degenerate into a lack of good-breeding. I approached Mlle. Herménégilde and addressed a few words to her, to which she replied with a gayety that seemed forced. The moment her father and the Count left us to ourselves, her face suddenly assumed an agitated expression, and she said rapidly:

"Your window opens on the garden: the key will be in the gate that leads to the woods—fly to-night!"

I was so much astonished at this remark that she placed her fingers on her lips to prevent my betraying myself. At the same moment M. de Maufert returned to us.

"We have kept you up very late, my dear Herménégilde," said he. "Pardon me; and as I probably shall not see you to-morrow, I will bid you good-by to-night."

I bowed in silence, thanking her by a glance. She replied by an almost imperceptible gesture, which seemed a prayer, and I followed my guardian, whom M. de Jonval preceded. At the door of our apartment our host left us. I thought it as well to acquaint myself with the designs of the Count.

"The Colonel will doubtless serve you as second, sir," said I to him. "Shall I write to two friends that I have in this city, to beg them to serve me, and to bring arms?"

He raised his head quickly, but remained silent. One could almost believe that my calmness astonished him.

"Sleep quietly," replied he, at last. "I will arrange everything."

"At what hour shall I be ready?"

"At seven, if it suits you."

I acquiesced by a nod, and entered my room.

I thought it would have lowered me to notice the queer precautions that were taken against my flight. The view from my window recalled the singular counsel of Mlle. Herménégilde. I thought she had surprised a few words that made her fear a duel; and, at the same time thanking her for her interest in me, I could not remember, without ruffling somewhat my amour-propre, the idea that she had of my bravery; but I had too much besides to think of. Everything aided me. I neared the decisive moment. Only a few hours more and I would have accomplished my task as liberator; and, supposing the Count escaped my sword, the Alsatian was there, and I was sure to discover Diana's retreat.

WANTED, A PLACE,

BY a young Protestant woman of respectable and eminently fashionable family. She can give the highest testimonials as to character, but no references to a "last place," as unfortunately, although twenty-two years of age, she has never been of service to any one. To save herself from idleness, she is willing to do any useful work for which she may be competent, and wages are not so much an object as something to do. Having tasted all the comforts town life can afford, and found them only temporary distractions, losing all their efficacy when frequently resorted to, she would prefer a country life, but has no serious objection to any situation which which will procure for her useful occupation.

She is healthy, active and cheerful, and, what is highly to her credit, considering the perfect vacuity of life, to which custom, since the completion of her school-days, has doomed her, she neither gambles nor eats opium. She is a finished musician; speaks French and German with fluency; is well read in the literature of her own language, and is said by competent judges to possess considerable dramatic talent. She would, ere now, have become, either an instructor in these accomplishments, or an actress, had she not felt that, being herself in affluence, she had no right to add one more to the number of competitors against whom patient need must struggle. She does not wish to take the place of any one who has any appointed and appropriate work to do. But she wants her own place, her own work.

A personal interview may be obtained in the genteel circles of any large town, at any fashionable watering place, in many an easy and luxurious home. She is well known to one part of the community as a sprightly, amiable companion. To the others as a chattering, dancing, foolish thing, made up of hollow smiles, without brains and without a heart. At home she is considered a dear, affectionate, incapable visionary, fit only to be petted, to be scolded, to dress, to shine and nothing more. But being herself aware that she has, perforce, to live, to die, and to give in a last account of life, she would fain have some work done, ready for the Master when He shall come, that he may have His own with usury. Kind and experienced friends have tried to persuade her that her place is with her lap-dog, on the brocaded sofa in the parlor; she has tried to fill it patiently and faithfully; and, though not in itself an unpleasand occupation, she finds it leaves a good deal of valuable time on her hands—time of which eternity is to be the reflex—time which she would be glad to use, so that one mortal being might be the happier or the better for it. But how shall she do it? Ignorant of life, inexperienced in the world, and left very much to her own guidance, she may easily—as others equally pure in purpose have done before her—by ill-directed effort retard the work of wiser people than herself.

Who will guide her? Who will teach her? Her father, an excellent man and successful merchant, she sees only occasionally at dinner; the sound of his voice is rare in his own house, for he, too, is absorbed in his own work. Her brilliant and [illegible]iable stepmother is capable and content to shine alone, to fill the gay circle of the hours with mirth and beauty and sunshine. Truly, she, too, fulfils her work, and, pitying, cannot understand the foolish girl whose humbler gifts cannot be put forth in the same sphere. Troops of uncles and cousins and friends deplore or reprehend her fruitless search, warning her that the feebleness of her mental constitution and the delicacy of her physical organization must preclude the possibility of her work being profitable to any one; that she must consent to be like a flower borne on the breeze—like the sea-weed, fixed firmly on the rock, but dragged hither and thither as the current may drift; they urge her to forget the words of an old man, whom they hold more crazed than wise, who told her that "the Lord's kingdom is a kingdom of uses." But the flower and the sea-weed were made for a purpose, each for its own work and its own place. Is she of less account than they? What is her individual purpose, place and work? She does not wish that old age shall come upon her and find the problem unsolved. She cannot consent to sit down and let the tide of emigration from Here to the Hereafter pass by and leave her stranded, a worthless hull on the beach of life, useless alike to herself and to others, nor does she wish to sit idly and see the caravan of workers go by without an effort to join them, that haply she may find some load unlifted not too heavy for her to carry—some place in the ranks where no idler can stand. Not with loud cries would she disturb the busy ones at their own work; but, unanswered in her own home—as so many are—she ventures to put forth this little notice, in the hope that it may catch the eye of one wiser than she, who in charity may suggest the right and proper work, not for her alone, but for the many who like herself are condemned to be idle, doomed to be frivolous, reproached with their inevitable uselessness—some one who may send them word that they are not self-deceived; that they were not born in vain; that there is work for them to do; that there is indeed a place found for them.

NEW BOOKS.

THE house of Roman again lays us under obligations for an invoice of books received by the last steamer. Captain Brand, of the "Centipede," by "Harry Gringo," (H. A. Wise, U. S. N.,) is published by the Harpers from their Weekly, in the pages of which it first found place as a serial. As the name would indicate, it is a sea-story, and tells the life of a rascally pirate, and his death by the same cruel exposure he had planned for another. Lashed to a plank on a barren islet, he was left there to perish of hunger and thirst, if not stung to death by blue-bottle flies and gallinippers.

The Early Dawn; or, "Sketches of Christian Life in England," is by the author of Chronicles of the Schoneberg-Cotta Family. Like its predecessor, this book has a religious character, the scene being transferred from Germany to England. Commencing with the dawn of Christianity through the mists and shadows of the ancient Druidical faith, the history of Christian life in England is brought down by a series of simple sketches to the great Reformation. This covers a period of fifteen hundred years. The contests of the Saxon and the Norman are vividly pictured, their different traits are outlined, and the story of the Crusades is well told. The book is furthermore interesting, as furnishing a portraiture of the customs and traits of the olden times, which the author seems to have made a special study.

Azarian, by Miss Prescott, has all that floridity of style which characterizes the authoress of The Amber Gods. The plot of the story is much more simple than the language; altogether, it reminds the reader of one of her Atlantic articles.

Margaret and her Bridesmaids is by the author of The Queen of the County. It is a story of English life, and of course a reprint. It has freshness and originality, and the character of the heroine is one which men and gods admire, but which is seldom found on earth—all beauty, gentleness, goodness, affection and love. On the whole, however, the story is one which will have more interest for lady readers than to those of the masculine persuasion, and the criticism applies to it that we so often have to use—it would have been better if told in less compass.

Talk on Women's Topics is a charming little volume by "Jennie June," well known as a contributor to Eastern Periodicals. Jennie discourses so freshly and so pleasantly and so sensibly withal—a good thing in woman—that in lieu of criticism we cannot refrain from making a few extracts. Jennie's head is level, so far as babies are concerned, and girls may gather a hint from the other articles we subjoin: We predict that the book will take like a bunch of June roses:

THE BIGGEST BABY.

What is the reason of the singular passion which mothers seem to have for enormous babies? From the delight and triumph with which a ten-pound baby is exhibited, one would imagine that babies, like Chinese wives, were valued according to their weight. It makes a modest woman, whose baby only weighs six or seven pounds, feel a certain kind of mortification, as if she had failed in her duty in some way. In fact, to be admired, it has become necessary for a baby, in some sort, to be a monster. It must have a very large head, or a quantity of unnatural hair, or a development of intelligence totally at variance with all received ideas of babyhood, or limbs which give promise of a young Hercules, or a premature beard to elicit the exclamations of wonder, surprise, and pleasure, which are so gratifying to maternal instincts. A simply plump, sound rosy baby, who knows just enough to attend exclusively to its particular baby business of eating and sleeping, and does both well, is not half fast enough for this fast age—it finds no special favor in any but its mother's eyes until long afterwards, when it is found that the baby faculty of doing every thing well, and at the right time, clings to it and makes it a useful and valuable as well as pleasant member of the family and of society.

CHATTING AT HALL DOORS.

Girls, don't do it; it inevitably makes the young gentleman, whoever he is, imagine that you are desperately in love with him. Take an instance: A young gentleman, not a very intimate friend, calls in the evening. You had been lonesome, or had the blues, and feel grateful; you exert yourself to be as agreeable as possible, and, when he makes a move to leave, accompany him to the hall door, laughing and chatting in a way which you imagine is making a very favorable impression—in fact, positively bewitching. He, in return, is all bows and smiles and compliments, and assurances, and, if it isn't too freezing cold, becomes quite tender before he parts from you on the steps. But, my dear, just watch his look when the door is closed, and he superciliously pulls up his shirt collar as he steps out upon the pavement. It says, as plain as words could speak, "Poor girl, I must not go there too often; it is evident what is the matter with her; she's in love. What fools girls are! Why can't they give us a chance to do a little on our own account?" And from that time Mr. Modesty labors under the impression that a certain young lady is desperately in love with him, and is only waiting for him to throw the handkerchief, and nothing on earth could ever make him believe otherwise.

Not until the right man comes, and the wedding-ring is bought, should girls indulge in lingering adieus at the hall door.

HOW TO LEAN ON A GENTLEMAN'S ARM.

A short essay might be written on this subject, as one sees it practised on the evening and moonlight promenades. Without knowing a single person, it is possible to determine the exact degree of relationship they sustain by this simple and involuntary indication. There is the comfortable lock matrimonial, allowed only to stout respectable fathers and mothers of grown-up sons and daughters; and the lounge confidential, indulged in by cousins, and sometimes, when there is mischief afoot, and they are not fighting, by affectionate brothers and sisters. Then there is the gentle pressure of trust from the young wife, and the daring pressure, shameless, of a married flirt. The light touch of a young girl upon a strange coat sleeve, and the tender fold of a lover and his pretty fiancée.

A hundred other methods might be enumerated, especially if one could follow the promenaders out of the glare of the gaslight and into the shadow of the walks and avenues; but the most disagreeable of all is the formerly fashionable juxtaposition of shoulder to shoulder, the gentleman's arm held in at an angle, to support the elbow of a young lady. This close and confidential style is still affected by some very loud talking and showy young ladies, but whether gentlemen generally admire it or not in young women is a doubtful question.

THE author of The Pleasures of Hope was somewhat provoked by J. M. W. Turner, who spoke of painting and painters as superior to all other arts and artists. The poet arose, and after alluding with mock gravity to his friend's skill in varnishing painters as well as paintings, proposed the health of Mr. Turner and the worshipful company of Painters and Glaziers. Turner responded; acknowledged the honor conferred on him; made some allusion to blotters of foolscap whose works are appropriately bound in calf; and finished by proposing the health of Mr. Campbell and the worshipful company of Paperstainers.

IZAAK WALTON says: "Put your hook through the mouth [of the frog] and out of his gills, and then with a fine needle and silk sew the upper part of his leg, with only one stitch, to the arming wire of the hook, and in so doing, use him as though you loved him."

AN Irishman boasted that he had skated sixty miles in a day. "Sixty miles!" said a person who heard him; "it must have been when the days were longest!" "To be sure it was," replied the Irishman: "I admit that."

THE NOTTING HILL MYSTERY.

SECTION VII.

1.—Statement of Mr. Henderson.

IN the concluding portion of the evidence we have now a double object in view. First, to lay before you the various links by which the circumstances already detailed are connected into a single chain; and, secondly, to elucidate the general bearing of the whole upon the particular case of the death of Mme. R., into which it is my more immediate duty to inquire. It was this apparent connection with the entire story which first led me to investigate matters otherwise quite beyond my province, and you will, I have no doubt, after reading the evidence, concur in the propriety of my so doing.

It is unfortunate that, in this important part of the case, as previously with regard to the no less important point of the suspicious circumstances attendant on Mme. R.'s first illness at Bognor, the evidence of the principal witnesses is open to very grave question. It is not indeed, as then, that the moral character of the individuals themselves rests under any suspicion, for, so far as I have been able to learn, both the servant-of-all-work, and her lover, John Styles, are perfectly respectable people, whilst the young man Aldridge, though certainly a foolish and perhaps rather a dissipated young fellow, has a very fair character from the house of business in which he is now employed. But the evidence of the two former is, as will be seen, greatly diminished in value by the circumstances under which it was obtained, whilst, in the latter, there is so clear a suspicion of animus as cannot but throw still greater doubts upon evidence in itself sufficiently questionable—and rendered yet more so by other circumstances which will hereafter more fully appear.

It was this man Aldridge, whose letter, as you will remember, led to the investigation, of which the result is now before you; and his statement, hereto annexed, that first gave substance to the suspicions of foul play on the part of the Baron, and, in conjunction with the discovery of the enclosed papers, subsequently induced me to extend my inquiries to the cases of Mr. and Mrs. Anderton. I confess that, notwithstanding the doubt with which his statement is surrounded, I am still inclined to accept it as substantially true, though possibly somewhat colored by personal feeling against the Baron. The point, however, has seemed to me of sufficient importance to justify the occupying a considerable portion of this present division of the case with such evidence as I have been able to gather respecting the circumstances of his final ejectment, and it will be for you to determine between the story as told by himself and that of Baron R.

With regard to the other two witnesses who, by one of those singular coincidences that, in criminal cases, seem so often to occur, are able to confirm in some degree the evidence of Aldridge, there is, I think, less difficulty. They had certainly no business where they were, but the circumstances are such as to fully acquit them of any felonious intent, while even had such existed, it would be difficult to see how the fact of such intent could have exercised any influence over their present statements. It is moreover quite clear that there has been no collusion on the subject.

I have now only to refer, in conclusion, to the fragment of paper found in the Baron's rooms in Russell Place, and the marked copy of the Zoist, belonging to the late Mr. Anderton, to which Mr. Morton referred in his statement [See Section II., 2] as having formed the subject of discussion at Mr. Anderton's house on the evening of the 13th of October, 1854. The first of these is a portion of a letter, which I have endeavored, so far as possible, to complete. Admitting that I have done so correctly, and coupling it with the fact of the visit which, as I have been able to ascertain, was paid by a foreign lady to the Baron "very early in the morning" following the death of Mme. R., it appears to throw no inconsiderable light upon the extraordinary circumstances of the death of Mme. R. The bearing of the latter upon the case will be perhaps less clear. I have no hesitation in admitting that when the connection first suggested itself to my own mind, I at once dismissed it as too absurd to be entertained for a moment. But I feel bound to add that the further my inquiries have progressed, the more strongly this apparent connection has forced itself upon me as the only clue to a maze of coincidences such as it has never before been my lot to encounter, and that while even now unable to accept it as a fact, I find it still more impossible to thrust it altogether on one side. I have therefore left the matter for your decision, merely pointing out, as I have before, in the opening portion of my report, that, even admitting the influence of these passages upon the mind of the Baron, and the ultimate success of the plan founded upon their suggestion, that success, however extraordinary, may not necessarily involve, as at first appears, the admission of those monstrous assertions of the "mesmeric" journal on which it was based.

With these observations, I now submit to your consideration the concluding portion of the evidence, after which it will only be necessary for me to take a brief review of the whole case before leaving it finally in your hands.

2.—Statement of Mrs. Jackson.

My name is Mary Jackson. I live in Goswell Street, City Road. I am a monthly and sick-nurse. In June, 1856, I was engaged to nurse Mme. R. I was recommended to the Baron by Dr. Marsden, who lodged in the same house. I have often nursed for him. Mme. R. was not very ill. I don't think she was ill enough to require a nurse. Of course she was the better for one—everybody always is—but she could have done without one. I came by the Baron's wish. He was anxious like. The poor gentleman was very fond of his wife. I never saw such a good husband. I am sure no other husband would have done what he did, and she so cold to him. I don't think she cared about him at all. She hardly ever spoke to him unless it was when he spoke first. She never spoke much. She always seemed frightened; especially when the Baron was there. She certainly seemed to be afraid of him, but I can't tell why. He was always kind to her. He was the nicest and most civil-spoken gentleman I ever knew. It was not that he was not particular. Quite the reverse. I wish all husbands were half so particular, and then nurses wouldn't so often get into trouble. Everything used to be done like clockwork. Every morning he used to give me a paper what was to be given in the day. I mean medicine and food. A list of everything, with the time it was to be taken. Everything used to be ready, and I used to give it regular. No one else ever used to give anything. The Baron never gave anything himself. Never at all. I am quite sure of that. He used to say that it was nurse's business, and so it is. He often said he had seen so much sickness he had learned never to interfere with the nurse, and I only wish all other gentlemen would do the same. He used to be very particular about the physic. We always have the bottles for our perquisites. We get a shilling a dozen for them all round if they are clean. The Baron objected to this. He allowed me a shilling a dozen instead. The bottles were all put away in a cupboard. They never used to be quite emptied. The Baron always made a point of having fresh physic in before the old was quite finished. He said he always liked to have them to refer to in case of accident or mistake. He was a very careful gentleman. I nursed Mme. R. every day until her recovery. I am quite certain that during the hours I was there nothing was ever given to her but what passed through my hands.

3.—Statement of Mrs. Ellis.

My name is Jane Ellis. I am a sick-nurse, and live in Goodge street, Tottenham Court Road. In about the end of July, 1856, I was engaged as night nurse to Mme. R. Perhaps she did not exactly need one. She was ill, but she could help herself. At times she was very ill. It was more comfortable for her, and she could afford it. Baron R. never seemed to spare anything for her. She was generally worse at night. The worst attacks used to come on about every fortnight. It was generally on a Saturday. I took turn and turn about with Mrs. Jackson. She took the day work and I took the night. I used to come at ten o'clock, and leave at breakfast time. During that time I was never out of the room. It was the Baron's particular desire. When I first came he made it a condition that I should never go to sleep and never leave the room. He was the most particular gentleman I ever nursed for. I have nothing whatever to say against him. Quite the contrary. He was always civil and pleasant spoken, and behaved most handsome, as a gentleman should do. He was uncommon fond of the lady. She didn't seem to care much about him. She was ill, poor soul, and could not care about anybody. She seemed quite frightened like. When the Baron came into the room she used to follow him about with her eyes as if she was afraid of him. I never heard him say an unkind word. Other times she would lie quite quiet, and not speak a word for hours. She seemed afraid of everybody. If I moved around the room, I could see her eyes following me about and watching me everywhere. I think it was part of her complaint. The Baron was most attentive. I never saw such an attentive husband. He used to lie in the next room. It opened into the bedroom. He always had the door wide open. He was a wonderfully light sleeper. If either of us spoke a word he would be in the room directly to ask what was the matter. I couldn't even move across the room but what he would hear it. He was a wonderful man. He seemed to live without sleep. I think it must have been the meat that did it. He used to eat enormous quantities of meat. I never saw a man eat so much. When I first came he used to joke with me about it. Mme. R. was not so bad then, and we used to talk sometimes. He told me it was because he was a mesmeriser. I don't believe in mesmerism. I told him so. He didn't say anything; he only laughed. One night he offered to send me to sleep. That was when I had been there about a week. I said he might try if he could. He looked hard at me, ever so long, and made some odd motions with his hands. I did go to sleep. I don't believe it was mesmerism. Of course not. I think it was looking at his eyes. I told him so. He asked if he should do it again. He did it once more. That was the night after. I went to sleep then almost directly. Of course I knew it was not mesmerism, but I couldn't help it. He did not talk about it any more. He only said that I must take care not to go to sleep of my own accord. I did drop asleep three or four times after that. That was not from anything the Baron did. He was not in the room at the time. He must have been in the next room. I suppose the door was open. It always was. The first time I went to sleep was about a week after we talked about the mesmerism. It was on a Saturday night, or Friday. I am not quite sure which. It was one of the nights when Mme. R. was ill. She had gone to sleep at about 11 o'clock. She seemed very well then. She was sleeping quite quiet. I suppose I must have dropped off. I was awoke by her moaning in her sleep. That was about 1 o'clock. She soon woke up in great pain, and had a very bad attack. The Baron came into the room just as I awoke. Something woke him, and he came in directly. He told me what it was that woke him. It was me snoring. He said so. I fell asleep again a fortnight after in the same way. The Baron was not there. Mme. R. was asleep. She had not slept for many nights. I must have dropped off in a doze hearing her so nicely asleep. The Baron woke me. That was at about 1 o'clock. He was very much displeased. He told me Mme. R. had been walking in her sleep and might have killed herself. He said she went into the kitchen. I am certain that was where he said. I can swear it. He asked what I had taken for supper, and tasted what was left of the beer. He seemed very much vexed and disturbed. I was very sorry, and promised to be very careful another time. I never had such a thing happen in any other case, and I told him so. He said he would look over it that time, but it must never happen again. He went up-stairs afterwards. I think it was to speak to somebody. He said somebody had seen her, I think. Mme. R. was ill that night. She began to moan while we were talking, and had a very bad attack. The Baron said she must have caught cold, and I am afraid she did. I determined to be particularly careful for the time to come. I was very careful for some time, particularly when she was asleep. She hardly slept at all for two weeks, but when she did I was very careful. At the end of that time I must have fallen asleep again. I was hardly aware of it. I know I must have been asleep, because when I looked at the clock it was two hours later than I thought. Mme. R. was ill again that night. I was very much vexed. I began to think somebody was playing tricks upon me. It was so strange, coming every fortnight. I did not tell the Baron that I had fallen asleep. I know it was wrong, but I was afraid. Next fortnight I was on the look out. Mme. R. went to sleep again. I was determined not to go to sleep. I thought somebody must have played tricks with the beer, so I couldn't drink it. I ate no supper and drank nothing but some strong green tea I made for myself. I was quite sure the tea must keep me awake. It did not. I awoke with a great start about 1 o'clock, and found Mme. R. bad again as usual. I was very much bothered about it. I made up my mind to tell the Baron if it happened again. It did happen again, but I did not tell him. Mme. R. was so bad then I was really afraid, and, after that, it never happened again, and she got well. I know I ought to have told the Baron. I am very sorry I did not. Such a thing never happened to me before. Of course I have slept in a sick-room before, but not when it was against orders. I was there about three months. I dropped asleep in that way, I think, six times, but I am not quite sure. It was always while Mme. R. was asleep. She was always bad afterwards. I did not say anything to her about it, or about her walking. The Baron particularly desired I would not. He said it would frighten her. He never asked me again whether I had been asleep, or I would have told him. I was really going to tell him once or twice, but something always happened to stop me. I can swear that nothing of the kind ever happened to me before. There must have been something wrong. I have sick-nursed twenty years, and have the best characters from many doctors and patients. —[This I find to be the case.—R. H.]

4.—Statement of Mr. Westmacott.

"LONDON, 20th September, 1857.

"SIR,—I have the honor to inform you that in compliance with your request I have submitted to the most careful and searching examination and analysis, the contents of three dozen and seven (43) medicine phials forwarded by you for that purpose.

"The number and contents of these phials correspond exactly with the prescriptions, etc., furnished by Messrs. Andrews and Empson, [the chemists from whom the Baron obtained his medicines,] and after the most exact analysis I have been unable to detect the slightest trace of either arsenic, antimony, or any similar substance.

"I have the honor to be your most obedient servant,

"THOMAS WESTMACOTT, Analytical Chemist."

5.—Statement of Henry Aldridge.

My name is Henry Aldridge. I am a clerk in the employ of Messrs. Simpson & Co., City. In the summer of 1856 I came to lodge at Mrs. Brown's, in Russell Place. I did not come there first as a lodger, but as a friend of her son. I had known him in Australia. We were together in the same store in Melbourne, and got to be great friends. We did not come home in the same ship. That is a mistake. I came home some weeks before he did, and was in Liverpool when he arrived. I think he came in the Lightning, but cannot be sure. I used to board so many ships that I can't call to mind. I was in a Liverpool house then for a time, and it was my duty to board every ship as she came up. I agreed to go with him to London. I could not go directly, as I had to give notice to my employers, but I was to follow him. He asked me to stay with him for his wedding at his mother's house, and I did so. That was how I first came to Russell Place. After that he arranged with his mother for me to take a room regularly, and I was to pay so much a week and so much more when I got a situation. I was not aware of the Baron making any objection. I saw very little of him. I slept on the floor above, and was always very careful not to make any noise on account of Mme. R. She was ill and I took particular care not to disturb her. I used sometimes to be out late. I have been intoxicated in my life. Not very often. Not at all while I was in Russell Place. I have been out to my friends while I was there, and have drank wine and spirits, but never to be the worse for it. I may have been merry. I don't say I have not been once or twice excited with wine. What I mean is, that I have never been in such a state as not to be conscious of what I was doing, and quite able to control myself. I am quite certain that I never made the slightest disturbance or could have done so without knowing it. That I will swear to. I believe the Baron accused me of it to Mrs. Brown. He spoke to her several times about it, and wished her to turn me out. She said she had never seen anything wrong, and couldn't say anything till she did, because I was her son's friend. At last he got her to do it. The reason was that I was found by a policeman on the doorstep at about twelve o'clock one night insensible. The policeman knocked and rang and woke up the house, and the Baron said I was drunk. I was perfectly sober. I had nothing whatever but one small bottle of ale. The facts of the case were these and I will swear to them. I had been kept late at our office with some heavy correspondence, and had then walked home with another clerk from the same office—Wells—having taken nothing but one small bottle of ale, which I had at a public house in High Holborn, as I felt quite tired. Wells had some brandy-and-water. He left me at the corner of Tottenham Court Road. When I got to Russell Place I tried to open the door with my latch-key, but the latch was fastened. I then rang at the bell, but could not make it sound, and the handle came out loose as if the wire was broken. I tried the key once more, and was just thinking whether I should not go to some place, as I did not like to disturb Mme. R. by knocking, when the door was opened from the inside. I turned round to go in when something was thrust into my face, and I can remember nothing more. I must have fallen down insensible, and the policeman found me. This is the truth. I could not see who opened the door. There was a street lamp close to the area gate, but the person was in the shadow. I cannot account for it. I made sure at the time it was a trick of the Baron to get me turned out. I think so still, but am not so sure of it as I was. What I mean is, that, on reflection, I do not think it was certain enough to accuse him of such a thing. I will swear to the truth of what I have said. I will swear that I was perfectly sober—as sober as I am now. My employers and Will Wells can prove it. I do not know why the Baron should have wished so much to turn me out. We never had words about anything. I don't think I ever spoke to him but once. I mean not more than "Good morning," or such like. That was on the occasion about which I wrote to the Assurance Office after Mme. R.'s death. It was one Saturday night. I had had a half-holiday, and had been up to Putney in a boat with some friends. We had drank a good deal of beer and shandy-gaff, but I was not drunk. I was quite sober, though perhaps a little excited. Nothing to speak of.

I got home at about eleven o'clock. I had a latch-key then, but the lock was hampered; and when I got back home I found the servant girl sitting up to let me in. I went up very quietly not to disturb Mme. R. I saw her bed-room-door ajar as I passed. The door of the next room to it was wide open, and there was some sort of a lamp burning. No one moved or said anything as I went by. I took off my shoes to go more softly, but the house was old, and it was impossible to move without the stairs creaking a little. The stairs below the Baron's room were stone and did not creak. I had a candle which I shaded carefully with my hand. I went to bed, but I suppose I was over-tired, for I couldn't get to sleep. The night was very hot. When I had been in bed about a couple of hours I thought I would have a good wash and see if that would cool me. I got up and went to the washhand-stand. I found the jug empty. The maid often forgot to fill it. I took the jug and went out on to the landing to fill it at the tap. I went out very softly, so as not to disturb Mme. R. As I got on to the landing, I saw some one coming out of her room, and went to look over the bannister. From the landing of my room you can see that of the floor below. I looked over, and saw that it was Mme. R. She was in her dressing-gown, but had no candle. She went to the stairs, and there I lost sight of her. As I watched her past the door of the other room, I saw the shadow of a man's head and shoulders upon the wall, as if somebody was watching her. I leaned against the bannister to watch her, and it creaked, and the shadow vanished directly. When I looked up again it was gone, and at first I thought it must have been fancy, but I am quite certain about it now. I was only doubtful for the moment; it was so sudden; I could swear to it now; I saw it perfectly plain. I saw it all the time Mme. R. was going down the first flight of stairs; about twelve of them. She was at the corner when I turned and leaned over to watch her. I felt convinced that Mme. R. was walking in her sleep. The staircase was quite dark beyond the corner, and she had walked straight down: I was afraid she would hurt herself, and went down to the Baron's door. He was asleep; at least I had to knock twice. He then came to the door, and I told him what I had seen. He seemed a good deal annoyed, and at once took up the lamp, and went down stairs. I looked over the bannister, and saw him go down. From that place you can see right down to the door which leads to the kitchen stairs. There is a glass partition between them and the hall. I saw him go in at the door, and I saw the light through the glass as he went part of the way down stairs. Presently he came up again, and stood back from the door while Mme. R. came up past him and walked up stairs, and he then followed her. When I saw her coming up, I went back to my own landing and looked over. She went back to her own room, fast asleep still, as it seemed to me, and he followed. I heard whispering in the room, and then the Baron came up to me. He thanked me very much for telling him, and said that Mme. R. had gone down into the kitchen, and was just coming out as he got to the foot of the stairs. He particularly begged me never to mention it, as it might come to her ears and do her harm, and I have never spoken of it to any one till I wrote to the Assurance Office. I had almost forgotten all about it when it was recalled to my mind by seeing that poor Mme. R. had killed herself in a sleep-walking fit. I then wrote. I had no malice against the Baron, nor have I now. I don't know why he tried to turn me out; I suppose he really thought I disturbed his wife. He was very fond of her, and I dare say he was anxious and fretful about her. I was very angry at the time, but when I come to think of it, I dare say I was hard upon him. He never seemed to bear me any grudge about what I had seen; on the contrary, he always said he was very much obliged to me. This is all I know on the subject, and I can swear to the truth of every word. I am quite positive he said Mme. R. had been into the kitchen.

6. Statement of Miles Thompson.

I am a police constable. In August, 1856, I used to be on night duty at Russell Place. I remember Baron R. speaking to me one night, and asking me to keep a lookout as often as I could of a night to keep the street quiet. He gave me five shillings for my extra trouble. I was on the beat one night about 12 o'clock when I saw some one lying on the Baron's door-step. It was a young gentleman, and at first I thought he was dead, but found he was only insensible. I set him up against the railings, and was going to ring the bell, when I saw a latch-key in his hand. I tried it in the door, and it opened directly, and I took him into the hall. I then knocked and rang till somebody came. The bell rang quite well. The Baron came down in his dressing-gown, and two other people. I offered to go for a doctor, but the Baron said he was only drunk. I helped to carry him up-stairs and get him into bed. The Baron gave me half a crown for my trouble. He seemed very much annoyed, as was natural, and said he wished I had taken the young man to the station. I think he was drunk myself; he smelt a little of beer, but not much. I helped put him to bed, and went away. That is all I know.

[N. B.—By letters from Messrs. Simpson and Mr. Wells, Mr. Aldridge's assertion that he was sober is borne out up to the time of the latter's leaving him at the corner of Tottenham Court Road, certainly not more than half an hour before he was found as above stated by police constable Thompson. —R. H.]

7. Statement of Johnson.

to mister endusson sir obeadent to yore Comands i hev eksammd tha belwir in russle please wich in my humbel Hopinnium it hev ben Tempid wit by sum Hunperfeshnl And wich tha Wir it hev ben tuk hof tha Kranke & putt bak hall nohowlik wich hany Purfeshnl and wud bo a Shamnd fur 2 du It I am sur yore hobeadnt survnt too Comand jon jonsun
Plommr hand belanger totunmcort rode lundou

8. Statement of Susan Turner.

My name is Susan Turner. In August, 1856, I was general servant to Mrs. Brown in Russell Place. I remember the night that Mme. R. came down-stairs. I had sat up to let Mr. Aldridge in because the latch was broken; Mistress broke it that afternoon. I don't suppose the Baron knew anything about it. Mr. Aldridge came in rather late. I cannot justly say the time. He was quite right; I mean quite sober. He went straight up to bed. I did not go up to bed. My young man was in the kitchen. He is a very respectable young man upon a railway; I don't know what railway; I know he goes to Scotland sometimes with his engine, that is all. He is what they call a fireman. He was going down with a luggage train somewhere that night very late, and came to see me. Mistress didn't know he was there: he came in after she was gone to bed. He was to start at 2, and we sat till about 1; he was just going away, and we were standing at the kitchen door when we heard somebody in the hall. I said: "O Lord! that's missis." He said: "She'll be coming to look for you," and wanted me to go and meet her while he cut out by the area. I said no, that wouldn't do, by reason of it being all glass and a gas lamp at the top of the area steps. I pulled him along to the lumber-room; the lumber-room is behind the kitchen and the cellar. There are some old boxes and things there, but nobody ever goes into it; I thought my mistress would not think of looking there. Just as we got to the door we saw somebody come from the hall and down the stairs. I whispered to John: "Why that's not missis—that's Madame." My mistress was very tall and stout, and Mme. R. was small and thin. I could see her as she came through the door, because there was some sort of light in the hall. She came right down-stairs and past where we were. She went right on into the little place at the end where the Baron kept all his bottles and stuff. She did not go into the kitchen; not at all; I will swear to that. She went into the Baron's place; the laboratory, I dare say it is—I don't know—it was where the bottles are. John and me crept to the window and looked out. The window of the lumber-room looks right into the window of the back room where the bottles are. You could see it quite plain. It was a bright moonlight night, and there is a sort of tin looking-glass over the back room window to make more light like. We saw Madame go into the room and take a bottle from a shelf. She poured out a glassful and drank it. Then she put the bottle back in its place. It was the last in the second shelf. Then she went out again, and when we turned round we saw a light shining into the room from the kitchen stairs. It stayed there till madame had gone past our door again, and then it went up again. Just as it got to the top of the stairs I peeped out and saw it was the Baron. The madame was close behind him. I said to John, "Why, John, there's the Baron." He said he supposed he had come to look after his wife. After they had gone John and me went into the bottle place. We found the glass on the table; there were a few drops of stuff in it. John and me smelt it, and it was just like wine. It tasted just like wine, too. Then we looked for the bottle. It was at the end of the second shelf. It was about half full of stuff that looked like wine. There was something in gold letters on the bottle. I can't tell what it was. It was "vin" something. I know that, because John and me settled it must mean wine. I think I should know the rest if I saw it—[being here shown several labels, witness picked out the following: "Vin. Ant. Pot. Tart.," designating antimonial wine, a mixture of sherry and tartar emetic]—I am pretty sure that was the one. I remember it because they were funny words. I remember John and me joking about "pots" and "pies." The stuff in the bottle smelt just like wine. It was just like sherry wine. I did not taste that. John wouldn't let me. He said I might go and poison myself for aught I knew. We put the bottle back and then John went away. I said nothing about it to anybody, not even when madame was taken ill that night. I was afraid by reason of John. I have never said a word about it to any living soul till I was asked to-day. Certainly not to Mr. Aldrich, nor he to me. I will swear to the truth of all I have said. I am quite positive that the madame never came near the kitchen. I am quite positive that the Baron must have seen her come out of the bottle place. He was standing with the candle in his hand waiting for her. That I can swear.

[N. B.—The statement of the "young man" referred to fully corroborates the above statement.]

9.—Copy of a letter from a leading Mesmerist to the compiler, with reference to the power claimed by mesmeric operators over those subjected to their influence.

DORSET SQUARE.

MY DEAR SIR.— . . . . Many times after throwing Sarah Parsons into the mesmeric state, I have willed her to go into a dark room and pick up a pin or other article equally minute, and however powerless she might be at the time out of the state was quite immaterial. My will and power being employed was sufficient. Then, Mr. L——, a paralytic, under my influence, without losing consciousness or undergoing any recognizable change, has many times, with the lame leg, stepped up on to and down again from an ordinary dining-room chair. This, of course, was a masterpiece of mesmeric manipulation. I wish I could write more and better, but my eyes forbid. . . .

"With kindest regards, yours most truly,

"D. HANDS."

10.—Fragment of a Letter found in the Baron's room after the death of Mme. R.

pendrait n'e auvre philippe? E t enfant, ce pauvre
ui nous regarde du
'est ce pas philipp
ns ne reverrons ja
t enfant je te le j
is bien capable j
core un fois, aujo
13, le 15, de grand rai chez toi; il fa
e trouve seul, tu n
ul au monde! n'
pas bien le moy
h! philippe je t'ai is tu cc qu
cumme ja

COMPLETED.

. . . On (?)
tc..pendrait n'e...st ce pas mon p...auvre philippe? E...h bien par ce...t cufaut, ce pauvre...petit ange (?) q...ui nous regarde du...haut du ciel, n...'est cc pas philipp...e et que no...us no reverrons ja...mais, par e...t enfant je te le j...uro. Tu m'en sa...is bien capable j...c crois. En..corc un fois, aujo...urd'hui c'est le....13, le 15, de grand....matin je sc...rai chez toi; il fa...ut que je t...e trouve seul, tu n...e comprends; se..ul au mondel n'...en sais tu...pas bien le moy...en? O...h! philippe je t'ai...me (je t'aime?) sa...is tu cc qu...e c'est qu' une f...emme ja...louse?

Translation of above.

(They) would hang thee, would they not, my poor Philip? Well, by that child—that poor (little angel) who is now—is it not so, Philip?—looking down on us from heaven, and whom we shall never see again—by that child I swear it to you. Once more. To-day is the 13th. On the 15th very early in the morning I shall be at your house. I must find you alone—you understand me, alone in the world! Do you not well know the means? Oh, Philip, I love thee (I love thee.) Knowest thou what a jealous woman is?

11.—Extracts from the "Zoist Magazine," No. XLVII., for October, 1854.

"MESMERIC CURE OF A LADY WHO HAD BEEN TWELVE YEARS IN THE HORIZONTAL POSITION, WITH EXTREME SUFFERING. By the Rev. R. A. F. Barrett, B. D., Senior Fellow of King's College, Cambridge.

* * * * *

"In January, 1852, I was calling upon ———, when she happened to tell me that she had been in considerable pain for a fortnight past; that the only thing that relieved her was mesmerism; but the friend who used to mesmerize her was gone. . . . I continued to mesmerize her occasionally for some months. . . .

"April 21st.—I kept her asleep an hour and a quarter in the morning and the same in the evening. She said* her throat looked parched and feverish; at her request I ate some black currant paste, which she said moistened it. She said, 'Before you ate, my stomach was contracted and had a queer-looking sort of moisture in it; now the stomach is its full size and does not look shrunk, and part of the moisture is gone.'

"I. 'But you could not get nourishment so?'

"A. 'Yes; I could get all my system wants.'

* * * * *

"April 26th.—In the evening I kept her asleep one hour, and took tea for her.

"April 27th.— . . . I ate dinner and she felt much stronger.

* * * * *

"I kept her asleep two hours and a quarter in the morning and one hour in the evening, eating for her as usual."

* In a former portion of the case we are told that this patient was a clairvoyant and could see her own internal condition.—R. H.

HEDGING TO SAVE A DOWRY.

THE turf, for the first time in French stable history, has commanded intense interest by the victory which Vermouth won over Blair Athol. Everybody bet who could procure money to stake or could find that indispensable vis-a-vis, a brother better. A good story is told in connection with the late race which will bear repeating. M. de —— is one of the most zealous members of the Jockey Club, and passes here for quite an authority in all matters connected with the turf. Of course he is a heavy better on all races, and his estate has been embarrassed somewhat by his lost debts. Chance's courtiers are all unlucky dogs; none ever grow wealthy, and the majority of them die bankrupt. He has a daughter fast approaching the marriageable age, and her dowry is still below the horizon, to the great distress of her mother, who knows if her daughter's charms are not set in a golden frame nobody will admire them so far forth as matrimony. When she heard that her husband had bet 100,000f. that the French horse would would win, she was greatly alarmed. She, as well as ninety people out of every hundred here, believed that Blair Athol must win; and she knew that if her husband lost the 100,000f. he had staked, her daughter's dowry would not be amassed till the advent of the week with seven Sundays. What could she do? The night before the race she wrote to a very wealthy and very gallant member of the Jockey Club a pressing and polite note begging him to meet a lady the next morning at 6 o'clock, A. M., at the Arc de Triomphe, who appealed to his honor and delicacy to do her a great service. The note bore no signature. A pair of woman's eyes will attract a Parisian to the ends of the earth. The gentleman to whom the note was addressed, assured that there was an adventure of gallantry suggested in this letter, was punctual to the hour, early as it was, and he found even more punctual than himself the hack with closed curtains which the note had indicated as containing the lady who would see him. As he approached the door, she thickly veiled, opened the door and pointed to the vacant seat by her side. He entered. She raised the veil, and to his astonishment he discovered Mme. de ——, the wife of his old chum and friend, the zealous member of the Jockey Club. He was greatly puzzled to imagine what she could want, for her honor is too well established for so much as a suspicion to her disadvantage to enter his mind. She did not leave him long in this perplexity, for he was scarcely seated than she said: "It was not a woman, it was a mother who appealed to you—a mother uneasy about the fortune of her children. Louise ought to be married. She will require about 100,000f. dowry, and this sum may still be borrowed on our estate, despite the existing mortgages. Now, pray tell me—you see the important interests I have at stake—is it true that my husband has bet 100,000f. on to-day's races?" "I am not very familiar with his bets for to-day, but I believe the sum total of his bets must be very nearly 100,000f." "Very well, that is just ten times more than he ought to bet. I have remonstrated with him in vain. I have besought him ineffectually. Only one thing is left for me to do: I must bet on the race. I bet 90,000f. that the English horses win. Will you accept my bet?" "Willingly, madame." They parted. After the races the husband came home almost delirious with joy. He had won 100,000f. His wife became very pale, when she found that it was necessary for her to confess that she had hedged his book, and that so far from winning 100,000f., he had only won 10,000f. Imagine the disappointment a man must feel who tumbles from profits of 100,000f. down to a beggarly 10,000f.! The husband stormed a good deal, but there was no help for it; and the mother bore the storm with patience, for at all events Louise's dowry was saved.

NOTICE

The publication of "The Californian" takes place on Saturday marnings, and copies may be obtained in the City at all News-stands, and of our News-agents through the country. It will also be served by carriers on the morning of publication.

* Correspondents will address all communications, business and otherwise, to C. H. WEBB, Office of "The Californian," 728 Montgomery street, San Francisco.*

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 3, 1864.

With the present number, The Californian passes out from the editorship and proprietorship under which it has hitherto been conducted. Its control is committed to competent and experienced hands, and in no essential features will the character of the journal be changed. In retiring from the chair which he has occupied since The Californian first appeared as a candidate for public favor, the editor takes occasion to thank his contributors for the help they have given towards the establishment of the journal; and while he clasps his friends and readers warmly by the hand in this brief word of farewell, he trusts that they will render to the new management that support of which he is confident it will prove eminently worthy.

THE CHICAGO NOMINATIONS.

THE Democratic Convention at Chicago has resulted, as was predicted it would from the first, in the nomination of Gen. McClellan for the Presidency. George H. Pendleton, of Ohio, was nominated as Vice President, but this office is one which is not taken much into account in making up the book. It is on the head of the ticket that the fight is to be made, and with it the battle will turn. The platform on which Gen. McClellan's feet are placed is called a peace platform, but to our thinking there is not a plank nor the piece of a plank in it that can float the candidate any nearer the White House than he was when he stood on the Virginia Peninsula. It will be hard to persuade the people of the North "that the war has lasted long enough," simply because every tick of the telegraph and every whisper that comes from the battle-fields tells them that it has not. The war was not inaugurated for a summer-day's sport; it was undertaken for a serious purpose. When that purpose is accomplished it will have lasted long enough; until it be, its existence has been of too brief duration though it had begun in the year 1800 and this were the close of the century. There is something more than a mere struggle for supremacy in arms involved in this present contest; the vindication of a principle is aimed at. The world has always questioned whether a republican form of government possessed in itself the elements of that cohesive power necessary to make a government lasting. It was claimed that a government based on the voice of the people would totter and fall when that people became disunited in their counsels; that a republican government is a thread of silk which can be cut at pleasure by a dissatisfied minority, while monarchial rule is a band of iron, so far as national unity is concerned—a chain which individuals cannot shake off at pleasure. Our yeomen exchanged their plough-shares for swords to teach the world a useful lesson—to make it plain to Hapsburg, Braganza and Guelph that a President's chair stands on a foundation as firm as a king's throne; to show to nations that a ruler whom themselves elect is hedged by as much divinity and clothed with as much right to govern as could be possessed by the descendant of any man upon whose head their remote ancestry chose to place a crown; to show the world, in short, that a compact entered into by the people of a nation establishing a form of government is as binding as any traditional tenets of allegiance that can be handed down from the dusty shelves of antiquity. When this truth is fairly established the Democratic proposition that "this war has lasted long enough" can be accepted, but until then all appeals to the people based upon it must fall on unheeding ears. This is not the time to confess that all the blood and treasure poured out so lavishly in vindication of a great principle has been spilt in vain, and propositions of peace, if any are to be made, must come from those who first loosed the red thunderbolts of war.

A better nomination than the Chicago Convention has made that Convention could not possibly have effected. Gen. McClellan stands well with his party, for the simple reason that they know very little about him politically. He is an excellent exponent and representative of the Peace policy, because even when at the head of one of the finest armies ever the world saw he did not make war. He evidently thought from the first moment of being appointed to command, that "this war has lasted long enough"; he was moderate at Manassas, peaceable on the Peninsula, courteous at Centerville, not especially active at Antietam. That he will display much more force in the coming political campaign than he did in his past military ones, we do not imagine or believe. Before it is half over he will probably conclude that the thing has lasted long enough. His chances for election can be summed up in the compass of a cipher, for even were he competent to the Presidency, he is the exponent of a doctrine which the nation will not listen to. There is mourning in nearly every home in the land, and it will be hard to persuade our people that their hearthstones have been made desolate in vain, and that it is right now to adopt a policy which the unanimous national voice rejected in the beginning. It will be found hard to persuade even those who are loudest in anticipations of McClellan's election to back him with their betting-books, though the long odds are laid against him. There is money in the market looking for investment, and a better one than five to three on the defeat of the Peace Party's ticket could not be asked for.

THE OPPOSITION LINE.

IT is generally understood that the line of steamships between this port and New York, known as the Opposition Line, has ceased to exist as an opposition line, having sold their ships to the new company who are reopening the Nicaragua route. There are still two lines of steamships plying, but they have adopted about the same rates of fare, and the competition between them is reduced to a simple struggle for public patronage based upon the claims of the respective routes.

Since this change has been made there has been but one opinion expressed by the travelling community, and that is one of regret. Even the very newspapers which on all occasions gave the Opposition line the cold shoulder—publishing the trivial complaints of those dissatisfied passengers who are to be found at the end of all voyages, and indirectly using the means best calculated to create a popular prejudice against the new line—these very newspapers now complain because it has ceased to exist, and rather find fault with the proprietors for its suspension. They say that the interests of California must suffer materially in consequence, and that the growth of the State will be retarded; that nothing is more calculated to provoke immigration and induce a vitality in business interests than an opposition line of steamships and the consequent cheap fares which rule.

The fact of the matter is there is, always a public howl for an opposition, and there is always a failure on the part of the public to support it when one comes. Recognizing what seemed to be a legitimate and a permanent demand, Mr. Roberts tried an experiment which will not be tried again, we fancy, this century. He re-opened the old Nicaragua route, put on an excellent line of boats, and put down the prices of passage very materially. He gave his passengers the best accommodations that it was possible for him to provide, he carried them at less rates than they would have been compelled to pay under other conditions—and lost money in the enterprise with a commendable liberality and fortitude. How did it end? Hardly had the Moses Taylor got regularly to running when she was plastered over with passenger-suits. Those who took passage to this coast in the steerage, paying about half the rates which the other line charged, grumbled because they were not furnished with cabin comforts and cabin fare, and brought suits against the vessel. A woman who sprained her ancle in jumping ashore from a gang-plank upon which passengers were forbidden to tread, sued the line for a new leg. And California Courts gave the plaintiffs verdicts; California papers took up the cry of bad food and ill-treatment, and endorsed the verdict. Under all these adverse circumstances and combinations, the Opposition line struggled on until now, when it has become a thing of the past, and of the two ocean routes by which California may be reached the choice has become simply a matter of taste, the rates of passage being the same. The people and the press mourn that there is no longer a cheap avenue to and from their Golden Gate, but they have only themselves to blame for it. Those who were brought out cheaply will find it quite another thing getting home. Perhaps they will have better fare and more room than the Opposition line gave them, but they will have to pay more. And it may possibly happen that their friends on the other side who wish to join them will be prevented from doing so simply by the difference between the regular prices and those which the Opposition Company inaugurated; a few dollars in gold, now-a-days, may very well interpose as an insurmountable barrier between the two coasts. Opposition is said to be the life of trade; if people want it, however, they must support it. They can perhaps revive it by giving such encouragement to the Nicaragua route as will prompt that company to make theirs the quickest and most desirable, thus inaugurating a competition which will insure comfort and safety, and make all Californians feel that there is no Vanderbilt gulf of despair between them and their Eastern homes.

Rather Inconsistent.—An English journal points with scorn to the present incumbent of the Presidential chair, and remarks that it is no wonder that the South desires emancipation from such a rule and is making vigorous efforts to obtain it. This does not come with good grace from a nation that sat so patiently under the sceptre of the imbecile Georges. A plain sensible man of the people is preferable as a ruler to one of the gibbering idiots that have occasionally filled the English throne, and are likely to fill it again in the divine order of royal succession.

The Yosemite has again been running her nose into the Washoe. Capt. Poole publishes a card saying the occurrence was accidental. We hope so; but another accident of a similar nature would have a rather suspicious look.

THINGS.

San Francisco, Saturday, September 3d, 1864.

I HAVE held a Christian Commission during the week; not in the regular army of Christians, but in a volunteer corps that has been organized at Union Hall.

I like it. Red roses, fuschia flowers, ribbons, pretty girls and bewitching women—of such is the kingdom of Heaven.

Who says that sectarianism holds close communion in this charity? Here we have representatives of all churches, as well as representatives of no church at all. In this great Hall, with its magnificent decorations of stars and strips and lips and glorious eyes, all creeds and conditions meet, and we have a faint foreshadowing of the Millennium. The music and all, through the week, made it a "place of delights," a Paradise, wherein Bianchi disported himself as a fudgy little cherub, while blooming Eves exerted themselves on all sides in peddling candies and apples to any number of easy Adams. So fragrant are the memories, that religion to me will hereafter be represented by a rose, Christianity by a camelia.

Enter with me for the moment. "I have that within me which passeth show," viz., a season ticket.

This vernal pagoda in the centre is the shrine where the multitude worship—they bow at this bower, I imagine, because it is the bower of Love—a right-bower at that. It is here that my saint resides, or, rather, presides—not a patron saint, understand, but a matron saint, which is much better. Were I a saint instead of a sinner, I could rightfully claim to be a patron one, for I have nearly ruined myself in a vain attempt to buy up all her floral favors so that no other man can enjoy the luxury of wearing one. But who would not be willing to be ruined in such a cause, or even to go willingly to perdition were the path lighted by the splendor of such smiles! On my last visit to the Fair, I came away with a rosebud in every button-hole, and a number in my pocket which nobody knew anything about, as I lifted them lightly but surreptitiously from the stand when no one was looking. Alas! that so charming a lady should sell such execrable cigars! Little the wonder that so many manifest preference for a widow's "weeds."

I have already remarked that this is the bower of Love. It is commonly said that Love laughs at locksmiths; to my thinking he smiles on other Smiths quite as rosily. Oh, bower! bower!! bower!!! what have you to answer for? Is it not here that confiding and guileless men have been taken in and Dexterously done for, to get their Walker papers when all was over and their pockets depleted. But can we say that all this with the multitude goeth against the Grain? Oh, bower! bower!! bower!!! we will have our revenge when you are stripped of your green leaves and adornments, when the beauty and the beauties have left you, and you shall stand there in the garish light of day, a poor, miserable left-bower.

On the right hand side of the room as you enter you see a cool-looking hole in the ground. If any one asks you how you like this, reply, simply: It is Well!

"Jacob's well, sir," remarks a red-lipped girl with a cup in her hand.

"Glad to hear it; how's the rest of the family?" you can reply in a kindly tone, as you lift up your legs like the Arabs and as silently get away. It is better to curb your thirst while in the vicinity of this well—it's none of your "bit-houses," and you may as well drop in at the Bank Exchange, or Barry & Patten's, or Porter & Collins', at once, so far as economy is concerned. And Jacob's well, though it be, you are not permitted to stand and Leah at the maidens who come to it.

Further down, you encounter the figure of a man who is perpetually holding out his hand in one everlasting appeal to passers-by. Drop a dollar in it, and the coin goes down his throat like a shot, snap goes his mouth over it, and the hand is put out for more. I suppose it is meant as a statue of Dr. Bellows.

The "President's quilt," a piece of patchwork of many colors, is displayed in a glass case, and you are requested to subscribe to it. Do so. If any man on this continent needs a comforter it is Abraham. I hope, however, he will not return the donation in kind and give us a patchwork peace.

That pretty girl with a basket on her arm sells mignonette. "Alas!" you sigh to yourself, "She is not my mignon, yet," and pass on.

You pass, because your hand would not justify you in assisting her.

Subscribe to this stitch-in-time-saving invention. It is intended as a present to the widow of one whom we all miss here to-night; one whose kind, generous heart and impulsive Christian charity were competent to surmount any bars or barriers which sectarianism or even Arianism could raise.

Low and behold! Halloo and behold! for that matter. This opera cloak is meant for the wife of the Governor. I suppose it is contributed by the Low Church.

You see that pretty girl, with a face like the Madonna, standing where that fuschia tree casts its scarlet shadows? Don't speak to her; she has a fool for a father. If in tribute to her beauty you gave her a rose-bud, even a four-bit one, he'd fling it back at you accompanied by a rock.

Bold man though you be, you'd have to back down when a boulder came.

That unfortunate father sees a cloven-hoof in every masculine boot-leather that walks the earth. Tuck that handkerchief in to your coat-pocket quickly, or he'll think it's a tail. Or, worse still, he may think it a rope-ladder that is destined to be pendant from his daughter's window some night next week, unless he goes careful rounds. Drop a tear for the young lady, and step on the old gentleman's toes the next time you meet him on a corner.

Here is a door with "25 cents admittance" pasted on the lintel. You tap on a panel:

"Come in; you are welcome."

"Incomes are always welcomo," you reply, and walk rapidly on, happy in the consciousuess of virtue and of having saved a quarter.

This booth, near the perch where the cherub Bianchi sings, gives shelter and protection to a pretty girl. You canuot help breathing oaths to her if you assume the vocative. You wouldn't mind playing Booth yourself for the occasion. There is a dressing-case here, and you are requested to vote as to whom it shall be given to, paying a dollar for the privilege.

Write "Mazeppa" on a card and slip it in the ballot-box. If the Tartar Boy does not need a dressing-case, who does? He certainly presents a case that needs dressing.

There are other things to be seen at the Fair, but I have not time to attend to them now. And it is doubtful whether I shall continue to find time between this and Tuesday; for I've lately found auother vein for silver and a place for gold, where they fine you.

So I throw up my Christian Commission, and the ladies of the Fair will please accept my Christian resignation.

THE FIERY AND UNTAMED.

When Mr. Charles Thorne stepped before the foot-lights, tho other evening, to explain to a curious audience the sudden dropping of the cnrtain, he remarked: "Ladies and gentlemen, I am authorized by the management to state that the horse having been out at pasture for a few days, it is impossible to make him lay down, and the play cannot go on while he is standing!"

I can only account for Mr. Thorne's substitution of the active verb for the neuter, in the matter of that "lay," by supposing that the excuse was hatched in his fertile brain at a moment's noticc.

However, I step beforc the foot-lights, authorized by my own observation to state that the managers of our theatres have sold the dressing-rooms that were formerly attached to their establishments, having no further use for them.

Theatrical wardrobes for the ladies of tho stage are to be dispensed with, a coat of paint being all that the exigencies of this new era will demand for actresses, and this is to be worn on the checks.

For the reign of the legitimate drama is over and a new rein is inaugurated.

Probably, were I to lament tho change, a number of astonished and indignant peoplo would cry: "Why, we've seen you at Mazeppa a dozen times!" To which I reply, "What of it? That does not prove that the play is good; nor does it exactly establish that I am bad." A model husband and an exemplary father, it is safe for me to go where the feet of impulsive youth may not be safely trusted. Besides, I'm not at all squeamish, and can stand all the Mazeppas that can possibly be put upon the stage. If the ladies who play the part are trying to make me blush, or drive me out of the house, they might as well quit at once, for they are only losing their timo.

And the older portion of the community, I fancy, are much like me. Anything that could harm them, or undermine the solid foundations of their morality, would raise such a hue and cry in town that the police would bo obliged to suppress it. The only thing that I deprecate is the effect on the future wives and mothers of the population, now wearing clothes that one would think should be short enough. But, no; they are emulous of Mazeppa. True, they have not seen the play, but they have the pictures. The father of a family—and, for that matter, of children enough to make one or two families—informed me, with tears in his eyes, that going out into the wood-shed the other day he found the pride and pet of his household, a lovely little girl with blue eyes and only six summers old, lashed to a saw-horse, whilo her younger brother stood by in a frenzy of tears, playing the Khan as well as he could, and declaring that he had at last discovered his long lost son and tho heir of his Empire.

On being unbound from her dangerous position, tho little blue-eyed girl struck an attitudo and shrieked in a childish treble: Once more I stand erect, and assumo the god-liko attitude of freedom and a man!

Sitting in the dress-circle at tho theatre and seeing the play go on, I never think much of the consequences to society at large, my attention being principally absorbed by wondering why the orchestra are so lavish with diapasons when the hero of tho piece is without a diaper. Viewing the question as a family man, however, I think that when little girls get to riding rail-fences and sliding down bannisters, clad in tho costumes they wear when the nurses tuck them into their trundle-beds and their mammas kiss them good night, in imitation of the Tartar Boy, it is well enough to stop and inquire whither theso wild and untamed steeds are dragging us.

As an instance of what people are coming to expect, many, the other evening, who had never before seen the second act of Fra Diavolo, actually thought that Miss Richings was going to take an opera-tuneity of gratifying the popular taste. A nervous start was visible among the ladies as she began to disrobe in the bed-room scene, while a look of delight and expectation sat on the faces of the male majority; but all were disappointed.

Had it been otherwise, I suppose the piece would have drawn immensely for a month—the nightly cry, with the multitude, being: My soul's in arms and eager for the Fra.

In conclusion, as regards the Mazeppa mania, I can only say, I'm glad that I'm not a fiery untamed steed, for it would be very embarrassing to have to go cantering over the mountains with a woman in that attire sprawling on my back; and it is possible—barely possible—that if I once got well up in the mountains, I might never return; and that the people below couldn't call me down even by shaking oats at me—wild oats, at that.

INIOO SAYS GOOD-BY.

In saying good-by, I do not intend to perpetrate a bad sell.

I was employed by the editor of this journal, in its very inception, to assist him in its conduct. Since that time, my position has been a very pleasant one. I had not much salary, it is true—in fact, none at all; but then I had constant employment, and what more could be desired?

The journal is now in a flourishing condition, and I leave it. It has for some time been paying its own expenses, and they tell me that the question of its paying mine is simply a matter of time.

To me it looks very much like a matter of eternity. And as life is brief, I intend to take the present opportunity and go a-fishing.

The journal passes into hands eminently capable of conducting it. In the editor who assumes my friend's place, the readers will recognize one whose graceful contributions to this and other journals have already made his name a household word on this coast. In the proprietor they will find a gentleman with a pen as well as a purse, who will fill my accustomed corner, and make it evident that the change is for the better.

So, good friends all, for the present good-by. We may meet again in some quiet corner; if not, none have occasion to regret it more than myself. For in endeavoring to amuse you, I have certainly contrived to amuse myself. Even if in the former attempt I have not succeeded, give me at least credit for the attempt, and think kindly of INIOO.

THE Bay View Park Fair had an auspicious opening to-day, notwithstanding the inauspicious weather which blew sand and dust in all directions, and put one's hope and faith and charity to a severe test long before reaching the track. A long line of buggies filled tho range of sheds, and fences had to be called into play as temporary hitching posts. Want of time and space prevents our giving the mention to the affair that it deserves. No accident happened, however, greatly to the disgust of a medical friend of ours, who drove out there with his buggy balanced with plasters and surgical instruments. One might well have happened, however, as a collision occurred during one of the best three in five heats, throwing Jim Eof from the the sulky, and canting the other driver out from his box so that for nearly a hundred yards he had the outside of his trap if not of the track. The consequence was that Eof's horse, Gentleman George, distanced his driver in the heat, though he did not win the race, notwithstanding he made the most remarkable time ever made where it was horse and sulky against a fence—a race in which the fence is sure to win in the long run. Tho Fair has opened successfully, and that it will be brought to a successful consummation canuot be doubted.

WE are indebted to Mr. E. S. Cummings for a lithograph of the wonderful bunch of pears grown in Briggs' orchard at Marysville, now on exhibition at the Christian Commission Fair. In this phenomenal bunch we have fifty pears with but a single stem, fifty pears to eat like one! An explanation of the curiosity is found in the fact that the lower branches of the tree were killed by frost, consequently all the sap and juices of the tree went up into the few branches which were sheltered by the foliage from the frost, and of theso branches this is one. But how could so small a stem—only eight inches long, and about a half inch through—convey nourishment to so many pears? It is something like one little woman nourishing fifty babies. And the question arises, as we count this bunch, should we say there are fifty pears or twenty-five pairs? Anyhow, the bunch weighs nineteen pounds.

SAM WELLS, the popular negro-minstrel, diod in Virginia City lately from injuries received by being thrown from a horse. Poor Sam, it is "lay down the shovel and the hoe," with him now. He has sung his last song and spoken his last jest. Tho same cold hand that quiets the sound of sobs and weeping comes to the house of laughter and hushes the minstrel's song forever. The funeral takes place to-morrow, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, from the Church of tho Advent. The friends of tho deceased are invited to attend.

D. E. APPLETON sends us a copy of San Francisco at the Fair—a presentation by the artist Jump, of the notabilities of the press, pulpit, bar, bench, and stock boards of the city. Some of the caricatures are excellent, though they are not so much caricatures as perfect likenesses. Others require considerable study to find them out, and the publicatiou of an explanatory key might not prove a bad idea. The picture is for sale by Mr. Appleton at 508 Montgomery street.

SIR HILARY'S PRAYER AT AGINCOURT.

IN answer to the charade by Praed, beginning, "Sir Hilary charged at Agincourt," published last week, "W. C. J." sends the verses below, remarking that they were contributed by him to Harpers' in reply to the same charade. We can but say that the solution, though ingenious, does not fill the requirements of the charade, and manifestly is not the right one. "My next, with her cold and quiet shroud," can by no construction be explained by "Dieu," the second syllable of the answer which our correspondent sends. The best and most palpable solution we have ever seen is "Good night"—though this supposes Praed capable of the perpetration of a pun in the reward promised—

To all blue eyes
That weep when a warrior nobly dies.

The supposition that this is the true answer is somewhat strengthened by the fact that the charade was orignally printed in Knight's Magazine—the device on the title-page being one that would suggest the poem, while at the samo time tho answer was a word of praise for the magazine. The chief objection is that "Good night" can scarcely be construed into a prayer. These are the verses "W. C. J." sends:

THE Christian knight Sir Hilary's prayer
At Agincourt, is of two words—
All the brief moment he can spare,
As for the fight he girds.

And these the words that in the heart
Of Christian knight would first arise—
The first that to his lips would start,
As upward turned his reverent eyes:

Bon Dieu! is good Sir Hilary's prayer
For all who in this day have share.

Bon for the ones who through this day
Shall live to see to-morrow's sun;
Dieu for the ones who 'midst the fray
Shall find their lives and duty done.

Bon Dieu! those tender ones in pity hold
Who through this long night, dark, and wet and cold,
Weeping shall kneel beside their loved ones slain,
Or, frantic, seek them 'midst the mire and rain:
'Tis Thou alone, great Ruler of the skies,
Canst soothe their hearts and dry their streaming eyes.

MR. C. J. ROBINSON'S classes in Light Gymnastics at Miss Aldrich's Academy are closed for vacation, to re-open on the 15th of September. Mr. Robinson's classes have proved eminently successful, the attendance having more than equalled his best expectations. The uses of a more muscular development than can be obtained by running the fingers over pianoforte keys are coming to be appreciated by the female world. With the re-opening, an evening class of young men for instruction in military drill will also be formed. No uniform will be required, the only expense involved being the tuition. In these war times it is well that the youth of the land should know how to carry muskets.

DR. GEORGE F. WOODWARD'S very comfortable rooms are located at 127 Montgomery street, and would furnish a very comfortable lounging place for his friends, if they were not so constantly filled by patients—unfortunates who come to be trepanned and phlebotomized and amputated and all that. Dr. Woodward has had many years experience in surgery at the East, having also had an extensive practice in that most fertile field for the exercise of his art—the battle-field. It can scarcely be called a pleasure to have a leg or arm removed under any circumstances, but it certainly lessens the pain to have the thing skilfully done.

THE INDUSTRIAL FAIR opens with much promise. A great quantity of articles have been entered for exhibition, and altogether it promises to be the Fair of the coast. Perhaps before its close the managers will conclude that newspapers are specimens of the mechanical arts, and permit an exhibition of them among other specimens of art and industry—a permission they at present refuse. We are indebted to the publishers of the Mining and Scientific Press for a copy of a very excellent engraving they have issued of the Fair building and the Fair grounds.

THE election for officers of the San Francisco Olympic Club will take place on Monday next. There are two tickets in the field; the Regular Nomination, and an Independent one, both bearing names that speak well for the Club. The election promises to be warmly contested, the young athletes in this instance contending for the laurels of popular approval rather than for tho parsley of the Cestus.

A FANCY

WHAT would you call the Sun, as he falls
Out of the heavens, while shadows dim
And rosy are draping tho broad sky-walls—
What would you call the Sun as he falls
Far down to the ocean's rim?

All of tho sky is gathering webs
Of shadow about it, and the tide—
The lazy tide—as it flows and ebbs,
Is quite entangled with crimson webs,
And with crimsom bloom is dyed.

Perhaps the sun is an egg of gold
In a nest of cloud, and Night must be
A fidgety hen—for look! she has rolled
Out of the nest the egg of gold
And spilled the yelk in the sea!

CHARLES WARREN STODDARD.

WHY SHE NEVER TOLD HER LOVE.

COULD it be virgin bashfulness
That still concealed the tender thought?
Or fear she might perchance confess
A love that was not sought?

Was it mere womanly caprice?
Or pride? or maidenly reserve?
Was it respect for mental peace?
Or merely want of nerve?

She could not choose but understand,
He thought, his little game of sighs,
Slow parting pressures of the hand,
Soft words, and "speaking eyes."

"The reason why" (this was above
Ten years ago) he now knows well;
She simply never told her love,"
Because—she'd none to tell!

THE OLD WAYSIDE INN.

"SIR, excuse me, but I wish to put you on your guard. I believe we have fallen into a den of thieves and murderers!"

I had been slumbering uneasily for nearly an hour, and had just become thoroughly awakened when Mr. Leslie entered my room cautiously and addressed me in this singular manner.

I had that day chanced to fall in with an elderly gentleman, (Mr. Leslie by name,) and his daughter Gertrude, an interesting young lady of nearly eighteen; and as our routes lay in the same direction, we very naturally agreed to accompany each other.

We had stopped at a roadside inn. Our accommodation was much more ample than I had supposed possible from the external appearance of the dwelling; and much to our satisfaction we were furnished with separate rooms, though all in the low chamber at the top of the house.

The apartment allotted to myself was a small one, furnished with a handsome bed with heavy green curtains, a light-stand, and a couple of chairs. Everything was in perfect keeping and good order, but the bed was placed against the wall near the door, greatly to my astonishment.

"What have you discovered?" I asked hastily.

He gave me a soiled piece of paper, on which were rudely inscribed these words:

"Jim saw three travellers coming over the old road an hour ago. Probably they will be at your house pretty soon after dark, and you must manage to keep them to-night. Don't try to settle them until I come, which will be about midnight.

"TOM SEYTON."

We engaged in a short conversation as to the course we had better pursue, and then, without arriving at any conclusion, I left the father and daughter alone for a few moments, while I cautiously descended the stairs. Having gained the hall below, I stole through a long narrow passage I had not before observed, and at last came to the door of an apartment, in which I knew the family of our host, together with our would-be murderers, were assembled.

"Well, Tom, how do you propose to settle our guests above?"

This was the voice of our host addressing the new-comer.

"How have you disposed of them?"

"Why," said the host, "I gave the old man and the girl the two rooms on the left, and that young fellow took the one at the right."

"The room you made so convenient last week?"

"Yes."

"Well, if that is the case I don't think we shall find hard work at all. The very instant you hear the report of my pistol you and Jim must be at hand to enter the old man's room and take care of him."

"But when will all this come off?"

"At twelve; they will be sleeping most soundly then."

It wanted but thirty minutes of the hour appointed, and I hastened to retrace my steps up-stairs.

I visited my own room first, where I found that the "convenient fixture" I had heard spoken of below was merely a small square hole in the wall, just opposite the pillow, sufficiently large to insert the barrel of any moderate-sized pistol—a very easy method to relieve a man of his life.

Having made this discovery I sought Mr. Leslie and his daughter.

"I was about to propose," I said, "that each one of us should keep his own apartment. If we meet them together while Seyton has his loaded pistol at hand, one of us will be sure to get killed. On the contrary, should I manufacture a good counterfeit, as I now propose, to occupy my place for the time being in that rather dangerous bed, and in this manner waste Seyton's shot and throw him off his guard, I am very sure I could gain the mastery in a hand-to-hand struggle, in a very few minutes, and then come to your assistance. Does my proposition suit you?"

"Perfectly; and, luckily for your scheme, I wear a wig, which may be of considerable benefit to you. Take it; it is entirely at your disposal."

It took but a very few moments to fill the wig sufficiently with the bed-clothes, and arrange it in a favorable position upon the pillow, in front of the little opening. Having done this, I glanced at my watch in the moonbeams. It wanted five minutes of 12!

The silence was growing oppressive, when at last I saw the curtains move aside a little. There was a moment's silence, and then a loud report, and I had resolution enough to bend forward and utter a low, despairing moan as the report died away. In an instant the door was opened, and the man called Seyton came running in, with his pistol still in his hand. Without the faintest suspicion he approached the bed; but meanwhile I had grasped a long, heavy bar of wood which, I presume, by the merest chance, happened to be standing against the wall near by, and when he had arrived within convenient distance I sprang out upon him, and with a single well-directed blow I laid him sprawling, and I judged insensible, upon the floor.

All this had occupied but a moment, and it was scarcely completed when I heard the report of another pistol in the direction of the apartment occupied by Mr. Leslie. Without stopping to assure myself further of the effect of the rather severe knock I had given the fallen man, I hastened forward to the assistance of my companion. He was engaged in a hand-to-hand struggle with Jim, while our host was lying upon the floor, badly if not dangerously wounded.

Jim was making desperate efforts to draw a knife from his belt, while Mr. Leslie was using his utmost endeavors to prevent it. He was brave and resolute, but I could see his strength was failing rapidly. I did not hesitate to put an immediate stop to the contest by again calling my club into requisition.

Having firmly secured our host and the fellow Jim with cords, and left Mr. Leslie in the charge of his daughter, I returned to the room where I had left Seyton. He was just recovering from the effects of the blow I had given him, which, as I had expected, had rendered him insensible for a time and I was just in season to bind him before he had recovered sufficiently to trouble us further.

Now all that remained for me to do to render our situation quite secure was, to take away from our hostess the power to harm us in any way, and I at once started below for this purpose.

I afterward learned that Mr. Leslie had made his daughter promise, after my departure, to remain quietly in her own apartment until she could safely venture forth, and then stationed himself near the door, with the only pistol he ever carried in his hand. By some mistake, our host and Jim did not attack him as soon as the pistol was fired at my counterfeit by Seyton, as was at first intended, but waited a moment. When they did present themselves he fired at the one in advance, who happened to be our host, and immediately grappled with the other.

We remained at the inn for the remainder of the night, and gave information to the authorities in the morning.

WHAT A TRUE WIFE SHOULD BE.—Macaria, a work just issued by Miss Evans, of Beulah renown, contains, among many things, the following, to which we give place for the benefit of the wife in esse and the wife in posse: "Noble wives, who properly appreciate the responsibility of their position, should sternly rebuke and frown down the disgraceful idea, which seems to be gaining ground and favor in our cities, that married women may, with impunity, seek attentions and admiration abroad. Married belles and married beaux are not harmless, nor should they be tolerated in really good society. Women who so far forget their duties to their homes and husbands, and the respect due to public opinion, as to habitually seek for happiness in the mad whirl of so-called fashionable life, ignoring household obligations, should be driven from well-bred, refined circles, to hide their degradation at the firesides they have disgraced. That wives should constantly endeavor to cultivate social graces, and render themselves as fascinating as possible, I hold their sacred duty; but beauty should be preserved and accomplishments perfected to bind their husbands' hearts more closely, to make their homes attractive, instead of being constantly paraded before the world for the unholy purpose of securing the attentions and adulation of other gentlemen. I do not desire to see married women recluses; on the contrary, I believe that society has imperative claims upon them which should be promptly met and faithfully and gracefully discharged. But those degraded wives who are never seen with their husbands when they can avoid it, who are never happy unless riding or walking with strangers or receiving their attentions at theatres, concerts or parties, are a disgrace to the nation which they are gradually demoralizing and corrupting. From the influence of these few deluded weak libels on our sex, may God preserve our age and country! Statesmen are trained up around the mother's arm-chair, and she can imbue the boy with lofty sentiments and inspire him with aims which, years hence, shall lead him into Congressional halls to adhere to principles, to advance the truth though, thereby, votes for the next election fall away like stricken leaves in autumn. What time has the married belle for this holy hearthstone mission? The conscientious, devoted and patriotic Christian women of a nation are the safeguards of its liberties and purity."

A LITERARY SWINDLER.—W. G. Graham was the most superlative coxcomb that ever took his daily lounge through Bond street or the Park, his Hessian boots of the nicest fit, his lavender gloves of the most spotless hue, his tie perfect, his "conduct of a clouded cane" more than "nice." I scarcely dared to talk of common literary drudgery to the exquisite editor of the Museum, but I was not repulsed with scorn. Yes, he would endeavor to find time to do what I wanted. Very rapidly did he accomplish his task. He got out of a hackney-coach in all imaginable haste, placed a sealed packet in my hands, explained that he was suddenly called from town and—would I give him a check on account. The bulk of the parcel was an evidence of his industry, of his talent I had no doubt; so off he went with his check and very quickly cashed it. I am not sure that I ever saw him again. Indeed, I never desired to see him; for when I opened the packet, guarded with seal after seal as a most precious treasure, lo! the half-dozen quires of which it was composed, though seeming to be as honest copy as ever went to the printer, were as false as the coin with which the magician in the Arabian Nights deluded the stall-keepers of the oriental bazaars. The outer leaves of each section were the fairest of manuscripts; the inner leaves were blank paper.—Charles Knight.

THE following is a copy of an advertisement which appeared in a London paper a few years since: "If this should meet the eye of Emma D., who absented herself last Wednesday from her father's house, she is implored to return, when she will be received with undiminished affection by her almost heart-broken parents. If nothing can persuade her to listen to their joint appeal—should she be determined to bring their grey hairs with sorrow to the grave—should she never mean to revisit a home where she has passed so many happy years—it is at least expected, if she is not totally lost to all sense of propriety, that she will, without a moment's further delay, send back the key of the tea-caddy."

THE VULTURES OF PARIS.

THE gay city of Paris has again been made conscious of its extreme credulity. A brilliant gentleman has just disappeared, and some $600,000 of what was held to be good debts have slided to the wrong column of profit-and-loss. $600,000—a good many tears, a good many heart-aches—for 3,000,000 francs can purchase a great deal of pleasure in Paris. Of course, nobody would have thought it of him! As if herein did not lay the very essence of the trick played; had he advertised in the newspapers that he was a penniless adventurer whose design was to swindle people, he could not have gotten a centime. He sung suspicion asleep with the sweetest lullaby heard this many a day, and the watchmen dozing in the castle vaults were his. He was the best dressed man in Paris. He was not excelled as a horseman and swordsman and pistol-shot. He spoke six languages perfectly and was thoroughly acquainted with the classical authors and current publications of England, Germany, Italy and France—and was a rogue after all! Such disenchantments are disheartening, and make one think of Timon of Athens without ill-blood. The same week which saw the hawk fly revealed the fate of a pigeon. Hen-hawks relieved it of its glossy attire. Knowing that Paris hen-hawks (the most brilliant ones) require $75,000 annually for their livelihood, no one need wonder at the great consumption of pigeons in Paris. There is not the slightest probability of an exhaustion of the supply, since, from the days of the Prodigal Son to yesterday, as fast as breaches were made in coveys young birds hastened to fill the gaps. There are always to be found multitudes of industrious, hard-working, self-denying men occupied in accumulating treasures for their children to waste in providing hen-hawks with comfortable nests and choice food. At Chantilly t'other day, several young men closely scanned a postilion who drove the leaders of a coach-and-four which brought down a fashionable lorette.

"By Jove!" exclaimed one of them, "if I was not sure the Baron de —— was killed in the horrid American war, I'd bet there he stands."

"Where?" asked the others.

"To your left; the tenth carriage from the Emperor's stand."

"That postilion?"

"Yes."

"Get out."

"Gentlemen, 'tis he! the very same eyes, nose and round shoulders."

"Why, the Baron de —— is dead; he was killed in Virginia."

"So went the rumor, but it was probably false, for I am certain that he was the Baron de ——."

"I'll bet you one hundred louis you are mistaken."

"Done."

They shook hands and turned their horses heads towards the postilion. There was evidently something wrong, for as they drew near, the postilion became more embarrassed and very anxious to hide his face. When they got up to him the postilion quickly leaped off his horse and said:

"François, Arthur, my dear fellows, I see you recognize me, but for heaven's sake don't betray me. If you do I shall be obliged to leave France, and my position, as it is, is bad enough without adding the evils of exile to it; so don't let my secret leak out."

"But tell us first, what the deuce you are doing in the costume of the Postilion du Lonjumeau? this is not Mardi Gras."

"Boys, I'm earning my living. The girls ruined me. Be warned by me and don't let them with their smiles and caresses eat you out of house and home as they have done me. I cannot tell you what anguish wrings my heart when I see them driving about this field as gay and blithe as ever, unable to recognize me, although I sacrificed to them the last house—and the last grape vine I had in the world."

JOHN RUSKIN'S THUNDER.—In a letter to the Morning Post, Mr. Ruskin says:—"The cession of Savoy was the peaceful present of a few crags, goats and goatherds by one king to another; it was also fair to pay for fair work, and in the profoundest sense, no business of ours. Whereupon Mr. Kinglake mewed like a moon-struck cat going to be made a mummy of for Bumbosis. But we saw the noble Circassian nation murdered, and never uttered a word for them. We saw the noble Polish nation sent to pine in ice and never struck a blow for them. Now the nation of our future Queen calls to us for help in its last agony, and we round sentences and turn our backs. Sir, I have no words for these things, because I have no hope. It is not these squeaking puppets who play before us whom we have to accuse; it is not by cutting the strings of them that we can redeem our deadly error. We English, as a nation, know not, and care not to know, a single broad or basic principle of human justice. We have only our instincts to guide us. We will hit anybody who hits us. We will take care of our own families and our own pockets; and we are characterised in our present phase of enlightenment mainly by rage in speculation, lavish expenditure on suspicion or panic, generosity whereon generosity is useless, anxiety for the souls of savages, regardless of those of civilized nations, enthusiasm for liberation of blacks, apathy to enslavements of whites, proper horror of regicide, polite respect for populicide, sympathy with those whom we can no longer serve and reverence for the dead whom we have ourselves delivered to death.

TENNYSON'S NEW POEMS.—The new volume of poetry from the pen of the Poet Laureate is not to receive the title of The Idylls of the Hearth, as was recently stated. The word "Idylls," in connection with the poet, had become familiar to most readers by reason of his last work, the "Idylls" of the famous King Arthur, and at the ninth hour it was decided that an entirely new title had better be given to the volume in press, in order to guard against confusion with previous publications, and so prevent public misconception. Mr. Tennyson has now decided upon calling his forthcoming book, Enoch Arden. It will form a volume of about the same size as In Memoriam, and will be published at the same price.

SIMPLICITY.

THERE is no gift of expression that tells more than simplicity in its right place. A simple style of talking or writing is an engine of power in good hands, enabling them to undertake tasks forbidden to the world at large. It even fits a man for talking or writing about himself, which only persons endowed with the art of being plain, transparent and natural ought ever to attempt. Simplicity, as we would view it here, is by no means a merely moral or negative quality. It is so in some cases, but it is then only noticed or appreciated for its suggestiveness. Children do not admire each other's simplicity, but we admire it in them, because what is uttered without thought or intention in the child, is full of meaning to us. It was more than a simple, it was probably a stupid, little girl that kept reiterating, "We are seven," but the words suggested deep meanings to the poet. The weeping child apologising at sight of the unfolding handkerchief, "My tears are clean," meant no more than the literal sense of his words, but to the hearer they brought thoughts of guileless innocence and of other tears that do leave a stain. After childhood no one can retain a simplicity worthy of admiration without some intellectual power. The unconscious simplicity of a child, when childhood is past, is disagreeable and painful, and is never recognized without a shade of pity or contempt. Manly simplicity is intelligent, and knows what it is about. And though, to win our respect, it must of course be real, it may, and often is, only one side of a many-sided character; that is, the quality may attach to part and not to the whole of a man's nature.

The charm of full-grown simplicity always gains by—and, we believe, even requires—contrast. We must be a little surprised at a man's being simple before we can value that quality in him. Thus the style and manners of royal personages are generally simple, and there are doubtless plenty of reasons to make this probable, and a thing to expect; but persons dazzled by the pomp and circumstance of greatness are delighted with this simplicity, which they confound with humility, because it seems to them a striking contrast with state and splendor. So with the aristocracy of intellect and genius. It appears a fine thing for a great author or thinker to be artless and unaffected; and we like it, because, if he chose to be pretentious, we could only say he had more right to be so than his neighbors; but the truth is, these people have not really the temptations to pretence that others, their inferiors, have. The world allows them so distinguished a place that there is no need for them to struggle and use effort in order to seem something higher and more important than they are. It needs a reliance on self to be perfectly simple in treating of self; and this reliance, as a conscious quality, it is scarcely modest to bring forward unless the world has given its sanction to the self-estimate. When the Duke of Wellington said publicly, "I should be ashamed to show my face in the streets," under such and such circumstances, the simple phrase, occurring in an important debate, had a noble effect; but there were not many men in whom it would have been becoming to bring forward self in this artless way in the House of Lords. There is no greater testimony to the weight of a name which once made itself known and felt than the manner of speaking of self in Dr. Newman's Apologia. Nothing can be more engaging than the simplicity of tone; the touches of personal feeling and recollection, of likes and dislikes, and of self-defence, are given in language the most artless and natural; but the tone would have been inadmissible if the writer had not had a right to rely on his past influence, and on the interest that still attaches to his name. Nobody can write in this way who does not feel that what he says will be well received—that people will care to hear things personal to himself told in the plainest way because it is himself. Very few men could venture to write their life, even though in self-defence, in this fashion. Indeed, if it comes to a venture, it is all over with him. Simplicity of the great sort is serenely confident.

All simplicity, however paradoxical it may sound, ought to conceal something—rank, or achievement, or high purpose, or extensive knowledge, or covert meaning, or a strength of modest purity, or an incorruptible honesty, or a power of self-command; or, in a child, innocence. In mature life it must be backed by some inner sense of worth, or, at least, by a self-respect founded on just grounds, though, perhaps, never consciously dwelt upon. It should have some touch of the heroic. It is impossible for some people to be simple. They are not great enough; they are born with that foppery which Dr. Johnson called the bad stamina of the mind, which, like a bad constitution, can never be rectified—"once a coxcomb, always a coxcomb." Indeed, people who are not coxcombs often dare not be simple, because they would feel naked and insignificant; their thoughts must be dressed up to be fit to be seen; in fact, they would not know how to set about it, and could not be simple if they would.—Saturday Review.

A REHEARSAL AT ANNA THILLON'S.— * * However, having finished, the room was ventilated by throwing open doors and windows; and then our charming hostess invited us to partake of a draught of that exhilarating fluid called Champagne. She also said she would cool us after the manner of the South Americans, which operation was executed by pouring Eau de Cologne into the palm of her hand, and rubbing it over our heads. And we also enjoyed breezes produced by the action of a monstrous Chinese fan. The relief experienced was delightful. But one of our party came to grief, in the person of the then primo tenore of the Drury establishment. When it came to his turn to enjoy the refresher, he kept bobbing his head up and down. At last our hostess got him steady, and rubbing his head vigorously, away went the scratch, leaving him under a bare poll, to the great amusement of the assembled party. The disconcerted tenor made a rush to recover the fugitive jascy; but Madame was beforehand, and, grabbing hold of the curly, flaxen decoration, she refused to give it up until he consented to the cooling and balmy process, so much enjoyed by the lookers-on. That completed, she said, "My dear Mr. T., I'm deceived; I did not think there was anything false about you."—Recollections of Paul Bedford.

FUNNY PARAGRAPHS.

THE DRESS FOR OUR ARTILLERYMEN.—"Shell jackets" and "percussion caps."

"IDEAS," says Voltaire, "are like beards—men only get them when they grow up, and women never have any."

"COME here, Tommy," said a schoolmaster, "do you know your A B C's?" "Yes, zur, I know a bee sees."

IN a country churchyard we find this epitaph, "Here lies the body of James Robinson and Ruth, his wife;" and underneath the text: "Their warfare is accomplished."

ONE who is rather loose in his opinion says that the Millerite theory ought to be more in vogue now than ever, since there is such a tendency in everything to rise.

A MAN said to some of his friends that when he married he loved his wife so much he could have eaten her up, and ever since had regretted he didn't.

A COUNTRY individual, who was caught in the water-wheel of a saw-mill, says he intends to apply for a pension, as he is a survivor of the revolution.

A PLAIN SALAD.—The Southerners at the commencement of the war being asked what they wanted, replied, "lettuce alone;" and the Northerners have, out of sheer perversity, been trying ever since to give them a dressing.

A MAN being asked by a young lady what phonography was, took out his pencil and wrote the following telling her that was phonography: "U. R. A. B. U. T. L. N. I" (You are a beauty, Ellen.)

A WAG, upon visiting a medical museum, was shown some dwarfs and specimens of mortality all preserved in alcohol. "Well," said he, "I never thought the dead could be in such spirits."

THE other day a town-crier took in charge a lost child and proceeded to hunt up its parents. On being asked by a lady what the matter was, he replied, "Here's an orphan child, madam, and I'm trying to find its parents."

THE INSULTING ROOM.—A lady of distinguished rank, wishing to consult a celebrated physician in Grosvenor street, called last week with her daughter. The servant took in her card, and returned overpowered with politeness, begging her "Ladyship would follow him to the insulting room."

A LAWYER, in cross-examining a witness, asked him, among other questions, where he was on a particular day, to which he replied, "In company with two friends." "Friends," exclaimed the lawyer; "two thieves, I suppose you mean." "That may be so," replied the witness, "for they are both lawyers."

WHAT a delightful correspondent was Dr. Thomas Chalmers! When in college he wrote very regularly to his mother, as all good boys should do. The good lady adjusted her glasses, and reading the superscription of the packages from the post office, would carefully put away his letters, remarking, "I ken our Tammy weel when he writes. Ever he comes home he'll read it for me."

A PAINFUL WORD.—Lord Louth wrote an excuse to a dinner invitation upon the plea of his having a bad fit of the gout. His friend inquired the next day after his gout. "Gout!" replied his lordship, "I have had no gout." "Why, what do you mean?" said his friend; "you yourself made the excuse for not dining with me." "Oh, now I understand," was Lord Louth's comment; "but show me the man who can spell rheumatism."

ARCTIC DISCOVERY.—George Colman, the younger, was dining at Lord Mulgrave's, when, just before joining the ladies, he was loitering about the picture of Lord Mulgrave's brother blocked up in the ice, in the Arctic expedition in which Nelson sailed as a middy. Lord Mulgrave, holding the lamp said, "What is that my brother has hold of? Is it a boat-hook?" "No my lord," said Colman in his half-throttled, witty voice, "it's the North Pole!"

CURE FOR WEAK EYES.—An elderly gentleman, accustomed to "indulge," entered the room of a certain inn, where sat a grave Friend by the fire. Lifting a pair of green spectacles upon his forehead, rubbing his inflamed eyes, and calling for hot brandy and water, he complained that "his eyes were getting weaker and weaker, and that even spectacles didn't seem to do any good." "I'll tell thee, friend," replied the Quaker, "what I think. If thee was to wear thy spectacles over thy mouth for a few months, thy eyes would get round again."

CANON GODALL was proverbially fond of punning. About the same time that he was made Provost of Eton he also received a stall at Windsor. A young lady of his acquaintance, while congratulating him on his elevation, and requesting him to give the young ladies of Eton and Windsor a ball during the vacation, happened to touch his wig with her fan, and caused the powder to fly about. Upon which the Doctor exclaimed, "My dear, you can get the powder out of the canon, but not the ball."

PUTTING HIS FOOT IN IT.—A young curate, fresh from the home of his youth and his mother's superintendence, being invited to dine at the great mansion recently, was excessively nervous, and most lavish in his praise and admiration of everything that came before him. He relished a tart much, and partook of it three times. "I am glad you like it, Mr. Spooks," said her grace. "Much, I assure you," was the ready and unabashed response, and with a delicate bit of flattery, which was intended to aid in church preferment, continued, "because I think your grace made it."

"WANTED—Expert needlewomen to make babies' bodies.' Well, that beats all!" exclaimed Mrs. Partington, throwing down the newspaper in which, during the last fifteen minutes, she had been spelling out the advertisements, and peering indignantly over her spectacles across the breakfast-table at Ike, who was busily excavating his fourth egg-shell. "Did anybody ever hear the likes! I always said it was as good as tellin' Natur' she didn't know how to do her own work when they instructed them steam-rams and donkey-engines. But this imposterous idea of making slop-work babies is enough to make the poor thing shet up shop altogether! Mark my words, Ike—them sewin'-machines will be pressed into this new-tangled business before long; and then all the emigratin' in the world won't be able to keep down the surplice poppylation."

PHILOSOPHIC PARAGRAPHS.

THE history of the world shows that Religion is the highest of all human concerns.—Parker's Discourse—Introduction.

MAX MULLER, in his Book on Budhism and Budhist Pilgrims, says that Budhism enforced the duties of morality, justice, kindness and self-sacrifice, and exercised a decided beneficial influence, not only on the natives of India, but on the barbarians of Central Asia.

IT need not puzzle us that Malay and Papuan, Celt and Roman, Saxon and Tartar should mix, when we see the rudiments of tiger and baboon in our human form, and know that the barriers of race are not so firm, but that some spray sprinkles us from the antediluvian seas.—Emerson's English Traits.

TRUTH is no more innate within the mind than light within the eye; yet from its inability to trace the origin of those earliest impressions, which by long continued and uncontradicted association have been implicitly received as incontrovertible, the mind hastily assumes the basis of its knowledge to be something intuitive or divine—a part, as it were, of itself. —R. W. Mackay.

THE temper which produced it [persecution] still remains; its parent, bigotry, is still in existence; and what is there more adapted to excite thorough disgust, than the disposition, the feelings, the motives, the kind of intellect and degree of knowledge, discovered by some of those who pretend to be the sole defenders and patrons of religious truth in this unhappy world, and the true and exclusive heirs of all the mercy of God.—Andrew Norton.

THE phenomena of feeling, of desire and aversion, of love and hatred, of fear and revenge, and the perception of external relations manifest in the life of brutes, imply, not only through the analogy which they display to the human faculties, but likewise from all that we can learn or conjecture of their particular nature, the superadded principle [of a soul] distinct from the mere mechanism of material bodies. That such a principle must exist in all beings capable of sensation, or of anything analogous to human passions and feelings, will hardly be denied by those who perceive the force of arguments which metaphysically demonstrate the immaterial nature of the mind.—Pritchard—Natural History of Man.

THE narratives of the Evangelists bear the marks of truth beyond all other histories. They set before us the most extraordinary being who ever appeared on earth, and they are as artless as the stories of childhood. The authors do not think of themselves. They have plainly but one aim—to show us their Master; and they manifest the deep veneration which he inspired, by leaving him to reveal himself, by giving us his actions and sayings without comment, explanation or eulogy. You see in these narratives no varnishing, no high coloring, no attempts to make his actions striking, or to bring out the beauties of his character. We are never pointed to any circumstance as illustrative of his greatness. The Evangelists write with a calm trust in his character, with a feeling that it needed no aid from their hands, and with a deep veneration as if comment or praise of their own were not worthy to mingle with the recital of such a life.—Channing's Character of Christ.

Now that [by the progress of geology] a wonderful opportunity has occurred of comparing, in this matter of classification, the human with the Divine idea—the idea embodied by the zoologists and botanists in their respective systems, with the idea embodied by the Creator of all in geologic history—we cannot perhaps do better, in entering upon our subject, than to glance briefly at the great features in which God's order of classification, as developed in Palæontology, agrees with the order in which man has at length learned to range the living productions, plant and animal, with which he is surrounded, and of which he himself forms the most remarkable portion. In an age in which a class of writers not without their influence in the world of letters, would fain repudiate every argument derived from design, and denounce all who hold with Paley and Chalmers as anthropomorphists, that labor to create for themselves a god of their own type and form, it may be not altogether unprofitable to contemplate the wonderful parallelism which exists between the Divine and human systems of classification, and—remembering that the geologists who discovered the one had no hand in assisting the naturalists and phytologists who framed the other—soberly to inquire whether we have not a new argument in the fact for an identity in constitution and quality of the Divine and human minds—not a mere fanciful identity, the result of a disposition on the part of man to imagine to himself a God bearing his own likeness, but an identity real and actual, and the result of that creative act by which God formed man in his own image.—Hugh Miller.

EATING THE FIRST OYSTER.—It has been often said that he must have been a bold man who first ate an oyster. This is said in ignorance of the legend which assigns the first act of oyster-eating to a very natural cause. It is related that a man walking one day picked up one of these savory bivalves, just as it was in the act of gaping. Observing the extreme smoothness of the interior of the shells, he insinuated his finger between them that he might feel their shining surface, when suddenly they closed upon the exploring digit, with a sensation less pleasurable than he anticipated. The prompt withdrawal of his finger was scarcely a more natural movement than its transfer to his mouth. It is not very clear why people when they hurt their fingers put them into their mouths; but it is very certain that they do; and in this case the result was most fortunate. The owner of the finger tasted oyster-juice for the first time, as the Chinaman in Elia's essays having burnt his fingers first tasted crackling. The savor was delicious; he had made a great discovery; so he picked up the oysters, forced open the shells, banqueted upon their contents, and soon brought oyster-eating into fashion. And unlike most fashions, it has never gone and is never likely to go out.

OUT THROUGH THE GOLDEN GATE.

FAR out, in the dim and the dark of the waves
That have gone through the Golden Gate,
Chanting a requiem over the graves
Of sailors who sleep in the coral caves,
My thoughts are wafted by fate—
Sad thoughts!
Wafted out through the Golden Gate.

Far over the rolling ocean-hill,
O'er the hill where the white ships go,
I see the barks that are rolling; and still
My thoughts go out far o'er the hill,
While my heart is aching so—
Ah, heart!
While the white ships come and go.

All around me is very fair; and, oh!
There is much in life to love!
Yet—strange that my dreams should wander so
Over the hills where the white ships go—
Why do they ever rove?
Sweet dreams,
Ah, truants that ever rove!

Oh! wandering thoughts and fairy-like dreams,
Ever roving against my will,
What star do you see? has it fairy beams
To lure you away o'er the ocean streams,
Ah, heart that is wandering still?
Truant heart!
Far over the ocean-hill! INGLE.

MUSICAL AND DRAMATIC.

AT the Academy of Music, on Monday evening, the Daughter of the Regiment was given for the benefit of Mr. Peter Richings. The compliment tendered by Mr. Maguire was but a fair acknowledgment of the steady labors and managerial skill of Mr. Richings, under whose supervision and control so many new operas have been successively, and with but few exceptions successfully, brought out. The amount of work done by the troupe since their engagement has been enormous, and if there has been any failure or shortcoming, the fault should lie rather with the exigency that demands such continuous labor than with either manager or troupe. Certainly, if any one deserved a bumper it was the Director, into whose hands the task of overcoming difficulties, flanking impossibilities, keeping the taste of the opera-going community alive with novelties, as well as imparting his own energy into the flagging exertions of a troupe who have performed for over fifty consecutive nights, not to speak of his own individual excellencies as a performer. But, alas for the inconsistency of the public! the attendance on that night did not equal that of either the preceding or subsequent performances. Even the Daughter of the Regiment, the best opera of their repertoire, did not draw its accustomed audiences. Either the public thought that the uniform success and the popularity of the troupe was a sufficient acknowledgment of the manager's skill, or that the benefit of Miss Caroline, which they largely attended, was a family affair, or that the brass of Mazeppa was "a metal more attractive; anyhow they did not come.

The very popular Doctor of Alcantara was repeated on Monday evening, with the substitution of Miss Kate Martin for Miss Julia Gould in the role of "Donna Lucrezia"—a change, but scarcely an improvement in the acting or singing of the character. On Tuesday evening Fra Diavolo was produced for the first time by the Richings' troupe. It did not go off so smoothly as other operas have, but the excellences of Auber's composition make themselves evident under the most adverse circumstances. We scarcely think that the troupe, as a whole, is equal to the task, and probably the management was somewhat apprehensive in attempting to produce it. In dramatic vigor and lyric power Mr. Hill was not up to the requirements of the role of "Fra Diavolo," and in the famous and somewhat difficult solo "Proudly and wide," the absence of these qualities rendered the execution of the song hardly tolerable. The "Zerlina" of Miss Richings was as perfect in toilette as that lady's characters always are, but it seemed to us that she was dispirited at times by the weakness of her support; and the continuous and unceasing tax upon her powers is beginning to make itself apparent. Her labors have been too ardent and uninterrupted. But she sang "On yonder rock reclining" with exceeding gracefulness and artistic beauty; it was the one true diamond sparkle amid all the glitter of the opera. Mr. Richings' "Lord Allcash" was an inimitable piece of acting; this old and popular favorite seems to improve like the best of wine, with age, and there is no telling how good he may become if he is spared to the stage a score of years longer. "Lorenzo" (M. Charles) sang his first solo very fairly and in good style. "Lady Allcash" (Miss Jenny Kempton) was not very spirited in action though recovering from the physical disorder of her voice. Messrs. Peakes and Seguin as "Beppo" and "Giacomo," without displaying much lyric strength, were dramatically good and amusing. Some of the enacted pieces might have borne a few more rehearsals; there were jarring, discord and false notes—infelicities that might naturally attend the production of an opera of this quality by a troupe not evenly effective and already wearied by excessive labors. We are pleased to record that the house was an excellent one, and subsequent representations have been given to fair audiences. This evening we have Flotow's Martha; on Sunday evening the French Dramatic Company appear in Les Trois Loges with an Italian intermede. On Wednesday evening Mr. Hill takes a benefit in Norma.

About the theatres there is but one thing to say—all are possessed of Mazeppa. Wheatleigh has gone or is going to Stockton; as for the other sensitive artists they have gone few know whither. Mrs. Hayne, Miss Ince, Mrs. Stark and Mrs. Woodward express a desire and Mrs. Judah is taking an active interest in the Christian Commision. Mrs. Perry, however, maintains her part, perfectly satisfied, and she has reason to be. Her début as "Mazeppa" on Saturday evening last, proved, as we predicted, a success. A slight nervousness of manner was visible at first, not to be wondered at when we reflect that in her soubrette parts she was accustomed to wear pinafores, and that the sudden disembarrassment from any clothes to speak of might have embarrassed even an older lady. The character, however, was dressed with propriety, so far as it could be. The audience was more polite than that which assembled in a rival theatre on the occasion of another lady's début in the same part. Mrs. Perry presented a very pretty figure as the Tartar Boy; so pretty as to take the galleries by surprise and win them to a decent demeanor. Her fencing was very good, and the runs up the mountain were well done. A slight difficulty occurred with the horse, but this Mr. Thorne explained in a few brief and appropriate words. Mr. Barry's performance of a Polish baboon was second only to Mrs. Perry's Tartar Boy; the only objection that can be made to it being that the part is an interpolation of his own and not to be found in the book. It is a pity that he is not content with giving us a respectable Chimpanzee, but this favorite actor is nothing if not troglodytic to excess. Mayo, Thorne, Mrs. Saunders and Miss Sweet filled up the balance of a bill which leaves little room for acting on the part of any one but the hero and the horse. If the horse on the opening night had done as well as the hero, he would probably have enjoyed a call before the curtain; but the truth compels us to say that he deserved hissing on one or two occasions. That he "would not lay down" was bad enough, but it was worse and positively indecent of him to kick a hole through the drop-curtain while Mr. Thorne was improvising an apology for him, startling that gentleman to such a degree, that he came very near falling into the kettle-drum. Even the horse's best friends must allow that he put his foot in it that time. And if we cannot conscientiously praise his behaviour coming down the mountain, what shall we say of the manner in which he went up? A miller's horse carrying a grist, could not have displayed a greater indifference to his burden. It is pleasant to turn once more from censure of the horse to praise of the hero. As Mazeppa, the latter carried off the part with so much of grace and dash, that comparisons have been instituted between her and the Menken, which turn not altogether to the advantage of the latter. If any doubt existed that she was well and properly put together, that suspicion has been most triumphantly removed by a demonstration which certainly left no room for deception. Mazeppa is on the bills, like one of Miss Braddon's tales, to be continued until further notice. In the meantime the mania is spreading, and we are informed that at the present time there are five Mazeppas in the field. That the interior will take the contagion, there cannot well be a doubt. Sacramento will probably lead off, Stockton following suit. What a fiery and untamed time there will be among the enthusiastic lunatics of that latter place! Critics may mourn, but what else can they do? Their sad protests are disregarded, and while they stand with hands uplifted in mute horror, the multitude are jumping over them to get front seats. It is the people who have the power of controlling these things, not the press. Experience demonstrates, that to speak of a play as "improper," crowds the house; that to denounce a book as "shocking," exhausts the edition at once. Every principle of art prompts us to detest dramas of this kind. The stage should be suggestive, Mazeppa leaves nothing to imagination. True, the mirror ought to be held up to nature, but the reflection should show us nothing but the face. We look with eager anticipation to that good time which we hope is coming, when a pure and elegant popular taste shall once more revive, and sweep the nude and sensational from the stage, as with a besom. We notice that Dick Turpin is announced at the Opera House for Sunday night, and that the French Spy is underlined for next week, Mrs. Perry appearing in both pieces.

Swift to be hurled
Anywhere, anywhere out of the world!

We last week announced the return of Mr. Wilson and his troupe from their country campaign. Last evening the hippotheatronic entertainment was re-opened at its old place on Jackson street, and once more the great tent shook its canvas sides in the breezes which make free with that locality. That it would be well attended was a foregone conclusion, for horses are the popular attraction just now. What with the Bay View Fair, the five Mazeppas, and Mr. Wilson's excellent equestrian entertainment, these are gala days for admirers of the turf. If we may call the public pocket a ledge whereof managers are the workers, it might be said that at the present time they have struck a "horse." We must confess to a preference for the style and manner in which Mr. Wilson gives his entertainment, for he preserves all the unities. We have the ring and the sawdust and the clown and all the other concomitants of the circus; it is the amusement that with its blandishments and its spangles moved us when we were boys, and separated us by an eternal divorce from all our spare "quarters." Then circus days were only equalled and not excelled by training days; huge posters with winged horses and postnring riders in all the colors of the rainbow decorated the fences and lent a new and fresh ornamentation to the smoked walls of the tavern bar-room, already well covered with inscriptions in chalk and pencil, and advertisements offering small rewards for stray sheep and steers. Our parents always gave us permission to do as we pleased on circus day, and sometimes the courts adjourned to see the show. It was a glorious epoch altogether in school boy life; uncles gave us money, and pretty little cousins were placed under our escort for the day; we treated them to ginger-cakes and lemonade, assuming for that day the prodigality of princes. The side-shows, too, where dwarfs and the lamb with two heads, and the anaconda were; the auctioneer who sold razors and combs and papers of pins, and was so witty—how they come up as memory turns her retrospective glass! The female equestrians were bright and beautiful to us as angels, and our little cousins would get fairly jealous as we launched out in open admiration of their rivals in the ring. It was something to sit in the tent with the wind blowing through, and the brass band blowing out its melodies in those warm July days. And now that early enthusiasm has all vanished, our pretty cousins are married, and we sit the best theatrical display through with the resignation of one who performs a duty, and are grateful to the managers if it be short. But it suddenly occurs to us that we have as yet said very little about Mr. Wilson's excellent entertainment, which we hope every one will go and see, if only for the sake of once more living their old circus days over.

"Jeems Pipes of Pipesville" had an audience at the Music Hall, Thursday evening, that would have been an excellent population for Pipesville in the days when he laid out that flourishing colony. Among the audience he saw many old friends, many whose heads as well as his own have become plentifully sprinkled with grey since the theatrical entertainments he gave in the old times when Stephen C. Massett was manager, actor, scene-shifter, scenery, and everything but audience. The entertainment of Thursday evening is well outlined in the title, Drifting About. It was a recital of the lands he has visited and the things he has seen, not in the didactic style of travellers but in the amusing vein of one who sits down to entertain a circle of friends. It was interspersed with imitations and with anecdote, recitals of pathetic poems and narratives of adventure. The imitation of Mme. Anna Bishop was excellent; as a mimic Mr. Massett is good, and his caricatures of people he had met, of indigenous geniuses and exotic characters, were very well done. Altogether, Mr. Massett gave value received, and the audience so accepted his entertainment, interrupting him with frequent applause. Encouraged by the success of his soirée, Mr. Massest intends giving a matinée on his return from an interior tour.

Gilbert's Museum is advertised to be teeming with wonders—an Irish Giant Boy, just returned from the interior, where he grew some three inches in height and sixty pounds in weight, being the driver of the team. There is also an Albino family on the bills, and a snake-charmer, and a Lightning Calculator—whom we remember at Barnum's Museum, where he was an institution—and the wonderful Tyrolean Warbler, and a ceroplastic group of life-like figures, and upwards of two thousand other curiosities. The Museum certainly offers a bill.

"EGOMET" writes to know why we do not generously set aside a busines rule and notice all the theatres in our dramatic column—even those that do not advertise. Simply because this is a business rule with all newspapers. If, as he suggests they are too poor to advertise, the sooner they close their doors the better. An entertainment that is too poor to advertise is manifestly too poor to deserve public patronage.

OCEAN WAVES.—Great exaggeration has existed in respect to the altitude of ocean waves. Even learned writers, until very recently, continued to speak of their rising forty or fifty feet high. In November, 1840, I encountered, during a voyage from New York to Barbadoes, in a small bark, one of the severest hurricanes of the present century. It was one of those great cycloidal storms reported on by the late Colonel Reid, which swept down the whole length of the Caribbean sea, and, turning with the Gulf Stream, followed the coast of North America to Newfoundland, and finally crossed the Atlantic to the shores of England. Owing to the ignorance and stupidity of the captain, we received the whole force of the storm for four days. When we reached the middle of the Gulf Stream, where the current was three knots an hour, off the capes of Carolina, we had the wind at its greatest force from the north, raising the waves to what people delight to call, in poetic language, "mountains high." Being a good sailor, I mounted the mast to get a better view of the terrible desolation which surrounded our little bark, and to measure the height of the waves. I was quite surprised when I mounted thirty feet to find that I was on a level with the waves when the ship was at the bottom of the "troughs." I therefore arrived at the conclusion that they never rise over sixteen or eighteen feet above the ocean's level when at rest. The violence of the waves was such, (as we found when we came into port,) that nearly one-third of the copper was torn from the ship's sides and bottom.—Wilson's Ship-building.

MR. CHRISTIAN PFISTER has the honor of calling public attention to his great assortment of Perfumery, Brushes, fine Hair-pins, Hair of all lengths and colors, Peruques, Toupes, Combs—tortoise-shell, buffalo and Irish horn, ivory and rubber; Cravats of all kinds; Jouvin's Gloves, ladies' and gentlemens'; silk Suspenders and common ones; Shirts and Collars; new styles of Head Dresses, etc. Having made new arrangements with Paris houses, it is within his power to offer to his numerous customers superior advantages over any others in the trade. Six artist coiffeurs will always be found ready for business in the gentlemen's room. A special apartment is provided for the coiffure of ladies.

EMBROIDERED DRESSES.—The fashion of having embroidery on cloaks, ladies' dresses, and in fact, garments of almost every description, is rapidly on the increase in this country—imported, as are other fashions, from Paris. Fortunately for the ladies, the crisis has not caught them unprepared, and left them with no means of ornamenting their articles of dress but the tedious and tiresome one by hand. There is at least one of our popular sewing machines (Grover & Baker's) which is adapted to both sewing and embroidery—the latter as well and as rapidly as it sews the plainest sewing.

(COMMUNICATION.)

THE LATE COLLISION—STATEMENT OF CAPT. POOLE.

Editor Californian: Taking it for granted that you are willing to have a fair statement as to the collision between the Yosemite and Washoe, on Tuesday night, I send this communication for publication.

The Washoe had just left Rio Vista wharf; the Yosemite was close to her at that time, and gaining very rapidly on her, and, on getting within a few feet of her stern, blew a single blast of her whistle, in accordance with the laws, indicating to the Washoe the intention to pass her to the right, but which was not answered. We turned out to pass her to the right, and when we had passed her so far as to bring our boat's wheel ahead of the Washoe's bow, (and we were passing her rapidly,) the latter boat caught the suction of the Yosemite and remained alongside for a few moments. As I suppose, she was drawn against my boat by the suction, and, her guards being lower than those of my boat, went under my guards, breaking in her side houses. No injury was intended to be done the Washoe, either by myself or any of my crew. In fact, no injury of any account was done, as two good carpenters can repair her in half a day, as could have been seen to-day while she was lying at Pacific Wharf. I have no disposition, and never have had, to injure the Washoe, and my orders from the officers of the Company are to do everything possible to avoid collision with her, as well as with all other boats. My pilots and officers are sober and capable men, and have an experience of nearly twenty years in handling boats. I claim that myself and crew have a better knowledge of the business than the Captain and crew of the Washoe can have, as their experience on steamboats is very short and limited; and therefore we are more liable to be right in all cases of collision. Very respectfully, E. A. POOLE,
Master steamer Yosemite.

RICHES HAVE WINGS.—Nothing illustrates this more forcibly than the recent fall in mining Stocks. Therefore, provide a certainty for your family in the future by insuring your life in the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company—cash assets, $6,500,000.
BIGELOW & BRO., Agents,
jy30-1m Over Parrott's Bank.

REFUGIO MINING COMPANY, CHIHUAHUA, Mexico—Office, Odd Fellows' Hall, Montgomery street—The annual meeting of the stockholders of the above company, for the election of Trustees for the ensuing year, will be held at this office on THURSDAY, the 8th of September next, at 2 P. M. COLL DEANE, Secretary.

NOTICE TO SHIPPERS
—TO—
Red Bluff.

ON AND AFTER JULY 8TH, AND UNTIL further notice, the
RED BLUFF BOAT
WILL LEAVE SACRAMENTO
EVERY FRIDAY MORNING,
(Instead of SATURDAY MORNINGS, as heretofore.)
y16-tf J. WHITNEY, JR., President.

TELEGRAPHIC EXCHANGE
—ON—
NEW YORK,
PAYABLE IN GOLD,
For sale in sums to suit by
au20-tf WM. T. COLEMAN & CO.

EXCHANGE
ON NEW YORK,
In sums to suit, at the lowest rates, for sale by
au20-tf WM. T. COLEMAN & CO.

SAN FRANCISCO CHORAL SOCIETY

THE SOCIETY will hereafter meet for Rehearsal on THURSDAY EVENINGS, AT 8 O'CLOCK,
In the Hall of
THE "SAN FRANCISCO VEREIN,"
On the east side of Kearny street, a few doors south of Sacramento street.

☞ MEMBERS PLEASE TAKE NOTICE. ☜

Parties may become SUBSCRIBING MEMBERS by applying to the Secretary.
By order of the Board of Directors,
au20-2t W. H. DANIELL, Secretary.

A LADY WISHES TO EXCHANGE LESsons in French, Music or Painting, for a room and board. Address "E. D. W.," care of W. H. BANCROFT, 609 Montgomery street: an13

REDINGTON & CO.'S ESSENCE OF Jamaica Ginger!

This valuable compound, which is now regarded as one of the most popular remedies in the domestic practice for various complaints of the digestive organs, such as Dyspepsia, Nausea, etc., is prepared solely from the WHITE JAMAICA GINGER, which is the best of all the varieties in use. In the preparation of

REDINGTON & CO.'S
ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER,

Great care is taken to have none but select Root, and to manufacture it in air-tight vessels, thus preventing the evaporation of its delicate essential oil, and preserving the true aroma of the Ginger. It thereby contains in its concentrated form all the valuable properties of the Jamaica Ginger, and is guaranteed to be free from any impurities whatever.

It is a grateful stimulant and carminative, giving warmth and tone to the stomach equal to Brandy, without any of its injurious effects.

It will cure Nausea, caused by riding in railroad cars, or from sea-sickness, or other causes.

Miners and others who are exposed to the heat of the Sun often whilst working in cold water, should never be without

REDINGTON & CO.'S
ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER,

As by taking it as a tonic two or three times a day, it is almost a sure preventive to Chills and Fever; and to those who are farming the rich bottom lands of California it is likewise invaluable as a tonic, and should invariably be taken in the early morning before going to the fields, at the mid-day lunch, and before leaving off work at night.

Ask for REDINGTON & CO.'S ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER, and take no other, if you would always have a Pure and Reliable article.

An excellent external application for Gout, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, &c.

REDINGTON & CO., Proprietors,
416 and 418 Front street,
my28 San Francisco.

RAREY'S CONDITION POWDERS.

THE MOST POWERFUL AND BENEFICIAL AGENT known on the Stomach, Blood, Lungs and Bowels of HORSES, MULES, CATTLE, AND STOCK
of all descriptions.

GREAT BENEFIT TO HARD-WORKING HORSES.

All diseased Stock SPEEDILY and CERTAINLY CURED; healthy Stock will be brought into the very HIGHEST STATE of PERFECTION by giving them a SPOONFULL, WOO

NO LIVERY STABLE SHOULD BE WITHOUT
RAREY'S
CELEBRATED CONDITION POWDERS!

All FARMERS and RANCHMEN should use constantly
RAREY'S
CELEBRATED CONDITION POWDERS!

TEAMSTERS and STAGE COMPANIES everywhere should keep constantly on hand and freely use
RAREY'S
CELEBRATED CONDITION POWDERS!

They are equal to a Life Insurance on all Stock, as will be fully appreciated on trial by all True Economists.

REDINGTON & CO., Sole Agents,
my28 416 and 418 Front Street, San Francisco.

WHAT KILLED HIM?

DR. HALL, in his "Journal of Health," speaking of the death of Washington Irving, asks the above question, and adds: "He might well have remained with us for some years to come had it not been for advice kindly intended, no doubt, but given in thoughtlessness and reckless ignorance.

HE HAD A COLD!

Which by some injudicious prescription had been converted into an asthma." Let me say to Dr. Hall, that that "prescription" was not

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP.

For that is an article calculated to remove rather than to produce asthmatic affections. And as for COUGHS AND COLDS, the world never saw a better remedy, and never will, until nature produces some new ingredient out of which to prepare it. Don't be afraid to use it freely. Every article in it is from nature's own laboratory—the same today as they were a thousand years ago—all calculated to soothe, heal and strengthen. There is no

BETTER FAMILY MEDICINE!

Keep it in the house, use it freely yourself, and give it to your children upon the slightest indication of a cold. By so doing you may save yourself many days and nights of care, anxiety and watchfulness so inseparably connected with the chamber of the sick. jy2

TO THE SICK AND AFFLICTED!

Peake Medical Institute,

Established by Experienced European Physicians for the certain, safe and permanent cure of all Special Diseases.

Consulting Surgeon, DR. PRATT, late of Paris, Member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England.

CONSULTATIONS FREE!

THIS INSTITUTE, CONDUCTED BY EUROPEAN PHYsicians of celebrity, who are graduates of the first Colleges and Universities of Europe, and who have acquired unsurpassed knowledge and skill in the cure of all special diseases during years of experience and study in the largest Hospitals of London and Paris, is to enable all sufferers from special or private diseases, to obtain with certainty safe and speedy cures from Physicians who have devoted entire attention to the various special diseases. These diseases have hitherto generally fallen into the hands of ignorant quacks and charlatans, and the amount of damage and number of deaths that are yearly owing to the ignorant treatment of these diseases by these men, it is impossible to calculate. With one drug alone—viz., Mercury—they annually destroy thousands of unfortunate sufferers, who are often confiding and unsuspecting enough to attribute to the disease what has been the effect alone of the medicine they have been so rashly taking for the cure of their disease.

OBSERVE THAT

The Peake Medical Institute will entirely remedy this great evil, by enabling sufferers from various special diseases which are so common on this coast to obtain, with as much certainty as if they were in London or Paris,

SPEEDY, SAFE AND PERMANENT CURES,

from educated, experienced and skilful European Physicians whose knowledge and skill in the cure of all special diseases is unsurpassed.

Thus confidence and certainty of a speedy cure may be felt by all sufferers going for advice to

THE PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE,

and they will likewise be saved from the danger of falling into the hands of ignorant quacks who throng this city and annually ruin and destroy the health and happiness of so many.

The Institute is fitted up commodiously and privately, and no expense has been spared in obtaining the very best instruments and appliances of modern European surgery and medicine.

The consulting surgeon, Dr. Pratt, Member of the Royal College of England and author of several works on special diseases, has been for years with the celebrated Ricord of Paris, where he acquired considerable celebrity for his great success in the cure of Special Diseases. Dr. Pratt has very high testimonials from some of the most eminent Surgeons of Europe and his treatment is such that he can promise a cure in almost every case.

MENTAL OR BODILY DEBILITY AND WEAKNESS

Arising from youthful excesses and indiscretions or from neglected and badly treated disease, will be treated at

THE PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE

In the most certain and successful manner and in a very short time, by a Surgeon who possesses unsurpassed knowledge and skill in the care of those harassing complaints having been associated with Ricord and other most celebrated surgeons for years, in the largest hospitals of Paris.

Persons who imagine that they are not well or whose strength and vigor is not what it should be, would do well by calling at the Peake Medical Institute (consultations being gratuitous) and getting the opinion and advice of the Surgeon, as in many of these cases the malady is entirely mental, aggravated perhaps, by some disorder of the general health, and a little skilful and kind treatment is all that is wanted to make the patient hearty, robust and happy.

All the after ill effects of special diseases, caused by neglect, bad treatment and mercury, will be speedily and permanently cured at the

PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE,

The sufferer being restored to hearty, strong and robust health.

RHEUMATISM, ULCERS AND DISEASES OF THE SKIN.

Sufferers from these diseases come to the Institute with the certainty of obtaining a perfect cure through the skill of a Surgeon, who devoted himself entirely to the cure of these diseases in the large hospitals of Europe, and who has such an unequalled experience in their treatment, that he has never yet failed in curing even the worst cases. Diseases, of even the longest duration, will be perfectly and quickly eradicated.

THE EYES. THE EYES.

DISEASES OF THE EYE will have especial and particular treatment at the Peake Medical Institute from a Surgeon who has the greatest skill in the cure of all the diseases of this most delicate organ, having been for years in the celebrated eye hospitals of Vienna and Paris, where he gained a rare and perfect knowledge and skill in the cure of all its diseases. All operations that are necessary will be performed with unequalled skill and success. Cataracts will be successfully couched or extracted.

THE PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE

Thus enables sufferers from any of the numerous forms of Special and Private diseases, to feel confident of obtaining a perfect and speedy cure from skilful and experienced European Physicians, of the highest education and unsurpassed knowledge in the cure of these diseases, and who are graduates of the first Colleges and Universities of Europe, as shown by their diplomas at the Institute Persons who have become broken down in health from excesses of any kind or from long-standing disease or mercurial treatment, may come to the Institute with the certainty of obtaining great relief and in all probability a perfect cure, through the extensive knowledge and skill of the Physicians.

Sufferers in the country can receive treatment by mail on receipt of letter with all symptoms, etc.

TO THE LADIES.

PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE.

This Institute is conducted by experienced European Physicians who have given years in the large Hospitals of London and Paris to the study of the treatment and cure of all the diseases and irregularities peculiar to women.

The Consulting Surgeon, Dr. Pratt, late of Paris, Member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England, is the author of a valuable work "On Diseases Peculiar to Females," and ladies suffering from any of the diseases peculiar to the sex are respectfully informed that they can be certain of a safe and sure cure in a short time at the Institute. The Institute is commodiously and privately arranged. Ladies in the country can receive all directions and treatment for a speedy cure, on receipt of letter with symptoms, etc. Consultations free, in English, French, Italian and German.

Address:
PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE,
No. 313 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

CALIFORNIA BRANCH
—OF THE—
U. S. SANITARY COMMISSION.

ALL COMMUNICATIONS AND REMITTANCES SHOULD be addressed to the

OFFICE, No. 240 MONTGOMERY STREET,
Southeast corner of Pine.
O. C. WHEELER, Secretary.

D. C. McRUER, Chairman Executive Committee.
R. G. SNEATH, Treasurer.

Office Hours: 9 A. M. to 4 P. M.

THE UNIVERSAL CLOTHES WRINGER!

WITH COG WHEELS.

BUY NO OTHER!

This Wringer is warranted in every particular. It was pronounced superior to all others at the World's Fair at London, in 1862, and has always taken the First Premium at every State and County Fair, when exhibited in competition with other machines.

No other Wringer has the cog-wheel, without which the rubber on the rolls will get torn, and the strain on the cloth is such as to wear it out.

A liberal discount made to dealers.

WM. FAULKNER & SONS, Agents,
sc3 411 Clay street, San Francisco.

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

The following steamships will be despatched in the month of SEPTEMBER, 1864:

SEPTEMBER 3d, - - - - - - CONSTITUTION
SEPTEMBER 13, - - - - - - SACRAMENTO
SEPTEMBER 23 - - - - - - GOLDEN CITY

From Folsom-street Wharf, at nine o'clock, A. M., punctually,

FOR PANAMA.

Passengers will be conveyed from Panama to Aspinwall by the PANAMA RAILROAD COMPANY, and from Aspinwall to New York by the ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

A. B. FORBES, Agent P. M. S. Co.,
sc3 Cor. Sacramento and Leidesdorff sts.

TYLER BROTHERS,

Importers, Wholesale and Retail Dealers in

School Books, Stationery,

PHOTOGRAPH ALBUMS,

PORTFOLIOS JUVENILE BOOKS, CHILDREN'S PICTURE BOOKS, FANCY ARTICLES, etc.,

NO. 632 WASHINGTON STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO.

au27-tf

IN THE DISTRICT COURT of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco.—FANNY L. GREEN, Plaintiff, vs. ROBERT E. GREEN, Defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said city and county of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to ROBERT E. GREEN, Defendant: You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff, in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days, (exclusive of the day of service,) after the service on you of this Summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this District, within twenty days; otherwise, within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree dissolving the bonds of matrimony existing between the plaintiff and defendant, and permitting plaintiff to resume her maiden name of Fanny L. Brown, and for costs of suit and general relief. And you are hereby notified, that if you fail to appear and answer the said Complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and Seal of the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 25th day of August, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-four.

Seal and Int. Rev. Stamp. WM. LOEWY, Clerk.
By WM. R. SATTERLEE, Deputy Clerk.
J. D. Stevenson, Plaintiff's Attorney. sc3

AUSTIN & SCHMITT, Importers and

Dealers in

FRENCH, ENGLISH AND DOMESTIC DRY GOODS,

Offer for sale the best assortment of the above goods to be found in the city, consisting in part of

SILKS,
SHAWLS, MANTILLAS,
LACES,
DRESS GOODS,
Of every description. Best quality of
MOURNING GOODS,
HOSIERY,
EMBROIDERIES,
Together with a complete assortment of
HOUSEKEEPING GOODS.

247 Montgomery street,
Between Sacramento and California streets.

Canton Tea Store, Established 1858.

GEO. S. HASKELL & CO.

IMPORTERS,
WHOLESALE AND RETAIL DEALERS
— IN —
JAPAN AND CHINA TEAS,
AND GROCERIES.

Store fronting on
514 Market & 15 Sutter St.
☞ THREE DOORS ☜
BELOW THE MARKET HOUSE,
San Francisco.

Our Motto, ☞ "Large Sales at Small Profits for Cash. ☜

FAMILY NOTICE.

Bowen Brothers,

COR. MONTGOMERY AND CALIFORNIA STREETS,
SAN FRANCISCO.

Offer for sale:

Barton & Gnesten's Salad Oil, the best in the world.
Boneless Sardines; a great luxury.
English Potted Meats.
Anchovy and Shrimp Paste.
Condensed Milk, preserved with refined Sugar hermetically sealed in cans for Army and Travelers' use. Its purity is guaranteed.
Bent's Water, Butter, Milk, Wine and Graham Crackers.
English, Stilton, Cheshire and Holland Cheese.
English Soups, assorted.
Pate de Foie Gras.
French Truffles and Mushrooms.
Spanish and French Olives, in kegs.
Spiced Oysters.
Dutch Herrings and Sardells.
English and American Bloaters.
Stuffed Olives and Mangoes.
Mess Mackerel.
Cider Vinegar.
Teas of every variety, imported expressly for our Family Trade.
Sugars of every kind direct from the Manufactory.

WINES AND LIQUORS,
Direct from Bond, Wholesale or Retail.

au6-tf

REMOVAL.

INSURANCE AG INST FIRE.

THE NORTH BRITISH AND MERCANTILE
INSURANCE COMPANY
OF LONDON AND EDINBURGH.
ESTABLISHED, 1809.

Capital, $10,000,000. Accumulated Funds, January 1, 1864, $11,169,140. Deposit in California under State law, $75,000. Limit on single Risks, $100,000. Bankers, Messrs Tallant & Co. Fire Policies on buildings and contents, throughout the Pacific States and Territories, granted on the most liberal terms. Losses promptly adjusted and paid here in U. S. Gold coin.
Office removed to 414 California street, opposite Alsop & Co.
WM. H. TILLINGHAST, Agent.
au19-3m

MANHATTAN FIRE INSURANCE
COMPANY OF NEW YORK.
Cash Capital and Surplus.....$750,000
Deposit in San Francisco.....$75,000

COLUMBIA FIRE INSURANCE CO.,
OF NEW YORK.
Cash Capital and Surplus.....$600,000
Deposit in San Francisco.....$75,000

THE ABOVE MENTIONED WELL-KNOWN and responsible Companies, having complied with the law enacted at the last session of the Legislature, and deposited with Messrs. Donohoe, Ralston & Co.

$75,000 EACH,

As additional security to Policy-holders, will continue to insure
BUILDINGS,
MERCHANDISE,
FURNITURE,
And other property in California, Oregon and Nevada Territory, against Loss or Damage by Fire, upon the most favorable terms.
All Losses promptly paid in United States Gold Coin.
R. B. SWAIN & CO., Agents,
ju25-tf 206 Front street, corner of California.

JOSEPH A. DONOHOE, San Francisco. | EUGENE KELLY, New York.

DONOHOE, KELLY & CO.,
SAN FRANCISCO.
EUGENE KELLY & CO.,
NEW YORK.
Bankers.

EXCHANGE ON
NEW YORK,
BANK OF LONDON, - - - - London.
BANK OF IRELAND. jy2

UNION COLLEGE,
SAN FRANCISCO,
Junction of Second and Bryant streets.
R. TOWNSEND HUDDART,
PRINCIPAL.

THE COLLEGE HAS BEEN ENLARGED DURING THE past year by the erection of a spacious Hall and Recitation Rooms, which have been furnished with Philosophical Apparatus and all these modern improvements that tend to facilitate the progress of Education, as well as to promote the health and comfort of pupils. The other buildings are commodious, the dormitories lofty and well ventilated, and the whole establishment is provided with every suitable accommodation. The grounds for exercise and recreation occupy a 100-vara Lot in one of the healthiest and most desirable parts of the city, near to South Park.

DR. HUDDART
Is assisted by efficient Instructors, who co-operate with him in constant supervision over the education of those entrusted to his care.

THE MODERN LANGUAGES, FRENCH, SPANISH and GERMAN, together with the accomplishments of MUSIC AND DRAWING, are under the best qualified Teachers.

A prospectus containing full information for parents and guardians, can be obtained on application at the College; or at the bookstore of A. ROMAN & CO, or C. Bench, Montgomery street. au6-1m

FORTY-FOUR FIRST PREMIUMS
IN 1863!

THERE IS BUT ONE
FIRST
PREMIUM SEWING MACHINE.

The GROVER & BAKER SEWING MACHINE has been awarded Twenty-three First Premiums at State Fairs, and Twenty-one at City and County Fairs, in 1863, making Forty-four in all.
R. G. BROWN, Agent.
my28 329 Montgomery Street.

CARPETS, OIL CLOTHS,

UPHOLSTERY GOODS,

PAPER HANGINGS.

THE LARGEST
—AND—
BEST ASSORTED STOCK IN THE STATE,
And everything to be found in a well-conducted

Carpet Warehouse,

For Sale at the Lowest Rates.

WM. M. HIXON'S

CARPET WAREHOUSE,

NOS. 606 AND 608 CLAY STREET.
One Door above Montgomery street. my28

GREAT TRIUMPH!!

STEINWAY & SONS

Were awarded the FIRST PRIZE MEDAL at the late great INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION AT LONDON, over the two hundred and sixty-nine Pianos entered for competition from all parts of the world.
The Special Correspondent of the New York Times says: "Messrs. Steinway & Sons' indorsement by the Jurors is emphatic, and stronger and more to the point than that of any European maker."
A constant supply of the above superior instruments can be found at the Agent's,
M. GRAY, 613 Clay street.
PIANO TUNING done by a first-class Workman, from Steinway & Son's Factory, New York. my28

COMMERCIAL STEAM PRINTING
HOUSE.
FRANCIS, VALENTINE & CO.,
517 CLAY and 514 COMMERCIAL STREETS.

Every description of BOOK, JOB and POSTER PRINTING done in the best style and at the lowest rates.
BOOK-BINDING and RULING done to order.

PILES! PILES!! PILES!!!

Not piles of Gold nor yet of Silver so much coveted by all men, but the bleeding, blind, or external Piles can be easily and speedily cured by the use of
WOOD'S SUB-POSITORY.
It is a preparation totally distinct from anything heretofore offered as a remedy for this painful and often fatal complaint. The Sub-Pository is neither a pill, powder wash or salve, and yet it has proved to be a certain remedy for the Piles. Do not doubt this assertion, nor delay testing the truth of it if you are troubled with the Piles—you will not be deceived in it.
Sold wholesale and retail by W. NEWELL, ju11 No. 630 Merchant street.

REOPENED FOR THE SEASON.

THE CRYSTAL SPRINGS HOTEL,
Situated four miles from the San Mateo Railroad depot, in a most splendid valley, surrounded with large, beautiful, natural trees, is now open for the public. The road from San Mateo to the house has been recently macadamized, making it the finest drive in California. The House and Cottages have been refitted and thoroughly renovated. New spring beds and every modern improvement have been added to the sleeping department. The larder, as usual, contains all the delicacies of the season. Stages leave San Mateo depot on the arrival of the trains for Crystal Springs.
A fine stable is now opened at San Mateo by Messrs. Byrnes & Ames, who will furnish horses and carriages, or saddle horses, at low rates, to the public. Parties wishing rooms or meals, on arrival, can engage them by telegraph, via San Mateo.
jul1-tf TONY OAKES, Proprietor.

FEET! FEET! FEET!

Listen all ye that deal in feet and are barefooted:
GOOD TIMES COME AT LAST!
No Assessments to Pay, but Dividends Secured at Once!

FOR SIXTY DAYS
We will dispose of our IMMENSE STOCK
AT UNPRECEDENTED LOW PRICES.

We have in store and arriving, upwards of $150,000 WORTH
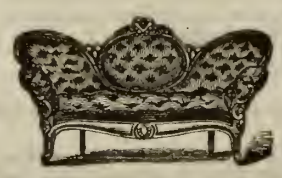
OF
BOOTS, SHOES AND GAITERS,
Which we are determined to give the public, and all our customers, for cash,
25 PER CENT. BELOW NEW YORK COST.

5,000 PAIRS LADIES' BUTTON, LACE AND CONGRESS GAITERS,
Suitable for House Shoes, Regardless of any Cost,
ON ACCOUNT OF HIGH PREMIUM ON GOLD.

We solicit a call to convince, then send along your friends, to the largest RETAIL SHOE STORE in the State.

HOLCOMBE BROTHERS,
PIONEER SHOE STORE,
Corner Washington and Kearny streets.
my28

THE MOST EXTENSIVE,



BEST SELECTED, CHEAPEST,
—AND—
LATEST STYLES
—OF—
Furniture.

GOODWIN & CO.,
No. 528 Washington street,
Are constantly receiving, and have on hand a large assortment of FINE ROSEWOOD, MAHOGANY, and BLACK WALNUT PARLOR, LIBRARY and CHAMBER SUITS, with DINING ROOM SUITS TO ORDER.
☞ We guarantee both Price and Quality satisfactory to our Patrons.
GOODWIN & CO.,
jul8 No. 528 Washington street.

AUSTIN & SCHMITT, Importers and
Dealers in
FRENCH, ENGLISH AND DOMESTIC DRY GOODS,
Offer for sale the best assortment of the above goods to be found in the city, consisting in part of SILKS,
SHAWLS, MANTILLAS,
LACES,
DRESS GOODS,
Of every description. Best quality of
MOURNING GOODS,
HOSIERY,
EMBROIDERIES,
Together with a complete assortment of
HOUSEKEEPING GOODS.
247 Montgomery street,
Between Sacramento and California streets.

SQUARZA'S PUNCH.
First Premium, Sacramento, 1862.
First Premium at San Francisco District Fair, 1863.
First and Special Premium, Sacramento, 1863.
Wholesale and Retail.
my23 44 Leidesdorff street, San Francisco.

EDWARD BOSQUI & CO.,
517
CLAY STREET, SAN FRANCISCO.
BOOKBINDERS, PAPER-RULERS, AND
ACCOUNT-BOOK MANUFACTURERS.
Blanks of all kinds printed and ruled to any desired pattern. my28

THE CALIFORNIAN.

A PAPER FOR THE TIMES.

Devoted to Live Topics,

AND THE

BEST INTERESTS OF CALIFORNIA.

Is published
EVERY SATURDAY MORNING,
AT
728 MONTGOMERY STREET.

Nothing will be spared that will enable THE CALIFORNIAN to appeal to the Public for support, not only as the
BEST JOURNAL ON THE PACIFIC COAST,
But also as being
THE EQUAL OF ANY ON THIS CONTINENT!

Paper, of a quality and weight not often brought to this market, is ordered from the East
EXPRESSLY FOR THE CALIFORNIAN,
THE BEST TALENT OF THE STATE
Is employed upon THE CALIFORNIAN, and arrangements have been made with contributors abroad for
EASTERN AND FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE.

THE TERMS OF THE CALIFORNIAN are $5 per year by mail to subscribers, invariably in advance; 50 cents per month served by carriers.

All communications and correspondence must be addressed to
C. H. WEBB,
Editor and Proprietor CALIFORNIAN,
728 Montgomery street.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—The first number of a new weekly bearing the above sententious title was laid upon our desk last Saturday. Its editor and proprietor is C. H. Webb, the "Inigo" of the Golden Era, and the late local editor of one of our permanent dailies. We have read its contents with considerable pleasure, for its originality and versatility are alike commendable. It will supply a void in literary circles, which has long been felt in the community, and should its existence be prolonged, unlike many of its predecessors, we shall look for a healthier tone to home-made literary merit. It has our best wishes for its success.—Police Gazette.

CALIFORNIA literature has been enriched by a new weekly paper, the CALIFORNIAN, published under the direction of Mr. C. H. Webb, who has already known how to make his capacities as a distinguished writer appreciated. This new organ is consecrated to the propagation of literature and scientific works, and merits a kind reception.—Franco-American Union, June 1st

THE CALIFORNIAN, a new literary journal, C. H. Webb, editor and proprietor, made its first appearance Saturday morning, May 28th. Mr. Webb is widely known as the writer of "Things," in the Golden Era. He has also been connected editorially with the Bulletin. His paper (16 pages) presents an elegant and attractive appearance.—Golden Era, May 29th.

And the following we clip from the country exchanges which have reached us:

THE CALIFORNIAN.—The first number of a literary paper (weekly), bearing this title, has been received from the Sacramento agent, C. A. Carolan. In size and general appearance it resembles the New York Round Table. The contents of this number, original and selected, establish the presence of editorial taste and the command of intellectual resources to insure a literary success, at least. To render the CALIFORNIAN acceptable to the State at large, however, San Francisco, the locality of its publication, should not occupy too much space in its columns. C. H. Webb, a gentleman of considerable journalistic experience, and a facile, lively, piquant writer, is responsible for the advent of this publication.—Sacramento Daily Union May 30th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This is the name of a new literary paper in San Francisco, published by C. H. Webb, a literary gentleman of considerable ability. It is the best looking paper ever printed in the State, and well filled with good reading matter. Carolan is the agent for this city.—Sacramento Daily Bee, May 30th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This new weekly paper, published in San Francisco by Charles H. Webb, has been handed us for perusal. It is a literary paper of the highest order of merit, and deserves success. It contains, among other things, a highly humorous rhyme—The Ballad of the Emeu. Charles A. Carolan is agent for this city.—Sacramento Evening Star, May 30th.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—This is the title of a new weekly literary journal which has just made its appearance in San Francisco, the first number of which has found a place on our table. It is got up in very fine style, and edited by C. H. Webb, a gentleman of considerable newspaper experience. From what we have seen of its contents, we believe the CALIFORNIAN will be a welcome visitor to the family fireside. Its editorials appear to be of a high-toned, liberal and finished order, while the selections are of such a character as should have a place in a respectable literary journal. It is not of the wishy-washy, sentimental, sickly order of publications, but one which we hope Californians will be proud to recognize as one of the productions of our coast.—Marysville Express, June 1st.

THE CALIFORNIAN.—A new candidate for public favor, in the shape of a Saturday literary sheet, made its appearance yesterday under the above title. It is a handsomely printed paper of sixteen pages, and the issue before us gives an earnest of the capacity of Mr. C. H. Webb to conduct such a journal with credit to himself and the literary progress of California. It will be found a welcome visitor in every house, and we wish it success. It is readable and interesting, and cannot fail making friends.—Daily Alta, May 29th.

ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM!

THE REMEDY FOR CURING

CONSUMPTION, COUGHS, COLDS,

ASTHMA, CROUP,

DISEASES OF THE THROAT, BRONCHITIS,

Pains and Oppression of the Chest or Lungs,

DIFFICULT BREATHING,

AND ALL THE

DISEASES OF THE PULMONARY ORGANS.

ITS ACTION IS EXPECTORANT, ALTERATIVE, SUDORIFIC, SEDATIVE, DIAPHORETIC and DIURETIC, which renders it one of the most valuable remedies known for curing diseases of the lungs. It excites expectoration, and causes the lungs to throw off the phlegm or mucus, changes the secretions and PURIFIES THE BLOOD; heals the irritated parts; gives strength to the digestive system, brings the liver to its proper action, and imparts, beyond the possibility of doubt, strength to the whole system. Such is the immediate and satisfactory effect, that it is warranted to break up the most distressing cough in a few hours' time, if not of too long standing. It is warranted to give entire satisfaction even in the most confirmed cases of Consumption. It is warranted not to produce costiveness, which is the case with most remedies, or affect the head, as it contains no Opium in any form. It is warranted to be perfectly harmless to the most delicate child, although it is an active and powerful remedy for restoring the system. There is no real necessity for so many deaths by Consumption, when ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM will prevent it, if only taken in time.

Sold by all Druggists. Price $1 per bottle.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,
Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,
au27 Corner of Clay, San Francisco.

DR. STEPHENS'

CELEBRATED

Eye Salve!

AN INFALLIBLE REMEDY FOR

DISEASES OF THE EYE,

Acute or chronic, ulceration of the lachrymal glands, film and weakness of the vision from any cause; it is the most effectual remedy ever discovered.

Sold by all Druggists.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,
Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,
au27 Corner of Cluy, San Francisco.

CATARRH!

DR. H. GOODALE'S

Catarrh Remedy!

FOR CENTURIES CATARRH HAS DEFIED THE skill of physicians and surgeons. No medical work contains a prescription that will eradicate it. Nothing save DR. GOODALE'S REMEDY will break it up, radically destroying the principle of the disease, and precluding the possibility of a relapse. Medical men have attempted to explain what it is, but admit that they have not discovered its antidote. Dr. Goodale offers this simple definition of its character: It is a disorder which he DOES CURE and they DO NOT. This is the great fact which it imports the sufferer to know, and a single trial will establish it beyond a question. Price, $1. Sold by all Druggists.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,
Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,
au27 Corner of Clay, San Francisco.

KENDALL'S AMBOLINE!

THE GREAT
UNEQUALLED
PREPARATION
FOR
RESTORING, INVIGORATING, BEAUTIFYING
AND DRESSING
THE
Hair!

IT IS A STIMULATING, OILY EXTRACT OF BARKS and Herbs. It will cure all diseases of the scalp and itching of the head, entirely eradicates dandruff, prevents the Hair from falling out, or from turning prematurely gray, causing it to grow thick and long. It is entirely different from all hair preparations, and may be relied on.

Put up in boxes containing two bottles—Price $1.

☞ Sold by all Druggists.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,
Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,
Corner of Clay, San Francisco.

ROSENBLATT'S Palace of Fashion,

OPPOSITE THE OCCIDENTAL HOTEL.

FRENCH CORSETS, - - - ONE DOLLAR!

WE HAVE JUST RECEIVED BY THE LAST STEAMER Valenciennes and Point Lace Collars, Sleeves and Handkerchiefs, French Embroidered Bands, new style Hoop Skirts, Bustles, Russia Leather Bags, Onyx Breastpins and Ear-rings, Jet Chains and Bracelets, Hosiery, Gloves; Velvet, Cloth and Opera Cloaks,

Which are offered 25 per cent. less than New York Prices, on account of the high premium on gold, at

ROSENBLATTS PALACE OF FASHION,
123 and 125 Montgomery street.

Branch, 125 J street, between Fourth and Fifth streets, au20 Sacramento.

BOYS! BOYS! BOYS!

NOW IS THE TIME!

H. M. LOCKWOOD & CO.,

New No. 624) CLAY STREET, (Old No 176

Have received a Large Stock of

GENTS' AND BOYS' CLOTHING

—AND—

FURNISHING GOODS,

Which they are selling

AT VERY LOW PRICES.

Every Garment warranted. All are invited to call and examine our goods.

H. M. LOCKWOOD & CO.,
my28 624 Clay street, San Francisco.

H. LUCKE,

BOOTMAKER, AND IMPORTER

—OF—

FRENCH BOOTS, SHOES AND GAITERS OF THE LATEST PARISIAN MAKE AND MODE.

Lady customers can have their measures forwarded and their shoes made in Paris in the latest style and by the most celebrated manufacturers, at moderate rates.

No. 648 Washington street, below Kearny,
SIGN OF THE GOLDEN BOOT. jy30-3m

McRUER & MERRILL,

WHOLESALE AUCTION HOUSE,

204 and 206 California street.

Regular Sale Days - - - WEDNESDAYS and SATURDAYS
(Advances on Consignments.)

NOTICE!

From this date Mr. A. P. EVERETT has an interest in our business. McRUER & MERRILL.
San Francisco, October 20, 1862.

A. P. EVERETT, - - - - - - - - - Auctioneer.
jul1-3m

DR. GEORGE F. WOODWARD,

SURGEON U. S. PENSION BUREAU.

OFFICE, 127 MONTGOMERY STREET,
Opposite the Occidental Hotel, San Francisco.
jy30-tf

DR. J. H. HATCH,

DENTIST,

Graduate of the Pennsylvania College of Dental Surgery.

All operations pertaining to the profession thoroughly and skillfully performed. Entire satisfaction in all cases guaranteed.

Office, 645 Clay street, between Montgomery and Kearny street, San Francisco. au27

SAVE YOUR

E. F. BUNNELL, D.D.S.,

ROOMS, NO. 51 SECOND STREET.

DR. BUNNELL WILL SAVE EVERY TOOTH THAT ACHES from exposure of the nerve, or refund the charge for the operation, and extract each tooth without pay in EVERY case of failure. Teeth filled with gold, artificial bone, and golden lithodeon. Plate teeth on vulcanite and gold enameled base, of surpassing beauty and comfort.

☞ All work warranted. Price low. ☜

N. B.—More than 1,000 aching teeth have been saved in succession, without the loss of one. au27-3m

REMOVAL.

DR. JOHN HEALD,

DENTIST,

OFFICE AND RESIDENCE: STEVENSON HOUSE,

Montgomery street, corner of California. Entrance on both streets. Rooms 12 and 13. jy30-3m

WONDERFUL TRIUMPH

IN AMERICAN DENTISTRY.

DR. BEERS & CO.,

617 Clay street,

ARE NOW MANUFACTURING THE NEW style of ARTIFICIAL TEETH so highly approved at the East, and which to be appreciated only requires to be seen. The Teeth, Gums and Plate are made of one entire piece of Porcelain without seam or joint, combining great strength and beauty with absolute purity and freedom from any metallic taste, while the coloring of the gums and the interior of the mouth are so perfect as to almost defy detection. All interested in the progress of the Arts are invited to examine samples of this work.

Superior Gold and Vulcanite Work also manufactured as usual, but at greatly reduced prices. jul8

LAWRENCE & HOUSEWORTH,

OPTICIANS,

IMPORTERS OF OPTICAL, MATHEMATICAL AND PHILOSOPHICAL INSTRUMENTS,

STEREOSCOPIC GOODS,

PHOTOGRAPHIC ALBUMS,

CARTES DE VISITE,

AND

JOSEPH RODGERS & SON'S

SUPERIOR CUTLERY,

No. 637 CLAY STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO,

(ESTABLISHED IN 1851,)

HAVE FOR SALE THE LARGEST STOCK ON THE PACIFIC COAST, consisting in part as follows:

720 dozen SPECTACLES, in Gold, Silver, Steel and Pluted Frames
305 dozen EYE GLASSES, in Gold, Silver, Steel, Horn, Shell and Rubber Frames.
150 dozen WIRE GAUZE GOGGLES.
300 dozen SPECTACLE GLASSES and BRAZILIAN PEBBLES.
350 dozen SPECTACLE and EYE GLASS CASES.

395 Opera and Marine Glasses.
75 Telescope and Spy Glasses,
178 dozen Magnifying Glasses,
80 doz. Pocket Compasses,
325 Hand Stereoscopes,
74 Revolving Stereoscopes
1025 doz. Stereoscopic Views
Drawing Instruments in German Silver and Brass,
Boxwood and Ivory Scales,
Microscopes in every Style,
25 Magnetic Machines for Medical purposes,
Aneroid Barometers,

20,500 Card Photographs, Photographic Albums,
600 Album Pictures—in oil colors,
50 doz. Union Card Frames,
Joseph Rodgers & Son's CUTLERY,
100 doz. Table Knives,
260 doz. Pocket Knives,
120 doz. Razors,
50 doz. Razor Strops,
130 doz. Scissors, SCISSORS, in Cases,
100 doz. Gyroscope Tops,
169 doz. Thermometers,
25 doz. Hydrometers,
Galvanic Batteries.

☞ COUNTRY TRADERS will consult their own interest by examining our Stock and Prices before purchasing elsewhere.

 ORDERS FROM THE COUNTRY promptly executed.

☞ CATALOGUES sent to any address FREE.

Address
LAWRENCE & HOUSEWORTH,
OPTICIANS,
637 CLAY STREET,
my28 SAN FRANCISCO.

R. G. SNEATH,

408 FRONT STREET, SAN FRANCISCO,

Importer and Wholesale Dealer in

GROCERIES, PROVISIONS, FLOUR, RICE

TOBACCOS, LIQUORS, ETC.

Branch House, - - SNEATH & BOARMAN, - - Red Bluff.

Forwarding Agent, D. W. EARL, Sacramento, who will receive and fill orders for all kinds of Goods on my account, and keep a large stock of Flour, Barley, Potatoes, Ground Feed, etc., etc. No charge for forwarding.

ALMADEN QUICKSILVER!

Orders for Goods not in my line furnished customers without extra charge. Orders for Goods in the Eastern markets attended to promptly. Daily Prices Current furnished when desired.

Orders respectfully solicited. jul1-1m

CONTINENTAL HOTEL,

SAN JOSE.

GEORGE T. BROMLEY.....Proprietor.

As a desirable place of resort for health or recreation, the above Hotel is not surpassed in the State.

Excellent accommodations for families, by the day, week, or month, on reasonable terms.
ju25

REMOVAL.

A. EDDY'S

Dancing Academy,

Platt's (Middle) Hall.

PUPILS TAUGHT IN ONE-HALF THE TIME OF elsewhere.

CLASSES—MONDAYS and FRIDAYS. Ladies at half-past 2 P. M.; Gents at half-past 7 P. M.

CHILDREN'S CLASSES—On SATURDAYS, at 2 P. M.; also, on WEDNESDAYS, at half-past 3 P. M.

Private instructions given separately or to classes, to suit the convenience of applicants.

SELECT SOIREES on alternate weeks. nu6-tf

CARRINGTON & CO'S

GENERAL PURCHASING AGENCY,

No. 40 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Personal Orders, small or large, and for articles of every descriptions, PROMPTLY and carefully attended to.

Who wants anything from New York?

THIS AGENCY

Enables Country Residents to make purchases in the City without troubling busy friends, or mere acquaintances.

IF YOU WANT

Books, Prints, Clothing, Instruments, Music, Tools, Weapons, Sporting Implements, Fancy Stock, Jewelry, Silver or Plated Ware, Wines, Cigars, Fine Groceries, Furniture, in short, any Article, large or small, singly or in quantity, for Ladies' or Gentlemen's use or wear, or for Dealers' Supplies, from a coal-ring to a steam engine —a Cameo or a Cashmere; lace or leather,

SEND ON YOUR ORDERS.

We can fill them on better terms than you could obtain if here; while our commission, even on large orders, is much less than the expense of visiting the city in person.

Orders under $10, from places within reach of our daily Expresses, (except for perishable articles,) can be paid for on delivery by Express; others should be remitted for, either direct, or through some city friend to be paid when filled. Every order should be as clearly worded as possible.

Orders may be given in French, Spanish or German.

COMMISSION CHARGE, - - - FIVE PER CENT.

Address:
CARRINGTON & CO.,
au6 40 Broadway, N. Y.

MECHANICS' INSTITUTE.

Industrial Exhibition, 1864.

NOTICE TO EXHIBITORS.

THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE WILL BE PREPARED at the Pavilion, on Union Square, to receive goods intended for exhibition, on the 22d of August, and none will be admitted after the 31st. By order of the Committee, au13-td C. B. PORTER.

MRS. HENDRICKS,

No. 629 MISSION STREET,

Devotes herself exclusively to

EMBROIDERY, STAMPING AND PINKING,

And she does more work than any other person in her line. She has by far the best collection and the largest assortment of stamps in the city. Her patterns are the most carefully drawn, and her marking is the evenest and the easiest to work, especially for those who are not very skilful. The coloring of all others rubs out, and the figures, if not traced round with thread, are effaced before the work is done; but Mrs. Hendricks' coloring, on all kinds of stuff, is warranted to defy rubbing, though it can be easily washed out. She is an engraver and engraves her own stamps, and thus is enabled to supply herself with all the latest patterns fashionable in Eastern and European cities.

Any customer can get a new pattern cut without charge, if Mrs. Hendricks can use it afterwards. Although there are many others in the same business in San Francisco, all acknowledge the superiority of Mrs. Hendricks, and send the most difficult work to her. Ladies are invited to call and examine her patterns.

☞ Remember the number, 629 Mission street, San Francisco. jy30tf*

FARRAND'S OSCILLATING Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALLED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REduction and amalgamation of Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY.

As a guarantee of what this machine will do, I propose, with any gentleman who will produce an Amalgamator that will work the same amount of ore in the same number of hours, with the same outlay of power, and produce the equal result, to deposit the sum of FIVE HUNDRED DOLLARS each, the money so deposited to be drawn by the person who shall be declared to have produced the best result. The money (the $500) by whichever party won to be paid over to some one of the benevolent institutions in this State, to be named by the party losing. This proposition is not made with the view of detracting from the merits of any Amalgamator now before the public, but for the purpose of placing this valuable improvement before such persons as may be interested in quartz milling, and to whom the matter properly belongs.

I CHALLENGE COMPETITION.

CALL AND SEE THE MACHINES WORK!

W. D. FARRAND.

R. L. OGDEN, Agent, Southeast corner of Montgomery and California streets, San Francisco. jy30tf

OCCIDENTAL HOTEL—Corner Montgomery and Bush streets, San Francisco.

This House possesses all the requirements of a FIRST CLASS HOTEL, its spacious READING ROOM, with large MINERAL CABINET and extensive COLLECTION OF SPECIMENS from the different Mining Regions of the Pacific Coast—BRANCH TELEGRAPH OFFICE connecting with Lines throughout the country—and NEWS STAND—all contributing to make it the Headquarters and Home for the Californian business man and tourist.

The TABLE of this House shall not be excelled by any.

BOARD, THREE DOLLARS PER DAY.
LEWIS LELAND & CO.,
my28 Proprietors.

LOCKE & MONTAGUE,

IMPORTERS OF

STOVES AND METALS,

Nos. 112 and 114 Battery street,
jy2 SAN FRANCISCO.

GEORGE B. MERRILL,

ATTORNEY AT LAW,

Office, 520 Montgomery street, (over Messrs. Sather & Co.'s Bank,)

SAN FRANCISCO.

Gives special attention to the Probate of Wills and the Administration of Estates.
au20

GREGORY YALE,

ATTORNEY AT LAW,

OFFICE—On second floor of Sather & Co.'s Bank, corner of Montgomery and Commercial streets, Nos. 2, 3 and 4, San Francisco. jy2

JOHN GORMAN,

NOTARY PUBLIC AND CONVEYANCER,

No. 705 MONTGOMERY STREET,

(Near Washington,)

Metropolitan Block, SAN FRANCISCO.
jy9.

LEGAL.

IN THE COUNTY COURT of the city and county of San Francisco, State of California.—In the matter of the Petition of JOSEPH GENTH, an Insolvent Debtor.

Pursuant to an order of the Hon. Samuel Cowles, Judge of the said County Court, notice is hereby given to all the creditors of said Insolvent, JOSEPH GENTH, to be and appear before the Hon. Samuel Cowles, Judge as aforesaid, in open Court, at the court-room of said Court, in the City Hall, in the city and county of San Francisco, on MONDAY, the 26th day of SEPTEMBER, 1864, at 10 o'clock, A. M., of that day, then and there to show cause, if any they can, why the prayer of said Insolvent should not be granted, and an assignment of his estate be made, and he be discharged from his debts and liabilities, in pursuance of the statute in such case made and provided; and in the mean time all proceedings against said Insolvent be stayed.

Witness, my hand and the seal of said Court, this 22d day of August, A. D. 1864.

(Seal and stamp.) WM. LOEWY, Clerk.
By J. NAPHTALY, Deputy Clerk.

Burnett & Cleveland, Attorneys for Petitioner, 634 Clay street. au23-5t

SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES!

Motto—The Singer Sewing Machines are the only machines that can sew all kinds of cloth, and with all kinds of thread.

THE SINGER LETTER A
TRANSVERSE SHUTTLE FAMILY
MACHINES,

With recent improvements for

HEMMING, FELLING,
TUCKING, GATHERING,
BINDING, CORDINO,
QUILTING, BRAIDING, etc.,

Are unrivalled for Family and light Manufacturing purposes. We invite the special attention of ladies to the Folding Top Cabinets, our latest improvement. They are the most useful, convenient and novel Cabinets yet introduced, and are worthy of examination.

SINGER'S STANDARD
MANUFACTURING MACHINES,

For Tailoring, Boot and Shoe Making, Harness and Carriage Trimming, are the cheapest, best and only Machine worthy of patronage for general purposes.

☞ Call and examine, or send for a pamphlet.

THE SINGER MANUF. COMPANY,
No. 139 Montgomery street.
WM. BRODERICK, Agent. se3-3m

QUINCY HALL

Clothing Emporium!

THE Largest and Finest Store in the State is QUINCY HALL, 545, 547, and 549 Washington street, where can be found clothing of every description, of the finest quality and latest style. Hats, Caps and Furnishing Goods.

se3-tf

$2,000 REWARD!

A REWARD OF TWO THOUSAND DOLLARS IS OFfered by the subscriber to any person who will discover or produce a better article for dressing and preserving the HAIR than the

TRICOMALICUM!!

known in California for many years for its wonderful properties.

The TRICOMALICUM, composed of substances tonic and strengthening, possesses the priceless quality of renewing the Hair, of destroying dandruff, and of dressing and keeping it in a perfectly healthy state.

PRINCIPAL DEPOT at the store of the Inventor,
CHRISTIAN PFISTER,
se3-tf No. 227 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

S. F. O. C.

REGULAR NOMINATIONS
—OF THE—
San Francisco Olympic Club.

☞ The following list of Candidates is recommended by your Nominating Committee to fill the respective offices for which they are named, to serve for the ensuing six months:

For President - - - - - - JOHN McCOMB
For Vice President - - - - - H. K. MOORE
For Treasurer - - - - - W. H. ELDRIDGE
For Secretary - - - - - EDWIN BONNELL
For Leader - - - - - - CHAS. C. JACKS
For Directors: ROBINSON GIBBONS, JOHN H. COLEMAN, JAS. S. TOWNSEND, HENRY DUTTON, Jr.

☞ The Election will be held at the Hall of the Club on MONDAY, September 5th, 1864, from nine o'clock, A. M., to nine P. M.

WM. P. MERRIAM, se3-1t Secretary Nominating Committee.

S. F. O. C.

MEMBERS' INDEPENDENT TICKET
—OF THE—
San Francisco Olympic Club.

☞ GENTLEMEN: In accordance with your numerously signed petition, we, your Committee, unanimously recommend the following-named gentlemen as eminently qualified to serve as officers, and worthy of your support at the approaching election.

W. A. WEST,
F. BARNARD,
J. C. EDWARDS,
ROBT. CUNNINGHAM,
J. W. GOULD,
Members of Independent Nominating Committee.

For President - - - - REUBEN H. LLOYD
For Vice President - - - - FRED A ELLIOTT
For Secretary - - - DANIEL H WHITTEMORE
For Treasurer - - - - - EDWARD W SMITH
For Leader - - - - - DURBIN VAN VLECK
For Directors: DAVID WILDER, ARTHUR NAHL, JOHN K ORR, JOSEPH MANSUR.

☞ The Election will be held on MONDAY, September 5, 1864, at the Club Rooms, on Sutter street, from nine o'clock, A M to nine P M.

JOHN W. GOULD, Secretary.
se3-1t Independent Nominating Committee.

MAGUIRE'S OPERA HOUSE.

T. MAGUIRE - - - - - - - PROPRIETOR.
C. L. GRAVES - - - - - - STAGE MANAGER.
W. STEVENSON - - - - - - TREASURER.

AFTERNOON PERFORMANCE TO-DAY,
FOR LADIES AND CHILDREN,
At HALF PRICES,
Commencing at 2 o'clock.

MAZEPPA!

SATURDAY EVENING, SEPTEMBER 3d, 1864,
BENEFIT OF MRS. H. A. PERRY,
And the last night of Mazeppa!

MAZEPPA - - - - - - - Mrs H. A. PERRY
Abder Khan - - - - - - - Frank Mayo
Koscar - - - - - - - W. H. O'Neil
Thamar - - - - - - - C R Thorne, Jr
Drolinsko - - - - - - - W Barry
Olinska - - - - - - - Miss Lulu Sweet
Zeimla - - - - - - - Mrs C R Saunders

TO-MORROW (SUNDAY) EVENING,
MRS. H. A. PERRY,
In the Equestrian Drama of Dick Turpin;
OR, THE RIDE TO YORK.

PRICES OF ADMISSION.—Dress Circle and Orchestra Seats $1; Parquet 50c.; Gallery 25c.
Doors open at 7 o'clock. Performances will commence at a quarter before 8. nu27

NOVELTY! NOVELTY! NOVELTY!

WILSON, ZOYARA & CARLO'S
Great Circus!

THIS MAMMOTH COMBINATION OF CIRCUS TALENT
Is now PERFORMING EVERY EVENING until further notice, in the
LARGE AND ELEGANT PAVILION,
Adjoining International Hotel,

When there will be presented to the San Francisco public a host of novelties.

The CARLO GROUPE are new and make their first appearance in this city.

The Manager, Mr. JOHN WILSON, is determined that the entertainment shall excel in every particular, and be worthy of patronage; he having concentrated in this company not only the largest and most complete Circus in the World, but the elite of the Equestrian, Gymnastic, Acrobatic, Juggling, Vaulting and Posturing performers of the country.

PRICES OF ADMISSION.

Dress Circle - - - - - - - - - $1 00
Second Circle - - - - - - - - - 0 50
Reserved Chairs - - - - - - - - 50c extra

☞ Grand Afternoon Performance for families every Saturday.

Doors open at 7 o'clock; performances commence at 8.
se3 JOHN WILSON, Proprietor.

EUREKA MINSTREL HALL,

Montgomery street, near Pine.

T. MAGUIRE - - - - - - - Proprietor
GEO. H. COES - - - - - - Stage Manager

GRAND OPENING NIGHT!
MONDAY EVENING - - - SEPT. 5TH.

THE EVER POPULAR
SAN FRANCISCO MINSTRELS!
Consisting of the following well known Artists:

Billy Birch, Charles Backus,
D. S. Wambold, Sig. R. Ahecco,
George H. Coes, Martin Simonsen,
Frank Medina, S. Wasburg,
C. F. Shattuck, Signor Pinto,
F. Harris, E. Groh, and
MRS. FANNY SIMONSEN.

A grand CHANGE OF PERFORMANCE EACH EVENING.

NEW SONGS, ACTS, BURLESQUES, DANCES, etc., will be performed in rapid succession.

Dress Circle and Orchestra Seats, 50 cents; Parquet, 25 cents; Private Boxes, $5; Reserved Seats, 25 cents extra.
Doors open at 7 o'clock. Curtain will rise at 8 o'clock, precisely.

LAST WEEK OF THE GRAND FAIR
OF THE
Ladies' Christian Commission

For the benefit of the Sick and Wounded Soldiers and Sailors, now being held at UNION HALL.

This Fair will close during the coming Week.

THIS (SATURDAY) EVENING, SEPT. 3.
The following Tableaux will be exhibited:

1. A Hospital Scene.
2. The Soldier's Dream.
3. Statuary—The Three Graces.
4. Cromwell and his favorite Daughter.
5. A Country Choir.
6. Past and Future.
7. Statuary—Death of Virginia.

Tickets.....50 cents.
Children, half price.

Tickets for sale at the principal Book, Music and Jewelry stores on Montgomery street, and at the principal Hotels.

LIGHT GYMNASTICS.

C. J. ROBINSON'S GYMNASTIC CLASSES, at Miss Aldrich's Academy, will be closed for two weeks from date; the new Term opening on THURSDAY, September 15th. An Evening Class of young men for instruction in Military Drill, will also be formed. For admission to membership, apply at the Academy, Stevenson street, near the corner of Market and Second streets.

San Francisco, September 1st, 1864.

MECHANICS' INSTITUTE.

OPENING
—OF—
The Industrial Exhibition.

The Grand Pavilion will be thrown open to the Public THIS (SATURDAY) MORNING, at 9 o'clock, and in the evening, at 8 o'clock, there will be a display of Fireworks by Messrs. Church & Clark, at Union Square, corner of Stockton and Geary streets.

Season Tickets for Lady and Gentleman - - - $5 00
Season Tickets for one person - - - - - - 3 00
Tickets for Single Admission - - - - - 50

Tickets may be had at the Institute, on California street, or of any member of the Executive Committee.

By order of the EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.

MAGUIRE'S ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

THOMAS MAGUIRE - - - - - - Sole Owner
Mr. PETER RICHINGS, - - - - - - Manager
G. T. EVANS - - - - - Musical Director

ENGLISH OPERA SEASON.

For this evening only.
SATURDAY EVENING, SEPTEMBER 3d, 1864.
Flotow's popular Opera of Martha!
THE RICHINGS'
English Opera Troupe!

In the principal characters:

Lady Harriet - - - - Miss CAROLINE RICHINGS
Nancy - - - - - - - - Miss J. Kempton
Lionel - - - - - - - - Mr. W. J. Hill
Plunkett - - - - - - - - Mr. E. Seguin
Sir Tristan - - - - - - - Mr. John Gregg
Sheriff of Richmond - - - - Mr. H. C. Peakes

TO-MORROW (SUNDAY) EVENING:
The French Dramatic Company will appear in the play of
LES TROIS LOGES,
And an Italian Intermede.

MONDAY EVENING,
First night of LA SONNAMBULA.

WEDNESDAY EVENING,
For the benefit of Mr. W. J. Hill, the opera of NORMA

PRICES OF ADMISSION—Dress Circle and Parquet, $1; Reserved seats, 50 cents extra; Family Circle, 50 cents; Gallery, 25 cents. se3

GILBERT'S MUSEUM,

Market street, opposite Second street, over the Occidental Market.

F. GILBERT - - - - - - - Proprietor
J. A. ROWE, - - - - - - - Manager

OPEN EVERY DAY AND EVENING.

HOME AGAIN!
JAMES MURPHY, THE IRISH GIANT BOY,
Who has just returned from the Interior.

This wonderful young man has grown some three inches in height, and is some sixty pounds heavier; he therefore now weighs over three hundred pounds, and stands nearly eight feet and a half high, making him really the most Colossal Giant—old or young, man or boy—the world ever saw. Don't fail to see him.

Also, just engaged, the celebrated
ALBINO FAMILY,
Consisting of brother and sister, with beautiful snowy, wavy hair, perfectly white skin, and pink eyes—the most novel, wonderful and instructive exhibition ever presented to the public. Every student of nature should witness this extraordinary phenomena.

Still astounding and startling the world, the
GREAT SNAKE-CHARMER, M. DE BAR.
Also, the great Mathematical Wonder,
THE LIGHTNING CALCULATOR,
From Barnum's Museum.
THE WONDERFUL TYROLEAN WARBLER

Will give his interesting Musical Exhibitions throughout the day and evening.

Notwithstanding the great expense attending this unprecedented array of novelties, the management announces the prices as before.

THE GREAT CEROPLASTIC GROUP OF LIFE-LIKE FIGURES, AND
UPWARDS OF 2,000 CURIOSITIES!

Also, a beautiful set of COSMORAMIC VIEWS, illustrating the PRINCIPAL CITIES OF AMERICA. There is also an AQUARIA GARDEN attached to the Museum.

The admission to the entire Exhibition is only 25 cents. Children, 15 cents. se3-1m

The Willows.

W. H. BARNARD, - - - - Proprietor.

THE HOTEL of this popular and fashionable place of public resort has been so far completed as to enable the lessee to open its Saloon and beautifully shaded grounds permanently for reception of visitors. The Grove has been culled and trimmed; the flower beds replanted and cultivated into fragrant bloom; the aquarium replaced, with the addition to its former feathered collection of four elegant black Australian Swans. The proprietor has also added a large collection of birds, embracing two Golden Pheasants and a brace of Silver Pheasants.

The Theatre has been entirely remodelled; the stage newly decorated, new galleries erected, the seats rendered more comfortable, and the floors replaced.

The Shooting Gallery, the Ten Pin Alleys, and the Shuffle Boards have been replaced.

The Flying Horses for children, are in readiness to perform daily duty.

Ample stabling is attached to the premises, attended by polite and watchful grooms.

MURPHY & BRAY'S
CELEBRATED MINSTRELS,

Will give a performance in the Theatre every SUNDAY Afternoon.

Mr. E. WOODWARD, formerly known to the San Francisco public, will give his personal attention to the Bar.

A grand opening of the WILLOWS will occur on the first of August, when the Billiard Room, the Lodging apartments, Restaurant and Ladies' Refreshment Saloon, will all be in readiness for occupancy. In the meantime, ladies, gentlemen and children visiting the grounds will find ample entertainment and amusement. jy2-tf

HEALTH
AND AMUSEMENT,
COMBINED!
C. J. ROBINSON'S SELECT CLASSES,
In Dr. Dio Lewis's System of
LIGHT GYMNASTICS!

At Miss ALDRICH'S ACADEMY, Stevenson street,
Near corner of Market and Second streets, San Francisco,

For Scientific Physical Training and Recreative Exercise, in classes, by persons of all ages and conditions of health, and by both sexes, with light and movable apparatus, and an invariable and appropriate musical accompaniment. While the Exercises of the Light Gymnastics impart strength, grace, activity and symmetry to the person, they at the same time furnish an exhaustless fund of social enjoyment and mental recreation.

Mr. ROBINSON has recently been employed to teach this system in all the public schools of this city.

CLASSES meet on Tuesdays and Fridays at 8 P. M. For admission or further information, apply at the Academy.

Mr. ROBINSON will give instruction, on application to classes and private pupils, in VOCAL CULTURE and ELOCUTION, as taught by the best masters in the East.

jy23-1m

LATE PUBLICATIONS.

A. Roman & Co.,

Are constantly in the receipt, by Steamer,
—OF—
ALL THE NEW PUBLICATIONS
OF THE DAY.

Among those recently received are the following:

Seven Stories, with Basement and Attic. By Ik Marvel.
Macaria; a Novel. By the author of "Beulah."
Bridal Eve. By Mrs Southworth;
Self-Sacrifice. By the author of "Margaret Maitland;"
Linnet's Trial; a Tale. By "S. M.," author of "Twice Lost;"
From Cape Cod to Dixie and the Tropics. By J. Milton Mackie.
The Silver Sunbeam; a Practical and Theoretical Text Book on Sun Drawing and Photographic Printing, by Towler;
The Blannerhasset Papers. By Safford;
Phantom Flowers; a Treatise on the Art of Producing Skeleton Leaves. Illustrated;
Wax Flowers: How to Make Them;
Hotspur; a Novel. By Walworth;
Denise; by the author of "Mademoiselle Mori." 2 vols.
Patriotism, and other Papers. By T. Starr King;
Parton's Life of Franklin. 2 vols;
Haunted Hearts; by the author of "The Lamplighter."
History of President Lincoln's Administration. By H. J. Raymond;
Darkness and Daylight. By Mrs. Holmes.

☞ We have on hand the largest stock of Standard, Miscellaneous and Library Books
to be found in this city, embracing every department of
LITERATURE, ART AND SCIENCE.

BOOKS IMPORTED TO ORDER.

A. ROMAN & CO.,
417 and 419 MONTGOMERY STREET,
SAN FRANCISCO.
jy30-1m

SAN FRANCISCO AND SAN JOSE RAILROAD.

CHANGE OF TIME.

On and after MARCH 1st, 1864, Trains will leave the Depot on Brannan street, between Third and Fourth, for San Jose and Way Stations, as follows:

Leave San Francisco at 8 A. M. and 4:30 P. M.
Leave San Jose at 7:30 A. M. and 4 P. M.

SUNDAYS.

On Sundays, Three Trains will be run, as follows:
Leave San Francisco at 8 1-2 and 10 1-2 A. M., and 4 1-2 P. M.
Leave San Jose at 8 A. M. and 4 and 7 P. M.

Passengers can reach the Depot by either the Third or Fourth street lines of city cars.

A. H. HOUSTON,
au20 General Superintendent.

MARKET STREET RAILROAD.

CHANGE OF TIME TABLE.

ON AND AFTER APRIL 1, 1864, Trains will start from the City and the Mission as follows:

Between the hours of 8:20 A. M. and 6 P. M., every 40 minutes, instead of, as heretofore, every 30 minutes, thus

FROM THE MISSION.

9:40	10:20	11:00	11:40

FROM THE CITY.

10:00	10:40	11:20	12:00

And so on till 6 o'clock.

Before 9 A. M. and after 6 P. M., the running will be the same as before.

my28 F. McCOPPIN, Superintendent.

The Californian

"SURELY THERE IS A VEIN FOR THE SILVER AND A PLACE FOR GOLD WHERE THEY FINE IT."

VOL. I.--NO. 16. SAN FRANCISCO, SEPTEMBER 10, 1864. TERMS { $5 a Year, by Mail, in Advance. 50 Cents a Month, by Carrier.

CONTENTS:

ORIGINAL ARTICLES:

Pour Passer le Temps—by "Restless."
Bores.—No. II.
Our Club.—No. I.
Trust. } Poetry.
The Potomac. } Poetry.
Anniversary Poem. } Poetry.

THE COUNTESS DIANA—A Translation.

SELECTED SKETCHES, STORIES, etc.
The Notting Hill Mystery—Concluded.
The Man in the Bell.
A Sailor's Yarn.
Charles Reade.
Ruminating Men.
Calendar for September.
The Original Bluebeard.
Ladies' Letters.
Parlor Magic.
Evening.—By a Tailor. } Poetry.
The Baby. } Poetry.

EDITORIALS:
Our Opponents.
A Mistake Corrected.
Mining Assessments.

SPORTING ON-DITS.
Flood and Field Notes.

PHILOSOPHIC PARAGRAPHS:
Selected sayings of Wise Men.

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS:
Minor Topics as They suggest Themselves.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS:
Interesting Items from Exchanges.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL:
A review of the Drama and Lyric Stage for the Week.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

POUR PASSER LE TEMPS.

"Quips and cranks and wanton wiles, Nods and becks, and wreathèd smiles."—L'Allegro.

THE present week commenced business by putting on a great many airs, and the man at the bellows (I don't mean the Reverend Doctor) gave it his undivided attention, and free remittances of dust came down from the sand hills, filling, not the purses, but the eyes of the public. The vote being taken at the meeting, the ayes had it, and had it good and strong. There has been a great deal of other blowing done in one way and another besides. September certainly came in like a lion, and if it don't go out like young mutton, then put not your faith in almanacs.

SPEAKING of lions, cannot that discontented animal that is caged at Gilbert's Museum be induced to roar more gently? Crossing Market street at a quiet hour the other night, I was startled by an attempt on the part of his lionship to charm the surrounding sleepy denizens of that classic precinct. He first struck up in a major key, probably for the ear of Major Van Voast, the Provost Marshal, down the street; thence into a minor key, for the edification of that honest class who rejoice in an appellation given in an ironical or other metallic sense, who were drinking mit the friends of Sigel in the lager saloon near at hand. That lion roars the most unhappy, discontented roar I ever listened to. What a bore to his surrounding comrades, who are trying to get a little rest and quietness, after having been poked with parasols and stirred up all day by Young America! There is evidently something on his mind, or very little on his stomach—possibly, an undigested recollection of a dainty supper on a stray Sepoy or neglected baby which he had seized and done for in the shady jungle of India; or, being in a museum, conceives that it will amuse him to set the neighborhood to saying hard things. If it arises from indigestion, or melancholic consequences of surfeit of beef a la mode, we hope Mr. Gilbert will take some other mode of satisfying his lordship's appetite, and let peace reign in that locality; and I won't bono him any more about it—it is meet that I should not.

WHO owns that diminutive chap that is put out in the night air to sell bouquets to gentlemen who keep late hours? He may be seen near Wells Fargo's every night, all doubled up in a little wad, with a big bouquet in his hand, intercepting the belated wanderer with piping, childish tones: "Buy a bouquet, sir?" It is all wrong to put that juvenile on a midnight watch in that way. He should be at home, asleep, tucked up in his trundle, dreaming of heavy winnings at marbles and riding a pony down a lane studded with molasses-candy pitching-posts. Such early years cannot stand late hours without driving the bloom from his ruddy little face more rapidly than his own flowers fade and die away.

I hope that young lady will forgive me for the unpleasant predicament an accident placed both of us in the other day, when the unruly breeze blew her long trail under my feet. Now, if she had stopped as I did, the string that gathered the skirt about her waist would not have parted, and the garment would not have fallen in such an ungraceful manner about her feet. It was a sudden transformation from a tall lady in a long (too long) flowing robe, into a girl in a short white dress not adapted to the street. She gave a delicate scream and sprang into the door of a store close at hand. I picked up the garment on the end of my cane and pitched it in after her, and would have followed with any number of apologies, had she not struck at me spitefully with her parasol, and screamed, "Go away!" I thought myself it was not a very good opportunity to offer apologies, and did go away.

THIS was worse than the awkward predicament of a friend of mine who has been very desperately in love with a young lady for two years past, and who now takes it out in silent and distant admiration—standing on street corners to see her pass, and following sometimes in a reverential and modest manner the graceful form of his inamorata. The other day, venturing too near, the mischievous wind caught his hat, and in its wanton glee whirled it at the very feet of the object of his Platonic affections, where it lodged apparently contented, and where its owner ought to have been long ago. The lady could not well avoid coming to a halt, and, of course, looked towards the head belonging to the hat with as much as to say, "Why don't you come for it?" There was a struggle between the legs that wanted to carry him off the other way, and "appearances." He smote his watch-pocket, and exclaiming, "I'll do it, or die!" bounded forward, bent his knee to the prettiest girl in the city, and reclaimed his hat; while she, with her face all rose-blushes and mischief, looked triumphant. She had brought him to it, and made him kneel at the shrine where he had long distantly worshipped. I can't do anything with the fellow since. He thinks of joining Albert Smith, and going into the walking-on-throne business permanently. As an indisputable evidence of his insanity, he went off and paid all his mining assessments. You have only to say "feet!" and down he goes on his knee-pans. What it will pan out remains to be seen. Ever since, he has sought sweet relief from the agitation of the interview at the altar of the twin deities, Music and Literature, as personated by Miss Richings and Lord Lyttleton, to whom he bows, an ardent, earnest devotee, after the Oriental style and fashion, which knows no difference between love and madness.

THE Fairs have been the feature of the week, and a great many fair features were there visible.

Is the Christian Commission Fair an institution started, got up, carried on in opposition to the Sanitary? Is it an opposition to the Rev. Dr. Bellows because he is a Unitarian? Information is wanted on this head. Why should there be jealousies and heart-burnings when the object is the same? Is the wounded soldier going to question the source from whence comes the spiritual or bodily comfort? Is he expected to ask if it is a cup of Unitarian tea or Episcopalian toast that is offered him? Are good deeds marked and numbered like pledges in a pawn-broker's shop, and put away, that due credit may be given to this or that particular sect? I heard a missionary once, in Hongkong, ratiug soundly a degenerate John for not attending to his religious duties in the school where the experiment of educating them to early piety was being tried. John says: "You talkee me do all same you do, and I go topside (Heaven.) By and by another missionary man he talkee me, 'No, John; not do so; but do all same as me and you go chop-chop.' All very 'curio'—s'poso must go two ways one time. What difference mo no shabbee—no shabbee." And we may say, with John, what difference does it make which way? Let us do good in our generation, and not stand on the order of doing it. Speaking of the Fair, let it be said that the ladies deserve a general recommendation for honesty and fairness in their dealings—unusual under similar circumstances. I have never known a Fair where business was done on such equitable principles. As a general thing, a man gets but little for his money—usually gets that little only—and the ladies might justly claim credit for constancy, and advertise "You'll find no change in me." At the Christian Commission they return correct change, and their dealings are conducted on a basis of fair-play that enables a man to form some idea how long his money will last. Now, I handed a half-dollar to the tall, graceful lady that attends the entrance to the picture gallery, and considered it cheap to look upon her face as the sweetest of the collection; but she handed me the change with such a positive air that I was afraid to express the modest "Keep it, ma'am," that was upon my lips.

Utility and appropriateness are not always the study of the crinolined clerks behind the tables. A very nice young woman sold me a net for my hair, and a bunch of what seemed to me be corset-strings. She urged me strongly to buy a machine called a "page"—some kind of a thing to reef up one's frock, I believe; I showed her my coat-tail—one of the regular Young America pattern, very brief—and asked her if she thought that would stand another reef. She said she thought it wouldn't; and she was correct, for if brevity is the soul of wit, it was a very funny coat.

CHEAP music for the million is what is wanted. There has been a little something in that way the past week, contributed by the Circus Band, the omnibus filled full outside with brazen gentlemen who blow for Billy Williamson, and the van used by all the political aspirants to announce, (through the medium of a small boy and a big drum inside, and an immense placard outside,) that there is to be an enthusiastic meeting somewhere, to be addressed by Mr. Somebody, who generally proves to be the victim who must pay the bills. It is an understood thing that the incipient politician begins his apprenticeship by standing the expense of the bubble reputation gained at Platt's Hall, against which heavy bills come in for gas, in its primitive state, and moisture for the thirsty souls who cry "Hear! hear!" and do most to prevent any one from hearing. Nobody objects to political meetings. They give business to sundry styles of blowers—those that blow on the instruments and those that are the instruments themselves. Platt makes his rent, and it serves to keep up the excitement. But about music: In most cities there is some arrangement for treating the public to a little melody. In Washington, the Marine Band plays in the Capitol grounds—a capital arrangement. In New York, Central Park is illuminated, and sweet notes float upon the air, moonlight evenings, that there is no discount on. Why can't the city go to the trifling expense of having music on the Plaza—say one evening each week. The great Bensley Watering-Pot might perhaps be induced to "operate" on such occasions, and dampen the old boots and shoes that are lying there cracking for want of moisture. It won't cost much, and it will please the dear people "muchly." It will keep them good-natured, in good spirits, and out of mischief; for no one can deny that the influence of music softens the hardest heart, leads us to think of purer and better things, and makes us better men.

IN the multiplicity of names for mining companies, to obtain which the arts, sciences and even heathen Mythology has been exhausted, and so many different offices in the same building, it is not strange that mistakes should occur. An instance of the kind worth mentioning happened recently at a meeting of the Board of a prominent mine. An individual who owned stock in a company appeared at the meeting, as he supposed, and made a long speech, "giving it" to the Trustees soundly for bad management, etc., and only sat down for want of breath when the Chairman remarked to the gentleman, "That's a very good speech, sir, but you have made a slight mistake, sir. You are one floor too low. You are in the wrong room, addressing the wrong company. That speech belongs in No. 6, up stairs. This is a Railway meeting."

RESTLESS.

SANITARY FUND.—The Executive Committee acknowledge the receipt of the following sums during the past week from various sources: From the Camanche, $358 95; from the Great Cheese on exhibition at the Industrial Fair, $506 70; from Martinez, $50; proceeds of the sale of Mrs. J. R. Crandall's fruit, from Auburn, at the Industrial Fair, $16 75; from Healdsburg, $5; the proceeds of Frank M. Pixley's lecture at San José, $277 50 in coin, and $135 in legal tender notes; from this city, $160—making a total for the week of $1,214 90 in coin, and $135 in legal tender notes.

We desire to call attention to the card of the California Branch of the Commission in another column, which designates the office to which all communications and remittances should be addressed. There can be no more worthy channel through which our generous and loyal people at this time can pour their bounty.

EVENING.

BY A TAILOR.

DAY hath put on his jacket, and around
His burning bosom buttoned it with stars.
Here will I lay me on the velvet grass,
That is like padding to earth's meagre ribs,
And hold communion with the things about me.
Ah me! how lovely is the golden braid
That binds the skirt of night's descending robe!
The thin leaves, quivering on their silken threads,
Do make a music like to rustling satin,
As the light breezes smooth their downy nap.

Ha! what is this that rises to my touch,
So like a cushion? Can it be a cabbage?
It is, it is that deeply injured flower,
Which boys do flout us with: but yet I love thee,
Thou giant rose, wrapped in a green surtout.
Doubtless in Eden thou didst blush as bright
As these, thy puny brethren; and thy breath
Sweetened the fragrance of her spicy air;
But now thou seemest like a bankrupt beau,
Stripped of his gaudy hues and essences,
And growing portly in his sober garments.

Is that a swan that rides upon the water?
Oh no, it is that other gentle bird,
Which is the patron of our noble calling.
I well remember, in my early years,
When these young hands first closed upon a goose;
I have a scar upon my thimble finger,
Which chronicles the hour of young ambition.
My father was a tailor, and his father,
And my sire's grandsire, all of them were tailors;
They had an ancient goose—it was an heir-loom
From some remoter tailor of our race.
It happened I did see it on a time
When none was near, and I did deal with it,
And it did burn me—oh, most fearfully!

It is a joy to straighten out one's limbs,
And leap elastic from the level counter,
Leaving the petty grievances of earth,
The breaking thread, the din of clashing shears,
And all the needles that do wound the spirit,
For such a pensive hour of soothing silence.
Kind Nature, shuffling in her loose undress,
Lays bare her shady bosom; I can feel
With all around me; I can hail the flowers
That sprig earth's mantle—and you quiet bird
That rides the stream is to me as a brother.
The vulgar know not all the hidden pockets,
Where Nature stows away her loveliness.
But this unnatural posture of the legs
Cramps my extended calves, and I must go
Where I can coil them up in their wonted fashion.

[O. W. Holmes.

THE MAN IN THE BELL.

IN my younger days, bell-ringing was much more in fashion among the young men in ——, than it is now. Nobody, I believe, practices it there at present, except the servants of the church, and the melody has been much injured in consequence. Some fifty years ago, about twenty of us who dwelt in the vicinity of the Cathedral, formed a club, which used to ring every peal that was called for; and from continual practice and a rivalry which arose between us and a club attached to another steeple, and which tended considerably to sharpen our zeal, we became very Mozarts on our favorite instruments. But my bell-ringing practice was shortened by a singular accident, which not only stopped my performance, but made even the sound of a bell terrible to my ears.

One Sunday, I went with another into the belfry to ring for noon prayers, but the second stroke we had pulled showed us that the clapper of the bell we were at was muffled. Some one had been buried that morning, and it had been prepared, of course, to ring a mournful note. We did not know of this, but the remedy was easy. "Jack," said my companion, "step up to the loft, and cut off the hat;" for the way we had of muffling was by tying a piece of an old hat, or of cloth (the former was preferred) to one side of the clapper, which deadened every second toll. I complied, and mounting into the belfry, crept as usual into the bell, where I began to cut away. The hat had been tied on in some more complicated manner than usual, and I was perhaps three or four minutes in getting it off; during which time my companion below was hastily called away, by a message from his sweetheart I believe, but that is not material to my story. The person who called him was a brother of the club, who, knowing that the time had come for ringing for service, and not thinking that any one was above, began to pull. At this moment I was just getting out, when I felt the bell moving; I guessed the reason at once—it was a moment of terror; but by a hasty and almost convulsive effort, I succeeded in jumping down, and throwing myself on the flat of my back under the bell.

The room in which it was, was little more than sufficient to contain it, the bottom of the bell coming within a couple of feet of the floor of lath. At that time I certainly was not so bulky as I am now, but as I lay it was within an inch of my face. I had not laid myself down a second, when the ringing began. It was a dreadful situation. Over me swung an immense mass of metal, one touch of which would have crushed me to pieces; the floor under me was principally composed of crazy laths, and if they gave way, I was precipitated to a distance of about fifty feet upon a loft, which would, in all probability, have sunk under the impulse of my fall, and sent me to be dashed to atoms upon the marble floor of the chancel, an hundred feet below. I remembered—for fear is quick in recollection—how a common clock-wright, about a month before, had fallen, and bursting through the floors of the steeple, driven in the ceilings of the porch, and even broken into the marble tombstone of a bishop who slept beneath. This was my first terror, but the ringing had not continued a minute, before a more awful and immediate dread came on me. The deafening sound of the bell smote into my ears with a thunder which made me fear their drums would crack. There was not a fibre of my body it did not thrill through: it entered my very soul; thought and reflection were almost utterly banished; I only retained the sensation of agonizing terror. Every moment I saw the bell sweep within an inch of my face; and my eyes—I could not close them, though to look at the object was bitter as death—followed it instinctively in its oscillating progress until it came back again. It was in vain I said to myself that it could come no nearer at any future swing than it did at first; every time it descended I endeavored to shrink into the very floor to avoid being buried under the down sweeping mass; and then reflecting on the danger of pressing too weightily on my frail support, would cower up again as far as I dared.

At first my fears were mere matter of fact. I was afraid the pullies above would give way, and let the bell plunge on me. At another time, the possibility of the clapper being shot out in some sweep, and dashing through my body, as I had seen a ramrod glide through a door, flitted across my mind. The dread also, as I have already mentioned, of the crazy floor, tormented me, but these soon gave way to fears not more unfounded, but more visionary, and of course more tremendous. The roaring of the bell confused my intellect, and my fancy soon began to teem with all sorts of strange and terrifying ideas. The bell pealing above, and opening its jaws with a hideous clamor, seemed to me at one time a ravening monster, raging to devour me; at another, a whirlpool ready to suck me into its bellowing abyss. As I gazed on it, it assumed all shapes; it was a flying eagle, or rather a roc of the Arabian story-tellers, clapping its wings and screaming over me. As I looked upward into it, it would appear sometimes to lengthen into indefinite extent, or to be twisted at the end into the spiral folds of the tail of a flying-dragon. Nor was the flaming breath, or fiery glance of that fable animal, wanting to complete the picture. My eyes inflamed, bloodshot, and glaring, invested the supposed monster with a full proportion of unholy light.

It would be endless were I to merely hint at all the fancies that possessed my mind. Every object that was hideous and roaring presented itself to my imagination. I often thought that I was in a hurricane at sea, and that the vessel in which I was embarked tossed under me with the most furious vehemence. The air, set in motion by the swinging of the bell, blew over me, nearly with the violence, and more than the thunder of a tempest: and the floor seemed to reel under me, as under a drunken man. But the most awful of all the ideas that seized on me were drawn from the supernatural. In the vast cavern of the bell hideous faces appeared, and glared down on me with terrifying frowns, or with grinning mockery, still more appalling. At last, the devil himself, accoutred, as in the common description of the evil spirit, with hoof, horn and tail, and eyes of infernal lustre, made his appearance, and called on me to curse God and worship him, who was powerful to save me. This dread suggestion he uttered with the full-toned clangor of the bell. I had him within an inch of me, and I thought on the fate of the Santon Barsisa. Strenuously and desperately I defied him, and bade him begone. Reason, then, for a moment, resumed her sway, but it was only to fill me with fresh terror, just as the lightning dispels the gloom that surrounds the benighted mariner, but to shew him that his vessel is driving on a rock where she must inevitably be dashed to pieces. I found I was becoming delirious, and trembled lest reason should utterly desert me. This is at all times an agonizing thought, but it smote me then with tenfold agony. I feared lest, when utterly deprived of my senses, I should rise, to do which I was every moment tempted by that strange feeling which calls on a man, whose head is dizzy from standing on the battlement of a lofty castle, to precipitate himself from it, and then death would be instant and tremendous. When I thought of this, I became desperate. I caught the floor with a grasp which drove the blood from my nails; and I yelled with the cry of despair. I called for help, I prayed, I shouted, but all the efforts of my voice were, of course, drowned in the bell. As it passed over my mouth, it occasioually echoed my cries, which mixed not with its own sound, but preserved their distinct character. Perhaps this was but fancy. To me, I know, they then sounded as if they were the shouting, howling or laughing of the fiends with which my imagination had peopled the gloomy cave which swung over me.

You may accuse me of exaggerating my feelings; but I am not. Many a scene of dread have I since passed through, but they are nothing to the self-inflicted terrors of this half hour. The ancients have doomed one of the damned, in their Tartarus, to lie under a rock, which every moment seems to be descending to annihilate him—and an awful punishment it would be. But if to this you add a clamor as loud as if ten thousand furies were howling about you—a deafening uproar banishing reason, and driving you to madness, you must allow that the bitterness of the pang was rendered more terrible. There is no man, firm as his nerves may be, who could retain his courage in this situation.

In twenty minutes the ringing was done. Half of that time passed over me without power of computation—the other half appeared an age. When it ceased, I became gradually more quiet, but a new fear retained me. I knew that five minutes would elapse without ringing, but, at the end of that short time the bell would be rung a second time, for five minutes more. I could not calculate time. A minute and an hour were of equal duration. I feared to rise lest the five minutes should have elapsed, and the ringing be again commenced, in which case I should be crushed, before I could escape, against the walls or frame-work of the bell. I therefore still continued to lie down, cautiously shifting myself, however, with a careful gliding, so that my eye no longer looked into the hollow. This was of itself a considerable relief. The cessation of the noise had, in a great measure, the effect of stupefying me, for my attention, being no longer occupied by the chimeras I had conjured up, began to flag. All that now distressed me was the constant expectation of the second ringing, for which, however, I settled myself with a kind of stupid resolution. I closed my eyes, and clenched my teeth as firmly as if they were screwed in a vice. At last the dreaded moment came, and the first swing of the bell extorted a groan from me, as they say the most resolute victim screams at the sight of the rack, to which he is for a second time destined. After this, however, I lay silent and lethargic, without a thought. Wrapt in the defensive armor of stupidity. I defied the bell and its intonations. When it ceased, I was roused a little by the hope of escape. I did not, however, decide on this step hastily, but, putting up my hand with the utmost caution, I touched the rim. Though the ringing had ceased, it still was tremulous from the sound, and shook under my hand, which instantly recoiled as from an electric jar. A quarter of an hour probably elapsed before I again dared to make the experiment, and then found it at rest. I determined to lose no time, fearing that I might have lain then already too long, and that the bell for evening service would catch me. This dread stimulated me, and I slipped out with the utmost rapidity, and arose. I stood, I suppose, for a minute, looking with silly wonder on the place of my imprisonment, penetrated with joy at escaping, but then rushed down the stony and irregular stair with the velocity of lightning, and arrived in the bell-ringer's room. This was the last act I had power to accomplish. I leant against the wall, motionless and deprived of thought, in which posture my companions found me, when, in the course of a couple of hours, they returned to their occupation.

They were shocked, as well they might, at the figure before them. The wind of the bell had excoriated my face, and my dim and stupefied eyes were fixed with a lack-lustre gaze in my raw eye-lids. My hands were torn and bleeding: my hair dishevelled; and my clothes tattered. They spoke to me, but I gave no answer. They shook me, but I remained insensible. They then became alarmed, and hastened to remove me. He who had first gone up with me in the forenoon, met them as they carried me through the church-yard, and through him, who was shocked at having, in some measure, occasioned the accident, the cause of my misfortune was discovered. I was put to bed at home, and remained for three days delirious, but gradually recovered my senses. You may be sure the bell formed a prominent topic of my ravings, and if I heard a peal they were instantly increased to the utmost violence. Even when the delirium abated, my sleep was continually disturbed by imagined ringings, and my dreams were haunted by the fancies which almost maddened me while in the steeple. My friends removed me to a house in the country, which was sufficiently distant from any place of worship to save me from the apprehensions of hearing the church-going bell; for what Alexander Selkirk, in Cowper's poem, complained of as a misfortune, was then to me as a blessing. Here I recovered; but even long after recovery, if a gale wafted the notes of a peal towards me, I started with nervous apprehension. I felt a Mahometan hatred to all the bell tribe, and envied the subjects of the Commander of the Faithful the sonorous voice of their Muezzin. Time cured this, as it does most of our follies; but, even at the present day, if, by chance, my nerves be unstrung, some particular tones of the cathedral bell have power to surprise me into a momentary start.—Dr. Maginn.

A PRACTICAL JOKE AT WINDSOR.—Mr. S. H. Hayes, of the 2d Life Guards, has written the following explanatory letter: "Finding the story which I relate below has gained greater publicity in London than I should ever have imagined, I should feel much obliged if you would allow my version of it to appear in your columns. On Monday night, July 4, I was returning from Maidenhead to Windsor on horseback. When about half-way, I was met by two rough-looking men, (on horseback also,) who asked me what time it was. I answered that, not having my watch, I could not tell them. They then said, 'Oh, yes, you have, and we want it!' Upon this, seeing that they were bent on mischief, and being utterly unarmed, (not even a riding-whip in my hand,) I put my horse to his best pace, dashed through their comrades on foot, (four in number, and armed with pistols and sticks,) and kept straight along the high road, the two mounted men following me full gallop. We went, I suppose, two miles in this way, during which time they twice came alongside me, but failed in stopping my horse, notwithstanding they endeavored so to do, when I suddenly viewed a public house, with several men standing before it. I immediately pulled up, and allowed my pursuers to pass on. I here obtained a heavy stick in hopes of meeting my friends again, and arrived in barracks in due course—to find that the two rough-looking men were two of my brother officers, and their comrades four others. Their intention, they told me afterwards, was to pull me off my horse and regularly act the highwaymen. This, as will be seen, however, they failed in doing. In conclusion, I can only say that I do not publish this in any spirit of animosity, as, I rejoice to say, I am on the very best of terms with all my brother officers; but think it only fair, as I hear the story told in all sorts of different ways, that there should be an authentic account given."

DEATH OF SAILORS IN CALCUTTA.—There is no port in the world where the normal rate of mortality is so high as in the port of Calcutta. This partly arises from the fact that seamen commonly drink the abominable water of the river, or a still more deadly poison which is sold to them in the bazaars. Even in the best of the bazaars, those intended for the supply of Europeans, the things sold are often most abominable. But the poor are compelled to live on what an Irish peasant would throw away as offal. Our sailors, when they come here, find that they are in a very thirsty land. They stick a thin cap on their heads and make all sail for the bazaars, where they can get something cheap to drink; for at our hotels a rupee is the standard price for what is called a "peg." The sailor cannot afford that, and so he strolls towards a den of unspeakable infamy called Flag street. If he does not get struck down with sun-stroke on the way, he finds himself in a narrow thoroughfare, the usual open festering drain on each side, and with little low native huts to which access is gained by a plank. In one of these places he pays two annas (3d.) for a glass of what is called champagne cognac, and which is in reality a native preparation drugged with datura, a deadly poison, or cocculus indicus. Out of these sinks of iniquity some of these poor fellows never come alive, and in Calcutta there is no registration of births and deaths, so that it is quite impossible to get exact returns of the number of men who thus perish. It has been estimated by Dr. Chevers, President of the Medical College, that the proportion of deaths among our sailors is "a very near approach to annual decimation, or total extinction in ten years." In a single year one hundred and seventy sailors were taken to an hospital in Calcutta suffering from delirium tremens.—Letters from Calcutta.

AN ale-house had up this sign "Bear sold here." It may be remarked that the word was spelled properly if he meant to inform the public that the article was his own Bruin.

A SAILOR'S YARN.

"WE sailed ou the 9th of April, which happened to be on a Friday. The owners were enlightened gentlemen who laughed at unlucky days, and both wind and tide being favorable, there was no reasonable excuse for delay, and we slipped our moorings.

"We arrived 'all well' in the Pacific, the men iu high rollicking spirits. The Condor was a model of what a whale-ship should be from stem to stern, from try-works to cutting-falls. Our boats can be dropped into the water at a moment's notice; sharp eyes sweep the sea in all directions, and all listen eagerly for the cry of 'There she spouts!' knowing as we do that sperm-whales are not far off. It is uot we only who know the business we are upon and the probable success which will attend our efforts. Countless flocks of birds hover round the ship, knowing by some mysterious instinct that they will soon be provided with abundance of food. But the fish just beneath the surface of the sea are far more numerous than the birds. For half a mile on every side the water is literally blackened with albacores. They will wait upon the ship for weeks, and unless a gale should rise and force the vessel along at the rate of something like nine knots, will keep up with her. An albacore is about a yard in length, is easily caught, and is excellent eating. The poor flying-fish are frightened into taking their feeble flight in the air, where, f not snapped up by the birds, they are instantly seized and devoured by the hungry albacores the moment their feeble powers of flight are exhausted and they drop helpless into the sea. How true it is that all Nature is at war; for the albacore has a terrible enemy in his turn; the sword-fish, namely, many of which free-lances of the deep make a rush in column, as it were, upon tho albacores, transfix them, often two together, with their projecting swords or lances, then shake off the victims and devour them. It sometimes happens that the sword-fish misses his aim and drives his sword into, and sometimes through, a merchant vessel's side.

"On the 19th of October, our look-out man hails in a stentorian voice the officer on deck, which happened to be myself, 'A large school of whales, sir!' 'Where away?' 'Off the weather bow, sir; about three miles distant.'

"In a moment the ship is brimming over with eager life. The boats are let fall manned, all is ready, and away we start upon a chase far more animated—the excitement stimulated by the well-known danger—than ever fox-hunter followed. I will give but one example of a whale hunt. We have not traversed half the distance from the ship to the school of whales wheu the huge monsters take the alarm aud are off at the rate of seven or eight miles an hour. They spout clouds of vapor, which ascend like steam from the valve of a hundred steam-boats, and each leaves a foamy track behiud it equal to that made by a ship of moderate tonnage.

"Presently, one fine fellow—a male we are sure from his tremendous bulk—leaps up and displays himself in the air, possibly to reassure the cows and calves—that is to say, female and youngster calves—by the view of their immense protector, the cow whale never reaching to half the size of the bull whale. That vainglorious exhibition is an ill-advised one. We select him for our day's sport and prey; and a splendid day's fishing it will be if we secure him—the experienced harpooner venturing a confident opinion that he cannot be less than sixty feet in length, and half that in girth. Fancy a fish measuring eighteen hundred feet in bulk!

"The men bend exultingly to the oars; we skim over the water like sea-birds, and come up with our friend hand over hand. We are within striking distance, and a vigorously-thrown harpoon pierces deep into the cachalot's side. Another and another follows. The wounded animal springs with convulsive strength into the air, then with a crash and a whirl of foam falls back into the sea and makes off with astonishing speed. The whale-line, about one hundred fathoms, in our boat is soon run out, but another is bent on; and though the monster sounds—that is, dives to an immense depth—we contrive by bending on a fresh line to keep our hold of him. He cannot remain more than half an hour at the utmost beneath the water. Probably he will re-appear in about teu minutes. He does so. We pull towards him quietly, and a few strokes of the lance finish him. He now spouts life-blood, crimsoning the sea for many yards around. Soon he turns over, and the cheers of our men proclaim an easy victory. We were destined on the same day to experience a terrible reverse of fortune. The huge whale we had killed was towed by the other boats towards the ship, and we should have followed, were following leisurely, when one of the men roared out, 'There she spouts—there she blows!—another big 'un, too!' We were instantly in chase. Two sperm-whales in one day would be marvellous luck. We were soon up with the monster, and our harpooner struck his weapon vigorously into the whale, which received the blow with a plunge which half filled our boat with water. The next moment he sounded. It was another huge male—we knew that from his size—and it was with dificulty we paid out rope fast enough. The whale-line, as I had contrived it, from observation of other whale-vessels, ran through a groove lined with tin to prevent its getting on fire with the swiftness of running out. Two hundred fathoms of line were very soon gone; a second and a third were bent on. By-and-by our enraged captive re-appeared at the surface and tore on at a furious rate. For nearly an honr, I should think, he continued on with unflagging speed, but despairing, as it seemed, of escape, and resolved on revenge, he suddenly turned, and with bellowing roar and distended jaws rushed back as if to devour us. We shouted, waved our oars, to deter him from attacking us. He heeded not, and immediately he was near enough raised his enormous tail into the air and with one blow thereof smashed our boat to bits, leaving us all struggling in the water, except the unfortunate harpooner, who, caught in the coils of the harpoon-rope was carried off by the furious fish.

"The accident was witnessed from the towing boats, and two were immediately detached to the rescue. We were picked up and taken back to the ship—of course with the exception of poor Tomkins. The fish, I hardly need say, escaped—for the time.

"The captured whale was cut up, the blubber converted into oil—the head matter, spermaceti, carefully eliminated and put safely away. This operation lasted quite ten hours. However, our work was done. The skeleton of the huge sea mammal was dropped into the sea to sink or float as chance or the sharks directed. A task successfully accomplished is a great joy. I slept soundly. All my preparations and devices had turned out well.

"I turned out early. Morn rose in beauty. It was a cloudless dawn which came blushing o'er the sea; and before I had been ten minutes on deck, the look-out in the crow's-nest—a slight fabric lashed to the cross-trees to protect the watcher in some degree from foul weather—the look-ont iu the crow's-nest shouted, 'Whales on the bow! There she spouts! There she flukes!'

"I did not pipe the crew. There was but one whale in sight, and I felt almost sure it was the gentleman who had played us such a pretty trick the previous evening. One boat was let fall manned, and we were off 'iu a jiffy.'

"It was as I expected. The wounded whale still lived, bnt was jettiug forth the life-blood. The animal was in its flurry when we neared it, and how exactly it happened I know not, cannot distinctly remember, but the tail of the whale again struck the boat, not smashing it as in the former instance, but turning it bottom upwards. There were twelve in the boat, and all but four—amongst which four was myself, very happily—perished. I meau that I was happily saved, though for weeks and months subsequently I often wished that I had been oue of the drowned ones.

"Four of us survived—myself, (Robert Chenies,) Richard Young, James Travers and Henry Smith. We with vast effort gained the bottom of the boat and tried to save our friends. One, Edward Thornley, an oldish man, I caught by the hand, but could not hold my grasp. He was gone with the rest. God pity them!

"We could not right the boat, but by-aud-by it drifted close to the dead whale, floating belly upwards. We got upon the monster, and pulling upon the harpoon-rope, fished up poor Jenkins, partly devoured. It was a night of horror. But soon real not fancied terrors shook our souls.

"The cloudless blue of the southern sky, which when we left the ship lit up the bright waves, adding to the dazzling whiteness of their surgiug crests and to the radiance of the gem-like spray, became, as often happens in those latitudes, suddenly and as rapidly overcast. A hurricane—a tornado—set in; the sea roared in foaming billows; the Condor was shut out of view in the thick blackness, and poor Travers was washed off by the furious sea. I shall never forget his cry of agony as he was swept amongst the sharks which beset us and had already began to devour the dead whale. It was a terrific, maddening shout. I myself almost envied Travers! he was past fearing death—bitter, horrible, yet brief, as has been his passage from life to eternity. But for us!—

* * * * * * *

"The boat again drifted close to the whale, and by almost superhuman exertions we contrived to right her. Most fortunately four oars were saved by the coutrivance I have described. We got into her, and were so far rescued from imminent death! Yes, from immediate death! but our fate was apparently merely postponed. The boat could hardly live amid that waste of raging sea; and wilder, fiercer waxed the storm, and louder roared the foaming waves, and we knew not whither we were being driven. Night at last closed over us, aggravating the horrors of the tempest. We ceased at last to pull—to struggle; abandoning ourselves in sullen despair to the mercy of the winds and waves. It chanced that myself and Smith had each a closely-corked brandy flask in our pockets. That alcohol was our salvation; without it we could not have survived the night aud storm—uot have lived to witness, to hail the bright dawn which broke from the glorious southern sky, and kissed into roseate blushing beauty the still heaving but fast calming sea.

"But where were we? whither had we drifted—been driven? The Condor was not in sight. We were alone upon that vast expanse of sea—alone, without a drop of water, (the brandy was long since spent,) to quench our raging thirst!—without an ounce of food to still the ravening pangs of hunger. Happily, as the horizon lightened beneath the cloudless sun-smile, land was seen at no great distanco. Au island—one of the Ballenys we conjectured. It seemed no more than three marine leagues away, and we should hope to reach it before thirst had driven us mad—hunger rendered us incapable of exertion. Peopled by savages, no doubt; but death by the torture of hunger and thirst was a more terrible fear than to front the possible enmity of even cannibals.

"The distance seemed to increase as we tugged at the oars. Very soon failing strength compelled us to work by relays—one resting, two pulling. Our progress was very, very slow; and but that about uoon we were caught in a strong current settiug direct for the island, we should never, I think, have reached it. Blessed, thrice blessed hour—moment of life, when the boat's keel grounded on the shelving beach of au islaud abounding in cocoa-nut trees, turtles innumerable, and it seemed unpeopled. The fruit was ripe; and never shall I forget the ecstacy, the sense of re-created life which ran through every artery—every vein of my body, as I quaffed the delicious, thrice delicious cocoa-milk!

"We returned God hearty thanks, and being filled, lay down to rest, after pulling our boat up high and dry. We slept soundly, sweetly; I at least can answer for myself. I know not what particular noise awoke me, but opening my eyes—I having, not without difficulty, recalled to mind all that had passed since the previous day-dawn, saw that we—I and my companions—were in prcsence of two meu, evidently sailors, armed with muskets, and ragged, forloru in attire. They were silently watching us, and seemed to have no hostile intent. Had they meant us harm—death or bondage—their purpose could easily have been accomplished whilst we slept. I spoke first, calling loudly, so that my sailors might awake and spring up, as I did. One of the strangers answered me in French, a language I knew well. He assured us that we were in the presence of friends, and that only himself and companion were the habitants—human habitants—of the island. They were shipwrecked mariners, and had beeu on the island more than a twelve-month. They had seen our boat approach from the look-out, whence one of them was always searching the ocean for a sail. Many had been seen, but not one had touched at the island, or noticed the signals they hoisted, or heard their musket-shots. It was not oue of the Balleny islands; they knew not its proper designation, but themselves had named it 'Turtle Island.' There was no lack of food, they said—game was iu abundance as well as turtle—but the wildereess was alive with beasts of prey. We had fortunately been cast upon a part of the coast which the more formidable animals did not frequent, or we should have been devoured as we slept. 'But,' added Lefranc, which was the elder Frenchman's name, 'we will talk further-by-and-by. Come with us to our place, on ship-board—a ship with the bottom stove in; but our breakfast will not be so bad. Roast game—a kind of elk, sweet water, and excellent brandy. Allons, friends!" Considering all things we were certainly very lucky fellows.

"The habitation of our French friends was the cabin of the Sylphide, a whaler from Marseilles, which had been abandoned by the crew during a terrific storm. They believed she would soon founder, and took hastily, much too hastily, to the boats. But that is the failing of French mariners; they are prone to panic. Land was in sight, and, like the man in the play, they preferred a dry death. That, however, was vouchsafed to but few of them. Of the four boats in which the sailors quitted the ship, all but one was swamped by the wild sea. If they had stuck to the vessel they would not have lost their lives—not at least, by drowning. The Sylphide was driven ashore by the hurricane, and must have been lifted by a tremendous surf wave to a great height, and let fall as it receded upon a bed of sand and gravel. Except such another hurricane came on, the vessel was safe enough, though her bottom was smashed in.

THE DANISH IRON-CLAD IN ACTION.

THE special correspondent of the London Times gives the following account of the part played by the Danish iron-clad Rolfe Krake duriug the fighting in Alsen: At about 2 after midnight the officer on duty in one of the boats came on board, after having run down the sound for four or five miles, i. e., till close upon Kjer and Ulkebel, without heariug or seeing anything; yet hardly had he stepped upon the deck of the Rolfe Krake when the report of brisk musketry fire was heard by all on board. Capt. Rothe was under way in a few miuntes; he doubled the point of Arnkellsore and advanced into the Als Snnd as far as the narrowness of the channel allowed him to do so with safety. The Sound was all swarming with Prussian boats, laden with soldiers, and making the best of their way towards the Alsen shore. Among these he let fly his shell and grape with such good effect that he sunk several of them and completely swept the water of the remainder. He fired oue hundred and eight shells from his four 68-pounders, and twenty-eight grape-shot. The batteries at Hoveskoi let fly at him with all their might, but with no great effect on the vessel and without the least hurt to a single person.

That day was a remarkably fortunate day for the Rolfe Krake. Two of her masts werc shot down by the enemy's fire, and the steel round-shot came grazing the deck, and striking with all its might the front turret, plunging several inches deep into the iron plate, but without piercing it or sensibly injuring the revolution of the turret. The Rolfe Krake was hit about one hundred and fifty times during the day. As the morning advanced, the captain had already ventured as far within the narrow Als Sund as he could do with safety, and on this side, within reach of his guns, there was no enemy in sight. The din of battle, which had begun at Kjer, was rapidly dying away, the fugitive Danish army and its Prussian pursuers having moved to the southward towards Aikebo and Vollerup, in the direction of Horup Hav. There was nothiug more to be done for Capt. Rothe ou this spot, and, backing out of the Sound about 9, he went back to his former shelter behiud the Arnkellsore point at the entrance of Augustenburg Fiord. Having here rapidly cleared away the wreck of his masts, and assured himself of the good condition of his ship, the captain put to sea again, and steaming through the broad part of the Sound to the northwest, or Als Fiord, he doubled the Cape of Hellesgaard, on the northern summit of the island, with the purpose of steaming all around Als, and bringing such aid as he could to the army at Horup Hav. On arriving off Hellesgaard, however, he sent one of his boats on shore, and learned that the steamer Hertha, which was anchored within the small creek called Rogs Vig, was in ueed of assistance; so, rounding the cape once more, Capt. Rothe made for the Little Vig, and, placing the helpless wooden steamer by the right side of the iron-clad, steamed out of the vig with her, and sheltering her with his mighty iron-side from the shot that was showered down upon them by the Prussian batteries on the main land, conveyed her safely round the cape, and round the northern extremity of the island. The same assistance was extended to two gun-boats that were lying inside the Augustenburg Fiord.

The vessels thus rescued performed the most useful service in behalf of the Danish troops on shore, as they took up at various points no less than one thousaud of the scattered corps that were quartered in the Nordborg districts, and which were cut off from the main body of the army under Gen. Heinmann, when the Prussians had rushed forward upon Augustenburg, and the Danish general was in full retreat upon Horup and Kogencœ. Together with the minor vessels and with the rescued troops, the Rolfe Krake theu made her best way to Svenborg, in Fuen, whence she proceeded to Middelfahrt, aud arrived at her present station off Fano Island on Thursday evening.

I found the Rolfe Krake minus two of her masts yesterday in the afternoon, but otherwise safe and sound, with steam up, ready for action, employed in watching the enemy across the Belt, and hastily repairiug the damages inflicted upon her front turret. Her bulwarks were down, and she looked as trim a craft as a monitor can. She has now her screw on board, which does not make her, as it was said, the swiftest vessel in the Dauish navy, but enables her to steam at the rate of niue and a half kuots an hour. The captain's turret is now made as invulnerable as any other part of the ship, and the plates on some parts of the deck have been strengthened. A few trifling improvements will soou make her a perfect vessel of her kind, and she proved lately, in a heavy gale on the Baltic, a tolerably safe and buoyant sea-boat.

MEN and women make the world, as head and heart make human life.

TRUST.

MY love is little, but she's very wise,
And sometimes she my little patience tries:
Whene'er she kisses me she shuts her eyes.

When first I noted it I, silent, thought:
'Tis a new trick my wizard love has caught;
It may not be, she shuts her eyes for naught.

And then I said, What can the reason be?
My love is mine, and few can love as we;
There's naught but love between my love and me.

My self-love whispered, Here the reason find:
She'd be like Cupid, truest Love when blind.
As she is wise, my winsome love is kind.

Still, not contented,—'t were a pleasure new
If that my love herself would whisper too,
And tell my self-love what it told was true.

And so I said, my love must make me wise,
And tell me this, which all my wit defies:
Why, when she kisses me, she shuts her eyes.

"You must not ask me." "Nay, love, but I must;
Love is not love without supremest trust.
As you are wise and kind, you will be just."

So, smiling, "Then 't is, you've so plain a face,
I could not, darling, kiss you else with grace;"
And hid herself, nor blushed at my disgrace.

THE COUNTESS DIANA.

[TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH OF MARIO UCHARD.]

CONTINUATION OF CHAPTER XXIV.

ON the following day the sun rose gloriously, the ground was dry and the air a little sharp. Strengthened by the night, I began to consider my position. The over-excitement of the previous day had yielded to the grave meditations which are apt to fill the soul about to form an important decision. Forgetting mercy, I was going to kill the man whom my father had selected to fill his place towards me, and although he was degraded in my eyes by the foullest treachery, still in the depths of my heart I heard that great voice of humanity which is never silent, they say, even in the heart of the hangman. However, I could not draw back; the life of Diana was in my hands: I must strike relentless as destiny itself. A slight noise was heard at my door—I opened it: it was M. de Jonval. He came, very obligingly, to know if I was in need of him or any of his people. I thanked him. I perceived my guardian, who had just completed his toilet.

"Ah, so you are up!" he exclaimed; "I will be with you in a moment."

I had thought of going out to see if the Alsatian was at his post.

"Well, where are you going?" said the Count to me, in a tone that offended me.

"Indeed, sir, I am going out! Are you afraid that I shall escape?"

"Perhaps so," replied he. "At all events, I am expecting some one for a conference, at which it is indispensable you should assist."

I bit my lips till the blood came, to keep from making any reply. Just then a valet entered and spoke to his master.

"Let him wait in the saloon," said the Colonel.

"Oh, no," returned M. de Maufert; "let this gentleman come up here; we can converse more at ease. Is he alone?"

"There are two men with him," replied the valet.

"I will ask him to come up," said M. de Jonval, at a sign from the Count, and he went out.

I supposed that these were our witnesses. I threw myself in an arm chair in an indifferent attitude, which sufficiently declared that I was disposed to let this affair be settled without my interference. Almost immediately, the colonel re-appeared followed by a personage, whose peaceable manners little accorded with the role of second in a mortal combat. The Count went before him, offered him a seat, and then spoke: "Has my friend, De Jonval," said he in German, "informed you of the state of things?"

"He has, sir," said this personage, who was looking with curiosity at me.

"It then remains for me," continued my guardian, "to justify to you the circumstances which have led me to take this rigorous measure, and the rights in virtue of which I must act. Here are the documents drawn up and endorsed by our legation."

And he presented him with two or three stamped papers that the little gentleman read with the most minute attention. I thought I must be mistaken as to the character of this interview, and that the Count, who owned property in Germany, had sent for a lawyer to entrust him with testamentary arrangements, made justifiable by our duel. I was about to retire.

"Stay," said M. de Maufert; "we want you. First," added he, "let me present to you Dr. Schultz."

"I hope, sir," then said the little man to me, "that you are inclined to see a friend in me, and that my hospitality will be agreeable to you."

"What signifies?" stammered I.

"It signifies, my dear," returned my guardian, "that you will enter for treatment at the house of this skilful physician, who undertakes to render you sane."

"I do not understand you, sir."

I thought myself the sport of some aberration.

"It is, however, very clear. You are mad. I feel too much interest in you to neglect any method for your recovery."

"Will you dare to shut me up against my will?" I exclaimed, indignantly.

"Oh, I do not consult you. I have just given this gentleman an order issued at the instance of your guardian."

"And you have hoped that I would submit to this infamy?"

"I have, at least, taken my measures to make sure the execution of my will. Thus your resistance will be useless. Don't excite yourself, for fear of giving this good Dr. Schultz a bad opinion of you. He comes to seek you. You are ready: I will conduct you as far as his house."

"Ah, you will not conduct me living, I swear to you!"

And suddenly springing up, for I saw myself already surrounded, I leaped to the other end of the room, determined to defend my liberty even at the price of the life.

"Come, come, sir," said the doctor, in the tone of voice which they use to the insane, "be reasonable."

"Enough!" interrupted the Count. "You have your people—let us end this ridiculous scene."

The Colonel called; two men appeared at the threshold. At a word from their master they advanced to seize me. I disengaged myself by an effort so powerful that one of them went rolling on the ground. Intimidated by this first check, they hesitated. At a sign from M. de Maufert they returned to me but exasperation had redoubled my strength, and twice I repulsed them. Driven into a corner of the room, I could not be surrounded. In an instant, I threw myself towards the chimney and returned to my corner, armed with a bronze candelabra that I brandished in so menacing a manner that one of my aggressors took flight. The noise brought the domestics to the room. I was blind with rage.

"Ah, you think to hold me," cried I, seeing their indecision; "Ill luck to you, however. I am mad, and can kill you with impunity. Woe to him who finds himself in my way!"

Already I made a start to throw myself in the midst of them and gain the street, when all of a sudden the door against which I was leaning, opened behind me—the man who had previously disappeared threw over my head a wrapper which blinded me, and enveloped me to my feet. In a second I was on the ground and bound. Extended on the floor, I was almost stifled. They cut the covering to give me air.

"Cowards!" cried I, in delirium, "you will assassinate me!"

The man approached. I still defended myself, fighting and striving to bite them. They were afraid of me; but I finally succumbed to their numbers. They again drew over my head the hood formed by the cutting of the wrapper; and restraining my screams, they carried me, thus enveloped, to a carriage waiting in the court-yard. Dr. Schultz and my guardian mounted near me.

"If you will be reasonable," said the Count to me, "they will give you more air.

And he threw the hood back. I kept immovable. One last hope remained. The Alsatian ought to be at his post. He would come at my call and deliver me by stirring up the populace.

The carriage flew along, but instead of passing before the front steps it turned and entered under the trees of the garden. They opened a railing, and we went out through the woods. One half hour later, I was incarcerated in a mad-house dungeon.

XXV.

ONE morning I woke up in a cell of Dr. Schultz's house. I believed myself to be just rousing from a horrible nightmare. My old Fritz was near me—he had arrived in the night. He told me that on the day following my departure, my guardian had made him transmit to him by Martin the order to join me at the house of M. de Jonval at Carlsruhe. After the time passed since my imprisonment, Diana was in the hands of her executioner, if Bastien had not succeeded. My first thought was to attempt an escape.

The Doctor was announced. At the first glance it was easy to see that he was somewhat embarrassed at the odious part he was playing towards me.

"I desire, Sir Baron," said he to me, "to inspire you with the confidence of a friend; and however painful the circumstances which have brought you to this house, I wish to assure you, from this moment, of my sincere good will."

"My confidence and my friendship, sir?" replied I. "Oh, that is a good deal to ask in one day, for a man whom I only know as yet by the most iniquitous of actions."

"Yes, I confess it," returned he, "appearances are against me; but also think, if I had not accepted this sad mission, another in my place would have been entrusted with it."

"Which would have been a pity for your establishment and a profit for one of your colleagues!" . . .

"In one word, sir," replied he, "I can make you regret this language. I know that you are persecuted by enemies, and it is to aid you in baffling their plots that I have lent them my co-operation."

"Then you do not believe me mad?"

"I should not merit the celebrity that I enjoy if I had doubted a moment—"

"And you will give me my liberty?"

"I engage to do so—at the moment that the thing will be possible without danger to you."

"How without danger to me?"

"Good heavens! do you imagine that your enemies do not mistrust each other? Oh, they have taken every precaution. See here," added he, in a low tone, "see these two men walking in the court—they are policemen, disguised as nurses; there is one at the door—others surround the house outside; at the least suspicion you would be surrounded, seized, re-incarcerated, I know not where, for M. de Jonval is very powerful, and you are spoken of as a dangerous madman. The French legation cannot reclaim you, since it is obliged to require from the authorities the execution of an arrest rendered against you by a French tribunal."

I hesitated to believe these words; he perceived it.

"Will you risk the proof?" said he. "Then leave any wrong which results to me. I should prefer to suffer rather than pass in your eyes for an accomplice in a crime against humanity. Remember, however, that I have done my duty in warning you. If, meanwhile, you prefer to wait here till the surveillance is sufficiently relaxed to permit you to fly, I am a physician, and not a jailor."

"And if you allow me to write, I can receive letters from my friends?"

Without replying, he rang a bell—a man appeared, and I recognized him as one of those who had arrested me.

"Hermann," said the Doctor, "bring my desk here. If my lord the Baron gives you some letters to post, you will carry them immediately and execute his orders, whatsoever he commands."

The man went out.

"I ought not to conceal from you," said Dr. Schultz, with a smile, "that it would be very imprudent for you to speak to him on the subject of an escape."

I was more and more astonished.

"Am I enjoined not to leave this room?"

"Let us take a turn in the garden," replied he; "you will find air and space."

I followed him, always with suspicion. We crossed a yard and entered a little park, scrupulously well kept. The two men, constituted as my guards, whom I had seen from the window, immediately took their position directly behind us.

"Here, here!" said Dr. Schultz, impatiently, to them; "oblige me by fulfilling your duties without endangering my heels. You can observe us at your ease a little distance off, but so that I do not see you." Then turning to me he added, "You will come here as much as it pleases you. I have another garden for my patients."

My suspicions were somewhat shaken.

"This is not the prison they perhaps would prefer for you," added he; "however, it is not my fault that this is not a prison. I can assure you, in short, that as long as you choose to stay I will render it bearable."

I returned to the house, still feeling very perplexed, but surrounded by so many dangers, it would have been imprudent to take any resolve without receiving news from abroad. Profiting by the privilege accorded me, and desiring to put to the test the sincerity of my doctor, I wrote to Bastien in terms which could not compromise any one in case my letter should be intercepted.

I passed four days of poignant suffering. Nothing arrived from Montherné. I began again to suspect Schultz. At last Hermann entered one morning with a letter in his hand. It was from Bastien. I broke the seal with a horrid palpitation of the heart, and read as follows:

"I am very unfortunate, M. André, to be able to give you none but bad news. Immediately after your departure I went to join the companion who was to scour the country around the spot where the person (of whom you know) had departed. I did well to send him at night, for he had discovered the traces of the carriage, already effaced on the highway when I arrived, and he had followed them to a cross-road where they remained quite fresh; he waited here for me. We then marched carefully along, and the direction showed me at once that this beggarly Placide, who led the way, had not been toward the city. At the end of half an hour we observed a spot where the carriage must have stopped. I soon understood that the person in the carriage must have descended at this place, the footprint was so small and light there could be no doubt. A little further on, two holes made by the heels of boots, showed that Placide had jumped from his seat. I have supposed that as she, doubtless, perceived the road that the steward took, she had ordered him to stop, and that she had, perhaps, refused to go any farther; but I feel sure she had not gone alone and had remounted. All this brought us to the road to Viray, where, unhappily, we lost all trace.

"However, my annoyance did not last long. Following the track towards Viray, I felt certain they could only have chosen that way in order to reach the railroad. There I discovered everything. The man at the station recollected very well that a lady with a very sad countenance, also an individual resembling Placido, had waited nearly an hour for the conveyance to Dinant. I had no longer any doubts, for, on inquiry at the inn, I found the carriage and horses, which I easily recognized. I visited the coupe to see if she might have left any sign, but found nothing. Once sure of my facts, I left my comrade (who is installed in the house so as not to miss Placide, who ought to be back at the end of two days for the carriage,) and then went to Dinant; but there, on account of the great number of travellers on that route, I could not hear any news. After a day of inquiries, I was convinced that they had continued their journey without stopping. I could do nothing but assure myself of Placide's return. I watched every train, and the second day, I perceived the steward in a first-class. I quickly took my seat in a third. Arrived at Viray station, I ran to the man who takes the little tickets on leaving, and I promised him a hundred sous if he would set aside for me the ticket of the passenger about to pass; it was night. I covered my face with my handkerchief to prevent recognition, and when Placide appeared I touched the man's elbow. The ticket bore the postmark of Spa.

"Finally, on going back home, I heard of the departure of of your old Fritz; and soon after, to heighten my misfortunes, the Alsatian returned, announcing to me that he had lost you because you had left by a back door with your companion, who has not reappeared at M. de Jonval's, and thus you escaped him. I tore my hair with rage. I await your orders—you know I have friends. Placide has discharged all the domesties—even Catherine; and he says publicly that Monsieur and Madame will not return for a long time. While I am waiting, I watch: some letters must come here from master to valet. I will examine the postmarks and we will see. I have scarcely spent five hundred francs of your money. I shall not stir, as I think the surest method of receiving news is to watch this rascal Placide. In any case, you know you have only to give me some sign and I will go on, either to join you or—travel elsewhere."

This sad news drove me to despair. Diana was at this very hour in the hands of her executioner, and I, far from her, was unable to defend her. Fool that I was! One day I had held the Count at arm's length! I must discover the retreat he had chosen, and I must kill him this time without mercy! . . . I felt a sudden inspiration; I summoned the Doctor:

"Sir," said I, "I have just received an important letter, about which I desire to communicate immediately with my guardian. I shall be grateful to you for his address, which, of course, he has left with you.

"I wish I could be of use to you," replied Dr. Schultz; "but the truth is, I am completely ignorant of the Count's whereabouts. It is through M. de Jonval that I correspond with him."

I was in consternation.

"But," said the Doctor, "I will beg M. de Jonval to come to you: he will tell you, without doubt, what you wish to know.

I clung to this last hope. An hour later, M. de Jonval entered. Calmly and stoically I made my request. He offered to take charge of my letter; he formally declared that M. de Maufert was travelling, and that it was his expressed wish that I should be left in ignorance of his movements. I besought, I prayed, but he was inexorable.

"I will repeat to M. de Maufert," said he, "the details of our interview. As soon as I receive his answer I will bring it to you."

He went out, and the night gathered dark around me.

THE PNEUMATIC DISPATCH.

Skeptics and unbelievers who have rejected the Prospectus of the Pacific Water Company in our last issue, will read with some caution the following from a reliable English paper:

The latest phase of the utility of the Pneumatic Dispatch has yet to be witnessed by the public, and will possibly have been seen by hundreds before these lines are perused by our readers. A large tunnel, 9 feet high by 8 feet wide—capable of containing the largest carriages of the Great Western Railway—and a quarter of a mile long, has been built in the Crystal Palace grounds, for passenger traffic. The tunnel, which is of a fine brickwork, with its closing valves, is already completed. The fan-wheel, 21 feet in diameter—which will be temporarily worked by a fixed locomotive—is erected and enclosed in its plate-iron case; a model station has been formed, and the model carriage, built at Manchester, is at this moment in the ground. It will be travelling in darkness, no doubt, or rather by lamp-light; but as the front head of the front carriage is sucked along by the exhaustion of the tunnel, the air will follow it instantly, and afford a plentiful supply of the life-supporting gas to the inmates of the carriages, while, just as the balloon, travelling at the same velocity as the currents of the air which waft it, presents a perpetual calm to the aeronaut, no matter how rapidly it may progress, so the passengers by the Pneumatic Dispatch will perceive not the least gusty effects from the gale which follows their passage closely up, or that torrent of air which, in the reverse method of propulsion, will blow them through in the opposite direction. One cannot contemplate either the dispatch of goods or passengers by this means, without perceiving the invaluable advantages which this method possesses for the under-ground traffic of our vast metropolis. Passengers will have as rapid transit as the locomotive affords, while they will experience nothing of the choking sulphurous vapors which the locomotives leave in our present under-ground railways. Moreover, one line of railway would be sufficient, and no collisions of trains could take place. Out of London, the locomotive would still be the engine for traffic of all sorts over large tracts of country. Again, for goods. To have our over-crowded streets relieved of much—perhaps of most—of their heavy traffic, and to have the thousands of tons now conveyed by weary horses quietly and silently transmitted unseen beneath our roads and houses, will be, indeed, no slight boon. Still more, we may hope to see a network of smaller pipes traversing London and all its suburbs for the transmission of parcels. A parcel-post thus established will be almost as great a benefit as the penny postage. It seems to us, also, that great advantage might be taken of the system for effecting communications with or between military fortifications. Goods and men might be packed through a tunnel of very great length; and if such tunnels were constructed at some considerable depth, it would be unassailable by an enemy. Gunpowder and stores so sent could not be fired, captured or destroyed: and although it would be a costly thing to make such a means of ingress and egress for a distance of five, ten or twenty miles, even such an expense might be worth its cost in actual warfare, while certainly in shorter lengths, within the region of a fortification, or between contiguous forts, it would undoubtedly have the highest claims to consideration. This, however, may be the last and least profitable of the many uses we shall see this system turned to.

PHILOSOPHIC PARAGRAPHS.

A fool utters all his mind; but a wise man keeps it in till afternoon. Even a fool, when he holds his peace, is counted wise, and he that shuts his lips, a man of understanding.—Solomon.

—

I have seen reason to change the greater part of my opinions. Let me confess to you, Quintus, we oftener say things because we can say them well, than because they are sound and reasonable.—Cicero, in Landor's Imaginary Conversations.

—

God hath divided his benefits so equally that there is noe country which excelleth not all others in some things or other; so, as it borrows, it lends. Likewise in men, there is noe one so excelleth in one thing, but hath need of another's witt in some other, and from these two proceed all trafick and society. —Sir Thomas Overbury.

—

A foolish consistency is the hobgoblin of little minds, adored by little statesmen, and philosophers, and divines. With consistency a great soul has simply nothing to do. He may as well concern himself with the shadows on the wall. Speak what you think now in hard words, and to-morrow speak what to-morrow thinks in hard words again, though it contradict everything you said to day. "Ah, so you shall be sure to be misunderstood." Is it so bad, then, to be misunderstood? Pythogoras was misunderstood, and Socrates, and Jesus, and Luther, and Copernicus, and Galileo, and Newton, and every pure and wise spirit that ever took flesh. To be great is to be misunderstood.—R. W. Emerson, on Self-Reliance.

—

A stated exaltation and emotion is a desecrated one. The prayers of children are empty and cold, and are, in fact, only the remains of the Jewish-Christian belief in sacrifices, which will reconcile and win the favor of God by means of innocent beings, not of innocence; and the child secretly regards the God whom you give him by word of mouth, as the Kamschatkadale and every savage does his. A grace before meals must make every child deceitful. As he grows older, let a day of prayer or of any religious observance becomes more rare, but on that account more solemn. What the first affecting Lord's Supper is to the child, that let every home be in which you consecrate his heart to religion. Let children go to church, but rarely, for you might as well take them to hear an oratorio of Klopstock or of Handel as that of the church; but when you do take them, impress in them the value of a sympathy with the devotional sentiments of their parents. Indeed, I would rather —since there is no special public worship of God, and no special preachers for children—you should lead them on the great days of the seasons, or of human life, merely into the empty temple, and show them the place of their elders. If you add to that, twilight, night, the organ singing and a father's preaching, you will at least leave behind on the young heart more religious consecration by that one church-going than you could on an old one by a whole year of church attending.—Jean Paul Fr. Richter.

Dr. H. O. Marcy, Surgeon of the 35th U. S. C. Troops, in a letter to the Boston Journal, reports having "direct and positive information received from several parties of prisoners as well as deserters—soldiers in the battle of Olustree, and perfectly conversant with the facts—that the morning after the battle a South Carolina regiment and the Second Georgia Regulars took possession of the depot for the wounded, and not as an armed mob seeking plunder and destruction, but under orders of their officers—who with their swords actually set the example—in cold blood murdered the colored soldiers who, wounded and helpless, lay there under the charge of an assistant surgeon, who was left to attend to their wants."

When Mirabeau (who was strongly pockmarked) was a candidate for election to the National Assembly, he made a long speech to the voters, minutely pointing out the precise requisites that a proper and efficient member ought to possess, and, of course, drawing as accurate a likeness of himself as possible. Talleyrand, who was the opposing candidate, contented himself with the following short speech in reply: "It appears to me, gentlemen, that M. de Mirabeau has omitted to state the most important of all the legislative qualifications, and I will supply his deficiency by impressing upon your attention that a perfectly unobjectionable member of the Assembly ought, above all things, to be very much marked with the small-pox." Talleyrand got the laugh, and won the election.

An elderly lady acted the part of "Calypso" in a tableaux vivant. In answer to the compliments which she received afterwards, she declared that she had done her best, but added that to represent Calypso properly, youth and beauty were necessary. "Not at all," replied an old General, "Your ladyship is a proof to the contrary; nothing could look better from the further end of the saloon, and nothing could be better acted; as to youth and beauty, the distance supplies all that." "In that case, General, I wonder that you do not always keep at a distance," was the retort.

A miser having been solicited to grant a favor, said, "On one condition I will do what you require." "What is that?" "Never to ask me for anything."

LIFE IN CORNWALL.

THE prospect was not an inviting one, either locally or morally, look at it how you might. Once you had quitted the Montacute demesne, and its still considerable plantations, and you found yourself in the midst of desolation; great heaps of refuse in every direction, as if all the rubbish in England had been shot out in the place. Mine chimneys dotted here and there as far as the eye could reach, and shabby rickety-looking counting-houses with their little balconies, from whence the work was let out to the miners. A tree was now a rare object, and those that did grow in the neighborhood were almost all stunted ashes, bent from the effect of many a westerly gale. The clay-built cottages more resembled Irish cabins than anything else; with this difference, however that few of them were without their bit of garden ground where myrtles and fuchsias and geraniums might be seen all the year round, and attaining a size which we look for in vain anywhere but in Cornwall. It is Gudgodah, a "land of waters," too; you are constantly coming to little streams and "stamps" where they wash the tin. All day long may you see those dark-eyed Cornish maids, with their picturesque sun-bonnets, busily employed in this way. Such was the view which presented itself daily to Trelawney, as he looked out of the windows of his picturesque parsonage, built, to be in keeping with the little English church at no great distance off, in the most approved Gothic style. It was quite an oasis in the desert, that pretty little parsonage, with rose-trees climbing all round the windows, and clematis and honeysuckle hanging in rich clusters about the porch. A well-kept garden, too, and flower-beds, bright with geraniums and heliotrope and verbena, gladdened the eye of the owner of this paradise. While right in front of you was that lofty, majestic, unchangeable hill which had looked down upon so many generations, and which, as the lights and shadows rested upon its side, assumed so many varying appearances. But now what of the people? what of that little flock in the wilderness whom Trelawney had come to feed? As may be said also of their own country, when you open your mouth to disparage, some redeeming trait presents itself and checks your utterance. Blessed with insatiable and ever-extensive curiosity about your affairs, yet are they equally communicative of their own and habitually civil and courteous in their demeanor. Fickle as their own climate, they are only too easily led after any novelty. The Cornish mind, like the Welsh, is eminently a religious one. They sing hymns and carols ("carls") instead of the drinking and amatory songs wherewith the peasantry in other parts of England refresh their spirits. You may often come upon a "young youth," standing in the middle of the road singing a hymn at a loud pitch, either as a trial of his voice or to summon his companions, rather than as a religious exercise, and he is sure to be joined by other youths before long, who make the welkin echo with their melody. For the Cornish, like the people of Lancashire, are fond of music, and whether in church, or going to "bal," or returning home from the mine, naturally betake themselves to this source of recreation. There is little drunkenness among the miners. Coffee and ginger-beer are the two beverages most in demand. But still it must be said of the Cornish miner that only let him sing "carls" to his heart's content, and he does not want any other species of "refreshment." It would be well if all this psalm-singing and chapel-going (for church-going is decidedly the exception and not the rule in Cornwall) commended itself by the ordinary tests of morality which we are in the habit of it applying. But it must be allowed, as in the kindred case of the Welsh, that female virtue is at a remarkably low ebb among the mining girls and farm servants, and is seldom, indeed, ever to be met with. However, we are not writing a history of Cornwall or its inhabitants. Enough has been said to give the reader, who perchance has never been in Cornwall, (he would be called a "foreigner" down in those western parts—for the inhabitants often speak of themselves, and still oftener are spoken of by others, as if occupying some island, or dependency of the British Empire, and not as forming part and parcel of Great Britain,) enough has been said to give the non-Cornish reader some idea of the place and people whither Reginald Trelawney's fate had brought him.

On Ancient Jests.—The Kynge with a goodlie companye rydinge thoro' cheape one daye espied a very fat woman, and he asked who she was, whereupon ye Lord Mare, with reddie wyt answered that she was Barklie and Perkyns, his stout, if it might please his Majestie; and his Majestie graciouslie replied, "Barklie and Perkyns, his stout, well pleases me, but yt seemeth me she is not XXX but X L-ent stout." At which everyone laughed ryghte merrillie. Then the Kynge asked the Lord Mare if he wold have that woman for hys wife; but, quoth he, "We thanke yr Majestie, but there is a proverbe, "Waste not, waste not!'" which pleased ye Kynge muche, and he gave to the Lorde Mare a dygge in ye rybbes, and caused him to fall off hys horse into ye conduit whych greatlie delyted ye Kinge and his Courtiers, and he sayed, "Rise uppe, Sir Thommas de Muddinose." So he becayru a knight that daye. And ye chroniclers saye that Sir Thommas de Muddinose was the only Mare that ever made 2 jests, and that ye Cittie of London is famous for its wittles and not for its witt.

A Delicate Costume.—A Paris letter, in speaking of riding at Longchamps, says: "Now and then came a turnout so very exquisite, that all eyes were fixed upon it; one in particular, a phaeton, looking as delicate as a sea-shell; the coachman and footman in white liveries faced with scarlet. The occupant, a fair creature, looking almost too fragile to be trusted out of a glass case, but all in keeping with her surroundings, wore a pale violet (de Parme) silk dress, edged with ruches of silk a shade darker; a paletot of the same color as the dress, trimmed in the same way; a white lace bonnet, with a soft crown, a spray of delicate flowers falling backwards toward the cape; and holding in her delicate lilac kid-gloved hands a parasol of lilac silk of exactly the same shade as the dress."

THE NOTTING HILL MYSTERY.

Section VIII.—Conclusion.

THERE now only remains for me, in conclusion, to sum up as briefly and succinctly as possible the evidence contained in the preceding statements. In so doing, it will be necessary to adopt an arrangement somewhat different from that which has been hitherto followed. Each step of the narrative will therefore be accompanied with a marginal reference to the particular deposition from which it may be taken.

I. First, then, for what may be called the preliminary portions of the evidence. With these we need here deal but very briefly. They consist almost entirely of letters furnished by the courtesy of a near relation of the late Mrs. Anderton, and read substantially as follows :

Some six or seven and twenty years ago, the mother of Mrs. Anderton—Lady Boleton—after giving birth to twin daughters, under circumstances of a peculiarly exciting and agitating nature, died in child-bed. Both Sir Edward Boleton and herself appear to have been of a nervous temperament, and the effects of these combined influences is shown in the highly nervous and susceptible organization of the orphan girls, and in a morbid sympathy of constitution, by which each appeared to suffer from any ailment of the other. This remarkable sympathy is very clearly shown in more than one of the letters I have submitted for your consideration, and I have numerous others in my possession which, should they be considered insufficient, will place the matter, irregular as it certainly is, beyond the reach of doubt. I must request you to bear it particularly and constantly in mind throughout the case.

Almost from the time of the mother's death, the children were placed in the care of a poor but respectable woman at Hastings. Here the younger, whose constitution appears to have been originally much stronger than that of her sister, seems to have improved rapidly in health, and in so doing to have mastered, in some degree, that morbid sympathy of temperament of which I have spoken, and which in the weaker organization of her elder sister, still maintained its former ascendency. They were about six years old when, whether through the carelessness of the nurse or not, it is immaterial to us now, the younger was lost during a pleasure excursion in the neighborhood. Every inquiry was made, and it appeared pretty clear that she had fallen into the hands of a gang of gypsies, who at that time infested the country round, but no further trace of her was ever after discovered.

The elder sister, now left alone, seemed to have been watched with redoubled solicitude. There was nothing, however, in the years immediately following Miss C. Boleton's disappearance having any direct bearing upon our case, and I have, therefore, confined my extracts from the correspondence entrusted to me to two or three letters from a lady in whose charge she was placed at Hampstead, and one from an old friend of her mother, from which we gather the fact of her marriage. The latter is chiefly notable as pointing out the highly sensitive temperament of the young lady's husband, the late Mr. Anderton, to which I shall have occasion, at a later period of the case, more particularly to direct your attention. The former give evidence of a very important fact; namely, that of the liability of Miss Boleton to attacks of illness equally unaccountable and unmanageable, bearing a perfect resemblance to those in which she suffered in her younger days sympathetically with the ailments of her sister; and, therefore, to be not improbably attributed to the same cause.

II. Thus far for the preliminary portion of the evidence. The second division places before us certain peculiarities in the married life of Mrs. Anderton; its more especial object, however, being to elucidate the connection between the parties whose history we have hitherto been tracing, and the Baron R., with whose proceedings we are properly concerned.

It appears, then, that in all respects but one, the married life of Mr. and Mrs Anderton was particularly happy. Notwithstanding their retired and often somewhat nomad life, and the limits necessarily imposed thereby to the formation of friendships, the evidence of their devoted attachment to each other is perfectly overwhelming. I have no less than thirty-seven letters from various quarters, all speaking more or less strongly upon this point, but I have thought it better to select from the mass a small but sufficient number, than to overload the case with unnecessary repetition. In one respect alone their happiness was incomplete. It was, as had been justly observed by Mrs. Ward, most unfortunate that the choice of Miss Boleton should have fallen upon a gentleman who, however eligible in every other respect, was, from his extreme constitutional nervousness, so peculiarly ill-adapted for union with a lady of such very similar organization. The connection seems to have borne its natural fruit in the increased delicacy of both parties, their married life being spent in an almost continual search after health. Among the numerous experiments tried with this object, they at length appear to have had resource to mermerism, becoming finally patients of Baron R., a well-known professor of that and other kindred impositions.

Mrs. Anderton had not been long under his care when the remonstrances of several friends led to the cessation of the Baron's immediate manipulations, the mesmeric fluid being now conveyed to the patient through the intervention of a third party. Mlle. Rosalie, "the medium" thus employed, was a young person regularly retained by Baron R. for that purpose, and of her it is necessary to say a few words.

She appears to have been about the age of Mrs. Anderton though looking perhaps a little older than her in years; slight in figure, with dark hair and eyes, and in all respects but one answering precisely to the description of that lady's lost sister. The single difference alluded to, that of wide and clumsy feet, is amply accounted for by the nature of her former avocation. She had been for several years a tight-rope dancer, etc., in the employ of a travelling-circus proprietor, who by his own account, had purchased her for a trifling sum of a gang of gypsies at Lewes, just at the very time when the younger Miss Boleton was stolen at Hastings, by a gang whose course was tracked through Lewes to the westward. Of him she was again purchased by the Baron, who appears, even at the outset, to have exercised a singular power over her, the fascination of his glance falling on her whilst engaged upon the stage, having compelled her to stop short in the performance of her part. There can, I think, be little doubt that this girl Rosalie was in fact the lost sister of Mrs. Anderton, and of this we shall find that the Baron very shortly became cognizant.

It does not appear that on the first meeting of the sisters he had any idea of the relationship between them. He was, indeed, perfectly ignorant of the early history of them both. The extraordinary sympathy therefore which immediately manifested itself between them was not improbably set down by him as a mere result of the mesmeric rapport, and it was not till he had been for some weeks in attendance on Mrs. Anderton that accident led him to divine its true origin. Nor, on the other hand, does this singular sympathy—a sympathy manifested in a precisely similar manner to that known to have existed years ago between the sisters—appeared to have raised any suspicion of the truth in the mind of either Mrs. Anderton or her husband. From the former, indeed, all mention of her early life had been carefully kept till she had probably almost, if not entirely, forgotten the event, while the latter merely remembered it as a tale which had long since ceased to possess any present interest.

The two sisters were thus for several weeks in the closest contact, the effects of which may or may not have been heightened by the so-called mesmeric connection between them, before any suspicion of their relationship crossed the mind of any one. One evening, however—and from certain peculiar circumstances we are enabled to fix the date precisely to the 13th of October, 1854—the Baron appears beyond all doubt to have become cognizant of the fact. I must request your particular attention to the circumstances by which his discovery of it was attended.

Upon that evening the conversation appears to have very naturally turned upon a certain extraordinary case professed to be reported in a number of the Zoist Mesmeric Magazine, published a few days before. The pretended case was that of a lady suffering from some internal disorder which forbade her to swallow any food, and receiving sustenance through mesmeric sympathy with the operator, who "ate for her." From this extraordinary tale the conversation turned naturally to other manifestations of constitutional sympathy, as an instance of which Mr. Anderton related the story of Mrs. Anderton's lost sister, and the singular bond which had existed between them. The conversation appears to have continued for some time, and in the course of it a jesting remark was made by one of the party in allusion to the story of eating by deputy, to which I am inclined to look as the key-note of this horrible affair.

"I said," deposes Mr. Morton, "I said it was lucky for the young woman that the fellow didn't eat anything unwholesome."

From the moment these words were spoken the Baron appears to have dropped out of the conversation altogether. More than this, he was clearly in a condition of great mental pre-occupation and disturbance. Mr. Morton goes on to describe the singularity of his manner, the letting the cigar expire between his teeth, and the tremulousness of his hands, so excessive, that in attempting to re-light it he only succeeded in destroying that of his friend. There can, I think, be no doubt whatever that from that moment he believed thoroughly in the identity of Rosalie with the lost sister of Mrs. Anderton. What other ideas the conversation had suggested to him we must endeavor to ascertain from the evidence that follows.

II., 5. On the morning of the day succeeding that on the evening of which he had become convinced of Rosalie's identity, we find Baron R. at Doctor's Commons inquiring into the particulars of a will by which the sum of £25,000 had been bequeathed, under certain conditions, to the children of Lady Boleton. Under the provisions of this will, the girl Rosalie was, after her sister and Mr. Anderton, the heir to this legacy. We need, I think, have no difficulty in connecting the acquisition of this intelligence with the steps by which it was immediately followed. Ar. Anderton at once received an intimation of the Baron's approaching departure for the continent, and at the end of the third week from that time leave was taken, and he apparently started upon his journey. In point of fact, however, his plans were of a very different character. During the three weeks wich intervened between his visit to Doctors' Commons and his farewell to Mr. Anderton, there had been advertised in the parish church of Kensington the banns of marriage between himself and his "medium," Rosalie,—not, indeed, in the names by which they were ordinarily known, and which would very probably have excited attention, but in the family name—if so it be—of the Baron and in that by which Rosalie was originally known when with the travelling circus. By what means he prevailed upon his victim to consent to such a step is not important to the matter in hand. The general tenor of the subsequent evidence shows clearly that it must have been under some form of compulsion, and, indeed, the unfortunate girl seems to have been made by some means altogether subservient to his will.

The marriage thus secretly effected, the Baron and his wife leave town, not for the continent, as stated to Mr. Anderton, but for Bognor, an out-of-the way little watering-place on the Sussex coast, deserted save for the week of the Goodwood races, where, at that time of the year, he was not likely to meet with any one to whom he was known. Before endeavoring to investigate the motive of all this mystery, it is necessary to bear in miud one important fact:

Between the wife of Baron R. and Mr. Wilson's legacy of £25,000, the lives of Mr. and Mrs. Anderton now alone intervened.

The first few days of the Baron's stay in Bognor seem to have been devoted to the search for a servant, he having insisted on the unusual arrangement of himself providing one where he lodged. It is worthy of note that the one finally selected was in a position, with respect to character, that placed her entirely in her master's power. It is untortunate that this same defect of character necessarily lessens the value of evidence from such a source. We must, however, take it for what it was worth, remembering at the same time, that there is a total absence of any apparent motive, save that of telling the truth, for the statement she has made.

It appears, then, from her account, that after trying by every means to tempt her into some repetitiou of her former error, the Baron at last seized upon the pretext of her taking from the breakfast table a single taste of jam upon her finger, to threaten her with immediate and utter ruin. One only loophole was left by which she could escape. The alternative was, indeed, most ingeniously and delicately veiled under the pretext of seeking a plausible reason for her dismissal; but, in point of fact, it amounted to this, that as a condition of her alleged offence not being recorded against her, she would own to the commission of another with which she had nothing whatever to do.

The offense to which she was falsely to plead guilty was this: On the night succeding the commission of the fault of which, such as it was, she was really guilty, Madame R. was taken suddenly ill. The symptoms were those of antimonial poisoning. The presence of antimony in the stomach was clearly shown. In the presence of the medical man who had been called in, the girl was taxed by the Baron with having administered, by way of a trick, a dose of tartar emetic; and she, in obedience to a strong hint from her master, confessed to the delinquency, and was thereupon dismissed with a good character in other respects. Freed from the dread of exposure, she now denies the whole affair, both of the trick and of the quarrel which was supposed to have led to it, and I am bound to say, that looking both to internal and external evidence, her statement seems worthy of credit.

Nevertheless the poison was unquestionably administered. By whom?

Cui bono? Certainly, it will be said, not for that of the Baron; for until at least the death of Mr. and Mrs. Anderton his interest was clearly in the life of his wife. It is not, therefore, by any means to be supposed that he would before that event attempt to poison her. Of this mystery, then, it appears that we must seek the solution elsewhere.

III. Returning then for a time to Mr. and Mrs. Anderton, we find that the latter has also suffered from an attack of illness. Comparing her journal and the evidence of her doctor, with that given in the case of Mme. R., it appears that the symptoms were identical in every respect, with this single but important exception, that there is no apparent cause for the attack, nor can any trace of poison be found. A little further inquiry, and we arrive at a more mysterious coincidence.

It is a matter of universal experience, that almost the most fatal enemy of crime is over-precaution. In this particular case the precautions of the Baron R. appear to have been dictated by a skill and forethought almost superhuman, and so admirably have they been taken, that, save in the concealment of the marriage, it is almost impossible to recognize in them any sinister motive whatever. His course with respect to the servant girl, though dictated, as we believe, by the most criminal designs, is perfectly consistent with motives of the very highest philanthropy. Even in the concealment of the marriage, once granting—as I think may very fairly be granted—that such a marriage might be concealed without any necessary imputation of evil, the means adopted were equally simple, effective, and unblameable. They consisted merely in the use of the real, instead of the stage names of the contracting parties, and in the very proper avoidance of all grounds for scandal by hiring another lodging in order that before marriage the address of both parties might not be the same. In the illness of Mme. R., too, at Bognor, nothing can, to all appearance, be more straightforward than the Baron's conduct. He at once proclaims his suspicion of poison, sends for an eminent physician, verifies his doubts, administers the proper remedies, and dismisses the servant by whose fault the attack has been occasioned. Viewed with an eye of suspicion, there is indeed something questionable in the selection of the medical attendant. Why should the Baron refuse to send for either of the local practitioners, both gentlemen of skill and reputation, and insist on calling in a stranger to the place, who in a very few days would leave it and very probably return no more? Distrust of country doctors, and decided preference for London skill, furnishes us, as usual, with a prompt and plausible reply. It does not, however, exclude the possibility that the expediency of removing as far as possible all evidence of what had passed may have in some degree affected the choice. Be that as it may, this precaution, whether originally for good or for evil, has enabled us to fix with certainty a very important point.

Mrs. Anderton was taken ill, not only with the same symptoms, but at the same time, with Mme. R.

Before proceeding to consider the events which followed, there are one or two points in the history of this first illness of the sisters on which it is needful to remark. The action of these metallic poisons, among which we may undoubtedly rank antimony, is as yet but very little understood. We know, however, from the statement of Prof. Taylor, certainly by far the first English authority upon the subject, that peculiarities of constitution, or, as they termed, "idiosyncracies," frequently assist or impede to a very extraordinary extent the action of such drugs. The constitution of Mme. R. appears to have been thus idiosyncratically disposed to favor the action of antimony. There can be no doubt that the action of the poison upon her system was very greatly in excess of that which under ordinary circumstances would have been expected from a similar dose. The poison, therefore, by whomsoever administered, was not intended to prove fatal, though from the peculiar idiosyncracy of Mme. R., it was very nearly doing so.

The narrowness of Mme. R.'s escape seems to have struck the Baron, and to have exercised a strong influence over his future proceedings. Whether or not he knew or believed her to be exposed to any peculiar influences which might tend to render her life less secure than that of her delicate and invalid sister, it is impossible positively to say. There was no question, however, that her death before that of Mrs. Anderton would destroy all prospect of his succession to the £25,000, and with this view he proceeded to take as speedily as possible the necessary steps to secure himself against such an event. The obvious course, and indeed that suggested at once by Dr. Jones, was that of assurance, and this course he accordingly adopted. after having previously, by a tour of several months, restored his wife to a state of health in which her life would probably be accepted by the offices concerned. The insurances, therefore, with which we are concerned, were effected in consequence of a previous administration of poison to Mme. R., producing an illness far more serious than could have been anticipated, and accompanied by precisely similar symptoms on the part of her delicate sister, Mrs. Anderton, whose death, if preceding that of Mme. R., would more than double the Baron's prospect of succession.

Between him, therefore, and the sum of either £25,000 or £50,000 there now intervened three lives, those of Mr. and

Mrs. Anderton, and of his own wife, Mme. R., and on the order in which they fell depended the amount of his gain by their demise. The death of Mr. Anderton before that of Mrs. Anderton, would open the possibility of a second marriage, from which might arise issue, whose claim would precede his; that of his own wife preceding that of either Mr. or Mrs. Anderton, would destroy altogether his own claim to the larger sum. It was only in the event of Mrs. Anderton's death being followed first by that of her husband, and afterwards by that of her sister, that the Baron's entire claim would be secured.

Within one year from the time at which matters assumed this position, these three lives fell in, and in precisely the order in which the Baron would most largely and securely profit hy their demise.

We now proceed to examine the circumstauces under which they fell.

Immediately on his return to England, and before apparently completing his arrangements with respect to the policies of insurance, the Baron, we find, calls upon Mr. Anderton, and by dint of minute inquiries draws from him the entire history of the attack from which Mrs. Anderton had suffered several months before. Supposing, therefore, that the information was of any practical interest, the Baron was now fully aware of the perfect similarity, hoth of time aud syuptoms, between the cases of his wife and her sister. It is essential that this should be borne in mind.

He now proceeds to estahlish himself in lodgings in Russell Place, in a house in which, for five days and every uight in the week, he is entirely alone. The only other tenant
V. is a medical man, whoso visits are confined to a few hours on two days in the week, and who lives at too great a distance to be called in on any sudden emergency. Here he establishes himself upon the first and second floors with a laboratory in a small detached room upon the basement floor, where his chemical experiments can be carried on without inconvenience to the rest of the house. It is essential that the position of this laboratory should he very clearly borne in mind, as it plays a most important part in the story which is now to follow.

In these lodgings, then, Mme. R. is again takeu ill with a return, though in a greatly mitigated form, of the same symptoms from which she had previously suffered at Bognor. The attack, however, though less violent in its immediate effects, was succeeded at regular intervals of about a fortnight by others of a precisely similar charaeter. And here we arrive at what is at once the most significant, the most extraordinary, and the most questionable of the evideuce we have heen able to collect.

It appears, then, that upon a night in August, a young man of the name of Aldridge, who, as a matter of special favor, had been taken into the house since the arrival of the
VII. Baron, saw Mme. R. leave her bedroom, and, apparently in her sleep, walk down the stairs in the dark to the lower part of the house. The room in which the Baron slept was next to hers, and on the wall of that room, projected by the night-lamp hurning on the tahle, the young man saw what seemed to be thc shadow of a man watching Mme. R. as she went hy. He looked again and the shadow was gone—so rapidly that at first he could scarcely believe his eyes, and was only, after consideration, satisfied that it really had been there. He went down to the room, but the Baron was asleep. He told him what had happened to Mme. R., and he at once followed her. Young Aldridge watched him until he had descended the kitchen-stairs and returned, followed closely by the sleep-walker. He then went back to his room, to which the Baron shortly afterwards came to thank him for his warniug, and to tell him that, in some freak of slumher, Mme. R. had visited the kitchen.

So far the story is simple enough. There is nothing extraordinary in a sick woman of excitahle nerves taking a sudden fit of somnambulism, aud walking down even into the kitchen of a house that was not her own. Thc Baron's conduct in all respects but that of the watchiug shadow—was precisely that which, from a sensible and affeetionate hushaud, might most naturally have been expected. Nor is it very difficult, even setting asidc all idea of malice, to set down the shadow portion of the story to a mere freak of imagination on the part of the young man who, though "not drunk," was nevertheless on his own admissiou, "perhaps a little excited," and who had been "drinking a good deal of beer and shandy-gaff." But the evidence does not end here.

By one of those extraordinary coincidences by which the simple course of ordinary events so often baffles the best laid schemes of crime, there were others in the house, besides the young man Aldridge, who witnessed the movements of the Baron and Mme. R. It so happened that, on the afternoon of that particular day, the woman of the housc had hampered the little latch-lock by which young Aldridge usually admitted himself, and, as this occurred late in the day, it is more than probable that the Baron was uaware of it, as also of thc fact that, in consequence, the servant-girl, Susan Turner, sat up beyond the usual hour of going to bed for the purpose of letting the young man in. This girl, it seems, had a lover—a stoker on one of the northern lines—and him she appears to have invited to keep her company on her watch. Aldridge returned and went up to bed, but the lover—who was to he on duty with his engine at two o'clock, and who was doubtlessly interrupted in a most interesting couversation by the arrival of the lodger—still remained in the kitchen, and was only just leaving it when Mmc. R. came down stairs. Taking her at first to he the mistress of the house, and fearful lest the strect-lamp gleaming through the glass partition should betray her "young man's" presence, Susan Turner draws him to the lumber-room, the window of which, it appears, looks into a sort of well between the housc and the two rooms built out at the back, after a fashion not unusual in London houses. Into this well, also, immediately opposite to the window of the lumber-room, looks that of the backroom or laboratory, furnished with what the witness describes as a "tin looking-glass," but which is really one of those metal reflectors, in common use, for increasing the light of rooms in such a position. The distance between the two windows is little more than eight feet. The night was clear, with a bright, full harvest moon, and its rays, thrown by the reflcctor into the laboratory, made every part of its interior distinctly visible from the lumher-room. The door of the latter room was open, and the staircase illuminated by the Baron's approaching light. The hiders in the lumher-room could see distinctly the whole proceedings of both Baron and Mme. R., from the time Aldridge lost sight of them to the moment they again emerged into his view.

And this is what they saw:

"Madame R. never went into the kitchen at all;" "she went straight into the laboratory," and "the Baron watched her as she came out."

A glance at the place shows the bearing of this evidence aud the impossibility of the Baron (who, if he had not been in the kitchen, must at least have thoroughly known the position of his owu laboratory) having made any mistake on this point.

What, then, was his motive in thus imposing upon Aldridge, to whose interference he professed himself so much indebted, with this false statemont of the place to which Mme. R. had been?

There does not seem the slightest reason for discrediting the evidence of these two witnesses. Their story is perfectly simple and coherent. There is neither malice against the Baron nor collusion with Aldridge, in whose case such malice is supposed to exist. The only weak point in their position is the fact, that they were both doing wrong in being in that place at that time; but the admission of this, in truth, rather strengthens than injures the testimony which involves it. We must seek the clue, then, not in their motives, but in those of the Baron. The errand of Mme. R., in her strange expedition, may perhaps afford it. What did she do in the laboratory?

"She drank something from a bottle." "It smelt and tasted like sherry." "It was marked VIN. ANT. POT. TART." That label designates antimonial wine, which is a mixture of sherry and tartar emetic.

Let us see if from this point we can feel our way, as it were, backwards, to the motive for concealment. The life of Mme. R. was, as we know, heavily insured. It had already beeu seriously endangered by the effects of precisely the same drug as that she was now seen to take. If the Baron knew or suspected the motivo of her visit, here is at once a motive sufficient, if not perhaps very creditable, for the eoucealment of a fact, the knowledge of which might very probably lead to difficulty with respect to payment of the policy in case of death.

But here another difficulty meets us. The incident in question occurred at about the middle of the long illness of Mme. R. That illness consisted of a series of attacks, occurring as nearly as possible at intervals of a fortnight, and exhibiting the exact symptoms of the poison here shown to have been takeu. One of these attaeks followed within a very few hours of the occurrence into which we are examining. Was it the only one of the kind?

The evidence of the night-nurse bears with terrible weight upon this point. Her orders are strict, on no account to close her eyes. Her hours of watch are short, and the repose of the entire day leaves her without the slightest cause for unusual drowsiness. The testimonials of twenty years bear unvarying witness to her care and trustworthiuess. Yet every alteruate Saturday for eight or ten, or it may even have heen nearly twelve weeks, at one regular hour she falls asleep. It is in vain that she watches and fights against it—iu vaiu even that, suspecting "some trick," she on one occasion abstains entirely from food, and drinks nothing but that peculiarly wakeful decoction, stroug green tea. Ou every other night she keeps awake with ease, hut surely as the fatal Saturday comes round she again succumbs, and surely as sleep steals over her is it followed by a fresh attack of the symptoms we so plainly recognize. She caunot in any way account for such an extraordinary fatality. She is positive that such a thing never happened to her before. We also are at an equal loss. We can but pause upon the reflection that twice before the periodic drowsiness began, a similarly irresistible sleep had been induced by the so-called mesmeric powers of the Baron himself. And then we pass naturally to her who had been for years hahituated to such control, and we cannot hut call to mind the statement of Mr. Hands: "I have often willed her (S. Parsons) to go into a dark room and pick up a pin, or some article equally minute."

And then we again remember the watching shadow on the wall.

And yet, after all, at what have we arrived? Grant that the Baron knew the nature of his wife's errand in the laboratory; that the singular power—call it what we will—by which he had before in jest compelled the nurse to sleep, was really employed in enabling the somnambulist to elude her watch. Grant even that the pretensions of the mesmerist are true, and that it was in ohedience to his direct will that Mme. R. acted as she did, we are no nearer a solution than before.

It was not the Baron's interest that his wife should die.

We must then seek further afield for any explanation of this terrible enigma. Let us see how it fared with Mrs. Anderton while these events were passing at her sister's house.

And here we seem to have another instance of the manner in which the wisest precautions so often turn against those by whom they are taken. Admitting the illness of Mme.
III. R. was really caused by criminal means, nothing could and be wiser than the precaution which selected for their
V. first essay a night on which they could be tried without fear of observation. Yet this very circumstauce euables us to fix a date of the last importance, which, without it, must have remained uncertain. Mme. R., then, was taken ill on Saturday, the 5th April. On that very night—at, as nearly as can be ascertained, thc very same hour, Mrs. Andertou was unaccountably seized with an illness in all respects resembling hers. Like hers, too, the attacks returned at fortnightly intervals. For a few days, on the Baron's advice, a particular medicine is given, and at first with apparently good effect. At the same date the diary of Dr. Marsden shows a similar amelioration of symptoms in the case of Mme. R. In both cases the amendment is but short, and the disease again pursues its course. The result in both is utter exhaustion. Iu the case of Mme. R. reducing the sufferer to death's door; in the weaker constitution of her sister terminating in death. Examination is made. The appearances of the hody, no less than the symptoms exhibited in life, aro all those of antimonial poisoning. No antimony is, however, found; aud from this and other circumstances, results a verdict of "Natural Death." On the 12th of October, then, Mrs. Anderton's story ends.

From that time dates the recovery of Mme. R.

The first life is now removed from between Baron R. and the full sum of £50,000. Let us examine briefly the circumstances attending the lapse of the second. Here again events each in itself quite simple and natural, combine to form a story fraught with terrible suspicion. I have alluded to the inquest which followed on the death of Mrs. An- VI.
derton. That inquiry originated in circumstances which cast upon her husbaud the entire suspicion of her murder. To whose agency, whether direct or indirect, voluntary o involuntary, is an after question, may every one of these circumstances be traced? Mr. Anderton insists on heing the only one from whom the patient shall receive either medicine or food. It is the Baron who applauds aud encourages a line of conduct diametrically opposed to his own, and tending more than any other circumstance to fix suspicion on his friend. A remedy is suggested, the recommending of which points strongly to the idea of poison, and it is from the Baron that the suggestion comes. Two papers are found, the one hearing iu part the other in full, the name of the poison suspected to have been used. The first of these is brought to light by the Baron himself—the second is found in a place where he has just been, and by a person whom he has himself despatched to search there for something else. He draws continual attention to that point of exclusive attendance from which suspicion chiefly springs. His replies to Dr. Dodsworth respecting the recommendation of the antimonial autidote are so given as to confirm the worst interpretation to which it had given rise, and even when, on the discovery of the second paper, he advises the nurse that it should be destroyed, he does so iu a manner that insures not only its preservation but its immediate employment in the manuer most dangerous to his friend.

The evidence fails. What is the Baron's connection with the catastrophe that follows? He knows well the accused man's nervous anxiety for his own good name. He procures on the ground of his friendly anxiety, the earliest intelligeuce of his friend's prohable acquittal. He euters that friend's room to acquaint him with the good news. Returning he takes measures to secure the prisoner throughout the night from interruption or iuterference. Iu the morning Mr. Anderton is a corpse, and on his pillow is fouud the phial in which the poison had heen contained, and a written statement that the desperate step had heen taken in despair of an acquittal. By what marvellous accident was the hopeful news of the chemical investigation thus misinterpreted? By what negligence or connivance was the fatal drug placed within his reach? One thing we know:

It was the Baron who conveyed the news. It was from his pocket medicine case, left within the sick man's reach, that the poison came.

Thus fell the second of the two lives which stood between the Baron and the full sum of £50,000. Of this sum the £25,000 which accrues from the relationship betweeu Mrs. Anderton and Mme. R. is already his as soon as claimed, but there is no immediate necessity for the claim to he preferred. He may perhaps have thought it better to wait hefore making such a claim until the first sensation occasioned hy the double deaths through which he inherited had passed away. He may have been putting in train some plausible story to account for his only now proclaiming a fact which he must have known for at least a year. Whatever his reason, however, he certainly for some weeks after Mr. Anderton's death made no movement to establish his claim upon the property, and during this time Mme. R. was slowly but surely recovering her strength.

But while wisdom thus dictated a policy of delay, the irresistible course of events hurried on the crisis. A letter comes filled with threats of the vengeance of jealous love if its cause be not that night removed. It is but a frag- VII.
ment of that letter that is preserved, hut its meaning is clear enough, and it is that under threat of revelation of some capital crime, the connection hetween himself and Mme. R. should be finally hrought to an end.

"N'en sais tu bien le moyen?"

That night the condition is fulfilled. Once more the sleeping lady takes her midnight journey to her husband's laboratory. Once more her unconscious hand pours out the deadly draught. But this time it is no slow poisou that she takes. It is a powerful and burning acid that even as it awakes her from her tranee, shrivels her with a horrible and instant death. One shrill and quickly stifled shriek alarms the iumates of the house, and when they hurry to the spot they find only a disfigured corpse, lying with bare feet and disordered night dress in the darkness of the stormy November night, with the fatal glass still clasped in its hand.

My task is done. In possession of the evidence thus placed before you, your judgment of its result will he as good as mine. Link hy link you have now heen put in possession of the chain. Is that chain one of purely accidental coincidences, or does it point with terrible certainty to a series of crimes, in their nature and execution almost too horrible to contemplate? That is the first question to be asked, and it is one to which I feel myself unable to reply. The second is more strange and perhaps even more difficult still. Supposing the latter to be the case, are crimes thus committed susceptible of proof, or even if proved, are they of a kind for which the criminal can he brought to punishment?

THE HUMAN EYE.—The language of the eye is very hard to counterfeit. You can read in the eyes of your companion, while you talk, whether your argument hits him, though his tongue will not confess it. There is a look by which a man shows that he is going to say a good thing, and a look when he has said it. Vain and forgotten are all the fine offices of hospitality, if there he no holiday in the eye. How many future invitations are avowed hy thc eye, though dissembled by the lips! A man comes away from a company; he has heard no important remark; but, if, in sympathy with the society, he is cognizant of such a stream of life as has been flowing to him through the eyes. There are eyes which give no more admission into them than blackberries; others arc liquid and deep wells that meu might fall into; and others are oppressive and devouring, and take too much notice. Thcre are asking eyes, and asserting eyes, and prowling eyes, and eyes full of faith—some of good and some of sinister omen.—Emerson.

MONTHLY MEMS, BY A CABBY.—September—Town gets flat, and you must look sharp. Gents and 'osses ankers after waterin' places. If pulled up ahout distance, swear through thick and thin, but avoid pedometers. "Measures, not men," doesn't suit Cabhies. Drains is werry wholesome, and if neglected, is apt to hring on fevers and colera. Avoid unripe fruit, especially 'winkles.

NOTICE

The publication of "The Californian" takes place on Saturday mornings, and copies may be obtained in the City at all News-stands, and of our News-agents through the country. It will also be served by carriers on the morning of publicotion.

* Correspondents will address all communications, business and otherwise, to "The Californian," office, No. 728 Montgomery street, San Francisco.*

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 10, 1864.

In the change of a name at the head of this paper, and of a personal influence in its columns, the undersigned trusts will hereafter be found the only essential alteration in that general character and desigu which have made it acceptable to its readers. F. B. Harte.

OUR OPPONENTS

UNDERRATING an adversary undoubtedly facilitates one's preparations for battle, but does not always ensure a termination that shall be pleasant to one's-self. The loyal press have, with but few exceptions, underestimated the importance of the uomination of Geo. B. McClellan by the Chicago Convention. Looking upon him merely as the nominee of a party whose platform is utterly obnoxious to the Union-loving majority—viewing him altogether as an abstract principle, to be defeated and overcome by another abstract principle, they have counted on an easy victory. Even those who are willing to admit the ambiguity of his position—who contrast his West Point war speech with the peace platform of the party that nominated him—refuse to make any but a favorable prognosis of its effect upon the campaign. War Democrats, they argue, will avoid him because of his party; Peace Democrats because of his principles. The effect of a simple transposition of these propositions is a logical sequence that never seems to have entered their minds.

If the campaign could be confined to a contest of principles, there would be little doubt of the result. But the popularity of men enters strongly into our struggle; principles which are in themselves unchangeable are absorbed by leaders who are changeable and inconstant. We, who have been fighting these three years for a principle, find ourselves no longer "Radical," "Abolitionist," or "Union," but simply "Lincoln men," and it behooves us to take the popularity of an opponent into some account. That he is popular cannot be doubted. He has a grievance. The odor of persecution, whether real or assumed, clings to his garments. This offers an irresistible charm to many honest people who would never allow themselves to be attracted by recognized and exalted merit. What justice could be so poetic as the succession of the much-abused servant to the master's chair, and what idea would occur sooner to the well-regulated American mind than the making of a poor President out of a good General? In the great cities he is an especial favorite. His reticence after his disgrace—so different from the national aptitude for "Explanation" and "Defense"—whether the result of incompetency or not, endeared him to a respectable class who had grown suspicious and wearied of advertising egotism. His West Point education, his fondness for review and military pageantry and his European experience, made him popular with those aristocratic loyalists, who love their country rather for its symbols and traditions than its faith and principles, and who hate rebellion because it implies anarchy. He has a larger class of worshippers in these timid, vacillating souls, who, though professing loyalty to the government, would not like to commit themselves to any party. Such are the adherents of the leader of the West Point-Chicago faction. Let us soundly consider if we can afford to despise a champion who is able to enlist in his favor so many of the prejudices and weaknesses of our people. But we need not fear him, nor abate one iota of our efforts to return our present honest Executive to the Presidential chair.

The Christian Commission Fair.—The Fair of the Christian Commission closed last evening with an auction of the various articles remaining unsold and donated by individuals. Good prices were realized, and the ladies, to whose untiring energy and labor the Christian Commission is so much indebted, have every reason to congratulate themselves on the perfect success of their project, which from the first has been a labor of love, and in the face of obstacles and other attractions, calculated to discourage them. But they persevered, and the crowds that have filled the Hall, and the dollars that have gone into the big purse of the Treasurer, are substantial proofs of the success of so praiseworthy an undertaking. And in the record of good deeds, the names of these good women will appear, written in letters of love, and verily they shall be rewarded. A Samaritan is a loveable object under any circumstances, but when done up in crinoline is perfectly irresistible. Such were they of the Christian Commission Fair.

No Draft!—In consequence of the rapidity with which the old regiments are filling up, and the great number of enlistments daily, there will be no necessity for resorting to a draft in this State. We have positive official information that no draft will be ordered.

A MISTAKE CORRECTED.

WHAT an error it was which that man made who first proclaimed that human life was a matter of importance to all the people. If that ever was true, we have come, by great familiarity with the subject, to treat it as of little consequence as the most commonplace event. But when we regard with what tenacity each individual still selfishly clings to that peculiar life which belongs to him, we believe it could have been only through a series of singularly petrifying events that we must have lost the sympathies that make us feel for others' pains. It is scarcely out of memory now that men pleaded a principle as an excuse for ridding the community of certain lives, as if they had gradually taught themselves to believe that some great truths must live, even though the truth only found the roots of its existence nourished in the graves of worthy men. It is, perhaps, an easy transition from the belief that principles are better than human lives, to the comfortable consciousness that petty interests, rivalries and whims, though possibly several degrees below principles on the moral scale, are of such estimation that men's lives are not a groat's worth in comparison.

It is quite plain that we who sail on the Sacramento are much more progressive in thought than they who fight by the James, for they have only revealed the poor fact that human life, though sacred once, is now only second to an eternal principle. We can place principles second, and our own whims far ahead, and know that a fleet vessel brings praises that tickle our personal vanity. We seize Time by the forelock and coax half an hour's advance out of him by an offering of a little extra steam, while our slower-footed rival must succumb to the poor defects of a weaker idea of humanity, or poorer machinery. The chances prove always in our favor for longer or shorter time, till Destiny, who is quite apt to hide behind the corner where we cannot see her, sends us stumbling across the Valley of Shadows into the Great Presence that we were not thinking about.

It is only a little while ago that we had quietly resolved the problem of individual murder as a mathematical certainty; but now the genius of our people displays a still greater progress, and we shall soon get quietly into the belief that wholesale slaughter—though possibly a little exciting to people of unquiet nerves—is only a refinement, by multiplication, of the individual murder, and an easy way of decimating the community of superfluous humanity. Our legislators, in their wisdom, are too shrewd to be caught so far napping as to put a check upon the satisfaction of man's jealousies, or put a halter around the necks of those who commit the meagre indiscretion—if it be even that—of murdering a hundred or so, in utter disregard of everything but their own individual wishes.

It is very pleasant to have progressed as a people to such a height or depth of philosophy. The Epicureans thought very kindly of their lives and bodies, and perhaps were oversensitive as to their physical nourishment. The Stoics poohpoohed at the Epicureans, and ate shingles and hard-tack with the easy digestion of cast-iron stomachs. The ages that have followed them have been wavering up and down between the two beliefs without developing a creed better than either, till we of the present climate, age and country have eschewed both, and step out as the champions of the worthlessness of humanity as a people, though perhaps our own selfish instincts may persuade us to use and guard carefully those individual bodies for whose benefit we become subordinate to tailors and cobblers. The trifling slaughter that happened last Monday night, that thrilled us each with horror and heart-sickness—that caused broken-hearted widows and made husbands wifeless—will be soon forgotten, and we will begin again a reckless, murderous race for gain and fame, till the Providence that spared us once shall wrathfully strike us down, who, if not speaking, are every day acting out the brazen lie against humanity, conscience and God!

How and When it is Done.—The following extract is taken from a small pamhlet, tentiled "A brief statement of the Sanitary Commission's work." It is not necessary to reiterate the story of the Commission here, nor to define their claims upon those people who share the result of the soldier's sublime devotion without experiencing one pang of his heroic sacrifice:

When the army moves it seeks victory. It can think of nothing else. Victory is its first duty; food for the men and powder for the guns, its first want. The surgeon's stores may or may not be sent on. Food and powder must go first. Victory is the first duty. The movement of the battle may leave surgeons and stores twenty miles away, while every team is busy pouring forward ammunition and food.

Here is where the Sanitary Commission comes in. It has teams ready for this very emergency. It waits nobody's motion. When the army moves, it follows. When the battle begins, the Commision is on the spot. Its tents are spread; its red flag is hoisted; barrels of lemonade, milk-punch, tea, and coffee are made ready; ice is there to cool the feverish thirst of the wounded; splints, sponges, bandages, lint, are on hand. Midst the whistling of bullets, the fallen heroes are gathered in. The huge tents are soon filled with the patient, grateful sufferers; and thus, in the very shadow of the battle-cloud, the work of mercy goes on.

The Pavilion.—The Fair of the Mechanics' Institute at the Pavilion is a great success, and has been thronged by thousands during the few days it has been opened to the public; it bids fair to continue to be a great attraction for the coming week. In our next we shall give an extended review of the Fair and its striking features.

MINING ASSESSMENTS.

TO say "assessment" is to touch almost any man on the "raw," and the entire community may be said to know the "smart" of this blister which draws out their life and substance. Just now the public are suffering under mental depression, caused by depression of stocks; for, say what you will, no man can feel real jolly, and laugh a good loud sincere laugh, when poverty and want stare him in the face, nor can he shout very loud even when somewhat removed from that state but still feeling that, if the sharp-eyed clerks at the Bank of California look askance at him as he enters the doors, it is because his account is so small that the weakest boy in the Bank can carry it forward without fatigue; and it all comes of depression in stocks. The time was when stocks were money. That time has passed for the present, and the "Woolly Horse" and "Bob-tailed Pony" will no longer "spout" for even a night's lodging or a "smile" at Jones' or John Harris' sample rooms. A fictitious value has been placed, undoubtedly, on all stocks, and they have been too high; but now they are too low—that is, some of them; others never ought to rise, because they never had any value at the beginning—but there are still a great many good mines that must lay "perdu" until money is easier and stockholders can better afford to pay assessments than at present. This system of going on to levy assessments regularly every month is ruinous to stockholders and the credit of the mine. Very few men can afford to pay assessments, so hard are the times now; and yet the merciless slaughter goes on, and stock that was purchased at high prices on the enthusiastic opinions and recommendations of trustees and particular friends interested, is assessed, advertised and sold at auction every day, for fifty cents or a dollar a foot.

We don't say that the "freeze-out" game is systematically played, but there are instances that look wonderfully like it. Is it not better to stop expenditures, and let unproductive mines rest easy at present? It is of more consequence to the individual stockholder to hold on to his interest until he can afford to contribute to the development of the mine than it is to minister to the general prosperity of the country by impoverishing himself in paying assessments. Finally, after paying month after month, he invokes blessings on the heads of trustees, secretaries and all concerned, and lets his stock go. The consequence is, he becomes disgusted with mines and mining stocks, and swears audibly whenever the subject is mentioned. The best thing to do is to do nothing until times are better, and "go slow" for the present. Don't crowd people who have all they can do to keep their heads above the dust (there being no water.) Don't assess them to death, and exasperate poor stockholders until they are ready to smash the bones of any secretary who appears before them with his tax book in his hand. It will be all the better for every one concerned to to stop levying these Irish dividends; reduce expenses, and let the mine and the stockholders rest until better times. A good mine will keep—we know it is all there, safe; and, if poor, this is no time to spend money to ascertain that pleasant piece of information.

There is talk in France of reviving a batch of extinct dukedoms. Gen. Goyon is to be Duke de Feltre; Count Corovonnel, Duke de Laral; Viscount Digeon, Duke de Sauly Tavaunes; Count de Morny, Duke of Dalmatia; Count Brissae, Duke de la Moltre-Hondencourt; M. de Gosstout, Duke de Lauzum. [There is also some talk about making an old political friend of ours a something of this sort. His title will be "Duc del Punta de Limo, or Knight of Go-in." Semmes is to be made Marquis of Cur-sa(r)ge brush. His crest will be a Hound in full flight one side, and a Frog and a Bull on the other, with the motto, "Aut (to) Cæsar, (sieze-her,) aut nil fit."]

Grand Ratification Meeting.—The State Central Committee have given notice of a grand Ratification Meeting and Union Rally, to be held on the 13th inst., in which a number of distinguished speakers will participate. The place of meeting will be designated hereafter. Let there be a full attendance, and an interest displayed commensurate with the importance of the call and the coming struggle.

The officer in command of the expedition to explore the country between Salt Lake City and the Colorado river, at a point supposed to be the head of navigation, reports that the intervening country gives excellent mineral indications, and that a good wagon-road can be made between the points above stated, at a very small expense.

Epaulets have gone quite out of use in military circles, their places being supplied by the less ostentatious shoulder-strap. Before the war nearly every militia company, privates and all, was supplied with all these gaudy ornaments, and no military organization was supposed to be completely equipped without them. The only use to which they are put is to figure in pictures on the shoulder of generals, and in some highly colored representations of battles, it is not unusual to see the commanding Federal general superbly mounted, and his shoulders loaded with these ornaments. One of these pictures is now exhibited in the window of a print-shop in this city, purporting to be a representation of the battle of Shiloh. In this print General Grant, with drawn sabre, bedecked with huge yellow epaulets, mounted on a furious war-horse, is charging at the head of his troops, in the very teeth of the whole rebel army. The undemonstrative Lieut.-General would smile to find himself thus caricatured, and put on paper in a position that, if occupied upon the field, would insure him a removal from the head of the army to the walls of a State lunatic asylum.—Boston Transcript.

THE POTOMAC.

AH, mourn, thou wild Potomac!
Flash high thy shouldering ranks;
A Nation's tears run down with theo,
And brim thy rocky banks:
The pride of all our homes is strewed
In wreck along thy shore;
Our loveliest and best go down,
But they come back no more.

Ah, rave, thou wild Potomac!
Thy fierce and sullen flow
Is like the nation's mighty rage
With its undertone of woe;
The gleam along thy white-lipped crags,
The brawl along thy shore—
But, ah! our loved ones walk by theo,
And they come back no more.

Ah, mourn, thou wild Potomac!
Yet mingle with thy moan
The Triumph song of Liberty
Where legions still march on!
The hopes of future years resound
Along thy glorious shore,
But, ah! our loved ones, where are they?
They come to us no more.

Oh, war-polluted river,
As shudderingly ye flee,
Deal gently with the martyr dust
Ye hurry to the sea!
The fevered sod your cold lips kiss
Grows greener than before,
But, ah! our loved ones sleep by thee—
They come to us no more!

H. C. B.

OUR CLUB.

NUMBER ONE.—INTRODUCTORY.

IT is a very significant fact, and one which the members of the club want all their friends and admirers to remember, that years ago, in old England, where the language we speak and write was much used and improved upon, there were associations of talkative wise men, who sipped tea, and talked wise gossip together, and called themselves The Club. In the wise and frivolous reign of the great Queen Bess, when the good Queen Anne held sway, these wielders of learned English chatted and ate together, and made all people who read about their agreeable assemblies envy the centuries that went away without bringing them forth to enjoy such incomparable wisdom, instead of leaving Fate to have her own way, and usher them into the light in these very busy, but, may be, very monotonous and unwise days. How Ben Jonson used to sit and pat Will Shakspeare on the back in a very patronizing way, and then quietly say to his friends that the sheep-stealer was a writer of some little merit, while he chuckled to himself that, though he be ever so wise, none could quite equal the felicitous wit of the great "rare Ben!" It were a wonder, too, if Sir Walter Raleigh didn't say occasionally a wise thing, though half the time one wonders if he didn't sit planning over some other great, gallant feat, which every one would take off their hats to and acknowledge it were more than worthy the man who could bravely soil his best garment that the wise Queen's slippers might be unstained. Rare times were they at the "Mermaid," and rare when gruff Sam. Johnson would snub the vain Goldy, or when Garrick laughed in his sleeve at the incomparable impudence of Dr. Sam himself, or when Goldsmith, if not always wise without his manuscript, would remember the vulnerability of the whole circle, and seize the admiration point of all in his genial "Retaliation."

While we remember kindly—history aiding us—those long-gone-by days of wonderful wit and wisdom, the Professor and his friend the editor have called us all together and painted the possibility of a like age for us if we would only live it. It is a short story to tell, but I shall not tell it: how we came together without line and rule, and now sit, (as the almanac rotates the Thursday evenings around to us,) and talk in our wise way of more than the poor world's-people could dare to comprehend. The unfledged attorney of the circle has even dared to whisper that it may be we are only crudities ourselves who try to comprehend and solve the mysteries of chaos. But we really say very wise things and laugh immeasurably at such witticisms as the learned Professor utters. His wit rolls down upon us like a new April shower upon the parched cattle, and we look up after it, like the flowers that have caught new life and are awaiting the sunshine to renew them in strength. Our sunshine sits there looking wise indeed, as indeed he is, whom we address as "the Doctor," and who looks out from the calm depths of his maturity and says such wise things to us as make us sober and reflective. Over there across the table is our nervous and energetic disciple, always active with his fingers while he waits for the immature thought to be formed, and then he tosses it out in his genial, clever way that makes us, (who claim less genius, but a share of wise stupidity,) smile patronizingly and declare there is promise there, where there is youthful verdure, and that those little buds of truth will by-and-by develop great glowing flowers of truth and beauty. There is a true philosopher among us who makes the immaturity of Our Club wonder where he keeps all that wisdom, and if some day we shall not find that the old theory of Pisistratus is so marvellously true, that a great Plato or Socrates has been waiting behind the fence for Time's caravan to move along, and has finally taken his place again with a new christening. The sage that has written volumes and can talk folios, has such claim upon our admiration, that doubting if we can write anything but interrogation-points after his propositions, in the place of argument, we listen for his coming footsteps and hide his volumes ere he enters. Some time, if you will wait, we will invite you to sit close to our table and hear what we say. We may paint more openly the pictures of the talkers, if you will promise not to look when you meet them as if you knew all about them, and carelessly twit them upon some temporary weakness of theirs. We are most of us terribly mortal, but try as we can to shift about among the vices and not wear too long the uniform of any special woe. So say we all of us, and saying, ask you to wait till we may speak again, promising always, however, to tell nó tales.

THERSITES.

BORES.—No. II.

THE story-telling Bore flourishes in all communities with considerable vigor, and he is one of the most dreary and hopeless of the whole species. He is the modern "old man of the sea." He singles you out for attack, fixes on you like a leech, and frequently succeeds in making you his exclusive property for the evening, in which case he exercises his power in the most tyrannical manner, scrupling not to do as he pleases with his own. A bold effort in the onset may sometimes disconcert and shake off the enemy. Thus a friend of ours, sauntering along Montgomery street the other afternoon, was attacked by a story-telling Bore, who hooked on, as these animals have a habit of doing, to his button-hole.

"Anything going on?" drawled the Bore—an insidious leading up to one of his own narrations—"Anything going on?"

"Yes," retorted the victim, "I am."

And bursting off, he darted amid a crowd of double teams and street cars to the opposite sidewalk. He risked his life, but he evaded the Bore.

The peculiarity of the stories enunciated by this species of Bore is, that they never have any end to speak of; that they are hooked together by the most bewildering stitches of "says I's," and "says he's," linking all manner of parenthetical impertinences; that they seldom relate to any subject other than the personal grievances of the narrator, and that the only notice required to be taken of them by the unhappy listener, is the utterance of a connected series of "oh's," "oh yes's," "exactly's," and "you don't say so's."

Bores, too—immeasurable Bores—are literary men when they insist on reading manuscript to their friends. On these occasions their pertinacity, their awful determination to bring about a first reading—perhaps the first and best ever to be obtained by the work—is something incredible. Johnson must have suffered deeply from this species of Bore, when, on observing what a showman would call "a literary man of the period" slowly and insidiously producing a manuscript, the lexicographer jumped up, and, with a shout which sent Boswell quaking into a corner, roared: "At your peril, sir! At your peril!"

We know one illustrative story. It is worth a wilderness of description:

A man was dying. He had a friend—an author. The friend came to him. To comfort him? No! to read manuscript. He produced a packet, and drew his chair to the bedside of the dying man. "Only a few chapters," he said insinuatingly. "But, my dear friend," urged the faint voice of the departing one, "the doctor says I've only half an hour to live." What was the reply? "Yes, yes, I know all that; but this will only take you twenty minutes.

An undoubted Bore is the man who talks "shop." Stock-exchange men, we regret to say, are much given to this unsociable practice. We dined the other day with a party of five, and not a word was spoken but about Gould & Curry, El Dorado, Wide West, "bulling" the market, "selling short,' dividends, assessments, and Savage vs. North Potosi. But we will not pursue the roll of Boredom farther. They are endless. Why, at this moment we are persecuted by Bores. A well-meaning but dismally-minded friend is informing us that we never looked halt so ill in all our life, and that we ought, seriously, to "do something—give up work and run up to Napa Springs and indulge in swimming baths for a week or two." A messenger, who has brought a note and is waiting for an answer, is creaking up and down the room, grinding away for dear life at a quill tooth-pick. An idle scamp of a friend has just dropped in to have a gossip, and won't take a hint to drop out. The lady down-stairs who is learning the piano is thumping away at the gamut, like a man running up and down a musical flight of stairs. The secretary of the "Dead Broke" has just stepped in to remind us that our stock will be sold at 11 o'clock for delinquent assessments if not previously redeemed, (it is now 10:30,) while the young man who is imbibing instruction on the cornet, on the first floor from the roof, has just commenced "When this cruel war," with a break-down at every third note. Can we write farther of Bores? You might as well expect a man stretched on the rack to pen a complacent treatise on the theory and practice of torturing. But we will be resigned. Bores were, are, and will be.

"TAKING them one with another," said the Rev. Sydney Smith, "I believe my congregation to be the most exemplary observers of the religious observances; for the poor keep all the fasts and the rich all the feasts.

MUSICAL AND DRAMATIC.

WEDNESDAY night was set apart at the Academy of Music for the benefit of Mr. Hill, the tenor—the beneficiary appearing as "Pollione" in Norma. Mr. Hill is a pains-taking and earnest artist, and has exhibited much industry and talent in contending with, and often triumphing over the light qualities of his voice. He has grown much in public estimation since his first appearance here, and has manifestly improved in his acting. On Thursday evening La Sonnambula was brought out for the first time by this company—Miss Richings in the role of "Amina." In spite of the recollections that are apt to haunt the opera-goer in connection with this renowned opera—the somnambulic shades of Grisi, Sontag and Alboni that flit before his fancy—our fair English soprano did not suffer from the contrast. Purity of voice, delicacy of execution and intelligent conception of the character were there, and once or twice in the rendition of a popular aria, she exceeded any of her former efforts. Mr. Seguin as the Count was exceedingly good. His singing of "As I view these scenes so charming," was decidedly his best effort in California. The usual undress military uniform of the character set off his figure finely, and with his martial-Gallic physiognomy, gave him a wondrous resemblance to the handsome "Zephir" of the Parisian photograph. On Thursday evening, instead of the first installment of the Italian Opera season, owing to the illness of Signora Bianchi, there was an indefinite postponement, and Linda di Chamounix was substituted. This opera gives much more scope for the contralto's powers than many of those in which she has lately appeared. She is a charming "Pierotto" to both eye and ear. We might add that Miss Kempton's dress was much more consistent with her character than in the first representation; and if the extempore hurdy-gurdy which supplanted her former guitar was a somewhat improbable-looking instrument, it offended the taste of the rigid critic the less. The "Marquis de Bois Fleury" of Mr. Richings—one of his best characters—was capitally played. While there are many actors who play old men well, there are few skilful delineators of old gentlemen. To show this distinction is Mr. Richings' speciality, and in acting he draws naturally on a fund of native good breeding and experience of society. He is one of the few actors who can enter or leave a room in a thoroughbred way—an exceedingly difficult thing to do and not overdo, and something impossible to be done unless one's experience extends beyond the footlights and the leader's baton, the pasteboard canvas and mock heroic. "Linda" is high; however, Miss Richings did not let the audience—not a very large one, by the way—observe how difficult must have been the role. Her acting in the dramatic episodes of the opera was natural and striking. Mr. Hill ("Carlo") sang with an uneven voice, but at times very sweetly and justly. The choruses were fair. The Postillon du Lonjumeau was given on Friday night. This evening the popular Doctor of Alcantara will be performed for the benefit of Mr. Edward Seguin, who will sustain the role of "Doctor Paracelsus," in which quasi-buffo character he is inimitably good. An accomplished gentleman and thorough musician, a pupil of the Paris Conservatoire, an excellent linguist, and the representative of a well-known musical family, we bespeak for this gentleman that success to-night which is due his merits as an artist and his position as a stranger. The bills underline Fra Diavolo for Sunday night, and Maritana (first time) for Monday. Further than this we cannot forecast the performances of next week. The illness of Signora Bianchi has apparently interfered with, if not stopped, the projected season of Italian opera at this time.

The editorial change in this paper during the week has prevented our giving a theatrical record with that completeness of detail and conscientious attention which has hitherto obtained in its columns, and which the present directors are desirous of carefully preserving as a distinctive feature of THE CALIFORNIAN. We may say, en passant, that at Maguire's Opera House the horse has given way to the spectacular pieces, and that the drama that formerly "held the mirror up to Nature" gives us a French Spy glass of Fashion and a mould of form. Popular opinion leans to Mrs. Perry and broadsword exercises, however. The Metropolitan has been returning gradually to the legitimate drama and the paths of rectitude, from which it was once borne reluctant and shrieking on Mazeppa's steed. On Friday night Boucicault's really clever Jessie Brown was given, with Fanny Morgan Phelps in the character of the Scotch heroine, which the dramatist's wife, Agnes Robertson, used to make so thrilling. A matinée for ladies and children is to be given this afternoon. At Maguire's, the French Spy in the afternoon, and, in the evening, Margaret Catchpole, who seems to be the female of the Dick Turpin species.

The Circus is crowded nightly, as usual, and never has it been better worth a visit. Everybody goes. Some of the best people of the city were there, and there is no reason why they should not go, for nothing is permitted that could grate harshly upon the feelings of the most fastidious. There is always something about a circus that is fascinating to old and young; and, as we said before, "everybody goes."

The Hon. William Birch and friends have returned to the city. Mr. Birch is sometimes addressed by his intimate friends as William, and when they take liberties, they say Billy. We are pleased to see that the troupe are all in their usual good looks and condition. William himself may have lost half an ounce or so, but it does not detract from his youth and beauty. We shall all miss poor Wells; and it makes us sad to think we shall see him in the old familiar place no more. It has not transpired whether the company visited San Andreas this trip or not. It is a very fine place. But they have our heartiest welcome back.

THE BABY.

ALONE! She threw her bonnet off,
Then sighing, as 'twere sighing the last time,
Approached the bed and threw a shawl away;
You could not peel a fruit you fear to bruise
More calmly or more certainly than so—
Nor would you find witbin a rosier flushed Pomegranate.
There be lay, upon bis back,
The yearling creature, warm and moist witb life
To the bottom of his dimples—to the ends
Of the lovely tumbled curls about his face;
For since he had been covered over-much
To keep him from the light glare, both his cheeks
Were hot and scarlet as the first live rose
The shepherd's heart-blood ebbed away into,
The faster for his love. And love was here
As instant! in the pretty baby mouth,
Shut close, as if for dreaming that it sucked:
The little naked feet drawn up tbe way
Of nestled birdlings; everything so soft
And tender—to tbe little hold-fast hands,
Which, closing on the finger into sleep,
Hath kept the mould of 't,
While we stood there dumb—
For oh, that it should take such innocence
To prove just guilt. I thought and stood there dumb;
The light upon his eyelids pricked them wide,
And staring out at us with all their blue,
As half perplexed between the angelhood
He had been away to visit in his sleep
And our most mortal presence; gradually
He saw his mother's face, accepting it
In change for heaven itself, with snch a smile
As might have well been learned tbere, never moved,
But smiled on in a drowse of ecstacy
So happy! half with her and half with heaven,
But smiled and lay there. Like a rose, I said:
As red and still, indeed, as any rose
That blows in all the silence of its leaves.
Content, in blowing, to fulfil its life.

[Mrs. Browning.

SELF-CONCEIT.—As this distemper is so prevalent in the human family, it is well, occasionally, to examine our own individual state and condition, and see if there he not some symptoms of the infection in ourselves, that we may more vigilantly guard against those exciting causes which tend to strengtben and develop hereditary disease or infirmity. Self-conceit, like many other chronic and hereditary complaints, is not specially alarming in its first stages, seldom attended with pain, and for the most part extremely comfortable, causiug the patient but little uneasiness or disquiet. The most characteristic symptom appears in the general tendency to inflation, which increases with the progress of the disease—in obstinate cases causing the patient to assume such unnatural proportions as to become an offensive object of contemplation to everybody except himself. This obliquity of vision usually affects the carriage and manners of the individual; causing an undue elevation of the head; throwing the vertebral column out of the line of the perpendicular; giving emphasis to utterance and gesticulation, pompousness to the gait, aud an air of immense importance to the whole bearing. These are, perhaps, the most obvious symptoms and characteristics, though the disease may exist without these geueral manifestations. Sometimes the indications appear only in one part or member, as in the head or face—the facial muscles being generally most susceptible to the influence of the mind and temper. Then, again, there may be no special manifestatious visible to the eye, and only become apparent to the understanding through familiar acquaintance. We see it in a morbid appetite for approbation and compliment; a disposition to be seen and heard; an itching for applause and admiration; a fondness for discoursing about self and self-interest; an indifference in listening to others (except when the conversation tends homeward.) These and various other features not unfrequently disclose themselves through the intimacy of acqnaintanceship. There is another form iu which self-conceit sometimes appears—it is that of mock humility. This type is so inveterate and deep-rooted as to be beyond the reach of antidotes or applications, and can only be eradicated by surgical skill. The less virulent forms may sometimes he mitigated or counteracted by certain inexpensive specifics. The simple application of a few grains of common sense tends greatly to relieve inflammation and cool the brain. Just make a sensible, impartial estimate of yourself, as you would of another for whom you had no predilection. Some writer has wisely said: "Other people think about as much of us as we thiuk of them; and everybody knows how little that is." An excellent sedative for those who distress themselves about the opinion of others! You need not be greatly elevated nor depressed by the estimation in which you are held by others; for, in nine cases out of ten, it is only the reflection of your opinion of them. If you praise a man for his excellent qualities he will give you credit for penetration and discernment; if you do not concede his supposed merits, he will charge you with ignorance and stupidity. Few hold in high regard those who do not in some way reciprocate the affection; for, however conscious you may be of your own blemishes of character, you would not be particularly attracted to the person who should venture to give you a hint regarding them.

CURIOUS CALCULATION.—Few persons have any tolerable notion of the space which would be occnpied by the whole population now living on this globe if congregated together and as to that vast majority, the dead, the wildest conjectures have been indulged in. Some have even doubted whether such a nnmber of human beiugs could find standing room on the whole face of the earth. Now, taking the present population of the earth to number 1,000,000,000, and assuming that the average population of the earth from the time of Adam till now has been half that number, and that the generations of men have averaged forty years each, we come to this conclnsion—that the smallest county of England would afford sitting room for all men, women and children now alive on earth, and that a number of human beings, equal to all that have ever lived on the face of the earth, might stand within the area of the largest county in England.

THE English are finding great difficnlty in recruiting their army, and are at loss whether to ascribe the fact to the Irish exodus to this country, or to the demand for labor.

CHARLES READE.

WHEN Peg Woffington first fell upon us, a dozeu years ago or so, Humdrum opened his eyes: it was like setting one's teeth in a juicy pear fresh from the warm sunshine. Then came Christie Johnstone, a perfect pearl of its kind, in which we recognize an important contribution to one class of romance. If ever the literature of the fishing-coast shall be compiled, it will be found to be found to be scanty bnt superlative; let us suggest that it shall opeu with Lucy Larcom's "Poor Loue Hanuah," the most touching and tear ful of the songs of New England life, followed by Christie Johnstone's night at sea amoug the blue-lights and the nets with their silver and lightning mixed, where the fishers struggle with that immense sheet varnished in red hot silver; aud at the end let uot "The Pilot's Pretty Daughter" of William Allingham's be forgotten:

Were it my lot—there peeped a wisb—
To hand a pilot's oar and sail,
Or haul the dripping moonlit mesb
Spangled with herring-scale:
By dying stars how sweet 'twould be,
And dawn-hlow freshening the sea,
With weary, cbeery pull to tbe shore
To gain my cottage-bome once more,
And meet, before I reached the door,
My pretty pilot's daughter!"

But it is a fine fashion of this noble world never to acknowledge itself too well pleased. Men are ashamed of satisfaction. So soon as they have exhausted the honey, they condemn the comb: it will do to wax an old wife's thread; they forget that the cells whose sides break the usual nniformity contain the royal embryos. Humdrum read these little novels through, laughed and cried over them in secret, then pulled a long face, stepped forth and denouuced the typography. Now we admit that the page presents a fairer appearance with single punctuations, unblurred by italics, and its smooth surface unbroken by strings of capitals; but let us ask these criticasters for what purpose types were cast at all. To assist the author in the expressiou of his ideas, and to elucidate subtile changes of meaning? or to prove his let and hiudrance, and to wrap his expression in mystery? Whether or no, it is patent that Charles Reade makes an exclamation and an interrogation-point together say as much as many novelists can dibble over a whole page. Nevertheless, in his latest work these eccentricities are greatly modified; yet who would forego in the sea-fight that almost inaudible, breathless whisper of—

"Our ammnnition is nearly done"?

Or, again, the moment when Skinner pokes Mr. Hardie lightly in the side and says, "But—I've—got—THE RECEIPT"? Aud could anything express the state of young Reginald's mind so ineffably as the primer type of his letter to Lucy?

A much less veuial fault than any typographical trifle is a tendency belonging to this author to repeat both incident and colloquy. This, of course, is merely the result of negligence, and negligence no one likes to forgive; only Shakspeare can afford to be careless of his fame, and the rags that his commentators make of him are a warning to all pettier people. We have seen the manuscript of a man already immortal so interlined, erased and corrected as to be undecipherable by any but himself and the printer who has been for tweuty years condemned to such hard labor; surely others can condescend to the same pains; yet we doubt if Mr. Reade so much as looks his over a second time.

Many persons have a trick of writing their uames, not on the fly-leaf of the books they possess, but on the hundredth or the fiftieth page. Perhaps it is according to some such brand of the warehouse that we fiud in Very Hard Cash, or White Lies, indifferently, such brief dialogues as this:

"No."
"Are you sure?"
"Positive."

Then Reade's characters are perpetually doiug the same thing. Josephine and Margaret both seize their throats not to cry out; Josephine and Margaret both kiss their babies alike—a very pretty description of the act, though:

"The young mother sprang silently upon her child—you would have thought she was going to kill it; her head reared itself again and again, like a crested snake's, and again and again, and again and again plunged down upon the child, and she kissed his little body from head to foot with soft violence, and murmured through her starting tears."

But not content with that, Margaret must re-enact it. Then Gerard and Alfred, returning from long absences, both find their only sister dead; and the plot of three of the novels turns on the fact of long and inexplicable absences on the part of the heroes. The Baroness de Beaurepaire, who is flavored with what her maker calls the "congealed essence of grandmamma," shares her horror of the jargon vocabulary equally with Mrs. Dodd, (the captain's wife, who "reared her children in a suburban villa with the manners that adorn a palace—when they happen to be there.") There is a singular habit in the several works of putting up marble inscriptions for folks before actual demise requires it—Hardie showing Lucy Fountain hers, Camille erecting one to Raynal. All his heroines, as soon as they are crossed in love, invariably lose their tempers, and invariably by the same process; all, without exception, have violet eyes and velvet lips (and sometimes the heroes also have the latter!) and all of them should wear key-holes at their ear-rings. Indeed, here is our quarrel with Mr. Reade. The conception of an artless woman is impossible with him. Plenty of beautiful ideals he creates, but with the actual woman he is almost unacquainted; Lucy Fountain, of all his feminine characters, is the only one whose counterpart we have ever met; Julia, the most perfect type of his fancy, impetuous, sparkling and sweet, has this to say for herself, on occasion of a boat-race: "We have won at last," cried Julia, all on fire, "and fairly; only think of that!" Through every sentence that he jots down runs a vein of gentle satire on the sex. Every specimen that he has drawn from it possesses feline characteristics: if provoked, they scratch; if happy, they purr; when they move, it is with the bodies of panthers; when they caress their children, it is like snakes; and in every single one of his books the women listen, behind the door, behind the hedge, or behind the boat.—Atlantic Monthly.

RUMINATING MEN.

"I REMEMBER," says Mrs. Piozzi, in her Tour in Italy, "Dr. Johnson once said that nobody had ever seen a very strange thing; but I had not then seen Av ocato B——, a la Wyerhere, at Milan, and a man respected in his profession, who actually chews his cud like an ox. He is apparently much like another tall, stout man, hut has many extraordinary properties, being emiuent for strength, and possessing a set of ribs and sternum very surprising, and worthy the attention of anatomists. His body, upon the slightest touch, even through all his clothes, throws out electric sparks; he can reject his meals from his stomach at pleasure; and did absolutely, in the course of two hours, go through, to oblige me, the whole operation of eating, masticating, swallowing, and retnrning by the mouth, a large piece of bread and a peach. With all this conviction, nothing more was wanting; hut I obtained, besides, the confirmation of common friends, who were willing likewise to bear testimony of this strange accidental variety. What I hear of his character is, that he is a low-spirited, nervous man; and I suppose his ruminating moments are spent in lamenting the peculiarities of his frame."

The human chewer of the cud was uot such a singular being as Mrs. Piozzi imagined. Fabricius ab Aquapendente records two similar cases coming under his observation. One was a monk, who rejoiced in another bovine characteristic, his forehead being adorned with a pair of horns. The other ruminant was uot so ornamented himself, but was the son of a one-horned parent; he was a Paduan nobleman, and Fabricius had the satisfaction of dissecting him, and proving the falseness of Bartholin's theory, that human ruminants possessed double stomachs. Lynceus tells us of Anthony Racchi, who was obliged to retire from the dinner-table to ruminate undisturbed, and who declared that the second process of mastication "was sweeter than honey, and accompanied by a delightful relish." His son acquired the same faculty, but with him it was under better control, he being able to defer its exercise till a convenient opportunity. Sennert knew a man similarly qnalified, and accounted for it by attribnting it to the fact of his having been fed on milk warm from the cow, in consequence of the death of his mother at his birth. Ryer believed that two of his countrymen acquired the habit from learning to imitate the calves and sheep with which their vocation associated them. Blumenbach says he knew two men who ruminated their vegetable food, and found great enjoyment in the feat, while one of them had the power of doing so or not as he felt inclined.

In The Philosophical Transactions for 1691, there is an account by the "experienced and learnd Frederick Slars, M.D.," of a ruminating man living at Bristol, described as a person of mean parents but of tolerable sense and reason, who had followed the practice from his earliest years, and always found a temporary deprivation of the faculty the sure precursor of illness. He used to commence ruminating about a quarter of an hour after a meal, and the process usually occupied him for an hour and a half, and was attended with greater gratification than the first mastication, after which food always lay heavy in the lower part of the throat.

Under the date of October 1, 1787, we find the following in The Annual Register: "We have the following extraordinary account from Winbourne in Dorsetshire. A few days ago died here Robert Gill, shoemaker, and one of our singing men, aged about sixty-seven, remarkable for chewing his meat or cud twice over, as an ox, sheep, or cow. He seldom made any breakfast in his latter days; he generally dined about twelve or one o'clock, ate pretty heartily and quickly, without much chewing or mastication. He never drank with his dinner, but afterwards about a pint of such malt liqnor as he could get; and no sort of spiritous liquor in any shape, except a little punch, but never cared for that. He usually began his second chewing about a qnarter or half an hour, sometimes later, after dinner, when every morsel came up successively, sweeter and sweeter to the taste. Sometimes a morsel would prove offensive and crude, in which case he wonld spit it out. The chewing continued usually about an hour or more, and sometimes would leave him a little while, in which case he would be sick at stomach, troubled with the heartburn, and foul breath. Smoking tobacco would sometimes stop his chewing, but it was never attended with any ill consequences. But on the 10th of June last, the faculty entirely left him, and the poor man remained in great tortures till the time of his death."

Similar cases have been recorded by Messrs. Tarbes, Percy, Lawrent, Cullerier, Riche and Copland. The latter published a full account of a case of rumination in the London Medical and Physical Journal (1819-20,) and observes in his Medical Dictionary, published in 1858, "since the publication of that case, two others, one of them in a medical man, have been treated by me, and I have reason to believe that instances of partial or occasional rumination are not so rare in the human subject as is generally supposed."

SONG OF SEPTEMBER.

AFTER AINSWORTH.

WHAT ho! my gun, my gallant boys,
September's always jolly;
I love the sportsman's pleasant noise,
Yoicks! forward! "Nix my dolly."

The partridge on its tender wing
Is up by break of day,
Bnt down the bird my gun shall bring,
Bang! fizz, boys! "fake away."

The evening's quickly drawing in,
Assist the cracksman sly,
And gallant boys may now begin
At eve to "fake the cly."

PUNCH has the following motto for Semmes' presentation sword:

A fitting gift to one whose merits lay
In being always prompt to Cut Away.

THE following equivocal apology was made for giving the lie: "I called you a liar, it is true. Yon spoke truth; I have told a lie."

THE ORIGINAL BLUEBEARD.

FOR more than a century and a half, Bluebeard has been a favorite melodramatic hero—favorite, that is, with those who wish to find a tyrant as a foil to some ill-used damsel or heroine; and the more savage he is, the more intense is the interest felt in the story—by boys and girls, if not by "children of larger growth." In this, as in some other histories, the more thoughtful readers occasionally ask—Is it true? There certainly was no real lady to say: "Sister Anne, Sister Anne, do you see anybody coming?" but nevertheless Mezeray and other French writers tell us of a man who really suggested to Perrault the idea for the story of Bluebeard.

Giles de Laval, better known in French history as Marshal de Retz, was born in or about the year 1396. Losing his father in 1416, Giles entered the service of the French King, Charles VII., and was actively engaged in the defensive war maintained by that monarch against the English, distinguishing himself in many engagements. In 1429, he was one of the captains under the celebrated Joan of Arc; and aided her in bringing provisions into Orleans. It is supposed that Giles was on this occasion created Marshal of France, in recognition of his military merits. Again we hear of him commanding troops against the English in 1430 and 1433, in which last-named year his martial services appear to have terminated.

Now, there is nothing whatever in this career to denote a cruel or depraved taste: on the contrary, Giles de Laval presents himself to us as the Marshal de Retz, a man of high birth, successful as a military commander, and in high favor at the Court of the King of France. Yet the French annals tell us that this man, at the age of 37, commenced the abominable course of life which has brought infamy upon his name. When 20 years of age, he had inherited large estates from his father; at 24, he had married Catherine de Thouars, who brought him still larger property; and when his maternal grandfather, Jean de Craon, died in 1432, another set of estates fell to him: insomuch that Giles became the richest subject in France. This immense fortune was the grand cause of his ruin. He plunged into a course of profligacy and debauchery which diminished his wealth rapidly; and he sold one estate after another to defray his lavish expenses. He maintained a guard of honor of two hundred horsemen; and his suite, of fifty persons, comprised chaplains, choristers, musicians, and pages, most of whom were made ministers or accomplices in his acts of libertinism. His family, alarmed at this prodigal waste of means in which they all had an interest, obtained a decree from the Parliament of Paris, forbidding him to make any further alienations of his property.

Even at this stage we do not recognize in Giles de Retz, what the world would call a monster; we see in him only a profligate spendthrift, who joined licentiousness with religious observances in a way not at all unusual in the middle ages. But the worst was approaching. Craving for wealth to supply his extravagance he had resource to alchemy. Failing, then, to discover the grand art of transmuting base metals into gold, he next turned his attention to magic and sorcery, under the guidance of an Englishman, named Messire Jean, and an Italian named Francisco Prelati. He is reported to have now made a contract with Satan, offering to give in return for boundless wealth, everything except his own life and soul; as regarded the lives and souls of others he felt no scruple. It was at this time, according to the accounts which have descended to us, that he began to immolate children—even while fulfilling his religious duties in his chapel with careful precision. The poor little creatures, made the victims of his iniquity in various ways, were finally put to death, and their blood and hearts used as charms in their diabolical rites. His myrmidons inveigled boys and girls from the neighboring villages into his castle, and they were never afterwards seen. Other agents of his, during his tours from one to another of his castles in Bretagne, were wont to persuade poor peasants, who had beautiful children, to entrust them to the care of the Marshal, who had promised to attend to their advancement in life. The children were never seen again; and when outcries were made in consequence, the accomplices in De Retz's iniquities sought to stifle them by threats or bribery.

This continued so long, and the number of children who disappeared became so large, that the matter came under the notice and interference of the authorities. In 1440, the Marshal was arrested, together with two of his men, Henri and Etienne Corillant. Confronted with two of his accomplices, Giles at first denied all knowledge of them; but a threat of the torture having alarmed him, he made what is called a "cleau breast of it" by revealing everything. The judges were frozen with horror at the atrocious recital which he made. There is no doubt as to the authenticity of the horrible transactions; and the manuscript reports of the trial (which lasted a month) exist in the Imperial Library at Paris, and also among the archives of the Chateau at Nantes. During a period of at least eight years, and at his several castles of Machecoul, Chantocé, and Tiffanges, as well as in his mansions at Nantes and Suze, were these atrocities carried on. In most cases he burned the bodies; but sufficient remains were found to indicate forty-six victims at Chantocé, and eighty at Machecoul. Giles did not boast of his atrocities; he confessed them, and publicly asked pardon of the parents of the murdered innocents. Condemned to be strangled, he exhibited once more a characteristic of his strange nature, by begging that the Bishop of Nantes would head the procession which was formed on this occasion. His execution took place in 1440, about or a little before Christmas Day—some say December 22.

Probably on account of some personal peculiarity, Giles de Laval became remembered as Barbe-bleue, whence our Bluebeard. It seems to have speedily become a name of terror; for Hollinshed, speaking of the committal of the Duke of Suffolk to the Tower, in the reign of Henry VI., says: "This doing so much displeased the people, that if politic provision had not been made, great mischief had immediately ensued. For the commons, in sundry places of the realm, assembled together in great companies, and chose to them a captain, whom they called Bluebeard; but ere they had attempted any enterprise, their leaders were apprehended, so that the matter was pacified without any hurt committed."

As to the children's Bluebeard, it was written by Perrault in the time of Louis XIV., and has been translated from the French into nearly all the languages of Europe. This Bluebeard's propensity is not to kill children, but to marry wife after wife in succession, kill them, and deposit them in the fatal closet which curiosity would not leave untouched. We all know how another victim was saved, and how Bluebeard met his death.—Book of Days.

LADIES' LETTERS.

WE see, then, that in one point women have a natural advantage in the art of letter-writing; they may write of things, and often the most obvious things, that men may not. Their natural subjects are of a more domestic character than men's can be, and even social or public matters are all treated from a private and personal point of view. We like this, though we could not, and indeed ought not, to imitate it. A man ought never to so far forget his citizenship as to fall habitually into the exclusively domestic vein. He ought to convey a consciousness of something beyond home life, or he will strike us as either selfish or trivial; and this necessarily checks a good deal of detail which would be very pleasant from some pens, but not from his. Glancing over the letters which have won for woman their high acknowledged reputation in the department of manuscript literature, they owe so much of their attractiveness to gossip, to their warm interest in the smaller commerce of life, to felicitous trifling, that what we began by calling one point we might end by calling the main point of their superiority where they are superior. Nor is this at all detracting from the merit of this accomplishment. A good piece of gossip told with playful malice, or with warm, effusive, trusting sentiment, is quite one of the pleasantest gifts the post can bring. Our spirits are the better for it; it is society at second-hand without the trouble; it is the study of human nature made easy. Another advantage possessed by women is that they can flatter with a good conscience. The same review of great authorities shows this. All thoroughly satisfactory letters from the feminine pen have a touch of flattery in them, or what would be flattery but that partial knowledge, blind feeling, and affection make it genuine. Mme. de Sevigné is always flattering her daughter. The ladies of the last century—the Mrs. Carters and Miss Talbots—extol one another in neatly-turned sentences. Miss Burney lays herself at the feet of her correspondents. We look for the most dulcet, gracious criticism from our cleverer and more gifted female friends. They have the art of seeing the best, and can praise with a large, ungrudging expansiveness. We do not expect this from our masculine critics, from whom we should hardly know how to take it; but it is pleasant, nevertheless, and constitutes another feature of that sympathy which we have recognized in ladies of graceful, fluent pen. The great test of excellence in this art is, of course, how a letter is received—what effect it produces before the seal is broken. We cannot guess what it may be about; the writer may live in scenes remote from our knowledge and personal interests; but we know, on sight of her handwriting, that she will either find some means of bringing us into close connection with her concerns, or that she will throw herself with warmth and intelligence into ours.

It must be owned, however, that the gift of writing very entertaining letters is compatible with a very imperfect sympathy, perhaps not as a natural defect, but one frequently present and uppermost at the time of writing. The temper and the personal habits that lead to letter-writing argue certain qualities and tendencies. It is a mark of fidelity in friendship to keep up the practice month after month, and year after year, where there is no family necessity for doing so, nor any call of mere interest; but we suspect this constancy is often marred by jealousy, and by a proneness to unpleasant hints and grievances. A good many people are not as amiable in their letters as in personal intercourse. We think it probable that the task of looking through a past correspondence between intimate friends will, in most cases, leave the impression of a less unbroken harmony than might have been looked for from the renown of their friendship. A printed correspondence, it is true, does not always, nor, indeed, often prove this; but published letters are generally by women who have lived much in the world and been concerned with public interests; besides which there is no knowing what the editor's work may have been in adapting them for publication.

The age of letter-writing begins earlier and lasts longer with women than with men. It is amazing what good letters girls sometimes write. They have a style peculiar to themselves, in which everything is a sort of quaint sham and pretence—the experience, the wisdom, the sentiment, the humor. All is an imitation of something else—a tone that is caught from somewhere, an echo of society, but put together with a sweet audacity, an innocent swagger of knowledge of the world and of the heart, and an affected precocity, that are often perfectly engaging. We know nothing more cheerful than one of these effusions inspired by hope and bright prospects, redolent of spring and insolent with the spirit of youth and virgin liberty. Our ideas of life gain a temporary glow under the influence. We would particularly entreat young ladies possessing this delightful gift to keep it for their friends, and not to suppose that the eloquence du billet can be diverted into successful novel-writing. A note to a confidante may be quite a perfect composition in its way; the gravest critic may read it with approval, wondering how it is done, how anything so graceful and piquante can be made out from such small material; and yet it may have no kindred whatever with the fancy and observation that go to a readable work of fiction. If every young woman does not know this, it is as often as much her friends' fault as her own.—Saturday Review.

On the authority of a prisoner escaping into Gen. Sherman's lines, it is stated that at Americus, Ga., is a stockade in an open field, without shade, and partly a swamp, containing a crowd of 19,000 Union soldiers, without a blanket, overcoat or cooking utensil.

SEPTEMBER CALENDAR.

[FROM "PUNCH'S ALMANAC."]

1. Th.—St. Giles emigrated from Ireland, and colonized the Seven Dials.
2. F.—Great Fire of London, 1666, which completely roasted Mutton-hill, and did the Poultry to a cinder.
3. S.—Sloman ascertains that Jinks has fitted up a bed in his empty cistern, and being up to trap, bribes Timkins the turncock to turn on the New River.
4. Sun.—15th Sunday after Trinity.
5. M.—Old Bartlemy. Massacred by the New Police, 1841.
6. Tu.—Shakspeare's Jubilee, 1769. Perpetuated by a new set of Jullien's quadrilles and promenade concerts at Drury lane—1840-41.
7. W.—Dr. Johnson born 1709; or, literally speaking, he obliged Mr. Boswell with the first incident in his biography.
8. Th.—About this time green geese make their wills.
9. F.—Municipal Corporation Act passed 1835. Aldermen are deprived of their loaves and fishes but receive as compensation a plentiful supply of "Burgess's Sauce."
10. S.—Curaçoa surrendered—after a spirited resistance to a British corkscrew.
11. Sun.—16th Sunday after Trinity.
12. M.—Green Goose shooting commences on Wimbledon Common; and Dan the Miller bags the Earl of Cardigan and Capt. H. Tuckett.
13. Tu.—Westminster Bridge begun, 1748. The masons at work upon it in 1842.
14. W.—Moscow burnt. Bonaparte and his army retreated, having received a large quantity of the "best Russia Towelling."
15. Th.—Ember Week commences—a natural consequence to the Burning of Moscow.
16. F.—Foundling Hospital built 1742. A great many people's faults have been laid at the door of this establishment.
17. S.—Timkins the turncock turns on the New River and turns out Jinks; who is half drowned, and tapped by Sloman.
18. Sun.—17th Sunday after Trinity.
19. M.—Full Moon. Recollect Quarter Day falls on the 29th. The present favorable aspect of the heavens should not be neglected for taking stock—out of the landlord's way.
20. Tu.—Money becomes scarce in town, and people go to the country for a little change.
21. W.—Battle of Preston Pans, fought by the Scotch in 1745. Ditto of Prague, fought by Miss Jemima Jones on the piano, in the present year.
22. Th.—The Sun enters the Scales, and is found to be not quite so light as he was in summer.
23. F.—Autumn Quarter commences. So does reaping. Hobler cuts his own corn with a razor.
24. S.—Day and night go halves in the twenty-four hours.
25. Sun.—18th Sunday after Trinity.
26. M.—Several Geese are sacrificed to the Moloch of Michaelmas; a vast number of ganders are left disconsolate widowers.
27. Tu.—Sidon captured by Napier. "After battering for five hours outside of the fortress, the troops at length get in-Side-un." (Vide Napier's log.)
28. W.—Colchester Riots. The annual rising of "the natives" takes place, unless kept down by brandy.
29. Th.—Michaelmas Day. Goose in perfection. Four farces and one comedy damned the same night. Sir Peter Laurie comes to the Mansion House stuffed with sage, and makes some wise observations.
30. F.—New River completed, 1613. Brought to a head, and has been subject to water on the brain ever since.

PARLOR MAGIC.

NINE RATIONAL RECREATIONS, for the Amusement and Instruction of the Young, and Others, during the Winter Evenings.—1. Take a tumbler, and fill it nearly full of water. Then insert a lump of sugar in the water, and continue to stir it. In a few minutes the sugar will become invisible.

2. Place a candlestick with a lighted candle in it, in the middle of a table, mahogany is best, but deal will answer the purpose. Place an extinguisher upon the candle, and the apartment will be left in darkness unless there are other lights in it.

3. Take a kitten (one of a kindly disposition is preferable) and place it upon your lap. Stroke it gently for a few seconds and the animal will be distinctly heard to purr. This experiment may be varied by pinching its tail, in which case it will spit, and jump down.

4. Let the cinders be thrown upon the fire, and then take a common hearth-broom, and carefully sweep every particle of ash and dust under the grate. Hang up the broom and sit down, and a pleasing display of tidiness will be made.

5. Take a pair of scissors, the size is immaterial. Obtain a piece of white or brown paper, six inches long and a yard and a half across. Snip it in two. You will find that no exertion of strength will join the severed parts together again.

6. Place the palms of your hands together crosswise, and holding them somewhat loosely, strike them on your knee. A sound will be produced somewhat resembling the chink of money. This is quite as good as having money itself, which only leads to outlay and extravagance.

7. Take a common ruled copy-book, and at the top of a page let a confederate inscribe "Bounty Commands Esteem," or some other moral sentiment. Copy this on every line of the page, and when you have done show it to the company. This experiment is not only interesting in itself, but leads to improve the handwriting.

8. Take the tumbler of water mentioned in the first experiment, and show the company that the glass is nearly full. Drink it off and make them observe that the glass is entirely empty. The success of this feat depends on its rapidity.

9. Go to bed.

THACKERAY in a journal of travel, speaking of taking leave of a steamer, describes his affection for his fellow-voyagers and the officers of the boat "down to the greasy old cook, who with touching affection used to bring us locks of his hair in the soup."

A FRENCHMAN who visited the United States and left it in disgust, when asked his opinion, exclaimed: "200 religions and only one gravy."

SPORTING ON-DITS.

The World's Horse Fair.—The great attractions offered at the Bay View track during the past week, together with a little disposition on the part of rude Boreas to draw it mild, has induced thousands to drive out and witness the very interesting races that have taken place. Every man or boy that could hire, borrow, or own a horse, might be seen tooling along over the road bound for the race course. Livery stables have been emptied of their contents, and many a spavined old roadster that had been consigned to a dark stall in the basement has been dragged forth, much to his astouishment, to do duty once more; and people who are generally very fastidious on the question of a "turnout," have been glad to get anything with the requisite number of legs, and the cry has been, "A horse! a horse! ten dollars for a horse!"—and often without getting one. Each day the bill has offered greater and more interesting inducements, and each day the attendance increases. Yesterday an extra entertainment was given, which was not in the bills, in the shape of a runaway. In the tandem race, Mr. Ferguson's team ran away with him, and at fearful speed made the circuit of the track three times before they were finally stopped. The horses seemed determined to have their frolic at the expense of Mr. Ferguson's neck. The excitement was intense; and although everybody shouted "Stop them," nobody could do it without risking their lives. The animals finally "slowed down," and were "stopped," much to the relief of the thousands looking on, who held their breath, expecting to see the driver dashed to pieces. But "all's well that ends well;" and we congratulate Mr. Ferguson on the happy denouement. To-day, twelve young ladies will contend for the prizes offered for the best exhibition of skill in equestrianism. There will also be a ten-mile trot, for which Fillmore, Seward, Lady Lancaster, and Gentleman George will enter. Great sport is anticipated. As Saturday is a sort of play-day anyhow, everybody will, undoubtedly, go to the course. Billy Williamson will be on hand in his best clothes to receive his guests and make them comfortable. William is one of the Boys.

—

Hare-breadth Escapes.—One day last week a couple of gentlemen, whose names for short we will call Col. D. and Jim P., went down to Santa Clara to hunt rabbits with ferrets. Setting out next morning with the ferrets, guns, and an excellent lunch provided by John Cameron, they came to the ground and let the little animals loose. Down they went into the rabbit-holes, while P. got his gun all ready, watching, with intense interest, the holes for the appearance of the game. Just at his feet was a hole he did not observe. While on the qui vive, and in a state of nervous expectancy, up popped a little "cotton-tail" from this hole, jumping high into the air. Everybody sung out, "Here he is!" "There he goes!" The suddenness of the animal's appearance so upset P.'s nerves that he up with his gun and blazed away, missing him—in fact, he didn't shoot within ten feet of the rabbit, but he came within an ace of knocking John Cameron into the future. The next attempt was no better, and the result was that whenever a rabbit appeared, everybody ran faster and harder than the animal, for safety; for nobody knew which way the fellow would shoot. He generally fired into the flock. The result of the day's shooting was one solitary little rabbit that Uncle Billy Forst shot with his crutch, while the party generally got slightly wounded in the neck. John Cameron says that ferret-hunting is heavy on the nervous system, and if it is all the same to the Colonel and Jim, he prefers not being considered a rabbit, and made game of in that way.

Moral.—When you go out rabbit-shooting with ferrets, don't open the champagne before the shooting begins; for, after Heidsieck, you can't always hit them on the wing.

—

The game laws will be up on the 15th inst., and, as game is abundant, everybody will be off camping out for a week's shooting. We would advise those who want a small chance not to go anywhere near the ground claimed by Ward Eaton or Col. Jack Gamble, for they are personally acquainted with every bird; and when they camp out, all they have to do is to build a fire and get ready for breakfast, when the quail run right up and wait to be picked and Eaten. We are trying to make an arrangement at the Sheriff's office to get both of those inveterate sportsmen on the jury for a whole term. We want a small show, and that's the only way to get it.

—

The best fishing in the State is up at Big Meadows, Indian Valley, Plumas county, about ninety miles from Marysville. Stage lines leave Oroville three times a week—Monday, Wednesday and Friday. The North Fork of the Feather river takes its rise there, boiling out at the base of the mountain in its full volume, forming a pool or lake a hundred yards across and six feet deep. From thence it goes rushing down over rocks, a foaming torrent, until it strikes the Meadows and flows onward in a stream fifty feet wide and from four to six feet deep. Trout? Well, rather! Mr. H. C. Bidwell, who resides on his ranch, (through which the stream passes,) goes down to the river every morning he feels inclined, and lands a five-pounder for breakfast. He don't take up his fish-pole until the frying-pan begins to get warm. The roads are splendid and accommodations excellent at Taylorsville, at the foot of the valley. Job Taylor keeps a first-rate house, and at Springer's you can get a splendid spring bed; a few miles up the valley there is the most refreshing lager manufactory, and when you are driving by, of a warm day, it salutes your olfactories with an odor so refreshing that you are bound to stop. It is good they have the 'ops. There are lots of fine mines—quartz and copper—in the vicinity. In fact, Plumas is the richest valley in the State, and the least known. But now that we have told all about it, it will no longer be a hidden Arcana.

—

A Duck Story.—A friend hearing that ducks did alight near here at night, asked a watchman if it was so. The following was his answer: "Oh, yes; last night there come a flock of one duck; pretty soon there come a flock of another duck; then there come two ducks all alone. They all lit together, and if my old gun hadn't snapped her cap, Lord! what a scattering I would have made!"

POEM,

DELIVERED BEFORE THE SOCIETY OF CALIFORNIA PIONEERS ON THE FOURTEENTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE ADMISSION OF CALIFORNIA INTO THE UNION.

ONCE more we meet, though in our native East
The sun that glitters on our birthday feast
Glanced as he rose on fields whose dews were bleat
With deeper tints than those Aurora lent;
Though shone his rays, his welcome disc concealed
In the dim smoke that veiled each battle-field,
Still striving upward, in meridian pride,
He climbed the walls that East and West divide—
Saw his bright face flashed back from golden sand,
And the calm sea that laves our western land.

Strange was the contrast that such scenes disclose
From his high vantage o'er eternal snows:
There War's alarm the brazen trumpet rings—
Here his love song the mailed cicala sings;
There bayonets glitter through the forest glades—
Here yellow cornfields stack their peaceful blades;
There the deep trench where Valor finds a grave—
Here the long ditch that carbs the peaceful wave;
There the bold sapper with his lighted train—
Here the dark tunnel and its stores of gain,
Here the full harvest and the wain's advance—
There the Grim Reaper and the ambulance.

'Midst scenes so adverse, what mysterious bond
Links our fair fortunes and the shores beyond?
Why come we here—last of a scattered fold—
To pour fresh metal in the broken mould?
To yield our tribute, stamped with Cæsar's face,
To Cæsar, stricken in the market place?

Ah, Love of Country is the secret tie
That joins these contrasts 'neath the arching sky;
Though brighter paths our peaceful steps explore—
We meet together at the Nation's door.
War winds her horn, and giant cliffs go down
Like the high walls that girt the sacred town,
And leaves a pathway to her throbbing heart,
From clustered village and from crowded mart.

Part of God's providence it was to found
A nation's bulwark on this chosen ground—
Not Jesuit's zeal nor Pioneer's unrest
Planted these pickets in the distant West;
But He who first the nation's fate forecast
Placed here his fountains sealed for ages past,
Rock-ribbed and guarded till the coming time.
Should fit the people for their work sublime;
When a new Moses with his rod of steel
Smote the tall cliffs with one wide-ringing peal,
And the old miracle the record told
To the new nation was revealed in Gold.

Judge not too idly that our toils are mean,
Though no new levies marshal on our green;
Nor deem too rashly that our gains are small,
Weighed with prizes for which heroes fall.
See, where thick vapor wreathes the battle line:
There Mercy follows with her oil and wine;
Or, when brown, Labor with its peaceful charm,
Stiffens the sinews of the Nation's arm.
What nerves its hand to strike a deadlier blow,
And hurl its legions on the rebel foe?
Lo! for each town new rising o'er our State
See rebel hamlets waste and desolate,
While each new factory, with its chimney tall,
Seems a fresh mortar trained on Richmond's wall.

For this, O brothers, swings the fruitful vine,
Spread our broad pastures with their countless kine;
For this o'erhead the arching vault springs clear,
Sunlit and cloudless for one half the year;
For this no snow-flake, e'er so lightly pressed,
Chills the warm impulse of our mother's breast.
Quick to reply, from meadows brown and sere,
She thrills responsive to spring's earliest tear;
Breaks into blossom, flings her loveliest rose
Ere the white crocus mounts Atlantic snows;
And the example of her liberal creed
Teaches the lesson that to-day we heed.

Thus ours the lot with peaceful, generous hand
To spread our bounty o'er the suffering land:
As the deep cleft in Mariposa's wall
Hurls a vast river splintering in its fall—
Though the rapt soul who stands in awe below,
Sees but the arching of the promised bow—
Lo! the far streamlet drinks its dews unseen,
And the whole valley wakes to brighter green.

A mother expressed her apprehension to a visitor that he might be disturbed by the crying of her spoiled brat. "Not at all, madam, was the reply, "I am delighted to hear such children cry." "Indeed, why so?" "Because in all well-regulated families, they are immediately sent out of the room."

ARMY AND NAVY PERSONAL.

A General Court-Martial for the trial of Lieut. Streeter, Native Cavalry, is in session at Drum Barracks.

A large number of improved rifled muskets has recently been received from the East for the use of State and Federal troops on the Pacific coast.

An express has been established to run between Fort Mojave and Preston, the capital of Arizona Territory; at Mojave it connects with the military express from Los Angeles.

Salutes of 100 guns were fired at Fort Vancouver and Benicia, on the 7th inst., in honor of the recent victories in Mobile harbor. A salute of 100 guns, in honor of Sherman's victory near Atlanta, was fired at Alcatraz on the 8th inst.

The following change of stations of officers of the department has recently been ordered: Capt. Hughes to take post at Fort Boise, Idaho Territory; Capt. Swasey at Wilmington depot; Capt. Morris at Benicia depot; Capt. Hoyt in San Francisco.

—

Brig.-Gen. William S. Smith has resigned.

The N. Y. Herald has collected $800 for a sword for Gen. McClellan.

Brig.-Gen. W. T. H. Brooks has resigned his commission as Brigadier-General of Volunteers, and Major 18th U. S. infantry.

By order of Lieut.-Gen. Grant, Gen. Terry has assumed command of the Tenth corps.

Gen. Couch is making preparations to change his headquarters from Harrisburg to Carlisle.

Capt. Pesilner, naturalist, appointed by the Government to accompany Gen. Sully's expedition against the Sioux, was killed by the Indians a few weeks ago.

Capt. Winslow of the Kearsarge, is reported to have lost the use of his left eye, and the oculists of Paris give him no hope of its restoration.

Gen. Dix has ordered the arrest and prosecution of E. H. Fuller, editor of the Newark (N. J.) Journal, for the publication of an article advising resistance to the draft.

Capt. H. S. Westmore, formerly Superintendent of Naval Recruiting at Memphis, has been assigned by Admiral Porter to the command of naval rendezvous at Cincinnati.

Brig.-Gen. Ransom, formerly Chief of Staff under Gen. Grant, who was wounded for the fourth time in the Red River campaign, is to take command of a division in Gen. Sherman's army.

T. F. Wade, Volunteer Lieutenant U. S. N., has not resigned as was reported, but is at present awaiting orders and recovering from wounds received at the destruction of the Commodore Jones of which vessel he was in command.

Maj. Burnes, formerly Paymaster in the United States Army, who was captured by the rebels on White River, and taken to Tyler, in Texas, made his escape from there, and has arrived safely at Quincy, Ill., after undergoing extraordinary privations.

The following promotions by brevet have been made by the President: Brig.-Gen. M. C. Meigs, Quartermaster-General, to be made Major-General U. S. Army. Brig.-Gens. J. G. Barnard, S. G. Burbridge, George Crook and W. H. Emory, U. S. Volunteers, to be Major-Generals U. S. Volunteers.

Col. Hoffman, commander of prisoners, has returned from Elmira, where he had been to inspect the new depot for rebel prisoners. He reports everything prepared for the reception and proper care of a large number of prisoners, who will be forwarded to that point as rapidly as possible.

Brig.-Gen. J. G. Barnard, who was temporarily relieved from duty on the staff of Gen. Grant, has returned to his former position with him as Chief Engineer of the Armies in the Field. [Gen. Barnard, was stationed in San Francisco, and engaged in his duties as Engineer in building the forts at Alcatraz and Fort Point. It was Gen. Barnard who laid the foundations at Fort Point.]

The organization of the Quartermaster's Department, under the act of July 4, 1864, authorizes the following increases of rank: Chiefs of divisions in the Quartermaster's Department (nine) colonels; Inspectors (six) colonels; Chief Quartermaster at depots (not exceeding ten) colonels; Chief Quartermaster to each army in the field of more than one army corps, colonel; Chief Quartermaster to each division, of two or more brigades, majors. Two-thirds of each of the above grades to be taken from among quartermasters of volunteer service. By previous law the Chief Quartermasters to each army corps is to have the rank of lieutenant-colonel. [Under this law Lieut.-Col. E. B. Babbitt, Chief Quartermaster of this Department, now takes rank as Colonel, and is re-assigned to the duties of Chief.]

Lieut.-Col. Charles G. Sawtelle, A. Q. M., was able to render essential service to the army of Gen. Banks, on the recent retreat from the Red River country, by extemporizing a bridge over the Atchafalaya River. No pontoons being at hand, Col. Sawtelle availed himself of 21 large Mississippi barges, steamers, which were moved up the stream, and anchored side by side. Upon this foundation a substantial bridge was rapidly constructed, over which the troops crossed with their trains, wagons, horses and artillery. The important service thus rendered by Col. Sawtelle was promptly recognized by Gen. Canby on his arrival, the Colonel being appointed Chief Quartermaster of the Department. [Col. Sawtelle, above mentioned, is the same officer that was for some time stationed at Benicia, doing duty as Acting Assistant Quartermaster. He was appointed Captain and Assistant Quartermaster at the commencement of the war, and has done much hard service with the Army of the Potomac; but, having fallen into disgrace with the present amiable Secretary of War, was ordered South, with the idea of placing him in the most disagreeable position possible. Anything like praise, due credit and promotion was not what the Hon. Secretary intended for him. All we can ask for him is, that he may get proper credit for being what he is—one of the most energetic and efficient officers of the Quartermaster's Department; and, although educated at West Point, does "know a hawk from a handsaw."]

SCIENCE.

It would appear, from the statement of a correspondent of the Geological Magazine, that some very fine specimens of fossil elephant bones have recently been discovered at Oldbury, near Dudley. The bones were found in a bed of dense clay, which is used for brick manufacture. They were at a depth of from ten to twelve feet below the surface, and lay embedded in the marl. One specimen thus described as being seven or eight feet long, a little curved, and as thick as one's arm. Portions of tusk, which measured twenty-four inches in length and thirteen inches round, were also obtained.

At the last meeting of the Chemical Society, Messrs. Way and Gilbert attacked the opinions of Baron Liebeg regarding the value of artificial manures, but the only arguments advanced by these ebemists were that ammonia affords nutrition to plants, and that the soil cannot be exhausted because of the large supplies of guano annually introduced into this country. It seemed to be unfamiliar to them that the recent experiments of Schonbein demonstrated the constant development of ammonia in the atmosphere. Their greatest blunder appeared to be the supposition that there is as much phosphate and potash imported into England as is annually lost through want of an efficient system of sewage.

In an article which appeared some time ago in one of our "popular science" journals, Mr. T. J. Moore asserted that "the female of Pallas' sand-grouse differs from the male in wanting the filament of the wing." This statement is contradicted by Mr. John Hancock, who says that in all the females he has seen this filament and that of the tail are present. In one specimen in his possession the wing filaments are not visible till the wing is carefully examined. This, however, is due to the circumstance of the imperfectly developed state of the first quill, which remains covered by the second. Mr. Hancock conceives that Mr. Moore may have been deceived by a specimen in this condition, or by the fact that the filamentous quill had fallen out, in the specimens he examined, before the new one had made its appearance.

According to the late researches of M. Desors, there are three distinct classes of oases in the desert of Sahara:—1. Those watered by streams from the mountains; 2. Those supplied with water from the artesian wells, the products of a very ancient industry; 3. The oases without water, of which those of the Souf are an example. Those of the first category are fed either by the streams from the mountains, or from subterranean springs, which are found in great and almost constant abundance, like the Reuss, the Noirague, and the Serrières, which are produced by the same cause, namely, the infiltration of the rain-water through the fissures of the limestone in the mountains. They are found at the foot of the Aurès, where they form the oases of Zibans; and some of them are warm, their temperature rising to 30° centigrade. The oases of artesian wells result from the industry of the Arabs, and may be seen in their perfection at Sedi-Rached The waterless oasis is produced by sowing the seeds of the date-palm at such a depth that the roots may abstract water from the deposit in which they lie, although the surface of the ground is perfectly arid. The cavities in which they are placed are termed ritans, and are frequently invaded by the sands. This compels the Arabs to employ the utmost activity, which, by giving them habits of industry, has resulted in procuring them not only competence but wealth.

It appears that Mr. Turnbull, of Edinburgh, has secretly communicated to the Académie des Sciences a method of curing deafness in the short space of one year. We understand that this strangely unscientific method of announcing a discovery has been recognised by the Academy, and that a commission, consisting of M. Flourens, Milne Edwards and Beruard, has been appointed to inquire into the nature of the alleged discovery.

The well-known naturalist, Strauss-Durekheim, has devised an ingenious apparatus by means of which the blind can read with facility; and even those possessed of vision can study in the absence of light.

The following conclusions regarding the poison of fox-glove (digitaline) have been arrived at by M. J. Lefort:

1. Two kinds of this alkaloid are used in France—the one is called German, or soluble; the other, French, or insoluble.
2. The former is less easily colored green by the action of hydrochloric acid than the latter.
3. Hydrochloric acid gas colors the insoluble from deep green and the soluble from dark brown.
4. This gas, when acting on the insoluble form, produces the odor of the fox-glove's leaves.
5. When seen under the microscope, the soluble form shows traces of crystallization; the insoluble has more of a granular character, and is opaque.
6. The soluble digitaline appears to be a better defined principle than the insoluble.
7. The peculiar principle which produces the green color appears to be independent of the solubility or insolubility of the digitaline; it is decidedly volatile, and gives the characteristic odor to ordinary digitalis.
8. Both varieties pass through the membrane of the dialyser, and may thus be separated from other substances with which they become mixed.
8. The coloration by hydchloric acid gas, and the peculiar odor of digitalis which is given out in the process, are sufficient to demonstrate the presence of this poison in liquids which contain it even in slight proportions.

M. Langier, who lately divided the median nerve, and caused its ends to unite without destroying sensation, concludes from his researches:

1. That, after suture of a nerve, sensibility of the parts to which it is distributed is established in a few hours.
2. That the operation does not produce much pain, at least when performed in the way adopted by him.

Amber.—This is a substance on which a great deal has been written. It has generally been classed among minerals, although avowedly originating from the vegetable kingdom. Nothing as yet has afforded a clue to the plant that may have produced it, nor has any plausible conjecture been formed from the flowers and insects sometimes found imbedded in its mass. Its peculiarly resinous nature seems to point to some Hymenæa or to the Pinus Dommara as the parent plant, but there is no perfect identity between the produce of these genera and amber. Nor is it certain that all kinds of amber proceed from the same source; for its aspect often varies considerably, according to the beds in which it is found; which circumstance has led many naturalists to the belief that there are several amber-producing plants. In a paper addressed to the Academy of Sciences by M. Baudrimont, the composition of this anomalous subject is examined. Reeluz had already shown that white and opaque amber contains more succinct acid than the perfectly transparent yellow sort; Drapiez had analyzed it, and found it to contain carbon, hydrogen, oxygen, and a small proportion of ashes, consisting of lime, alumina and silica. M. Baudrimont, however, shows that it contains another element not hitherto mentioned, viz., sulphur. If a few fragments of amber be subjected in a test-tube to a heat of distillation, and paper impregnated with acetate of lead be immersed into the fumes evolved, it immediately turns black—thus unmistakenly denoting the presence of a sulphuretted compound. The proportion of sulphur contained in amber is not, however, very considerable, since our author fixes it at somewhat less than one-half per cent. But under what form does it exist therein? Is it contained in the essential oil, or in the two soluble resins, or in the insoluble bitumen contained in amber? M. Baudrimont does not tell us, but states that most certainly it is combined with organic matter, because it is evolved under the form of hydrosulphuric acid.

Wrinkles, Lines, Crow's-feet, etc.—To remove these when presenting themselves prematurely, or when the results of severe illness, as well as to ward them off at the time of life when they may be expected to show themselves, several essential points must be observed. The face should be well bathed in cold water every morning, winter as well as summer, by means of a sponge. Curd, honey, or common yellow soap should be used in washing the face previous to the bathing. The oftener cold water is applied to the face the better. If any roughness of the skin ensues, a little cold-cream applied at night will soon remove it. Then, again, as much exercise as can be conveniently taken in the open air, every day, is to be practiced. The diet must be generous, but wholsome. Plenty of substantial food should be taken, with port-wine, or stout or porter. Vinegar, pickles and other acids must be avoided. In addition to all the above rules, it would be as well if regular hours were observed, and heated places of amusement seldom visited.

We speak from experience when we say that, after having tried all the principal sewing-machines, we must accord to that of Grover & Baker the pre-eminence. Those indispensable features of sewing—strength, uniformity, and elasticity—all of which are brought out in this incomparable invention, make it the first sewing-machine in the country.

Mr. Christian Pfister has the honor of calling public attention to his great assortment of Perfumery, Brushes, fine Hair-pins, Hair of all lengths and colors, Peruques, Toupes, Combs—tortoise-shell, buffalo and Irish horn, ivory and rubber; Cravats of all kinds; Jouvin's Gloves, ladies' and gentlemens'; silk Suspenders and common ones; Shirts and Collars; new styles of Head Dresses, etc. Having made new arrangements with Paris houses, it is within his power to offer to his numerous customers superior advantages over any others in the trade. Six artist coiffeurs will always be found ready for business in the gentlemen's room. A special apartment is provided for the coiffure of ladies.

Riches have Wings.—Nothing illustrates this more forcibly than the recent fall in mining Stocks. Therefore, provide a certainty for your family in the future by insuring your life in the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company—cash assets, $6.500,000.

BIGELOW & BRO., Agents,
jy30-1m Over Parrott's Bank.

Pacific Mail Steamship Company.

The following steamships will be despatched in the month of SEPTEMBER, 1864:

SEPTEMBER 13, - - - - - - SACRAMENTO
SEPTEMBER 23d - - - - - - GOLDEN CITY

From Folsom-street Wharf, at nine o'clock, A. M., punctually,

FOR PANAMA.

Passengers will be conveyed from Panama to Aspinwall by the PANAMA RAILROAD COMPANY, and from Aspinwall to New York by the ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

A. B. FORBES, Agent P. M. S. Co.,
se3 Cor. Sacramento and Leidesdorff sts.

Union College,
SAN FRANCISCO,
Junction of Second and Bryant streets.
R. TOWNSEND HUDDART,
PRINCIPAL.

THE COLLEGE HAS BEEN ENLARGED DURING THE past year by the erection of a spacious Hall and Recitation Rooms, which have been furnished with Philosophical Apparatus and all these modern improvements that tend to facilitate the progress of Education, as well as to promote the health and comfort of pupils. The other buildings are commodious, the dormitories lofty and well ventilated, and the whole establishment is provided with every suitable accommodation. The grounds for exercise and recreation occupy a 100-vara Lot in one of the healthiest and most desirable parts of the city, near to South Park.

DR. HUDDART

Is assisted by efficient Instructors, who co-operate with him in constant supervision over the education of those entrusted to his care.

THE MODERN LANGUAGES, FRENCH, SPANISH and GERMAN, together with the accomplishments of MUSIC AND DRAWING, are under the best qualified Teachers.

A prospectus containing full information for parents and guardians, can be obtained on application at the College; or at the bookstore of A. ROMAN & CO., or C. Beach, Montgomery street. au6-1m

Gregory Yale,
ATTORNEY AT LAW,

Office—On second floor of Sather & Co.'s Bank, corner of Montgomery and Commercial streets, Nos. 2, 3 and 4, San Francisco. jy2

THE CALIFORNIAN.

A PAPER FOR THE TIMES.

Devoted to Live Topics,

AND THE

BEST INTERESTS OF CALIFORNIA.

Is published

EVERY SATURDAY MORNING,

AT

728 MONTGOMERY STREET.

Nothing will be spared that will enable The Californian to appeal to the Public for support, not only as the

BEST JOURNAL ON THE PACIFIC COAST,

But also as being

The Equal of any on this Continent!

Paper of a superior quality and weight is being made

EXPRESSLY FOR THE CALIFORNIAN,

THE BEST TALENT OF THE STATE

Is employed upon The Californian, and arrangements have been made with contributors abroad for

EASTERN AND FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE.

The voluntary notices bestowed by the press of the Eastern cities have been no less warm and congratulatory than those which we have received at the hands of our cotemporaries of the Pacific. Their verdict is unanimously in favor of

THE CALIFORNIAN,

and all join in pronouncing their unqualified approval of its unequalled merits.

Its reputation is now fully established. It is not

EXCELLED BY ANY LITERARY JOURNAL

on the Continent.

Let the people of the mountains and the valleys

BUY THE CALIFORNIAN!

Let every lover of choice literature throughout the States and Territories of the Pacific coast

READ THE CALIFORNIAN!

Let no family be without this paper, which, as an Eastern cotemporary remarks, is creditable to the people who sustain it. Therefore,

SUBSCRIBE

FOR THE

CALIFORNIAN!

The Terms of the Californian are $5 per year by mail to subscribers, invariably in advance; 50 cents per month served by carriers.

All communications and correspondence must be addressed to "The Californian,"

Office, No. 728 Montgomery street,
SAN FRANCISCO.

To the Sick and Afflicted!

Peake Medical Institute,

Established by Experienced European Physicians for the certain, safe and permanent cure of all Special Diseases.

Consulting Surgeon, Dr. Pratt, late of Paris, Member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England.

CONSULTATIONS FREE!

THIS INSTITUTE, CONDUCTED BY EUROPEAN PHYsicians of celebrity, who are graduates of the first Colleges and Universities of Europe, and who have acquired unsurpassed knowledge and skill in the cure of all special diseases during years of experience and study in the largest Hospitals of London and Paris, is to enable all sufferers from special or private diseases, to obtain with certainty safe and speedy cures from Physicians who have devoted entire attention to the various special diseases. These diseases have hitherto generally fallen into the hands of ignorant quacks and charlatans, and the amount of damage and number of deaths that are yearly owing to the ignorant treatment of these diseases by these men, it is impossible to calculate. With one drug alone—viz., Mercury—they annually destroy thousands of unfortunate sufferers, who are often confiding and unsuspecting enough to attribute to the disease what has been the effect alone of the medicine they have been so rashly taking for the cure of their disease.

OBSERVE THAT

The Peake Medical Institute will entirely remedy this great evil, by enabling sufferers from various special diseases which are so common on this coast to obtain, with as much certainty as if they were in London or Paris,

SPEEDY, SAFE AND PERMANENT CURES,

from educated, experienced and skilful European Physicians whose knowledge and skill in the cure of all special diseases is unsurpassed.

Thus confidence and certainty of a speedy cure may be felt by all sufferers going for advice to

THE PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE,

and they will likewise be saved from the danger of falling into the hands of ignorant quacks who throng this city and annually ruin and destroy the health and happiness of so many.

The Institute is fitted up commodiously and privately, and no expense has been spared in obtaining the very best instruments and appliances of modern European surgery and medicine.

The consulting surgeon, Dr. Pratt, Member of the Royal College of England and author of several works on special diseases, has been for years with the celebrated Ricord of Paris, where he acquired considerable celebrity for his great success in the cure of Special Diseases. Dr. Pratt has very high testimonials from some of the most eminent Surgeons of Europe and his treatment is such that he can promise a cure in almost every case.

MENTAL OR BODILY DEBILITY AND WEAKNESS

Arising from youthful excesses and indiscretions or from neglected and badly treated disease, will be treated at

THE PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE

In the most certain and successful manner and in a very short time, by a Surgeon who possesses unsurpassed knowledge and skill in the care of these harassing complaints having been associated with Ricord and other most celebrated surgeons for years, in the largest hospitals of Paris.

Persons who imagine that they are not well or whose strength and vigor is not what it should be, would do well by calling at the Peake Medical Institute (consultations being gratuitous) and getting the opinion and advice of the Surgeon, as in many of these cases the malady is entirely mental, aggravated perhaps, by some disorder of the general health, and a little skilful and kind treatment is all that is wanted to make the patient hearty, robust and happy.

All the after ill effects of special diseases, caused by neglect, bad treatment and mercury, will be speedily and permanently cured at the

PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE,

The sufferer being restored to hearty, strong and robust health.

RHEUMATISM, ULCERS AND DISEASES OF THE SKIN.

Sufferers from these diseases come to the Institute with the certainty of obtaining a perfect cure through the skill of a Surgeon, who devoted himself entirely to the cure of these diseases in the large hospitals of Europe, and who has such an unequalled experience in their treatment, that he has never yet failed in curing even the worst cases. Diseases, of even the longest duration, will be perfectly and quickly eradicated.

THE EYES. THE EYES.

DISEASES OF THE EYE will have especial and particular treatment at the Peake Medical Institute from a Surgeon who has the greatest skill in the cure of all the diseases of this most delicate organ, having been for years in the celebrated eye hospitals of Vienna and Paris, where he gained a rare and perfect knowledge and skill in the cure of all its diseases. All operations that are necessary will be performed with unequalled skill and success. Cataracts will be successfully couched or extracted.

THE PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE

Thus enables sufferers from any of the numerous forms of Special and Private diseases, to feel confident of obtaining a perfect and speedy cure from skilful and experienced European Physicians, of the highest education and unsurpassed knowledge in the cure of these diseases, and who are graduates of the first Colleges and Universities of Europe, as shown by their diplomas at the Institute Persons who have become broken down in health from excesses of any kind or from long-standing disease or mercurial treatment, may come to the Institute with the certainty of obtaining great relief and in all probability a perfect cure, through the extensive knowledge and skill of the Physicians.

Sufferers in the country can receive treatment by mail on receipt of letter with all symptoms, etc.

TO THE LADIES.

PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE.

This Institute is conducted by experienced European Physicians who have given years in the large Hospitals of London and Paris to the study of the treatment and cure of all the diseases and irregularities peculiar to women.

The Consulting Surgeon, Dr. Pratt, late of Paris, Member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England, is the author of a valuable work "On Diseases Peculiar to Females," and ladies suffering from any of the diseases peculiar to the sex are respectfully informed that they can be certain of a safe and sure cure in a short time at the Institute. The Institute is commodiously and privately arranged. Ladies in the country can receive all directions and treatment for a speedy cure, on receipt of letter with symptoms, etc. Consultations free, in English, French, Italian and German:

Address:
PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE,
No. 313 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

Canton Tea Store, Established 1858.

GEO. S. HASKELL & CO.

IMPORTERS,
WHOLESALE AND RETAIL DEALERS
— IN —
JAPAN AND CHINA TEAS,
AND GROCERIES.

Store fronting on
514 Market & 15 Sutter St.
☞ THREE DOORS ☜
BELOW THE MARKET HOUSE,
San Francisco.

Our Motto, ☞ "Large Sales at Small Profits for Cash. ☜

FAMILY NOTICE.

Bowen Brothers,

COR. MONTGOMERY AND CALIFORNIA STREETS,
SAN FRANCISCO.

Offer for sale:

Barton & Guesten's Salad Oil, the best in the world.
Boneless Sardines; a great luxury.
English Potted Meats.
Anchovy and Shrimp Paste.
Condensed Milk, preserved with refined Sugar hermetically sealed in cans for Army and Travelers' use. Its purity is guaranteed.
Bent's Water, Butter, Milk, Wine and Graham Crackers.
English, Stilton, Cheshire and Holland Cheese.
English Soups, assorted.
Pate de Foie Gras.
French Truffles and Mushrooms.
Spanish and French Olives, in kegs.
Spiced Oysters.
Dutch Herrings and Sardells.
English and American Bloaters.
Stuffed Olives and Mangoes.
Mess Mackerel.
Cider Vinegar.
Teas of every variety, imported expressly for our Family Trade.
Sugars of every kind direct from the Manufactory.

WINES AND LIQUORS,
Direct from Bond, Wholesale or Retail.

au6-tf

REMOVAL.

INSURANCE AGAINST FIRE.

THE NORTH BRITISH AND MERCANTILE
INSURANCE COMPANY
OF LONDON AND EDINBURGH.
ESTABLISHED, 1809.

Capital, $10.000.000. Accumulated Funds, January 1, 1864, $11.169.140. Deposit in California under State law, $75,000. Limit on single Risks, $100,000. Bankers, Messrs Tallant & Co. Fire Policies on buildings and contents, throughout the Pacific States and Territories, granted on the most liberal terms. Losses promptly adjusted and paid here in U. S. Gold coin.

Office removed to 414 California street, opposite Alsop & Co.

WM. H. TILLINGHAST, Agent.
au19 3m

MANHATTAN FIRE INSURANCE
COMPANY OF NEW YORK.
Cash Capital and Surplus.....$750,000
Deposit in San Francisco.....$75,000

COLUMBIA FIRE INSURANCE CO.,
OF NEW YORK.
Cash Capital and Surplus.....$600,000
Deposit in San Francisco.....$75,000

THE ABOVE MENTIONED WELL-KNOWN and responsible Companies, having complied with the law enacted at the last session of the Legislature, and deposited with Messrs. Donoboe, Ralston & Co.

$75,000 EACH,

As additional security to Policy-holders, will continue to insure
BUILDINGS,
MERCHANDISE,
FURNITURE,
And other property in California, Oregon and Nevada Territory, against Loss or Damage by Fire, upon the most favorable terms.

All Losses promptly paid in United States Gold Coin.

R. B. SWAIN & CO., Agents,
ju25-tf 206 Front street, corner of California.

JOSEPH A. DONOHOE, San Francisco. | EUGENE KELLY, New York.

DONOHOE, KELLY & CO.,
SAN FRANCISCO.
EUGENE KELLY & CO.,
NEW YORK.

Bankers.

EXCHANGE ON
NEW YORK,
BANK OF LONDON, - - - - London.
BANK OF IRELAND.
jy2

SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES!

Motto—The Singer Sewing Machines are the only machines that can sew all kinds of cloth, and with all kinds of thread.

THE SINGER LETTER A
TRANSVERSE SHUTTLE FAMILY
MACHINES,
With recent improvements for
HEMMING, FELLING,
TUCKING, GATHERING,
BINDING, CORDING,
QUILTING, BRAIDING, etc.,

Are unrivalled for Family and light Manufacturing purposes. We invite the special attention of ladies to the Folding Top Cabinets, our latest improvement. They are the most useful, convenient and novel Cabinets yet introduced, and are worthy of examination.

SINGER'S STANDARD
MANUFACTURING MACHINES,

For Tailoring, Boot and Shoe Making, Harness and Carriage Trimming, are the cheapest, best and only Machine worthy of patronage for general purposes.

☞ Call and examine, or send for a pamphlet.

THE SINGER MANUF. COMPANY,
No. 139 Montgomery street.
WM. BRODERICK, Agent. se3-3m

FORTY-FOUR FIRST PREMIUMS
IN 1863!

THERE IS BUT ONE
FIRST
PREMIUM SEWING MACHINE.

The GROVER & BAKER SEWING MACHINE has been awarded Twenty-three First Premiums at State Fairs, and Twenty-one at City and County Fairs, in 1863, making Forty-four in all.

R. G. BROWN, Agent.
my28 329 Montgomery Street.

NOTICE TO SHIPPERS
—TO—
Red Bluff.

ON AND AFTER JULY 8TH, AND UNTIL further notice, the
RED BLUFF BOAT
WILL LEAVE SACRAMENTO
EVERY FRIDAY MORNING,
(Instead of SATURDAY MORNINGS, as heretofore.)
y16 tf J. WHITNEY, JR., President.

TELEGRAPHIC EXCHANGE
—ON—
NEW YORK,
PAYABLE IN GOLD,
For sale in sums to suit by
au20-tf WM. T. COLEMAN & CO.

EXCHANGE
ON NEW YORK,
In sums to suit, at the lowest rates, for sale by
au20-tf WM. T. COLEMAN & CO.

GREAT TRIUMPH!!

STEINWAY & SONS

Were awarded the FIRST PRIZE MEDAL at the late great INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION AT LONDON, over the two hundred and sixty-nine Pianos entered for competition from all parts of the world.

The Special Correspondent of the New York Times says:

"Messrs. Steinway & Sons' indorsement by the Jurors is emphatic, and stronger and more to the point than that of any European maker."

A constant supply of the above superior instruments can be found at the Agent's,
M. GRAY, 613 Clay street.

PIANO TUNING done by a first-class Workman, from Steinway & Son's Factory, New York. my28

COMMERCIAL STEAM PRINTING
HOUSE.
FRANCIS, VALENTINE & CO.,
517 CLAY and 514 COMMERCIAL STREETS.

Every description of BOOK, JOB and POSTER PRINTING done in the best style and at the lowest rates.
BOOK-BINDING and RULING done to order.

PILES! PILES!! PILES!!!

Not piles of Gold nor yet of Silver so much coveted by all men, but the bleeding, blind, or external Piles can be easily and speedily cured by the use of
WOOD'S SUB-POSITORY.

It is a preparation totally distinct from anything heretofore offered as a remedy for this painful and often fatal complaint. The Sub-Pository is neither a pill, powder wash or salve, and yet it has proved to be a certain remedy for the Piles. Do not doubt this assertion, nor delay testing the truth of it if you are troubled with the Piles—you will not be deceived in it.

Sold wholesale and retail by W. NEWELL, jul1 No. 530 Merchant street.

ALLEN'S
LUNG BALSAM!

THE REMEDY FOR CURING
CONSUMPTION, COUGHS, COLDS,
ASTHMA, CROUP,
DISEASES OF THE THROAT, BRONCHITIS,
Pains and Oppression of the Chest or Lungs,
DIFFICULT BREATHING,
AND ALL THE
DISEASES OF THE PULMONARY ORGANS.

ITS ACTION IS EXPECTORANT, ALTERATIVE, SUDORIFIC, SEDATIVE, DIAPHORETIC and DIURETIC, which renders it one of the most valuable remedies known for curing diseases of the lungs. It excites expectoration, and causes the lungs to throw off the phlegm or mucus, changes the secretions and PURIFIES THE BLOOD; heals the irritated parts; gives strength to the digestive system, brings the liver to its proper action, and imparts, beyond the possibility of doubt, strength to the whole system. Such is the immediate and satisfactory effect, that it is warranted to break up the most distressing cough in a few hours' time, if not of too long standing. It is warranted to give entire satisfaction even in the most confirmed cases of Consumption. It is warranted not to produce costiveness, which is the case with most remedies, or affect the head, as it contains no Opium in any form. It is warranted to be perfectly harmless to the most delicate child, although it is an active and powerful remedy for restoring the system. There is no real necessity for so many deaths by Consumption, when ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM will prevent it, if only taken in time.

Sold by all Druggists. Price $1 per bottle.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,
Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,
au27 Corner of Clay, San Francisco.

DR. STEPHENS'

CELEBRATED
Eye Salve!

AN INFALLIBLE REMEDY FOR
DISEASES OF THE EYE,

Acute or chronic, ulceration of the lachrymal glands, film and weakness of the vision from any cause; it is the most effectual remedy ever discovered.

Sold by all Druggists.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,
Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,
au27 Corner of Clay, San Francisco.

CATARRH!

DR. H. GOODALE'S
Catarrh Remedy!

FOR CENTURIES CATARRH HAS DEFIED THE skill of physicians and surgeons. No medical work contains a prescription that will eradicate it. Nothing save DR. GOODALE'S REMEDY will break it up, radically destroying the principle of the disease, and precluding the possibility of a relapse. Medical men have attempted to explain what it is, but admit that they have not discovered its antidote. Dr. Goodale offers this simple definition of its character: It is a disorder which he DOES CURE and they DO NOT. This is the great fact which it imports the sufferer to know, and a single trial will establish it beyond a question. Price, $1. Sold by all Druggists.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,
Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,
au27 Corner of Clay, San Francisco.

KENDALL'S AMBOLINE!

THE GREAT
UNEQUALLED
PREPARATION
FOR
RESTORING, INVIGORATING, BEAUTIFYING
AND
DRESSING
THE
Hair!

IT IS A STIMULATING, OILY EXTRACT OF BARKS and Herbs. It will cure all diseases of the scalp and itching of the head, entirely eradicates dandruff, prevents the Hair from falling out, or from turning prematurely gray, causing it to grow thick and long. It is entirely different from all hair preparations, and may be relied on.

Put up in boxes containing two botttles—Price $1.

☞ Sold by all Druggists.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,
Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,
Corner of Clay, San Francisco.

REDINGTON & CO.'S ESSENCE OF Jamaica Ginger!

This valuable compound, which is now regarded as one of the most popular remedies in the domestic practice for various complaints of the digestive organs, such as Dyspepsia, Nausea, etc., is prepared solely from the WHITE JAMAICA GINGER, which is the best of all the varieties in use. In the preparation of

REDINGTON & CO.'S
ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER,

Great care is taken to have none but select Root, and to manufacture it in air-tight vessels, thus preventing the evaporation of its delicate essential oil, and preserving the true aroma of the Ginger. It thereby contains in its concentrated form all the valuable properties of the Jamaica Ginger, and is guaranteed to be free from any impurities whatever

It is a grateful stimulant and carminative, giving warmth and tone to the stomach equal to Brandy, without any of its injurious effects

It will cure Nausea, caused by riding in railroad cars, or from sea-sickness, or other causes.

Miners and others who are exposed to the heat of the Sun often whilst working in cold water, should never be without

REDINGTON & CO.'S
ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER,

As by taking it as a tonic two or three times a day, it is almost a sure preventive to Chills and Fever; and to those who are farming the rich bottom lands of California it is likewise invaluable as a tonic, and should invariably be taken in the early morning before going to the fields, at the mid-day lunch, and before leaving off work at night.

Ask for REDINGTON & CO.'S ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER, and take no other, if you would always have a Pure and Reliable article.

An excellent external application for Gout, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, &c.

REDINGTON & CO., Proprietors,
416 and 418 Front street,
my28 San Francisco.

RAREY'S CONDITION POWDERS.

THE MOST POWERFUL AND BENEFICIAL AGENT known on the Stomach, Blood, Lungs and Bowels of HORSES, MULES, CATTLE, AND STOCK
of all descriptions.

GREAT BENEFIT TO HARD-WORKING HORSES.

All diseased Stock SPEEDILY and CERTAINLY CURED; healthy Stock will be brought into the very HIGHEST STATE of PERFECTION by giving them a SPOONFULL, wee

NO LIVERY STABLE SHOULD BE WITHOUT
RAREY'S
CELEBRATED CONDITION POWDERS!

All FARMERS and RANCHMEN should use constantly
RAREY'S
CELEBRATED CONDITION POWDERS!

TEAMSTERS and STAGE COMPANIES everywhere should keep constantly on hand and free use
RAREY'S
CELEBRATED CONDITION POWDERS!

They are equal to a Life Insurance on all Stock, as will be fully appreciated on trial by all True Economists.

REDINGTON & CO., Sole Agents,
my28 416 and 418 Front Street, San Francisco.

DEATH'S DOINGS!

THE DEAD TELL NO TALES, 'TIS SAID. WHAT A pity 'tis 'tis true; for if they could, what a "skedaddling" there would be among the numerous quacks and impostors of the present time.

THE MEDICAL FACULTY

May differ in relation to the treatment of disease, but there is very little diversity of opinion among them as to its origin. The philanthropist does not contend that any man becomes at once a

DRUNKARD OR A THIEF

Nor does the well informed physician maintain that any one becomes at once an invalid. He knows that almost all diseases are of slow growth; that the seeds of disease are often sown at a remote period, and only await some change of climate or condition of the individual to manifest themselves.

A COMMON COLD!

Is the forerunner of many a fatal disease; a leading symptom of Consumption; a general disturber of the human system, and

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP

Is the greatest barrier that can be thrown in the way of its progress. Its timely use will ward off Consumption, cure the Asthma, Bronchitis, Sore Throat, and the thousand and one other ills so sure to follow in its wake when too long neglected or improperly treated.

REDINGTON & CO., Agents,
San Francisco.
And for sale everywhere se10-tf

$2,000 REWARD!

A REWARD OF TWO THOUSAND DOLLARS IS OFfered by the subscriber to any person who will discover or produce a better article for dressing and preserving the HAIR than the

TRICOMALICUM!!

known in California for many years for its wonderful properties.

The TRICOMALICUM, composed of substances tonic and strengthening, possesses the priceless quality of renewing the Hair, of destroying dandruff, and of dressing and keeping it in a perfectly healthy state.

PRINCIPAL DEPOT at the store of the inventor,

CHRISTIAN PFISTER,

se3-tf No. 227 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

QUINCY HALL

Clothing Emporium!

THE Largest and Finest Store in the State is QUINCY HALL, 545, 547, and 549 Washington street, where can be found clothing of every description, of the finest quality and latest style. Hats, Caps and Furnishing Goods.

se3-tf

TYLER BROTHERS,

Importers, Wholesale and Retail Dealers in

School Books, Stationery,

PHOTOGRAPH ALBUMS,

PORTFOLIOS JUVENILE BOOKS, CHILDREN'S PICTURE BOOKS, FANCY ARTICLES, etc.,

NO. 632 WASHINGTON STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO.

au27-tf

REOPENED FOR THE SEASON.

THE CRYSTAL SPRINGS HOTEL,

Situated four miles from the San Mateo Railroad depot, in a most splendid valley, surrounded with large, beautiful, natural trees, is now open for the public. The road from San Mateo to the house has been recently macadamized, making it the finest drive in California. The House and Cottages have been refitted and thoroughly renovated. New spring beds and every modern improvement have been added to the sleeping department. The larder, as usual, contains all the delicacies of the season. Stages leave San Mateo depot on the arrival of the trains for Crystal Springs.

A fine stable is now opened at San Mateo by Messrs. Byrnes & Ames, who will furnish horses and carriages, or saddle horses, at low rates, to the public. Parties wishing rooms or meals, on arrival, can engage them by telegraph, via San Mateo.

jul1-tf TONY OAKES, Proprietor.

SQUARZA'S PUNCH.

First Premium, Sacramento, 1862.

First Premium at San Francisco District Fair, 1863.

First and Special Premium, Sacramento, 1863.

Wholesale and Retail.

my28 44 Leidesdorff street, San Francisco.

EDWARD BOSQUI & CO.,

517

CLAY STREET, SAN FRANCISCO.

BOOKBINDERS, PAPER-RULERS, AND

ACCOUNT-BOOK MANUFACTURERS.

Blanks of all kinds printed and ruled to any desired pattern. my28

MRS. HENDRICKS,

No. 629 MISSION STREET,

Devotes herself exclusively to

EMBROIDERY, STAMPING AND PINKING,

And she does more work than any other person in her line. She has by far the best collection and the largest assortment of stamps in the city. Her patterns are the most carefully drawn, and her marking is the evenest and the easiest to work, especially for those who are not very skilful. The coloring of all others rubs out, and the figures, if not traced round with thread, are effaced before the work is done; but Mrs. Hendricks' coloring, on all kinds of stuff, is warranted to defy rubbing, though it can be easily washed out. She is an engraver and engraves her own stamps, and thus is enabled to supply herself with all the latest patterns fashionable in Eastern and European cities.

Any customer can get a new pattern cut without charge, if Mrs. Hendricks can use it afterwards. Although there are many others in the same business in San Francisco, all acknowledge the superiority of Mrs. Hendricks, and send the most difficult work to her. Ladies are invited to call and examine her patterns.

☞ Remember the number, 629 Mission street, San Francisco. jy30tf*

A LADY WISHES TO EXCHANGE LESsons in French, Music or Painting, for a room and board. Address "E. D. W.," care of W. H. BANCROFT, 609 Montgomery street. au13

ROSENBLATT'S

Palace of Fashion,

OPPOSITE THE OCCIDENTAL HOTEL.

FRENCH CORSETS, - - - ONE DOLLAR!

WE HAVE JUST RECEIVED BY THE LAST STEAMER Valenciennes and Point Lace Collars, Sleeves and Handkerchiefs, French Embroidered Bands, new style Hoop Skirts, Bustles, Russia Leather Bags, Onyx Breastpins and Ear-rings, Jet Chains and Bracelets, Hosiery, Gloves; Velvet, Cloth and Opera Cloaks,

Which are offered 25 per cent. less than New York Prices, on account of the high premium on gold, at

ROSENBLATTS PALACE OF FASHION,

123 and 125 Montgomery street.

Branch, 125 J street, between Fourth and Fifth streets, au20 Sacramento.

BOYS! BOYS! BOYS!

NOW IS THE TIME!

H. M. LOCKWOOD & CO.,

New No. 624) CLAY STREET, (Old No 176

Have received a Large Stock of

GENTS' AND BOYS' CLOTHING

—AND—

FURNISHING GOODS,

Which they are selling

AT VERY LOW PRICES.

Every Garment warranted. All are invited to call and examine our goods.

H. M. LOCKWOOD & CO.,

my28 624 Clay street, San Francisco.

H. LUCKE,

BOOTMAKER, AND IMPORTER

—OF—

FRENCH BOOTS, SHOES AND GAITERS OF THE LATEST PARISIAN MAKE AND MODE.

Lady customers can have their measures forwarded and their shoes made in Paris in the latest style and by the most celebrated manufacturers, at moderate rates.

No. 648 Washington street, below Kearny,

SIGN OF THE GOLDEN BOOT. jy30-3m

McRUER & MERRILL,

WHOLESALE AUCTION HOUSE,

204 and 206 California street.

Regular Sale Days - - - WEDNESDAYS and SATURDAYS (Advances on Consignments.)

NOTICE!

From this date Mr. A. P. EVERETT has an interest in our business. McRUER & MERRILL.

San Francisco, Octobe 20, 1862.

A. P. EVERETT, - - - - - - - - - Auctioneer.

jul1-3m

DR. GEORGE F. WOODWARD,

SURGEON U. S. PENSION BUREAU.

OFFICE, 127 MONTGOMERY STREET,

Opposite the Occidental Hotel, San Francisco.

jy30-tf

DR. J. H. HATCH,

DENTIST,

Graduate of the Pennsylvania College of Dental Surgery.

All operations pertaining to the profession thoroughly and skillfully performed. Entire satisfaction in all cases guaranteed.

Office, 645 Clay street, between Montgomery and Kearny street, San Francisco. au27

SAVE YOUR

E. F. BUNNELL, D.D.S.,

ROOMS, NO. 51 SECOND STREET.

DR. BUNNELL WILL SAVE EVERY TOOTH THAT ACHES from exposure of the nerve, or refund the charge for the operation, and extract each tooth without pay in EVERY case of failure. Teeth filled with gold, artificial bone, and golden lithodeon. Plate teeth on vulcanite and gold enameled base, of surpassing beauty and comfort.

☞ All work warranted. Price low. ☜

N. B.—More than 1,000 aching teeth have been saved in succession, without the loss of one. au27-3m

REMOVAL.

DR. JOHN HEALD,

DENTIST,

OFFICE AND RESIDENCE: STEVENSON HOUSE,

Montgomery street, corner of California. Entrance on both streets. Rooms 12 and 13. jy30-3m

WONDERFUL TRIUMPH

IN AMERICAN DENTISTRY.

DR. BEERS & CO.,

617 Clay street,

ARE NOW MANUFACTURING THE NEW style of ARTIFICIAL TEETH so highly approved at the East, and which to be appreciated only requires to be seen. The Teeth, Gums and Plate are made of one entire piece of Porcelain without seam or joint, combining great strength and beauty with absolute purity and freedom from any metallic taste, while the coloring of the gums and the interior of the mouth are so perfect as to almost defy detection. All interested in the progress of the Arts are invited to examine samples of this work.

Superior Gold and Vulcanite Work also manufactured as usual, but at greatly reduced prices. jul8

LAWRENCE & HOUSEWORTH,

OPTICIANS,

IMPORTERS OF OPTICAL, MATHEMATICAL AND PHILOSOPHICAL INSTRUMENTS,

STEREOSCOPIC GOODS,

PHOTOGRAPHIC ALBUMS,

CARTES DE VISITE,

AND

JOSEPH RODGERS & SON'S

SUPERIOR CUTLERY,

No. 637 CLAY STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO,

(ESTABLISHED IN 1851,)

HAVE FOR SALE THE LARGEST STOCK ON THE PACIFIC COAST, consisting in part as follows:

720 dozen SPECTACLES, in Gold, Silver, Steel and Plated Frames.
305 dozen EYE GLASSES, in Gold, Silver, Steel, Horn, Shell and Rubber Frames.
150 dozen WIRE GAUZE GOGGLES.
300 dozen SPECTACLE GLASSES and BRAZILIAN PEBBLES.
350 dozen SPECTACLE and EYE GLASS CASES.

395 Opera and Marine Glasses.	20,500 Card Photographs, Photographic Albums,
75 Telescope and Spy Glasses,	600 Album Pictures—in oil colors,
178 dozen Magnifying Glasses,	50 doz. Union Card Frames,
80 doz. Pocket Compasses,	Joseph Rodgers & Son's CUTLERY,
325 Hand Stereoscopes,	100 doz. Table Knives,
74 Revolving Stereoscopes	260 doz. Pocket Knives,
1025 doz. Stereoscopic Views	120 doz. Razors,
Drawing Instruments in German Silver and Brass,	50 doz. Razor Strops,
Boxwood and Ivory Scales,	130 doz. Scissors,
Microscopes in every Style,	SCISSORS, in Cases,
25 Magnetic Machines for Medical purposes,	100 doz. Gyroscope Tops,
Aneroid Barometers,	169 doz. Thermometers,
	25 doz. Hydrometers,
	Galvanic Batteries.

☞ COUNTRY TRADERS will consult their own interest by examining our Stock and Prices before purchasing elsewhere.

 ORDERS FROM THE COUNTRY promptly executed.

☞ CATALOGUES sent to any address FREE.

Address

LAWRENCE & HOUSEWORTH,

OPTICIANS,

637 CLAY STREET,

my28 SAN FRANCISCO.

R. G. SNEATH,

408 FRONT STREET, SAN FRANCISCO,

Importer and Wholesale Dealer in

GROCERIES, PROVISIONS, FLOUR, RICE

TOBACCOS, LIQUORS, ETC.

Branch House, - - SNEATH & BOARMAN, - - Red Bluff.

Forwarding Agent, D. W. EARL, Sacramento, who will receive and fill orders for all kinds of Goods on my account, and keep a large stock of Flour, Barley, Potatoes, Ground Food, etc., etc. No charge for forwarding.

ALMADEN QUICKSILVER!

Orders for Goods not in my line furnished customers without extra charge. Orders for Goods in the Eastern markets attended to promptly. Daily Prices Current furnished when desired.

Orders respectfully solicited. jul1-1m

CONTINENTAL HOTEL,

SAN JOSE.

GEORGE T. BROMLEY..... Proprietor.

As a desirable place of resort for health or recreation, the above Hotel is not surpassed in the State.

Excellent accommodations for families, by the day, week, or month, on reasonable terms.

ju25

REMOVAL.

A. EDDY'S

Dancing Academy,

Platt's (Middle) Hall.

PUPILS TAUGHT IN ONE-HALF THE TIME OF elsewhere.

CLASSES—MONDAYS and FRIDAYS. Ladies at half-past 2 P. M.; Gents at half-past 7 P. M.

CHILDREN'S CLASSES—On SATURDAYS, at 2 P. M.; also, on WEDNESDAYS, at half-past 3 P. M.

Private instructions given separately or to classes, to suit the convenience of applicants.

SELECT SOIREES on alternate weeks. au6-tf

CARRINGTON & CO'S

GENERAL PURCHASING AGENCY,

No. 40 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Personal Orders, small or large, and for articles of every descriptions, PROMPTLY and carefully attended to.

Who wants anything from New York?

THIS AGENCY

Enables Country Residents to make purchases in the City without troubling busy friends, or mere acquaintances.

IF YOU WANT

Books, Prints, Clothing, Instruments, Music, Tools, Weapons, Sporting Implements, Fancy Stock, Jewelry, Silver or Plated Ware, Wines, Cigars, Fine Groceries, Furniture, in short, any Article, large or small, singly or in quantity, for Ladies' or Gentlemen's use or wear.

or for Dealers' Supplies, from a seal-ring to a steam engine —a Cameo or a Cashmere; lace or leather,

SEND ON YOUR ORDERS.

We can fill them on better terms than you could obtain if here; while our commission, even on large orders, is much less than the expense of visiting the city in person.

Orders under $10, from places within reach of our daily Expresses, (except for perishable articles,) can be paid for on delivery by Express; others should be remitted for, either direct, or through some city friend to be paid when filled. Every order should be as clearly worded as possible.

Orders may be given in French, Spanish or German.

COMMISSION CHARGE, - - - FIVE PER CENT.

Address:

CARRINGTON & CO.,

au6 40 Broadway, N. Y.

OCCIDENTAL HOTEL—Corner Montgomery and Bush streets, San Francisco.

This House possesses all the requirements of a FIRST CLASS HOTEL, its spacious READING ROOM, with large MINERAL CABINET and extensive COLLECTION OF SPECIMENS from the different Mining Regions of the Pacific Coast—BRANCH TELEGRAPH OFFICE connecting with Lines throughout the country—and NEWS STAND—all contributing to make it the Headquarters and Home for the Californian business man and tourist.

The TABLE of this House shall not be excelled by any.

BOARD, THREE DOLLARS PER DAY.

LEWIS LELAND & CO.,

my28 Proprietors.

FARRAND'S OSCILLATING

Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALLED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REduction and amalgamation of Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY.

As a guarantee of what this machine will do, I propose, with any gentleman who will produce an Amalgamator that will work the same amount of ore in the same number of hours, with the same outlay of power, and produce the equal result, to deposit the sum of FIVE HUNDRED DOLLARS each, the money so deposited to be drawn by the person who shall be declared to have produced the best result. The money (the $500) by whichever party won to be paid over to some one of the benevolent institutions in this State, to be named by the party losing. This proposition is not made with the view of detracting from the merits of any Amalgamator now before the public, but for the purpose of placing this valuable improvement before such persons as may be interested in quartz milling, and to whom the matter properly belongs.

I CHALLENGE COMPETITION.

CALL AND SEE THE MACHINES WORK!

W. D. FARRAND.

R. L. OGDEN, Agent, Southeast corner of Montgomery and California streets, San Francisco. jy30tf

LOCKE & MONTAGUE,

IMPORTERS OF

STOVES AND METALS,

Nos. 112 and 114 Battery street,

jy2 SAN FRANCISCO.

GEORGE B. MERRILL,

ATTORNEY AT LAW,

Office, 520 Montgomery street, (over Messrs. Sather & Co.'s Bank,)

SAN FRANCISCO.

Gives special attention to the Probate of Wills and the Administration of Estates. au20

GREGORY YALE,

ATTORNEY AT LAW,

OFFICE—On second floor of Sather & Co.'s Bank, corner of Montgomery and Commercial streets, Nos. 2, 3 and 4, San Francisco. jy2

JOHN GORMAN,

NOTARY PUBLIC AND CONVEYANCER,

No. 705 MONTGOMERY STREET,

(Near Washington,)

Metropolitan Block, SAN FRANCISCO.

jy9

LEGAL.

IN THE COUNTY COURT of the city and county of San Francisco, State of California.—In the matter of the Petition of JOSEPH GENTH, an Insolvent Debtor.

Pursuant to an order of the Hon. Samuel Cowles, Judge of the said County Court, notice is hereby given to all the creditors of said Insolvent, JOSEPH GENTH, to be and appear before the Hon. Samuel Cowles, Judge as aforesaid, in open Court, at the court-room of said Court, in the City Hall, in the city and county of San Francisco, on MONDAY, the 26th day of SEPTEMBER, 1864, at 10 o'clock, A. M., of that day, then and there to show cause, if any they can, why the prayer of said Insolvent should not be granted, and an assignment of his estate be made, and he be discharged from his debts and liabilities, in pursuance of the statute in such case made and provided; and in the mean time all proceedings against said Insolvent be stayed.

Witness, my hand and the seal of said Court, this 22d day of August, A. D. 1864.

(Seal and stamp.) WM. LOEWY, Clerk.

By J. NAPHTALY, Deputy Clerk.

Burnett & Cleveland, Attorneys for Petitioner, 634 Clay street. au23-5t

IN THE DISTRICT COURT of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco.—FANNY L. GREEN, Plaintiff, vs. ROBERT E. GREEN, Defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said city and county of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to ROBERT E. GREEN, Defendant: You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff, in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days, (exclusive of the day of service,) after the service on you of this Summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this District, within twenty days; otherwise, within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree dissolving the bonds of matrimony existing between the plaintiff and defendant, and permitting plaintiff to resume her maiden name of Fanny L. Brown, and for costs of suit and general relief. And you are hereby notified, that if you fail to appear and answer the said Complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and Seal of the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 25th day of August, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-four.

Seal and Int. Rev. Stamp. WM. LOEWY, Clerk.

By WM. R. SATTERLEE, Deputy Clerk.

J. D. Stevenson, Plaintiff's Attorney. se3

WORLD'S HORSE FAIR,

AT BAY VIEW PARK.

PROGRAMME

FOR THIS DAY, SATURDAY, SEPT. 10TH,

At 11 A. M., Boy Equestrians, under 14 years old, for a premium of Silver Plate, valued at $25; for which there are ten entries.

At 12 M. grand display of

LADY EQUESTRIANS,

FOR THREE PRIZES, WORTH $600!

1st premium: Silver plate valued at $300.

2d premium: Silk dress pattern, valued at $200, given by Messrs. Austin & Schmitt, the choice of their entire stock.

3d premium: Lady's fine Point Lace set, valued at $100, awarded by Joseph Roberts & Co.,

For which the following names are registered:

Miss Madeline Perry, San Francisco,
Miss D. B. Harris, San Francisco,
Miss Emily Wicks, San Jose,
Miss Rosa Taylor, San Francisco,
Miss Ellen Clark, San Francisco,
Miss Jennie Hamilton, San Francisco,
Miss Mary J. Hamilton, San Francisco,
Miss Olmstead, San Francisco,
Mrs. J. B. Saufley, Contra Costa,
Miss Teresa Inglemire, Contra Costa,
Mrs. Alexander Hoy, San Francisco,
Miss Isabella Cook, San Mateo.

At 2 o'clock:

GREAT TEN MILE TROT!

FOR A PREMIUM OF $500.

J. M. Daniels names Lady Lancaster.
Charles H. Shear names Fillmore.
J. L. Eoff names Gentleman George.
Barney Rice names Seward.

☞ The above programme will be executed promptly.

se10-1t W. F. WILLIAMSON, Proprietor.

NICARAGUA ROUTE RE-OPENED.

650 MILES LESS OCEAN TRAVEL IN THE TROPICS THAN TO PANAMA!

SHORTEST AND QUICKEST ROUTE TO NEW YORK!

THE CENTRAL AMERICAN TRANSIT COMPANY will despatch the commodious and favorite steamship

AMERICA,

W. L. MERRY, Esq. - - - - - Commander,

FOR SAN JUAN DEL SUR, NICARAGUA,

ON WEDNESDAY, - - - SEPTEMBER 21ST,

From Mission street Wharf, at 10 o'clock, A. M., precisely,

Connecting at GREYTOWN with the new and swift Steamship

GOLDEN RULE,

3,500 TONS, FOR NEW YORK.

The transit over the Isthmus is now in fine order. The passengers are conveyed from San Juan to Virgin Bay over a good macadamized road, a distance of twelve miles, in Concord coaches built expressly for this route. The balance of the transit is performed by steamers. The Company have two on the Lake and six on the River, capable of accommodating twelve hundred passengers with ease.

For information or passage, apply to

I. W. RAYMOND, AGENT, Agent,
Northwest corner Battery and Pine streets,
se10 Up stairs, San Francisco.

THE MOST EXTENSIVE,

BEST SELECTED, CHEAPEST,

—AND—

LATEST STYLES

—OF—

Furniture.

GOODWIN & CO.,

No. 528 Washington street,

Are constantly receiving, and have on hand a large assortment of FINE ROSEWOOD, MAHOGANY, and BLACK WALNUT PARLOR, LIBRARY and CHAMBER SUITS, with DINING ROOM SUITS TO ORDER.

☞ We guarantee both Price and Quality satisfactory to our Patrons.

GOODWIN & CO.,

Jy18 No. 528 Washington street.

ADMINISTRATOR'S SALE of Real ESTATE.

NOTICE IS HEREBY GIVEN, THAT IN PURSUANCE of an order of the Probate Court of the city and county of San Francisco, State of California, made on the 16th day of August, 1864, in the matter of the Estate of ANDREW ROBESON, deceased, the undersigned Administrator, with the will annexed, of said deceased, will sell to the highest bidder for cash, payable in United States gold coin, and subject to confirmation by said Probate Court, on MONDAY, the 10th day of OCTOBER, 1864, at 12 o'clock, noon, of that day, at No. 108 Front street, in said city and county, all the right, title and interest of the said Andrew Robeson at the time of his death, and all the right, title and interest that the said estate has, by law or otherwise, since acquired, other than or in addition to that of said deceased at the time of his death, in and to all that certain lot of land situated in said city and county, and described as follows:

Commencing at a point on the north line of Ellis street 77 1-2 feet west from the northwest corner of Mason and Ellis streets; thence running westerly along said line of Ellis street 20 feet, thence at a right angle northerly 60 feet, thence at a right angle easterly 20 feet, and thence at a right angle southerly 60 feet to the point of beginning.

And the said Administrator will receive offers or bids therefor at said place, No. 108 Front street, from this date till said 10th day of October, 1864

EDWARD F STONE,
Administrator, with the will annexed, of
Andrew Robeson, deceased.

D. P. Barstow, Attorney for Administrator, 24 Montgomery Block. se10-5t

MAGUIRE'S OPERA HOUSE.

T. MAGUIRE - - - - - - - - PROPRIETOR
C. L. GRAVES - - - - - - - STAGE MANAGER
W. STEVENSON - - - - - - - TREASURER.

AFTERNOON PERFORMANCE TO-DAY,

FOR LADIES AND CHILDREN,

At HALF PRICES,

Commencing at 2 o'clock.

MRS. H. A. PERRY,

—IN—

The French Spy!

SATURDAY EVENING, SEPTEMBER 10th, 1864,

MRS. H. A. PERRY AND THE STAR COMPANY

—IN—

Margaret Catchpole;

OR, THE FEMALE HORSE THIEF.

Margaret Catchpole - - - - Mrs H. A. PERRY
Ben Luff - - - - - - - - Frank Mayo
Jonathan Catchpole - - - - - D. C. Anderson
Muffin Pegs - - - - - - - W Barry
Gooseberry Pip - - - - - - C. L. Graves
Sally - - - - - - - - - Mrs C R Saunders
Mrs. Palmer - - - - - - - Kate Archer

PRICES OF ADMISSION.—Dress Circle and Orchestra Seats $1: Parquet 50c.; Gallery 25c.

Doors open at 7 o'clock. Performances will commence at a quarter before 8. au27

NOVELTY! NOVELTY! NOVELTY!

WILSON, ZOYARA & CARLO'S

Great Circus!

THIS MAMMOTH COMBINATION OF CIRCUS TALENT

Is now PERFORMING EVERY EVENING until further notice, in the

LARGE AND ELEGANT PAVILION,

Adjoining International Hotel,

When there will be presented to the San Francisco public a host of novelties.

The CARLO GROUPE are now and make their first appearance in this city.

The Manager, Mr. JOHN WILSON, is determined that the entertainment shall excel in every particular, and be worthy of patronage; he having concentrated in this company not only the largest and most complete Circus in the World, but the elite of the Equestrian, Gymnastic, Acrobatic, Juggling, Vaulting and Posturing performers of the country.

PRICES OF ADMISSION.

Dress Circle - - - - - - - - - - $1 00
Second Circle - - - - - - - - - - 0 50
Reserved Chairs - - - - - - - - 50c extra

☞ Grand Afternoon Performance for families every Saturday.

Doors open at 7 o'clock; performances commence at 8.

se3 JOHN WILSON, Proprietor.

EUREKA MINSTREL HALL,

Montgomery street, near Pine.

T. MAGUIRE - - - - - - - - PROPRIETOR
GEO. H. COES - - - - - - - STAGE MANAGER

GRAND OPENING NIGHT!

MONDAY EVENING - - - SEPT. 5TH.

THE EVER POPULAR

SAN FRANCISCO MINSTRELS!

Consisting of the following well known Artists:

Billy Birch, Charles Backus,
D. S. Wambold, Sig. R. Abecco,
George H. Coes, Martin Simonsen,
Frank Medina, S. Wasburg,
C. F. Shattuck, Signor Pinto,
F. Harris, E. Grob, and
MRS. FANNY SIMONSEN.

A grand CHANGE OF PERFORMANCE EACH EVENING.

NEW SONGS, ACTS, BURLESQUES, DANCES, etc., will be performed in rapid succession.

Dress Circle and Orchestra Seats, 50 cents; Parquet, 25 cents; Private Boxes, $5; Reserved Seats, 25 cents extra.

Doors open at 7 o'clock. Curtain will rise at 8 o'clock, precisely.

LIGHT GYMNASTICS.

C. J. ROBINSON'S GYMNASTIC CLASSES, at Miss Aldrich's Academy, will be closed for two weeks from date; the new Term opening on THURSDAY, September 15th. An Evening Class of young men for instruction in Military Drill, will also be formed. For admission to membership, apply at the Academy, Stevenson street, near the corner of Market and Second streets.

San Francisco, September 1st, 1864.

CALIFORNIA BRANCH

—OF THE—

U. S. SANITARY COMMISSION.

ALL COMMUNICATIONS AND REMITTANCES SHOULD be addressed to the

OFFICE, NO. 240 MONTGOMERY STREET,

Southeast corner of Pine.

O. C. WHEELER, Secretary.

D. C. McRUER, Chairman Executive Committee.

R. G. SNEATH, Treasurer.

Office Hours: 9 A. M. to 4 P. M.

A LADY WISHES TO EXCHANGE LESsons in French, Music or Painting, for a room and board. Address "E. D. W.," care of W. H. BANCROFT, 609 Montgomery street. au13

MAGUIRE'S ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

THOMAS MAGUIRE - - - - - - Sole Owner
Mr PETER RICHINGS, - - - - - - Manager
G. T. EVANS - - - - - - - Musical Director

ENGLISH OPERA SEASON.

THE RICHINGS'

English Opera Troupe!

THE FIRST BENEFIT IN SAN FRANCISCO

OF

MR. EDWARD SEGUIN,

WILL TAKE PLACE

THIS (SATURDAY) EVENING, SEPT. 10TH,

Upon which occasion will be presented for the last time, Eichberg's successful opera of

The Doctor of Alcantara!

Doctor Paracelsus - - - - - - Mr. E. Seguin
Don Carlos - - - - - - - - Mr. W. J. Hill
Senor Balthazar - - - - - - - Mr. P Richings
Don Pomposo - - - - - - - - Mr. H. C. Peakes
Donna Isabella - - - - - - - Miss J. Kempton
Donna Lucrezia - - - - - - - Miss Kate Martin
Inez - - - - - - - Miss CAROLINE RICHINGS

TO-MORROW (SUNDAY) EVENING:

FRA DIAVOLO.

MONDAY EVENING,

First night of MARITANA.

PRICES OF ADMISSION—Dress Circle and Parquet, $1; Reserved seats, 50 cents extra; Family Circle, 50 cents; Gallery, 25 cents. se10

GILBERT'S MUSEUM,

Market street, opposite Second street, over the Occidental Market.

F. GILBERT - - - - - - - - Proprietor
J. A. ROWE, - - - - - - - - Manager

OPEN EVERY DAY AND EVENING.

HOME AGAIN!

JAMES MURPHY, THE IRISH GIANT BOY,

Who has just returned from the interior.

This wonderful young man has grown some three inches in height, and is some sixty pounds heavier; he therefore now weighs over three hundred pounds, and stands nearly eight feet and a half high, making him really the most Colossal Giant—old or young, man or boy—the world ever saw. Don't fail to see him.

Also, just engaged, the celebrated

ALBINO FAMILY,

Consisting of brother and sister, with beautiful snowy, wavy hair, perfectly white skin, and pink eyes—the most novel, wonderful and instructive exhibition ever presented to the public. Every student of nature should witness this extraordinary phenomena.

Still astounding and startling the world, the

GREAT SNAKE-CHARMER, M. DE BAR.

Also, the great Mathematical Wonder,

THE LIGHTNING CALCULATOR,

From Barnum's Museum.

THE WONDERFUL TYROLEAN WARBLER

Will give his interesting Musical Exhibitions throughout the day and evening.

Notwithstanding the great expense attending this unprecedented array of novelties, the management announces the prices as before.

THE GREAT CEROPLASTIC GROUP OF LIFE-LIKE FIGURES, AND

UPWARDS OF 2,000 CURIOSITIES!

Also, a beautiful set of COSMORAMIC VIEWS, illustrating the PRINCIPAL CITIES OF AMERICA. There is also an AQUARIA GARDEN attached to the Museum.

The admission to the entire Exhibition is only 25 cents. Children, 15 cents. se3-1m

The Willows.

W. H. BARNARD, - - - - Proprietor.

THE HOTEL of this popular and fashionable place of public resort has been so far completed as to enable the lessee to open its Saloon and beautifully shaded grounds permanently for reception of visitors. The Grove has been culled and trimmed; the flower beds replanted and cultivated into fragrant bloom; the aquarium replaced, with the addition to its former feathered collection of four elegant black Australian Swans. The proprietor has also added a large collection of birds, embracing two Golden Pheasants and a brace of Silver Pheasants.

The Theatre has been entirely remodelled; the stage newly decorated, new galleries erected, the seats rendered more comfortable, and the floors replaced.

The Shooting Gallery, the Ten Pin Alleys, and the Shuffle Boards have been replaced.

The Flying Horses for children, are in readiness to perform daily duty.

Ample stabling is attached to the premises, attended by polite and watchful grooms.

MURPHY & BRAY'S

CELEBRATED MINSTRELS,

Will give a performance in the Theatre every SUNDAY Afternoon.

Mr. E. WOODWARD, formerly known to the San Francisco public, will give his personal attention to the Bar.

On the first of August, the Lodging apartments Restaurant and Ladies' Refreshment Saloon of the WILLOWS were thrown open to the public. Ladies, gentlemen and children visiting the grounds will find ample entertainment and amusement. se10-tf

MECHANICS' INSTITUTE.

OPENING

—OF—

The Industrial Exhibition.

The Grand Pavilion was thrown open to the Public on last SATURDAY) MORNING, and is now open daily for the reception of visitors.

The North Beach and Mission Railroad cars pass the Fair Grounds every few minutes.

Season Tickets for Lady and Gentleman - - $5 00
Season Tickets for one person - - - - - 3 00
Tickets for Single Admission - - - - - 50

Tickets may be had at the Institute, on California street, or of any member of the Executive Committee.

By order of the EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.

HEALTH

AND AMUSEMENT,

COMBINED!

C. J. ROBINSON'S SELECT CLASSES,

In Dr. Dio Lewis's System of

LIGHT GYMNASTICS!

At MISS ALDRICH'S ACADEMY, Stevenson street,

Near corner of Market and Second streets, San Francisco,

For Scientific Physical Training and Recreative Exercise, in classes, by persons of all ages and conditions of health, and by both sexes, with light and movable apparatus, and an invariable and appropriate musical accompaniment. While the Exercises of the Light Gymnastics impart strength, grace, activity and symmetry to the person, they at the same time furnish an exhaustless fund of social enjoyment and mental recreation.

Mr. ROBINSON has recently been employed to teach this system in all the public schools of this city.

CLASSES meet on Tuesdays and Fridays at 8 P. M. For admission or further information, apply at the Academy.

Mr. ROBINSON will give instruction, on application to classes and private pupils, in VOCAL CULTURE and ELOCUTION, as taught by the best masters in the East.

jy28 1m

LATE PUBLICATIONS.

A. Roman & Co.,

Are constantly in the receipt, by Steamer,

—OF—

ALL THE NEW PUBLICATIONS

OF THE DAY.

Among those recently received are the following:

Seven Stories, with Basement and Attic. By Ik Marvel.
Macaria; a Novel. By the author of "Beulah."
Bridal Eve. By Mrs Southworth;
Self-Sacrifice. By the author of "Margaret Maitland;"
Linnet's Trial; a Tale. By "S. M.," author of "Twice Lost;"
From Cape Cod to Dixie and the Tropics. By J. Milton Mackie.
The Silver Sunbeam; a Practical and Theoretical Text Book on Sun Drawing and Photographic Printing, by Towler;
The Blannerhasset Papers. By Safford;
Phantom Flowers; a Treatise on the Art of Producing Skeleton Leaves. Illustrated;
Wax Flowers: How to Make Them;
Hotspur; a Novel. By Walworth;
Denise; by the author of "Mademoiselle Mori." 2 vols;
Patriotism, and other Papers. By T. Starr King;
Parton's Life of Franklin. 2 vols;
Haunted Hearts; by the author of "The Lamplighter."
History of President Lincoln's Administration. By H. J. Raymond;
Darkness and Daylight. By Mrs. Holmes.

☞ We have on hand the largest stock of

Standard, Miscellaneous and Library Books

to be found in this city, embracing every department of

LITERATURE, ART AND SCIENCE.

BOOKS IMPORTED TO ORDER.

A. ROMAN & CO.,

417 and 419 MONTGOMERY STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO.

Jy30-1m

SAN FRANCISCO AND SAN JOSE RAILROAD.

CHANGE OF TIME.

On and after MARCH 1st, 1864, Trains will leave the Depot on Brannan street, between Third and Fourth, for San Jose and Way Stations, as follows:

Leave San Francisco at 8 A. M. and 4 30 P. M.
Leave San Jose at 7:30 A. M. and 4 P. M.

SUNDAYS.

On Sundays, Three Trains will be run, as follows:

Leave San Francisco at 8 1-2 and 10 1-2 A. M., and 4 1-2 P. M.
Leave San Jose at 8 A. M. and 4 and 7 P. M.

Passengers can reach the Depot by either the Third or Fourth street lines of city cars.

A. H. HOUSTON,
General Superintendent.

an20

MARKET STREET RAILROAD.

CHANGE OF TIME TABLE.

ON AND AFTER APRIL 1, 1864, Trains will start from the City and the Mission as follows:

Between the hours of 8:20 A. M. and 6 P. M., every 40 minutes, instead of, as heretofore, every 30 minutes, thus

FROM THE MISSION.

9:40	10:20	11:00	11:40

FROM THE CITY.

10:00	10:40	11:20	12:00

And so on till 6 o'clock.

Before 9 A. M. and after 6 P. M., the running will be the same as before.

my28 F. McCOPPIN, Superintendent.

The Californian.

"SURELY THERE IS A VEIN FOR THE SILVER AND A PLACE FOR GOLD WHERE THEY FINE IT."

VOL. I.--NO. 17. SAN FRANCISCO, SEPTEMBER 17, 1864. TERMS { $5 A YEAR, BY MAIL, IN ADVANCE / 50 CENTS A MONTH, BY CARRIER.

CONTENTS:

ORIGINAL ARTICLES:
Pour Passer le Temps—by "Restless."
On a Great Public Institution.—By Bret.
An Hour or Two with the Spirits—By Flyleaf.
A Reminiscence of Alma Mater.
A Book for the Times.
POETRY—
San Francisco by the Poets,
On a Naughty Little Boy, Sleeping.
THE COUNTESS DIANA—A Translation.

EDITORIALS:
Californians in the East.
Fashions in San Francisco.

PHILOSOPHIC PARAGRAPHS:
Selected sayings of Wise Men.

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS:
Minor Topics as They suggest Themselves.

SCIENTIFIC PARAGRAPHS:
Of Interest to All.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS:
Interesting Items from Exchanges.

SELECTED SKETCHES, STORIES, etc.
The Deserted House on the Landes.
Three Spanish Pictures.
Sentimentalism.
General Utility.
A Scene at Pompeii.
My First Deal in Horseflesh.
Mark Lemon's Jest-Book.
Laconic Love-Letters.
The Glass of Fashion.
Common Sayings.
POETRY—
A Common Trick.
After the Wedding.
Enoch Arden.
Thackeray's Four Georges.
The Presidential Showman.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL:
A review of the Drama and Lyric Stage for the Week.

DOMESTIC RECEIPTS.
Practical Receipts for the Household.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

POUR PASSER LE TEMPS.

DEAR CALIFORNIAN.—I was horrified on looking over my last-week's jottings to discover that you had made me quote Albert Smith, the great Mont Blanc showman, as the poet Alexander—all owing, doubtless, to the multiplicity of Smiths. But there are distinctions as well as differences, and the family run to varied and various occupations. Some are poets, some are authors, and some are nice young men, who drive very nice grey horses; but Alexander is the gentleman my friend proposed to join, and that you may all know what I meant, I suppose I must do what is generally a very great nuisance—explain my joke—it becoming necessary from one of two causes: want of comprehension and general intelligence of the reader, or the very obtuse and complicated nature of the witticism. Alexander says in his poem:

> "My soul leaped up beneath thy timid kiss;
> What then to me were groans,
> Or pain, or death? Earth was a round of bliss,
> I seemed to walk on thrones—" alluding to the little enterprise shown by his heroine, who, after a good deal of vascillating and faint-heartedness, mustered up courage to kiss him, whereupon he made a great deal more fuss about it than a little trivial accident of that sort deserved. I don't think he had much of a run of custom in that line of business.

SPEAKING of explaining things, reminds me that a great many people don't understand your motto, and a greater number don't imagine what and where it is from. I have been asked frequently, "Where did they get that? and what does it mean?" I can understand their coming to me to ascertain the authority, it being from the Bible; but to ask what it means is a sight-draft on common sense; and as that appears to be like coin in Wall street, scarce and at a premium, I don't propose to dispose of any that I may have to spare at present rates. For the information of those of your readers who never would come across it in their readings, I will mention that it is derived from Job xxviii: 1.

THOSE benighted people who did not go to Seguin's benefit, Saturday evening, missed a rich treat. They would have had an opportunity of witnessing the results and general effects of the Doctor of Alcantara's treatment of his patients. There are a great many practitioners hereabouts that are very much on that style, with this difference: their patients seldom revive. The Doctor's dye-stuff was tolerably potent, however, and I had a twinge of the same agony so feelingly depicted by Mr. Hill, for an hour after, and it was only by mild restoratives, applied internally by Jones at his sample-rooms, that I was enabled to go home comfortably. That the Doctor's stuff was very strong was perfectly evident, and Mr. Hill evinced a lively appreciation of its merits, and it left him in a bad box. Mr. Seguin is incomparable in the character of the Doctor; and, as a whole, it is one of the most amusing and entertaining things the troupe have played and sung, for it is a cross between an opera and a comedy—considerable of both. The pleasant frame of mind they all leave the old Don in is not to be envied, and about the prettiest conceit of the whole piece is the adieu to the old gentleman. Everybody is humming the air. I went to bed that evening with a couple of night-caps procured at Jones's, as aforesaid, and awoke a dozen times before morning, murmuring:

> "May no ghost your slumbers mar;
> Good-night, Señor Balthazar!"

and finally jumped out as frantically as the old Don himself, imagining a veritable ghost under my bed, which proved, however, to be my dog Sport, much afflicted with that wicked flea that every man and woman pursueth in California.

SPEAKING of the Opera reminds me that Maritana has been played three nights of this week to fair houses. It should have filled the house to a jam, for there is no English opera that can compare with it. The music generally is sweet, the instrumentation beautiful, and every air is a gem. It strikes me—although I do not assume to be of the dilettanti—that if Mr. Seguin would not throw himself in his one favorite attitude so frequently, it would be better. He is not always an upright man, although he may be a downright clever fellow. He seems to have been drilled under Scott's tactics, and forgotten everything about it except "Right-shoulder, forward!" The dropping of the shoulder and extension of the right arm is a mannerism so characteristic of his singing that perhaps if he were to straighten up he could no more sing than a Frenchman could talk with his hands tied; but as I am a strong friend of Seguin's, and have his well-doing really at heart, he will, I am sure, forgive me for mentioning these little faults, which mar his really fine performances. It is a nice thing to have a friend to be telling one continually of one's faults in a good-natured way—makes one feel so pleasant and amiable. Nothing like it!

I can't say I admired Peakes in the character of the King. There was too much "Devil's-hoof" in it, and he made his entrances and exits as if he had served his time as package-deliverer for Wells, Fargo & Co. There was a vehemence of manner and a roughness that ill-accorded with the courtly character of a king; and I don't wonder "Maritana" didn't fancy him. A grizzly bear would not have shown a more muscular style of love-making than did he when he entered like a Congreve rocket and fired his words at her with a blunderbus. It was enough to scare the girl to death, anyhow. Temper your words and manner, "Me Baby." Modulate and soften down your notes, and don't throw them at the lady in that vigorous manner, or you will never win any woman's love by singing it at her. It strikes me that the indiscriminate praise and adulation showered down upon the devoted head of friend Peakes, alias "Baby Lablache," has been of immense service in the way of bring out his faults, so that the public can see them and point them out to him. Let not the "Baby" forget that however competent one man may be to criticise, and award unqualified and wholesale praise, he may only represent his own individual opinion and not that of the public. Therefore, it is not well to relax in effort and say, If the public like me so much as I am, why should I bore myself by study. Peakes must study, or he will bore the public as well. It is not well for any man to allow the praise he gets, however worthy he may be of it, to give him that very common disease generally known as "the big head." It is a disease that stands wonderfully in the way of a man's advancement, and the less he has of it the better for him; and the speediest way of reducing it is to listen to a little wholesome advice from any one who is willing to do justice, be fair and set nothing down in malice. I say, Peakes has a splendid voice, but he is careless and inattentive. He evidently does not devote that time to his "parts" that the music requires. It strikes me that he don't like study; and if he won't study he never will acquire fame. I would not wonder if the trio in the last act is omitted because he can't sing it. And why can't he sing it? Probably because he won't study it. That, at least, is the most natural supposition.

Miss Kempton certainly deserves praise for great painstaking and the study and care she gives her role. She is always correct, and although not always in good voice, shows a praiseworthy desire to do her best. In the duet in the last act of Maritana she sings beautifully; and that duet, of itself, is worth the dollar admittance. Miss Richings and herself have been encored on each occasion.

How happy it would make me if those two German gentlemen who blow the horns in the orchestra should some day get short of wind and blow more gently. I have been for a long time under great apprehensions lest they should blow their brains out, if they have any, which I am disposed to doubt, or they would not seek to drown out the whole orchestra and the voices of the singers entirely. There are times when those two horns have the floor all to themselves, and not a note from the throats of the singers are heard. And it is not the fault of Mr. Evans, the leader, either; for I have noticed that he has been made perfectly frantic and tried with his baton to slow down those vigorous Teutons; but they toot on, regardless of all decency and propriety. The most effectual method would be to have a baton long enough to reach their heads, and, when pianissimo is required, give the two Gabriels the stick-ato.

I WENT to the Fair Thursday evening, with the intention of making a few notes and jottings for your edification; but the crowd was so great I could not see anything, and I am going to see it by daylight. It was almost impossible to find any one. I learned that some friends were there, and commenced a search for them at half-past seven, and did not encounter them until about nine o'clock. As there were ladies in the party, I bethought me of the lace and bonnet department; and there they were, sure enough. I did not like to disturb them—they were so intensely interested in that showcase of French hats, and so deeply were they absorbed, that the people, the music, everything passed unheeded. It took them three-fourths of an hour to do the Bonnets, and at half-past ten, when I left, they had only accomplished the Furs and the Laces. Just imagine the number of visits they must make to do the entire Fair. However, they can't be expected to find anything so intensely interesting as the part they have already "done." Laces, bonnets, furs, kid gloves and diamonds would absorb the best woman in the world; and by the same token, these best women absorb a great deal of money, indulging in those little weaknesses. If you want to find people at the Fair, the only way to make sure of it and save labor and fatigue, is to appoint an hour and a moment to meet, not by moonlight alone, but by gas light, at the big cheese.

RESTLESS.

THE TROT.—The match for $2,000 a side, best three in five, between Mr. Teackle's horse Gentleman George, and McKinty's Stockbroker, (née Bally Lewis,) came off at Bay View Park Thursday morning, and resulted in favor of Gentleman George, who won in three straight heats—best time, 2:38. The attendance was fair, considering the rather unusual hour for a trot, but it was a very sensible idea to have it in the morning, before the gentle zephyrs begin to whirl the dust into the eyes; and we doubt not the horses never will say neigh to the change of hour. Gentleman George appears to have entirely recovered from his ten-mile trot, and looked as fresh and lively as if he never had trotted in his life. We expect to see him do his mile inside of thirty yet. We would suggest to McKinty to change the name of his steed once more, on account of the general tendency of Stock-brokers in these days to fall a little behind time—and contracts on time to make time, or come to time, troubles them a little, as it did Stockbroker on this occasion, although the old horse is game to the last.

A MAN should learn to detect and watch that gleam of light which flashes across his mind from within, more than the lustre of the firmament of bards and sages. Yet he dismisses without notice his thought, because it is his. In every work of genius we recognize our own rejected thoughts; they come back to us with a certain alienated majesty. Great works of art have no more affecting lessons for us than this. They teach us to abide by our spontaneous impression with good-humored inflexibility tho most when the whole cry of the voices is on the other side. Else, to-morrow, a stranger will say with masterly good sense precisely what we have thought and felt all the time, and we shall be forced to take with shame our own opinion from another.

HAPPINESS grows at our own firesides, and is not to be picked in strangers' gardens.

A COMMON TRICK.

I TELL in verse—'twere better done in prose—
One curious trick that everybody knows;
Once form this habit, and it 's very strange
How long it sticks, how hard it is to change.
Two friendly people, both disposed to smile,
Who meet, like others, every little while,
Instead of passing with a pleasant bow,
And "How d'ye do?" or "How's your uncle now?"
Impelled by feelings in their nature kind,
But slightly weak, and somewhat undefined,
Rush at each other, make a sudden stand,
Begin to talk, expatiate, and expand:
Each looks quite radiant, seems extremely struck,
Their meeting so was such a piece of luck;
Each thinks the other thinks he 's greatly pleased
To screw the vice in which they both are squeezed;
So there they talk, in dust, or mud, or snow,
Both bored to death, and both afraid to go!
Your hat once lifted, do not hang your fire,
Nor, like slow Ajax, fighting still, retire;
When your old castor on your crown you clap,
Go off; you've mounted your percussion cap.

[O. W. Holmes.

THE DESERTED HOUSE ON THE LANDES.

IN the midst of the flat, grassy, furze-besprinkled plain which lies between that town of ancient memories, La Teste de Buch, and the more modern one of Cazeaux, may be seen a large substantial-looking stone house. There, as if just dropped in the midst of the solitude, it stands, deserted and alone—its nearest neighbors the funereal pines which stand immovable on the distant horizon, and form as it were a silent living wall, closing in the plain on every side. The situation of the house is undoubtedly peculiar, but in the building itself there is not the smallest claim to the romantic. Far from ruinous, certainly not picturesque, the plain unadorned stone edifice looks commonplace and ordinary to a degree. There it stood in its utter dreary loneliness the April morning I saw it first, the door ajar, as if silently inviting the entrance of some passer-by; but the inquisitive grasses that peered cautiously through the window-panes were its only visitors. Undoubtedly it had its history, but a thick veil of mystery hung darkly over it, and overshadowed its past life with a gloomy pall.

"Eh! mon Dieu, monsieur," said the horror-stricken Arcachon gamin, who, having constituted himself my guide, and goad to the wretched horse on which I was mounted, was following me in the above capacities to Cazeaux, and beguiling the weary way through the Landes by a flood of gossiping talk. "Eh, mon Dieu! no one would think of going into that house," strongly reprobating my desire to go near it, and pulling the head of my hired charger in the opposite direction.

"And why not?" I asked, applying the butt of my fishing-rod in the spirit of opposition pretty forcibly to Coco's hind-quarters, whose skin, by the way, was about as sensitive as the hide of a rhinoceros.

"Because, because," gasped the boy, keeping tight hold of the bridle, "there are ghosts there"——

"Which I should particularly like to see. Bah!" I continued, "what do you expect to happen, mon ami? The ghosts are not likely to eat you, though you are young and tender."

"Si, si, monsieur," said Georges, showing his white teeth to great advantage, "they might well do it, for they are wicked, ces messieurs-la."

"Well then, my child," I said, dismounting; "if you don't like to visit them, stay here. I couldn't be so impolite. If I don't come back, why, then you may suppose they have been inhospitable enough to eat me, but, par exemple," I continued, involuntarily shrugging my shoulders, "such a tough morsel is not likely to tempt them, if they have any common sense, or know what indigestion means."

But Georges was very unhappy all the same. He implored, remonstrated, almost came to tears, "mais, que voulez-vous," as I heard him afterwards observe to a select audience at Cazeaux: "My father truly says that the English are so eccentric, so obstinate. Ah, how my heart beat, how I suffered! But monsieur apparently cared for none of these things," for, fishing-rod in hand, I walked up to the open door through a flood of bright morning sunshine, and having pushed it a few inches wider open, entered the hall. "What was to be seen there," do you ask? Just nothing. And the empty void of the hall repeated itself in the room to the right, the door of which stood open. Cobwebs in abundance certainly, but no other sign of life. The lock of the second door on the right was stiff, but at last it suddenly opened, and I went in. This room was furnished, the bare-boarded floor indeed had no carpet, the windows had no curtains, but there was a great sofa near the fireplace where the half-burned logs of wood lay blackened and charred. Over the chimney-piece was the inevitable mirror. An arm-chair with a tumbled, somewhat faded chintz cover, faced the sofa on the opposite side of the hearth. A round mahogany table with a thick coating of dust, in which, after the manner of my countrymen, I wrote my name (you see I had no visiting-cards to leave), stood in the middle of the floor; another table in the far window, a very ancient piano against the wall near the door, some dozen or so of chairs covered with chintz of the same pattern as the arm-chair, stood grouped near the tables and ranged against the wall. Such was the furniture. Having surveyed the room to my satisfaction, I returned to the hall, and went upstairs. All the rooms there were empty except two. In one were two bedsteads, "with bedding complete," to use an auctioneer's phrase; a marble-topped table, over which was a mirror, the gilding of its frame a good deal tarnished and worn off; and three or four chairs. The other, a very small room, contained a turned-up bedstead only, which not looking particularly interesting, I did not care to examine, but retraced my steps downstairs. There was a nest of small rooms, some boarded, some flagged, opposite to those I first visited; one, that had evidently been the kitchen, contained some kitchen utensils hanging up against the wall, and a large deal table; but the rest were empty, and having looked through them, and thus "done" the house, I returned to my gamin Georges, who had meanwhile retired to a safe distance on the grassy plain, and hailed me as joyfully as he might have hailed one risen from the dead. Poor little chap! though not, perhaps, the stuff of which heroes are made, he was a nice little fellow, and capital company.

Well, we went on through the April sunshine to Cazeaux, the larks overhead singing and singing from the exhilarating influence of the bright spring morning, as if their little throats could never tire. Apparently the young Georges, who was an equally untiring chatterbox, gossiped indefatigably to every one he saw at Cazeaux, about "Monsieur," and the deserted house; for on my return to the village from the lake, where I had spent the day fishing, I found myself, nolens volens, turned into a lion. Here was a real living specimen of a peculiarly eccentric Englishman to be seen gratis. Naturally, the whole population turned out to look.

But, strange to say, I could elicit no particulars from any inhabitant of Cazeaux of the history of the "House"

"Could you tell me, madame, some of its occupants?" I asked, as soon as I could edge in a word, of a very voluble old lady, who had been favoring me, while knitting indefatigably at a stocking, with a most diffuse account of an acquaintance she had once had with an English family named Gogueah, at some period, it is supposed, so very remote in the past, that that curious patronymic had since had time to become extinct

"Eh, pardi, monsieur!" rejoined Madame Veuve Tournier, with a shrug, "I am from La Hume. The house has been that way ever since I came here."

Even the herdsmen, those unearthly looking apparitions, who clad in sheepskins, and mounted on stilts fully five feet high, stalked in front of their flocks of sheep and goats, looking like denizens of some other world, and of whom we saw several on our way back from Arcachon; even they, whom one supposes necessarily gifted with the supernatural powers of the weird magicians of old, could tell us nothing of those who once dwelt in that lonely house.

"It had a bad reputation; why should they investigate into the causes of the strange unusual noises that would often startle them from that direction at night? We are not curious, nous autres." "En effet," I replied, laughing; as we parted from our last son of Anak, who vociferated unintelligibly in patois in reply.

Well, April, capricious, charming April, merged gently into May; the genial, flowery May well known to the poets and the south of France, but not, alas, to my native land. Arcachon, a belle at all times, became a very Hebe in her gala dress of flowers and bright colors. Sounds of life and laughter were in her pine groves, and the gay, stirring, many-colored street by the sea-shore; the acacias which flank each side of the road to La Teste de Buch scented the air with the delicate perfume radiating from their white robes of blossom; and young May, just entering her teens, was to be seen abroad looking her very fairest, on a morning I started for a day's fishing at Cazeaux. Knowing well every turn of the usual and shortest route through the forest, I dispensed with the attendance of the young lady who acted as a groom to the wonderful brown I had hired for the day, and set off alone. I reached Cazeaux without accident—spent the day on the soft mild waters of its great silent lake (equal in extent, it is said, to the Bassin d'Arcachon), which lies embosomed in the dark pine forest; and as evening drew near, I gathered up my spoils, remounted my shambling Rosinante, and started on my return to Arcachon.

As the afternoon wore on, the sky had become overcast, the atmosphere still and sultry; and rain threatened to come before long as I crossed Cazeaux bridge. I had intended to have returned home by the same route as I had taken in the morning; but, suddenly recollecting that a man I wanted particularly to see on business was to leave La Teste for Paris early next day, I changed my mind, and determined to take the more circuitous road to Arcachon by La Teste. The evening was gloomy, and the air ominously close and still, as I rode along the canal that connects Cazeaux with La Teste. The sun, quite out of sorts at the disgrace of finding himself under a cloud in his old age, had gone into retirement till such times as the storm blew over. The light-hearted, merry larks were silent, and the sandy grass plain was only enlivened by some poverty-stricken looking cows, who were disconsolately wandering through it to the music of their unmelodious bells. At first I tried to induce the old Methuselah on which I was mounted to hurry on, but soon gave that up as useless, the brown hardening himself utterly against persuasions of all kinds; the more striking my arguments grew, the slower he went—so, finally I resigned myself to his will, and we jogged dreamily along, both of us I suspect in a brown study. We had left Cazeaux, I dare say, about an hour, when the big drops of rain slowly plashed down, and an ominous distant rumble told that something else was coming.

A minute or two of perfect stillness, then suddenly a tremendous clap of thunder roared deafeningly over my head, preceded by a flash of lightning so vivid that it felt quite to blind me, and the horse started violently from terror. An inch or two farther and we should have been bodily in the canal, and this veracious history might never have been written. It was a very close thing; but Methuselah only nearly lost his footing. One leg indeed slid down the steep bank, but a sharp dig of the spurs made him recover himself, and scramble up tant bien que mal. The rain now poured down in a great sheet of water. As to shelter, there was simply none, on the open grassy plain. None, did I say? I forgot the existence of the deserted house, till on looking round, I saw it standing with inviting open door some distance on our left. Never was sight more welcome. With considerable difficulty, and indeed, only by tying my handkerchief over the eyes of the unfortunate brown, whom the thunder and lightning caused quite to lose his head—I managed that we should both reach our haven of refuge before getting quite soaked through. The door lay partially open, as I have said; there was more than enough space for me to enter, but as there was not sufficient admission of the horse, I gave it a push, expecting it to yield at once. But I found that it was uncommonly stiff, and it was with much difficulty I succeeded in moving it sufficiently to enable the old brown to drag himself through.

We went into the empty front room, which was just as I had seen it three weeks before; and as I stood at the window I congratulated myself immensely that we had a roof over our heads. But time wore on, darkness slowly crept nearer and nearer, and at last I began to wish the pelting rain would cease; But it didn't seem to have the slightest idea of doing anything of the kind. The lightning, if possible, became more vivid than ever; and the window-frames rattled again amid the great crashing of the thunder. It was evident that the elements intended to make a night of it now they had the chance, and as I did not the least fancy a two hour's jog to La Teste through the storm, I determined to migrate to the next room and make myself as comfortable as circumstances would permit on the big sofa. Taking off the horse's bridle, I therefore first, as a precautionary measure, hobbled his fore-legs, that if the fancy should seize that valuable animal to make his way out during the night, he might not be able to wander far enough to get lost in the forest. This done, I turned my steps to the next room.

With the help of a box of matches and a newspaper that I happened to have in my pocket, I set to work at the half-burned logs on the hearth, got up a feeble fire, lit my pipe, and drawing one of the chairs up in front of the fire-place, under the combined soothing influences of the fire and the "baccy," fell into a reverie, and finally, I suspect, a sleep. How long it lasted I don't the least know, but I suddenly became aware that the fire had died out, and that thick darkness was all around me. The thunder and rain appeared to have ceased, for not a sound broke the complete silence, which came to feel so oppressive that at last I got up, and groped my way into the passage to look out on the night.

Feeling my way by the wall I slowly progressed along till I reached the hall door, but it was shut. Shut? How odd! I had certainly left it open. Perhaps I was at the wrong door. But I soon convinced myself that it was not the case by striking a match—my last, I was sorry to perceive.

"Very odd," I said to myself, "the door was so firmly driven back by the passage of the horse, it couldn't have been shut without considerable force and noise. I wonder I didn't hear it clap, but at all events I'll go out for a bit." That was easier said than done. I put out my right hand as a matter of course, but it was strange I could not grasp the handle. I saw well enough where it was by the match, yet somehow my fingers couldn't take hold of it. "What nonsense," I said to myself, as I perforce dropped the burning end of the match on the floor; "what can have come over me?" and I put out my left hand. A strange twinge ran through it the moment it touched the handle, and it dropped dumb and powerless to my side; I felt I couldn't raise it, couldn't move a muscle of it. A light mocking laugh sounded suddenly behind me, and I am afraid I lost my temper. "Confound you!" I involuntarily burst out, "what do you mean by that idiotic titter? open the door." Dead silence. Perfect unbroken silence, and the darkness seemed to wrap round me and envelop me in a thick fog. There was an oppression, a weight in the atmosphere, and I felt an indescribable something that seemed to make it an impossibility either to speak or move. Yet my senses seemed at the same time strained to an unnatural degree of expectation, I felt as if my hearing, for example, was become unnaturally acute; and yet, God knows there was nothing to hear. Utter complete silence, silence indeed that "could be felt."

With a strong effort I raised myself from the wall against which I had been leaning, and determined to make my way back to my sofa. Instantly I felt that I had regained power over my arms, and I made a dash at the door. Quite in vain. Again my hands trembled and fell powerless to my side, and again that aggravating laugh was heard, as if mocking my puny efforts. Restraining my anger, I got up a laugh myself not to be out of the fashion, but I could not help knowing that it sounded forced and strange. "How charmingly hospitable you are!" I exclaimed, in French. "Really, your affection for my company is quite touching, what a pity I can't reciprocate it. Oh!" I thought involuntarily as the jibing titter again sounded close to my ear, "if I had but a light." The thought had hardly crossed my mind before I felt a curious conviction that there was a light in the room I had not long since left. By some irresistible impulse I felt myself attracted thither. I turned round. Why, I could see a light shining through the doorway from where I stood—there was no doubt about that. I strided rapidly down the hall, and rushed into the room. No wonder I had seen a light, for an immense wood fire burned brightly on the hearth. I could hardly believe my senses. Where had the great pile of wood come from? How was it I had heard no signs of fire-kindling through the open door? It was certainly very strange. Decidedly comfortable, though, all the same; for it made the dusty old room look wonderfully cheery, so I felt quite grateful for the attention, and mentally revoked all the abuse I had levelled at my invisible companions.

Drawing my chair again in front of the fire, I sat for some time enjoying the warmth and gazing on the blazing logs; then I tried the old piano, a wonderful instrument frightfully out of tune, that would have made Thalberg shiver; and finally stretched myself on the vast sofa, which protested against my weight by many internal groans. Turning my face from the glare of the fire, I lay for some time in a dreamy reverie, till a slight stir made me involuntarily turn my head. What was that? A living form or a shapeless mass, that the leaping flickering flames showed me in the arm-chair opposite? Certainly there was something there, a greyish thing, huddled up rather back in the shadow of the chimney-piece. Stay, it moves, a head with the long dishevelled dark hair of a woman emerges gradually from under the grey wrapping. "Was this the nymph who laughed in the hall, and noiselessly lighted the fire, I wonder?" thought I to myself, as I watched the silent surging of the drapery. "I think I ought to thank her for the fire at all events." So with a preliminary hem to attract the attention of my Phyllis, I began a polite speech. Rapidly and noiselessly, as I spoke, the contents of the chair glided shapelessly out of sight, melted gradually and imperceptibly away, dissolving before my stupified gaze into nothingness. There stood the empty arm-chair, the fire-light playing on its faded chintz cover. I could hardly believe my eyes. Could it have been a dream? A titter seemed to come from under the sofa. I snatched one of the burning logs from the hearth and peered underneath. Of course there was nothing there except dust, of that there was any amount. Surprised and bewildered I stood for a moment log in hand. "There's not much chance of finding anyone, I suppose," I thought to myself; "but at any rate I'll search the house." So, taking a flaming stick in each hand to light me as torches on my way, I set out on my travels.

First, I explored the nest of rooms opposite. They were all perfectly empty except the kitchen, where I found my old Rosinante, who had apparently betaken himself there in the vain hope that a kitchen might furnish food, and now looked more woe-begone and out of sorts than ever, from his disappointment. Up-stairs I tramped, looked into every room, curiously examined the turned-up bedstead in the small room, and came to the conclusion that it was a decidedly disreputable old relic; discovered an unlocked wall-press, which, however, contained nothing but a horribly damp mouldy smell, and I returned to my fire as wise as I set out. No living thing, no sign of life was to be seen in the house, and, pitching my improvised torches back on the hearth, I threw myself in disgust on the sofa and revolved the mysterious riddle in my mind. I always was immensely worried by difficult problems, and this one I couldn't solve, try as I would. I leaned back on the sofa still pondering, and as I lay there I felt a consciousness creeping over me that there was something coming stealthily behind my neck. Involuntarily I turned my head. Close to me, the soft brown-bearding chin leaning on the back of the sofa, was a man's head. I felt his breath on my cheek as I turned my face, and his strange, sad grey eyes seemed to look me through and through. I started up and faced him—he was gone. Gone. Utterly vanished. Where had he gone to? Ah, that was the mystery; unless he had sank down through the floor, which seemed as firm as strong boards could make it.

"Well," I thought to myself, "certainly this is a house of odd inmates. If the fellow had only told me his story before he disappeared in that absurd way—" and, rousing up the fire, which was beginning to get low, I half expected to see him back again when I had completed a scientific arrangement of the logs. But there was nothing. I went over to the window. The night was dark and cloudy, and the wind sighed a plaintive lament now and then. I tried to open the sash, but I found that it had been nailed down, so, as it was but stupid work staring out at the elements, I sauntered presently back to my sofa, my hands in my pockets, determined to woo old Morpheus as the last resource of ennui.

"If it were only morning," I thought, "I would make another trial at that confounded hall door." "Ah, you will never leave this house," slowly whispered a low sad voice in startling proximity to my ear. "Indeed!" I said, not caring this time to take the trouble to move, (you see I had got to consider the unusual quite as a matter of course,) "may I ask why?" But there was no answer. As I lay there on the sofa, with closed eyes, I knew there was a form close to me, that if I looked I should see some shape, but a strange reluctance seemed to prevent my doing so—a presentiment of evil, an indefinable horror, thrilled strangely through me, but I struggled against and forced myself to look. For an instant I got a glimpse of the bearded face and sad grey eyes I had seen before leaning over me; then I felt stifling, powerless; I knew that pitiless torso was slowly, surely, smotheringly, crushing down upon me, and that there was no escape. Closer and closer still it came stealthily on, and, gasping for breath, I——awoke from my dream to find myself lying on my back on the sofa, the old brown snuffling at my face, and the bright May sun shining in through the opposite window.

Didn't I tell you that I "suspected I fell asleep" in front of the fire? O.

Pathan War-dance.—Here is an account of an entertainment which few readers could have witnessed:—"The officers of the 20th Regiment Punjab Infantry entertained their guests last Saturday night with an exhibition of the sword dances of the warlike tribes serving in the regiment. The performances began with the war-dance of the Pathans. The pipers and drummers, genuine Pathan musicians, supplied the weird and monotonous music, to which the dancers kept time with their paces, movements, and the brandishing of their tulwars. The dance was a series of studied attitudes, timed steps, and advances, accompanied with various drawing-cuts and rapid brandishing of the tulwar overhead. The movements were continued in a circle around the group of musicians. The rapid whirlings of the tulwars, and the swift and telling cuts which the dancers laid about them, naturally raised a dread in the minds of the spectators that the dancers would injure themselves or their neighbours. But nothing could exceed the extraordinary tact with which the dancers, when they approached each other, guided their tulwars, without reducing the velocity or the variety of their flourishes. The Pathans were succeeded by the Punjaubee Mussulmans, whose display was less warlike but more skilful. Two tall and lithe men engaged in single combat apparently, advancing and retreating, and whirling their tulwars with surprising rapidity over their heads and shoulders, and under their arms, exhibited much power and pliability of wrist and shoulder. One of the men subsequently performed a series of singular and grotesque feats with the tulwar; forming an arch of his body with one hand and one foot on the ground, and the face uppermost, and propelling himself around in a circle with the other foot, he executed a variety of the most astonishingly rapid flourishes with his tulwar, to the imminent risk of his nose and ears. Standing erect on one foot, and closing his eyes, he whirled his body around rapidly, and, while so engaged, sheathed and unsheathed his tulwar in a variety of positions, before him upon his forehead, upon his head, and behind his back. A number of men then engaged in a round dance with tulwars, similar to the dance of the Pathans. The next performance was a more peaceful dance with shields, but without tulwars. The dancers hopped and skipped around the pipers, keeping time with the music, and noting the conclusion of each bar by simultaneously stooping down and striking their shields on the ground. The Dogras, a less warlike tribe, inhabiting the territory of the Maharajah of Cashmere, concluded the exhibition with a fencing match with short sticks. The combatants had each two sticks, which they used together, employing both hands in performing the same movements with both sticks. Keeping time with the music, they executed with great dexterity and precision a variety of blows and guards, advances and retreats, and other feints."

"You sot of a fellow!" exclaimed a poor woman to her husband; "you are always at the public house getting drunk on hot toddy, while I am at home with nothing to drink but cold water." "Cold! you silly jade," hiccoughed the husband; "why don't you warm it?"

In a company at Vienna, where the conversation was nearly engrossed by praises of Gœthe, Catalini, the singer, exclaimed: "Who is this Gœthe? I have never heard any of his music."

THREE SPANISH PICTURES.

ESTREMADURA.

A REGION of sheep and swine—it is Estremadura: those silver threads drawn across its slate and granite rocks, its turfy sheep-walks and aromatic wastes, are the two great rivers, the Tagus and the Guadiana: in other countries they would be peopled with ships; here they serve but as ditches for draining. Once a land of corn and oil, under Moor and Roman, Estremadura is now a sheep-walk desert of grass and thyme. That man you see under the cork tree sounding his horn is a swineherd; that horseman wrapped in a sheepskin is a smuggler, and in winter a wild-duck shooter in the oozy swamps on the banks of the Guadiana. No fear of robbing here; the people are too poor, and the travelers are scarce. That dull city on the hill above the river yonder, close to the Portuguese frontier, is Badajoz, where much English blood, and French, too, was once shed. That white ring of road winds from Badajoz to Madrid, and from there to Seville. Here, in that heap of grey ruins, where the wild fig grows, the frog croaks, and the stork snaps his bill, is the once famous Roman city of Merida; and not far off is Medellin, where Cortez was born. You may know it, though it is but a speck in the kaleidoscope, by the castle on the hill and the bridge below. You can only see, you can not hear, through the kaleidoscope; it is no ear trumpet, or you might distinguish from the wild olives of the desert-tracks there to the right the perpetual soft cooing of the Barbary turtle-doves, who dispute the sovereignty of the woods with the crested hoopoe, the bee-eater, and the blue pie.

Observe the shepherds who pass across our picture-chamber; they wear leather jerkins open at the arms, and the women short green, red, and yellow serge petticoats, with cloth mantillas and silver clasps; there are sandals on their pretty ballet-dancing feet. They all wear crosses; and under chestnut trees covered with white flowers, or tripping about at vintage time, look very romantic, pleasant, and unnatural. But you must not expect this small kaleidoscope circle, though it does seem to widen and widen, will show you all Estremadura—the old Duke of Alva's palace, for instance; the oak wood where Pizarro drove his swine, or the white belfry and cypresses of the Carmelite convent; no; what I see in two sorts of country, both desert, lonely, and barren; one, sheep-track, thyme, cistus, and crop-eared grass; another, oak woods and swine walks.

If your eye could pierce those beech woods there to the right, you would see the countless herds of swine that at night thunder back to the dirty villages of the kind-hearted, lazy, pork-loving, sausage-eating Estremadurans. As for the lower plains out of sight, they are noisy with the incessant droning, chirping of the locust and cicala, which the peasant burns in heaps, and even institutes religious processions, with bell, book, and candle, to exorcise. And as the kaleidoscope can only play its own set of tunes, can only show you one aspect of the year, I tell you that in April all the country is dusty, and alive with thousands of sheep returning in flocks of enormous extent to the cool hills, from whence in October they had come with great bands of shepherds and dogs to seek the warmer plains. The great festivals of Estremadura are the sheep-shearing in May, and the pig-killing in November: always something to do; in winter, the lambing; in March, the marking and tail-cutting; and in September, the daubing the sheep with red ochre, to make the wool fine. But I must not stop all day basking in the purple thyme of the Estremaduran sheep-walks, that plague and the sword have, since the Moor left, all but reduced to a desert. I shake the kaleidoscope again, and the scene changes to Leon.

LEON.

I am staring on the green wooded hills and fiery dusty plains of Leon. Those little toy towns of stone are the Leonese cities—Leon, Salamanca, and Valladolid. Recollections of Moorish and French storming forays of horse and foot rise around me. I see the great whirlpools of corn, and the slopes where the sour wine grows. I see the pastures where the herdsmen direct the cattle with stones from their slings, just such as knocked out Don Quixote's jaw teeth when he mistook a flock of sheep for an army of infidels, and rode down among them lance in rest. I see the tepid trout-streams, hot enough to boil the fish, and the great golden seas of corn, that roll in summer round Zamora. Again I hear the creaking woodeu wheels, and see the mules toil at the simple plow. Shall I forget the simple, hospitable Leonese, who still talk of Wellington as "the great lord," and love Englishmen for his sake? Shall I forget their clean, comfortable farm houses, where the herdsmen were centaurs, and the cattle-branding was a feast of good things; where castanets, and fifes, and drums set the peasant feet dancing? Shall I forget the strange dress of the charro, or country beau, that is to be seen about Ciudad Rodrigo—the low, broad-brimmed hat, large as an umbrella; the rich embroidered shirt, with the gold bossy brooch; the low, square waisteoat of pounced and figured velvet, cut low to show the wonderful shirt even below the waist; the square silver buttons, too, of that marvelous waistcoat, and the quaint cross ribbons; the jacket, open like a South American's at the elbow, and edged with black velvet, rich and soft; the broad belt instead of the red webby sash; long, dark cloth gaiters, embroidered below the knee; largo silver buckles in his shoes; a javelin, patriarchal stick, in his right hand, and a cloak over his shoulder? And here, too, even in the mud hovels in the plains near Valladolid, we see that enchanted creature, the charra, or Leonese belle, the caramba in her black shining hair, which is covered by the square cloth mantilla, fastened by a silver brooch, the hood richly embroidered. As for the little red velvet bodice that clasps her round, it is adorned with a patchwork of patterned bugles, which run about in flowery knots all round her bosom; her wrist-cuffs are worked with gold thread; her sash ties behind; her petticoat is scarlet as a geranium, if it is not purple as a pansy; her apron is like an old-fashioned sampler, starred with quaint birds and flowers; her handkerchief is embroidered with gold; and she wears chains of colored stones, which have come down to her as heir-looms. For all that, he and she are honest and simple as heart could wish them; and if you sleep in the charro's cottage, though it be but of unbaked brick, and you are weary of the dusty plains and dreary bare hills of Leon, and long to pass over even to the cold damp Asturias, still you will not easily forget the good people's hospitality, their towers of four-post beds, the clean, fringed sheets, and the regal pillows, embroidered with lions and castles. Again I fancy myself riding through the salt dusk-smoke of the Leon plains, and see the herds tossing their horns, and bellowing as the stones from the herdsmen's slings turn them left or right. But I must on to Gallicia, the rainy coast country of Gallicia, whose ports, Vigo and Corunna, have often listened to the voice of English cannon.

GALLICIA.

Yes, this is Gallicia, the country that the Minho divides from Portugal, and whose shores run down to the Bay of Biscay. It is from the snowy mountains, green meadows, and chestnut forests, which bears and wolves still haunt, that the Madrid porters and the Lisbon water-carriers come. Here you see the women plowing or turning the distaff under a hedge, hard, rugged, and ugly; the men, strong, hardy, boorish, and rude, you meet in every coasting vessel, with bundle in red handkerchief and green umbrella, returning home with their Portuguese earnings. This is the country of contrasts—from the wretched inns without chimneys, where no one but a muleteer can get anything to eat, to the smiling valleys and rich farms of the lower Minho. Here the cottages are mere stables; their gojas run over with corn and wine.

No one who has ever been to Spain will forget the stolid, litigious, stubborn groups of emigrant Gallicians whom he meets on the decks of the coasting steamers—whom he sees land at Corunna, or disembark at Vigo. They look like Irishmen without their sparkle, fire, or wit—Irishmen with the soul out—Irishmen stupefied to helots—Irishmen grown prudent, churlish and industrious. There they sit, silent and absorbed, leaning on their great black-handled umbrellas, the crooks under their beardless chins, wrapped in their heavy great-coats: they sit dismal and forlorn, their penury and hard frugality not unalloyed with selfishness, the black shadow of prudence. How glad we were to clear the decks at Vigo and cart them off—blankets, bedding and all—in that little green bay of Vigo.—Thornbury's Life in Spain.

SENTIMENTALISM.

THE habitual use of the word "sentimental," in a bad sense, implies that the tender emotion may be so indulged as to produce bad effects; and thus we shall get a tolerably complete notion of sentimentality, if we are able to ascertain the cases in which the direct effects, the secondary effects, and the practical effects, respectively, of the tender emotions, are injurious. First, as to its direct effects. Mr. Bain is probably correct in saying that they are always pleasurable. The feeling of tenderness is specifically pleasant, and, therefore, it is a good thing to feel it, unless there is some special reason to the contrary. The pleasure of tenderness is like the pleasure of lying in a warm bed on a cold night—an excellent thing in itself, unless the use of it is immoderate and improper under the circumstances. In what case is it immoderate and improper? This question cannot be answered directly, inasmuch as there is no way either of measuring the quantity of emotion (in pounds, for instance; or by the number of vibrations a second of the nerves) which a person feels at a given moment, nor by any rule which it can be determined how much he ought to feel; but though the question does not admit of a decisive, peremptory answer, it does admit of an observation which considerably illustrates the subject. It will be found, by observation, that a display of tender feeling is generally stigmatized as sentimental, or considered improper and excessive, when it appears probable, from the circumstances of the case, that it is not the natural expression of an involuntary feeling, called up by circumstances, but an act of self-indulgence, done for the sake of the pleasure of the emotion itself. No one calls Prince Arthur a sentimentalist, as he had plenty of cause for his sadness; but the young gentlemen in France who were as sad as night, for very wantonness, might well have been described by that word, if it had been invented in Shakspeare's days. Any one who watches with care the common use of language, will be surprised to see how accurately popular feeling and the common use of language apply to this principle. Analyze any popular writer, any well-known scene, which would generally be called sentimental, and ask why it is so stigmatized, and the answer will always be, because it appears, from the turn of the sentence, or the extent to which the author dwells upon a painful subject, that he had ceased to think naturally and simply about the fact, real or supposed, which originally drew out the feeling, and had begun to think about himself, and how cleverly he could describe sources of tender emotion, and how pleasant it was to stimulate their action. This will explain how sentiment may be, and often is, theatrical and affected without being insincere. When Mrs. Siddons frightened herself into hysterics by her own acting, there can be no doubt that she really was in a state of genuine emotion. One of the great charms of Mr. Carlyle's History of the French Revolution is the clear perception which he has of the fact, that the fierce, violent nonsense of many of the famous scenes in the revolution was sincere as well as nonsensical. The swearing, the swaggering, the protesting was genuine in its way, though the actors in the strange melodrama seem to have had continually before their minds' eyes the reflection that they were wunderfully fine fellows for figuring in such a performance. The volunteers who went to fight on the frontiers had a natural love for the bombast with which they were fed, and licked it up as a dog does a pat of butter; but they really did mean the greater part of what they said, and their reason for going beyond what they mean was, that they liked the sentiment which their position created so much, that they could not resist the the temptation of increasing their enjoyment by exaggerated language.

One of Sheridan's creditors, after having long and vainly dunned him, at length suggested that if he could not discharge the principal of the debt, he might at least pay the interest. "No!" said the wag; "it is not my interest to pay the principal, nor my principle to pay the interest."

ON A NAUGHTY LITTLE BOY, SLEEPING.

Just now I missed from hall and stair
A joyful treble, that had grown
To harmonize with that grave tone
Which tells this world my older care.

And little footsteps on the floor
Were hushed. I laid aside my pen,
Forgot my theme, and listened—then
Stole softly to the nursery door.

And there he lay, his chubby arms
Filled with the trifles he had sacked,
As sleep had caught him in the act,
And bound his fumbling feet and palms.

A broken vase, a tattered book,
Still testified his deep disgrace;
I stooped and kissed his sleeping face,
Bright with some heavenly far out-look.

Perhaps 'twas wrong—but, half beguiled,
I trusted when my last long sleep
Should come, there might be One who'd keep
An equal mercy for His child.

THE COUNTESS DIANA.

[TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH OF MARIO UCHARD.]

XXVI.

ONE day M. de Jonval was announced. "I have transmitted your request to my friend de Maufert," said he, "and I come, according to promise, to bring you his reply."

"And doubtless it is not favorable?"

"You could scarcely expect it would be, unless for your interest. As your guardian, he feels that he must try all that science—"

"Oh, sir, I beg you to lay aside the theme of my pretended insanity. You are perfectly aware that it is only a falsehood invented for my ruin!"

"Agreed!" said he; "and I will no longer endeavor to bring you to a more reasonable state of mind—although, as you very well know, the Count acts entirely with the approval of your family."

"Bribed by him," I replied.

"In your eyes it is a plot. It is, however, by the advice of one in whom you have great confidence, and whom you cannot suspect of having any interested motives—the Countess de Maufert, my niece, for example."

"What do you mean to say?" stammered I, turning pale at the sound of her name.

"I mean to say that she fully approves the measures that her husband has judged necessary to take."

"She!" cried I. "She approve of my being confined in a mad-house! It is so incredible, sir, that I would not believe it were you to show me a proof signed by her own hand!"

"Here it is," said he, coldly.

And he drew from his pocket a letter, which he handed me. I took it, faint and trembling.

"Read, read," said he.

I hesitated to open the paper. My name was on the envelope, written in Diana's hand. M. de Jonval looked fixedly at me. With great effort I broke the seal and read these lines:

"I am greatly afflicted, my dear André, to learn the vigorous decision of the physicians who have care of you, and I weep at the thought of your being alone and far from us; but this cruel state of things is judged indispensable. André, I conjure you, submit, and do not give me the sorrow of seeing you compromise your future. Remember that a few months of patience, and the skilful care of Doctor Schultz will undoubtedly deliver those you love from the fears they now entertain for you. It is a devoted friendship which gives me courage to speak to you thus. "DIANA.

"P. S.—At the end of winter I will go and thank you for your resignation."

I remained dumb-founded, incapable of believing.

"At the price of what torture have you drawn from her this letter?" said I to M. de Jonval. "It is not from her!"

"And why not, may I ask?"

"Why not! why not!" said I, indignantly. "Because it is impossible! because—"

"Because she loves you, is it not?" said he, with a smile. "I will finish the thought which you dare not express."

"Sir!"

"Ah, I beg pardon! . . . but I have the right, it seems to me, to protect Mme. de Maufert, my niece, from dreams which may end by destroying her peace. She has confessed all to us; yes sir, all—even to the generous but imprudent feint she practised in order to save you if possible."

"A feint!—to save me?"

"Did it never occur to you, sir, that Mme. de Maufert might possibly forget what she owed to her name. Come, since it is necessary to draw you from your error, I will give you some information: My niece had discovered the insane passion you cherished for her—she saw your mental state—and the morning appointed for your examination by the physicians, she found you, as she tells us, very much depressed. She was still willing to save you, even by uttering a pious falsehood—that fact your excitement soon caused you to reveal to us. This is why, fearing to aggravate your error, she desires, as does her husband, to leave you ignorant of the place of her retreat. She counts upon distance and reflection to render you more reasonable, and hopes before long to renew a relation with you worthy of her and of you. You will then both laugh at this romantic misunderstanding."

"Enough!" cried I. "Leave me! You will kill me!"

Left alone, I threw myself on the bed and gave way to my miserable reflections. Oh, Diana! Diana! I wished to doubt, but there was her letter: she had told them all—and this pure flame, which fed my very existence, was to her but the sickly dream of a madman Then, as I remembered the thousand proofs of tenderness she had bestowed upon me, my soul would indignantly discard these impious suspicions. Then again, I would judge her weak, and accuse her of having denied her love for me to save her own peace. . . .

Months went by—winter was at an end. I waited, striving to hope. She did not come. I believed her dead, and said so to M. de Jonval. A few days after, he brought me an official journal containing an account of a brilliant court ball, and among the names of those who figured there I read that of the Countess Diana de Maufert. She had passed two days at Carlsruhe; and then had departed.

The spring and summer passed—she did not come. The only being who seemed to remember me was Bastieu. He wrote me each week.

I have waited one year, and my solitude becomes every day more insupportable. I have submitted to my destiny—I exist no longer. For the price of this submission, invoked by her in the name of a false friendship, she does not even give me a remembrance.

William, I love her no longer; I swear it to you. Let her live, happy, gay, more beautiful than ever. She whom I loved is dead, and the angels have borne her on their wings to some celestial sphere. Oh, radiant ideal! where hast thou taken refuge? . . . I love not her, William, I swear! . . . But why these tears? . . .

XXVII.

WILLIAM, go down on your knees and thank God! . . . She is here—I have seen her. She has come to seek me, and to-morrow I leave this place with her.

William, they have deceived her—tortured her. She only knew two days ago what had been done with me. They took her to Rhodes, and there kept her in that deserted place for sixteen months. He was her pitiless jailor. I have just left her. She still loves me. She has not said so, but I feel it, I comprehend it, I know it. This morning I was writing, when all of a sudden my door opened, and Bastien appeared, radiant with happiness. He was too much excited to speak. "She is there!" cried I, and I flew into my parlor, almost overthrowing poor Schultz. Behind him she stood, trembling and weeping for joy. . . .

William, I have not yet told you—Diana is a widow! . . . The Count was killed in a duel by an Englishman. She has been all this time the victim of treachery. They took her from Maufert, telling her that I was seized with an attack of the most demoniac fury, and that it had become necessary to place me in a mad-house, and they wished her to come to my relief. Struggling against her suspicions, she followed Placide as far as Spa, where the Count arrived the next day. She pined through a sixteen-months' captivity in an old deserted castle. Finally, one day, her people set her free. . . The Count was dead. Exhausted by fever and suffering, she thought but of me. Arrived at Maufert, no one could tell her what had become of me. Happily, my faithful Bastieu, hearing of her return, hastened to her. She wished to come to me that very hour. . . .

I have confided to her the misfortune of our poor Schultz, my friendship for him, and my efforts to save him. It is agreed that he, his wife and children, shall go with us. We will buy his house, if necessary, and we will assure to him a competency in the future. I cannot abandon him. . . .

We have dined all together. Night has come, and I must leave her; she is worn out with fatigue. The doctor's charming wife has given her up her room. As for me, I have returned to my pavilion, whence I can watch her window; and while I write, Bastien sleeps soundly on a bed near me.

William, what a future! Is it not a dream?

I have passed all night in anticipating my happy destiny. In the morning Schultz found me with my eyes fixed on Diana's window.

"What a physician is happiness!" said he to me, with that artless enthusiasm of child and philosopher which renders him so charming. "And so," continued he, "it appears that you have formed the design of carrying me off, too?"

"Indeed, yes," replied I, "and if you try to resist me, I warn you beforehand that I remain a prisoner in your hospital, with Diana, until you decide. The matter stands thus: You are indispensable to my happiness. I am sick; you must take care of me."

"Enough, I understand you," said he, with deep emotion. "Thanks for your brotherly friendship. Come, I swear to you, you will cure me."

"Bah!" replied I, "the cure is complete."

"I would hope so," said he, a little thoughtfully; "but we cannot know that till autumn. If nothing goes wrong with me—"

"When shall we leave?" interrupted I.

"I think," said he, "we had better order two days of rest for Mme. Diana. During this time, I will arrange my affairs with Steiner, my pupil and friend, who will take my place here. But let us go down to the garden. I see the children."

I followed him, somewhat saddened in my joy by the thought that the slightest accident might extinguish forever this noble intelligence; but I was too happy not to feel great hope.

Dignified and at the same time softened by the feelings she did not even yet confess to herself, Diana seemed to exhale all the virgin and timid graces of a first love. The woman had become the young maiden; her countenance, so pure, and somewhat pale from suffering, had all the soft contour of the Madonnas of Guido Reni; her large brown eyes, languishing with tenderness, were veiled each moment by their long lids, as if to hide the secret of her soul. The slightest accent of her voice was an avowal, and I listened to her, entranced.

The following day, as we were all seated after breakfast in the Doctor's parlor, a servant announced the Canoness de Jonval, who asked to see the Countess de Maufert. I could not resist a movement of uneasiness; but with a courage that commanded my admiration, Diana gave orders for her aunt to be introduced. Mme. de Jonval entered with a stern and composed air. A gesture of surprise showed that she had expected to find her niece alone. Diana rose with respect and advanced to meet her.

"I am disappointed, my dear," said her aunt, in a dry tone, "to see you in Carlsruhe in any other house than mine, and, more than all, to be obliged to come here to meet you."

Then followed an icy silence which Diana interrupted by saying calmly, "Pardon me, madam, but I did not expect to inform you of my presence here."

"The avowal is frank, at least," replied the Canoness; "but I have come to converse with you upon family matters, and—"

"Speak, madam," said Diana, interrupting; "I have nothing to conceal from the friends around me. Indeed, they are my advisers."

Mme. de Jonval could ill conceal her mortification, but, after a moment's hesitation, she continued:

"Always occupied with your interests, my niece, my brother and I have thought that, as a widow, you are too young to live without guidance. We have, therefore, decided that I shall give you an asylum, and resume the post that I filled towards you before your marriage. This is why, armed with the authority I possess over you, I have come to say that I am ready to take you home with me."

At these words I felt greatly excited, but Diana soon re-assured me.

"I am grateful, madam," said she, "to you and my uncle for the solicitude you deign to evince for me; but I have already decided otherwise for my future."

"Decided!" interrupted the Canoness, with haughty surprise. "Without our consent?"

"Yes, madam," said Diana, with respectful hardihood; "I intend retiring to my mother's mansion, to live on the humble fortune she has left me. I know what I owe to the world, and I am already assured of a protection which you will judge worthy, I think, in all respects: it is the protection of Dr. Schultz and his wife, who kindly consent to live with me for the present."

"But you forget, it seems to me," said Mme. de Jonval, "the claims of your family."

"The claims of my family, madam," said Diana, bitterly, "I should do well to forget! Do not you remember them? You have exercised your rights in uniting me, at the age of sixteen, regardless of my prayers and tears, to a man I detested, and of whom I was afraid. I pardon you all, but do not invoke the souvenir of your protection—I have too well experienced it."

The Canoness bit her lips, but controlled herself sufficiently to say: "And thus you resist our will?"

"You have yourself delivered me from your authority, madam, in marrying me. I am free, and my own mistress. The pride of our race will answer for my future dignity of conduct. If in this I am ever wanting, I will accept your reproaches."

THE MOON'S INFLUENCE.—M. Arago, from a comparison of the tables compiled by observers in different parts of Europe, found that rain falls oftener during the increase than the wane of the moon, by six to five, and that this is more particularly the case from the quarters to the full moon. Sir John Herschel has noticed the incliuation to a cloudless sky, which takes place during the time that the full moon is above the horizon. It is a popular belief that the moon's rays have the effect of promoting the decomposition of meat. Old recipes advise the exposure of joints which require to be rendered tender to the direct rays of the moon. It is believed, however, that these rays do not communicate any heat to the earth. The exact nature of the moon's influence, if any, upon vegetation, has never been substantiated, although, as Lord Lovelace remarked, it has been more or less believed in old as well as modern times, and distant countries not deriving their tradition from each other. Pliny abounds with rules for regulating agricultural observations by the moon's phases, derived, there is no doubt, from the practice of the most skilful Italian farmers of his time. In France, it was then considered that trees should only be felled in the wane, and the old ordonnances forestieres enjoyed this. In Demerara and some of the West Indian Islands, Mr. M. Martin states that there are woods which, if cut down during the moon's increase, can be easily split and soon rot; but, if cut in the wane, are extremely enduring, and can be riven with difficulty; and the same fact was stated, as to certain Brazilian woods, to M. St. Hilaire.

SCIENTIFIC PARAGRAPHS.

——— Totamque infusa per artus
Mens agitat molem, et magno se corpore miscet.—Æn., lib. vi.

The attempt has often been made by practical men to calculate and express the worth of the most valuable piece of land on the earth's surface; and precedence has heretofore been given to the acres in and about the centre of London; but by late statistics, taking the yield as the test of value, the mining world now claims the palm of honor financial, and justly, too, for one square mile of ground in Cornwall has given £10,000,000 in tin and copper products.

No more beautiful forms can be found than Nature offers in the delicate and exquisitely-graceful drapery, columns, flutings and fringes of its vegetable kingdom, and in the strange, almost mysterious structure of the various crystallized metals that are bound and held together by some law of mechanical combination or affinity, which has thus far defied the keenest scrutiny of the most distinguished savants. Nature's ways are past finding out, it is true; but we can admire and imitate her results, and thereby refine and correct the popular taste in all the varied modes of the æsthetic world, and borrow from God's own models that grace of strength and power of beauty to be seen in the most simple works of nature. In its laboratory, the strong and the beautiful, the rich and tho apparently valueless are found indissolubly blended together in permanent forms till disturbed by the ruthless hand of man. How true is this of the little quartz specimen now before us? A perfect crystal in form, emitting a clear pure light, and containing in its bosom a piece of fine gold. Here are the beautiful and the useful most strongly united, serving to settle a question of some scientific interest, whether gold has ever been found in crystallized quartz. The attempt to destroy this happy union and secure the prize within, as shown by the touch of some tool on one of the edges of our little gem, evidently gave way to a happier feeling under the influence of its beauty, and now it is safely beyond the reach of vandal attack.

It has long been a matter of discussion among learned men whether rocks exist, so to speak, ab initio or are still in the act of forming, whether rocks grow—as other natural productions. This subject is one of extreme difficulty, and can only be definitely settled after a larger view and more extended observation has been taken, and a closer and more minute inquiry given to it than has yet been found practical by scientific men. The present best-informed opinion inclines to the affirmative of the proposition, and derives, by analogy, its strongest support from the fact that ores of metals do grow, and are now daily forming, probably as fast as they are being exhausted by the most systematic mining. This was recently seen very beautifully in an English mine, where the sides of the levels and shafts and of the mining tools used in the deep workings were found covered with deposits of copper and coppery ores, thrown down and precipitated from the copper salts held in solution by the water of the mine. In a recent very curious memoir published by M. Sjogreen, a Swedish naturalist, the fact was stated as beyond doubt, after close investigation and as the research of the many authentic data collected by himself, that the iron ore found in various lakes and streams in Sweden, and principally in the province of Smaland, was the direct work of certain infusorial animalculi living in fresh water. This iron is of a very fine quality, and is obtained in such abundance that it is used largely in the iron-works of that country and Russia. The little metallurgical insects doing this work are often of a size sufficient to be seen by the eye without the aid of a microscope. These small beings can be seen actively at work at the bottom of the lakes, each one engaged in enclosing itself in a metallic case, there to be entombed forever, and, in the aggregate, forming that mass of ore that reprodnees itself every 26 years. The ore with which these iron architects construct their houses, lying each in his own death domicil, made by his own hands, is undoubtedly derived from the water where it exists in a soluble state, having been borrowed from the surrounding lands of which it formed a constituent part.

Much has been said and written about the coincidence, in point of time, of many of the greatest scientific discoveries by men often unknown to each other and living far apart. There is a tendency in the human mind to seek companions—to look for contrasts—but at the same time the inclination tends much more strongly to points of similarity than to those of difference. The positive is ever more attractive than the negative. We know of no better illustration of this pervading feeling of the mind than is seen in the perennial attempt, in all centuries and among all men, strong and weak, from Aristotle to the present time, to conform the circle to the square either by geometric figure or algebraic formula. It is extremely interesting to observe this parallelism of the human intellect whereby men have been often simultaneously led to the conception and enunciation of the grandest principles, and at the same time to notice the ease with which men run into the most fanciful points of resemblance in others and their works, where none whatever, in truth, exist, except as the conjurings of their own morbid imaginations. Yet how extraordinary have been these coincidences, and mostly in cases that have wrought wonders in the improved condition of mankind and influenced in an immense degree the industrial growth of the present age. To name but a few of many instances: the invention of the steam engine, the discovery of the method of fluxions and of the decomposition of water, the invention of the electric telegraph, and, lastly, the sublime discovery of the planet Neptune by an abstruse effort of the mind and solely by the force of calculation, unaided by telescopic observation. Little did the dreamy, half-asleep world imagine the consequences when an unknown civil engineer, by name W. H. James, in 1821, suggested to the late celebrated George Stephenson the introduction of tubes into his locomotive engine. From that simple idea the machine, prior to this a lumbering mass of iron, sprang into life and power, and the practicability of the railway system became at once apparent to all intelligent minds. We have now to notice another coincidence, not of time, but of persons: for this same Mr. James, civil engineer, after a lapse of forty-three years, again appears upon the scene of science, and suggests an improvement destined in the opinion of clever, unbiased men, to produce an entire revolution in all steam machinery, and which will soon be given in proper shape to public use. It would be curious, indeed, as has been said by a close observer of these matters, if it should fall to the lot of the same individual, after an interval of so many years, to be the originator of the second great revolution in steam locomotion.

A REMINISCENCE OF ALMA MATER.

Apropos of incidents of College life, "E. H. L. P." writes to the Californian:

"Talking of early hours puts me in mind of a droll occurrence which took place at Christ Church, during those happiest days of my life—my Oxford days.

"You must know that at all the colleges and halls at Oxford undergraduates are invariably expected to attend morning prayers, offered up in their various chapels by the respective chaplains, at an early hour before breakfast. At the time I speak of there was a very fast set of young men at Christ Church College, headed by the youthful Lord L., Eustace S., and the Marquis of T. These men used to spend their nights carousing and enjoying themselves in the most jolly bachelor's style; sometimes roving around, up to all sorts of deviltry; at other times sitting all night over their Burgundy and cigars, in a continual round of wit, humor and merriment. Now, as these men never got to bed before four or five o'clock in the morning, it was, of course, out of their power to attend chapel at seven, and they never attempted it. This state of affairs lasted some time, when, in Trinity Term of 185—, the chaplain of Christ Church, (the Rev. Dr. B.,) got tired of saying prayers alone in a college chapel of which there were at least five hundred members, and accordingly made a complaint to Dr. Pl—tre, Vice-Chancellor of the University, telling him that, out of all the College members, he only got three (!) regular attendants at morning prayers. The Vice-Chancellor was, of course, much concerned, but suggested to the chaplain that perhaps his hour for morning prayer was too early for such hard-reading men, and told him to make it an hour later and then see if the men would not attend. The chaplain accordingly read prayers an hour later every morning, but to his intense astonishment he found that he not only did not get any more men to attend, but even the three men who had been so punctual before ceased altogether to come, and he had an empty church. He at once went and reported this to the Vice-Chancellor, who was so enraged and nonplussed that he at once sent for those who had been formerly punctual to find out from them, at all events, the reason they had left off attending chapel. These three men were Lord L., Eustace S., and the Marquis of T. The Vice-Chancellor and the chaplain, upon their appearance, courteously invited them to be seated, and at once informed them that they had been sent for to inquire their reasons for not attending morning prayer, now that it was at 8 o'clock, when they used to be so punctual and edifyingly pious when prayers were an hour earlier—at 7 o'clock. After a moment's hesitation, Eustace S., who assumed the position of spokesman, thus answered: "You have asked us, gentlemen, the reason why we do not attend morning prayers at 8 o'clock, when we used to be so regular and punctual in our attendance when prayers were an hour earlier, at 7 o'clock. The reason is simple. We could manage to sit up till 7 o'clock, but we could not stand an hour longer—8 o'clock was too late for us!'"

MILITARY NOTES AND QUERIES.

Questions.—1. In what direction does a sentinel face, when "facing to the proper front" as prescribed in paragraph 423 Revised United States Army Regulations?

2. Does a sentinel salute an officer who passes him, by bringing his left hand to his musket as high as his right shoulder only when he is in his sentry-box, or does he so salute under other circumstances?

J. L., 128th Ohio Vols.

Answers.—1. A sentinel on any of the four sides of a camp will face outward, or, if before the colonel's tent, will face towards the color-line, and will stand at shouldered arms, when an officer in uniform approaches him, unless the officer be a general, a field officer, the officer of the day, or the commanding officer of the post, to any of whom he will present arms. At all other times the sentinel is required to carry his arms at support, or on either shoulder, unless in wet weather, when he will secure arms, if there be no sentry-box.

2. A sentinel only salutes, when he is in sentry-box, by standing at attention, and by bringing his left hand to his musket as high as his right shoulder.

Question.—Being in double column and changing direction by the right flank, should the subdivisions be aligned by the left or by the right? G., Brooklyn, N. Y.

Answer.—A battalion, in double column, closed in mass, being at a halt, changes direction according to the principles prescribed for a simple column by division. If a simple column by division is right in front, the alignment, after a change of direction, either by the right or left flank, is towards the guide, or by the left. In the case of a double column, the alignment will also be towards the guide or by the right, as a double column habitually takes the guide to the right, though sometimes to the left and sometimes to the centre of the column.

PHILOSOPHIC PARAGRAPHS.

If the best man's faults were written on his forehead, it would make him pull his hat over his eyes.

Clear writers, like clear fountains, do not seem as deep as they are; the turbid look the most profound.

Good lawyers are often bad legislators; many know perfectly what has been established, and very imperfectly what ought to be.

To no act of begging are people so averse so to begging pardon; that is, when there is any serious ground for doing so. When there is none, this phrase is as soon taken in vain, as other momentous words are upon light occasions. On the other hand there is a kind of begging which everybody is forward enough at; and that is begging the question. Yet surely a gentleman should be as ready to do the former, as a reasonable man should be to do the latter.

There is always some religion, some hope and fear extended into the invisible, from the blind boding which nails a horse-shoe to the mast or the threshold up to the song of the Elders in the Apocalypse. But the religion cannot rise above the state of the votary. Heaven always bears some proportion to earth. The god of the cannibals will be a cannibal, of the crusaders a crusader, and of the merchants a merchant. In all ages, souls out of time, extraordinary, prophetic, are born, who are rather related to the system of the world, than to their particular age and locality. These announce absolute truths, which, with whatever reverence received, are speedily dragged down into a savage interpretation. The interior tribes of our Indians, and some of the Pacific Islanders, flog their gods, when things take an unfavorable turn. The Greek poets did not hesitate to let loose their petulant wit on their deities also. Laomedon, in his anger at Neptune and Apollo, who had built Troy for him, and demanded their price, does not besitate to menace them that he will cut their ears off. Among our Norse forefathers, King Olaf's mode of converting Eyvind to Christianity was to put a pan of glowing coals on his belly, which burst asunder. "Wilt thou now, Eyvind, believe in Christ?" asks Olaf, in excellent faith.

I could write a whole paragraph merely in favor of cheerfulness and merriment in girls, and dedicate it to mothers who so frequently forbid them. But seriously to assure girls they may laugh on suitable occasions would look very much like presenting them an opportunity of doing so. Mothers have much a habit of grumbling, even though they may smile inwardly; the daughters, on the contrary, generally only laugh visibly. The former have passed out of the triumphant church of virgins into the church-militant of matrons; their growing duties have increased their seriousness; the bridegroom is changed from a honey-bird, who invited them to the sweets of the honeymoon, into a resolute honey-hunting bear, who will himself have the honey. Then, all the more, O mothers! grant the dear light-hearted beings their sports around the flowers; their minute's play, before long years of serious duties. Why may not with them, as with the Romans, comedy precede tragedy? If a boy may be a zephyr, why may not the girl be a zephyrette? Is there in the whole range of life anything so beautiful, so poetical, as the laughing and jesting of a maiden who, still in the full harmony of all her powers, plays with everything in luxurious freedom, and neither mocks nor hates when she jests? . . . Never fear that feminine merriment precludes depth of soul and feeling. Does it do so in men? And did not the law-giver Lycurgus, and his Spartans everywhere, build an altar in his house to Laughter? It is precisely under external cheerfulness that the quiet powers of the heart increase and grow to their full stature. How heavenly must it be, then, when, for the first time, the smiling face weeps for love, and the irrepressible tears mirror the gentle heart!

A Turkish Bath.—The first occasion on which I ever saw Dr. Whately (observes a correspondent) was under curious circumstances. I accompanied my late friend Dr. Field to visit professionally some members of the archbishop's household at Redesdale, Stillorgan. The ground was covered by two feet of snow, and the thermometer was down almost to zero. Knowing the archbishop's character for humanity, I expressed much surprise in seeing an old laboring man in his shirt-sleeves felling a tree "after hours" in the demesne, while a heavy shower of sleet drifted pitilessly on his wrinkled face. "That laborer," replied Dr. Field, "whom you think the victim of prelatical despotism, is no other than the archbishop, curing himself of a headache. When his grace has been reading and writing more than ordinarily, and finds any pain or confusion about the cerebral organization, he puts bath to flight by rushing out with an axe, and slashing away at some ponderous trunk. As soon as he finds himself in a profuse perspiration he gets into bed, wraps himself in Limerick blankets, and falls into a sound slumber, and gets up buoyant."—Fitzpatrick's Memoirs of Archbishop Whately.

Snobs.—After looking over the crag we went into the pleasant summer-house close by, a quaint, rustic erection of hazel twigs, coated on the sides with moss, and the roof covered with ling; and we sat on the gnarled oak seats, on which the snobs of the neighborhood, who go there a pic-nicking, had cut their initials, as English snobs always do in such places! Oh, I wish, sometimes, a big stout-armed game-keeper would catch one of the fellows at work "whittling" in this way, injuring what is placed there for his enjoyment, and would put "his mark" on the culprit's back with a good hazel stick. Not long ago I saw, in Kendal church, a white marble statue of the son of some ancient knight or squire in the neighborhood on which there is scarcely a square inch on which some fool or other had not cut his name or initials; and oh, how ashamed I felt for my countrymen! But it is the same nearly everywhere in this country. When will they mend?—Rambles by the Ribble, by William Dobson.

Blind people, like blinded finches, sing better and louder than those who see.

AFTER THE WEDDING.

ALL alone in my room at last:
I wonder how far they have travelled now?
They'll be very far when the night is past;
And so would I, if I knew but how.
How lovely she looked in her wreath and dress!
She is queenlier far than the village girls;
Those were roses, too, in the wreath, I guess—
'Twere they made the crimson amongst the curls.

She's good as beautiful, too, they say;
Her heart is as gentle as any dove's;
She'll be all that she can to him alway—
Dear! I am tearing my new white gloves.
How calm she is with her saint-like face!
Her eyes are violet—mine are blue;
How careless I am with my mother's lace!
Her hands are whiter, and softer, too.

They've gone to the city beyond the hill,
They must never come back to this place again!
I'm almost afraid to be here so still,
I wish it would thunder! and lightning! and rain!
Oh, no! for some may not be a-bed,
Some few, perhaps, may be out to-night;
I hope that the moon will come instead,
And heaven be starry, and earth all light.

'Tis only a summer that she's been here—
It's been my home for seventeen years!
But her name is a testament far and near,
And the poor have embalmed it in priceless tears.
I remember the day when another came—
There, at last, I have tied my hair—
Her curls and mine were nearly the same,
But hers are longer, and mine less fair.

They're going across the sea, I know,
Across the ocean—will that be far?
Did I have my comb a moment ago?
I seem to forget where my things all are.
When ships are wrecked, do the people drown?
Is there never a boat to save the crew?
Poor ships! If ever my ship goes down,
I'll want a grave in the ocean, too.

Good night, good night—it is striking one!
Good-night to bride and good-night to groom.
The light of my candle is almost done—
I wish my bed was in mother's room.
How calm it looks in the midnight shade!
Those curtains were hung there clean to-day;
They're all too white for me, I'm afraid,
Perhaps I may soon be as white as they.

Dark—all dark!—for the light is dead.
Father in heaven, may I have rest?
One hour of sleep for my weary head—
For this breaking heart in my poor, poor breast!
For his sweet sake do I kneel and pray,
O God! protect him from change and ill;
And render her worthier every way,
The older the purer, the lovelier still.

There, I knew I was going to cry,
I have kept the tears in my soul too long;
Oh! let me say it or I shall die,
As Heaven is witness, I mean no wrong.
He never shall hear from this secret room,
He never shall know in the after years,
How seventeen summers of happy bloom
Fell dead, one night, in a moment of tears!

I loved him more than she understands—
For him I loaded my soul with truth;
For him I am kneeling with lifted hands,
To lay at his feet my shattered youth!
I love, I adore him, still the same!
More than father, and mother, and life!
My hope of hopes was to bear his name—
My heaven of heavens to be his wife!

His wife—oh, name which the angels breathe,
Let it not crimson my cheek for shame—
'Tis her great glory, her word to wreathe
In the princely heart from whose blood it came.
Oh, hush! again I behold them stand,
As they stood, to-night, by the chancel wall;
I see him holding her white-gloved hand,
I hear his voice in a whisper fall.

I see the minister's silver hair,
I see him kneel at the altar stone,
I see him rise when the prayer is o'er,
He has taken their hands and made them one.
The fathers and mothers are standing near,
The friends are pressing to kiss the bride;
One of those kisses had birthplace here—
The dew of her lips has not yet dried.

His lips have touched hers before to-night—
Then I have a gram of his to keep!
This midnight blackness is flecked with light,
Some angel is singing my soul to sleep.
He knows full well why many a knave
So close to his lady's lips should swim—
God only knows that the kiss I gave
Was set in her mouth to give to him!

[William L. Keese.

PRESENCE OF MIND.—During a recent performance at a Paris theatre a man and his wife had to quarrel on the stage, the woman in a rage of jealousy, the man trying to persuade her she was too suspicious and too passionate; both were acting with great spirit, when the wife moved her arm too near a candle, and her muslin dress was in flames in an instant. Both actors kept their presence of mind, however; the husband extinguished the fire, and, proceeding with his part, interpolated—"You see, my dear, I was right; you are ready to flare up (vous enflammer) for the least thing!"

In the Senate, on the leather tax in 1794, in the Irish House of Commons, the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Sir John Parnell) observed, with great emphasis, "that in the prosecution of this war every man ought to give his last guinea to protect the remainder." Mr. Vandeleur said, that "however that might be, the tax on leather would be severely felt by the barefooted peasantry of Ireland." To which Sir Boyle Roche replied, that "this might easily be remedied by making the under leather of wood."

Do not keep stirring the ashes of dead things in your conscience; do not keep turning over the leaves of memory, debiting the soul with a thousand debts that you can never pay; do not keep looking within, trying if you can to strike a balance—that after all if you are not so good you are not so bad, and therefore that you have a chance of escape. Leave the whole thing; it is a bankrupt concern; look out from the ruin, look up to Him who has taken your debts upon his own shoulders.

GENERAL UTILITY.

"WHERE got'st thou that goose look?" "Go prick thy face, thou lily-livered boy." "Take thy face hence." "Dull, unmindful villain, why stay'st thou here?" "Speak, slave!"

These and such like expressions I have been used to for many years, and use with us is second nature; for we talk about our thousands, and flutter our crisp bank notes, as if they were old friends.

I've seen the great tragedian take his paper on Saturday, but I never got beyond a small pile of silver—a very small pile. There are three more mouths at home, but she (I mean my wife) makes the salary go to the end of the week very well.

It seems like a dream to look back on the time past, and see the old man in his chair, smoking his pipe, and listening to the bit o' news out of a paper more than a week old. Ah! he was opposed to anything theatrical, "tooth and nail." Wouldn't have seen me talking to a play-actor, in case I might have caught the infection; well, he didn't live to see me in the "general utility" line, that's a shock he was spared.

There were no music-halls when I first started; if there had been, I do not suppose I should have joined the travelling company. I had a tidy voice at that time, and, if I could have got a good comic song written, I should have only had to put on a ridiculous dress; then I should have stood a better chance. Why do I not do it now? Too late, sir. My salary, as I have said before, is not very great, and my wardrobe is not very flourishing; but utility is my line, sir—"general utility"—and I expect that I must go on making myself generally useful till the "baize" falls.

I had a long apprenticeship in the country. Pieces changed every night; that is the time to try your study. "Practice makes perfect," they say; but when you come to play a dozen pieces a week, there is no mistake about the practice; but as to being perfect, you had better ask the prompter.

Yet, mind you, there is a sort of charm about the "uninterrupted chain of novelty" business, (that is what they call it in the bills.) Why? Well, I will tell you. I have played in a piece for more than two hundred nights. I had to go on when it was nearly over, and take a letter, which caused a good deal of excitement, to the leading man; and when he asked me if "the Lady Leonora had entrusted it to my care?" I had to reply, "She did, my lord." "There's for thy pains," he said, and, giving me the usual coin, waived me off. That was my part for two hundred and odd nights, and it almost knocked me over. But what annoyed me still worse was that after the run of this successful piece the governor puts up Pizarro and Rob Roy, all the utility parts of which I know backwards. I do not believe in that year I had a chance of studying half a dozen parts.

My wife was on the stage before we were married; but now, what with the children and looking to my collars and lace ruffles for "ball-room scenes" and "evening parties," she could hardly have the time to study, even if I asked for the double engagement.

My eldest girl, somehow or other, took a liking to the boards very early; she'd been reading over my parts and a few permitted books of published plays that I picked up a bargain. When poor Harry Collins, our "second heavy man," died, he only left an old father behind him, who soon melted Harry's little stock of "props," and the books came to me; but I was going to say about my girl Ellen, (we always call her Nell at home.) I never shall forget how pleased that child was when I came home one day from rehearsal, and told her that Old Burton, the stage manager, was in a fix for a girl to play in Belphegor, and I said that I had come to take her to the theatre. She put on her bonnet, and I think she wanted to have a "bus" to the stage-door.

She read the part beautifully at rehearsal, and at night I stood as near the wing as a "general utility" man is allowed, and I heard the governor say to the stage-manager, "I say, Burton, that girl's playing that part remarkably well;" and so she did, for the woman at the pit told me the next night that she made the people cry in the second act; and when I went home and told Nelly that, she laughed and drew herself up, "Ah!" said she, "we must have bills out next week, with our name in larger type, and we must speak about raise of salary."

She has got on wonderfully since then. She's in America now "starring," and writes home about "dollars;" well, she's a good girl, though I say it, and industrious, for she's studied her profession, and kept to it from nigh the bottom of the ladder. I'm proud to say she never did go on without having something to speak, not that I have anything to say against the ballet. I've seen too many instances of hard-working girls taking home their little earnings to poor parents for that. There are exceptions, I know, in this as well as in other professions, but perhaps not quite so many.

I have been at the theatre where I am now for three years, but before that time I was out of an engagement sometimes for a month or two. I went one summer into the provinces, leaving my wife in our old lodgings with the younger children. I joined half a dozen others, who were taking the very small theatres, and, as it was out of the season at the places we went to, the proprietor was glad to let us open and take two-thirds of the receipts for his rent, printing, and gas. We managed to live somehow. I remember I played "Macbeth" for my benefit, and when I came at night, the woman who cleaned the stage gave me a letter, and when I opened it there was a sovereign fixed in a card, and a few words inside the envelope asking me to reserve the front row in the boxes; you may guess that I was rather excited, for there was no name mentioned.

Well, I dressed for the part; it was not such a bad make-up, for I had seen some of the best on the stage. I won't say much about the dress; I remember I was not pleased with it after receiving the sovereign.

I came down to look through the curtain to see if there was any one in the house, and was surprised to see a good gallery and a very decent pit. I had not expected it, for there was a pony race and jumping in sacks in a field near the theatre, but, as it was raining fast, the presence of my patrons was explained.

Seven o'clock. Prompter rang the bell. Up went the curtain. The first and second scenes passed over. Scene third.—Enter Banquo, followed by Macbeth. 'Good reception for a utility man. I did not look at the audience, but closed my eyes as I bowed. I came down for my first soliloquy, and, when I turned my eyes towards the centre, there was my Nelly, with her mother and her sister Jessie, sitting in the reserved seats. The mystery of the sovereign was revealed, and, strange to say, her presence seemed to give me more power. The good girl never laughed at me during the whole performance, and, when I was killed and the curtain fell, she came round to me in the dressing-room, and giving me a kiss, said "You're a dear old bad actor, that you are."

That was the only time I went beyond "general utility," and she often reminds me of it in her letters.

I'm very comfortable at present. A few months since, though, I was a little vexed. I can hardly tell you the reason. I can't explain why it should trouble me, but the fact is I wanted to go to Stratford-on-Avon, but there was a misunderstanding between the governor and the committee, and our company didn't go down.

A SCENE AT POMPEII.

SIGNOR FIORELLI had frequently observed hollows in the hard volcanic matter, in which were found human bones or fragments of charred wood occasionally mixed with ivory and bronze ornaments. The happy idea occurred to him of pouring liquid plaster into these hollows—in fact, using them as a sculptor would a mould. The result far exceeded his expectations. Among the first casts that he thus obtained were those of four human beings. They are now preserved in a room at Pompeii, and more ghastly and painful, yet deeply interesting and touching objects it is difficult to conceive. We have death itself moulded and cast—the very last struggle, the final agony brought before us. They tell their story with a horrible dramatic truth that no sculptor could ever reach. They would have furnished a thrilling episode to the accomplished author of the Last Days of Pompeii.

These four persons had perished in the street. They had remained within the shelter of their homes until the thick black mud began to creep through every cranny and chink. Driven from their retreat, they sought to flee when it was too late. The streets were already buried deep in the loose pumice stones which had been falling for many hours in unremitting showers, and which reached almost to the windows of the first floor. These victims of the eruption were not found together, and they do not appear to have belonged to the same family or household. The most interesting of the casts is that of two women, probably mother and daughter, lying feet to feet. They appear from their garb to have been people of poor condition. The elder seems to be tranquilly on her side. Overcome by the noxious gases she probably fell and died without a struggle. Her limbs are extended, and her left arm drops loosely. On one finger is still seen her coarse iron ring. Her child was a girl of fifteen; she seems, poor thing, to have struggled hard for life. Her legs are drawn up convulsively. Her little hands are clinched in agony. In one hand she holds her veil, or a part of her dress, with which she had covered her head, burying her face in her arm to shield herself from the falling ashes and from the foul sulphurous smoke. The form of her head is perfectly preserved. The texture of her coarse linen garment may be traced and even the fashion of her dress, with its long sleeves reaching to her wrists. Here and there it is torn, and the smooth young skin appears in the plaster like polished marble. On her tiny feet may still be seen her embroidered sandals. At some distance from this group lay a third woman. She appears to have been about twenty-five years of age and to have belonged to a better class than the other two. On one of her fingers were two silver rings and her garments were of a finer texture. Her linen head-dress, falling over her shoulders like that of a matron in a Roman statue, can still be distinguished. She had fallen on her side, overcome by the heat and gases; but a terrible struggle seems to have preceded her last agony. One arm is raised in despair; the hands are clenched convulsively. Her garments are gathered up on one side, leaving exposed a limb of beautiful shape. So perfect a mould of it has been formed by the soft and yielding mud that the cast would seem to be taken from an exquisite work of Greek art. She had fled with her little treasure, which lay scattered around her—two silver cups, a few jewels, and some dozen silver coins. Nor had she, like a good housewife, forgotten her keys, after having probably locked up her stores before seeking to escape. They were found by her side.

The fourth cast is like that of a man of the people, perhaps a common soldier. He is of almost colossal size. He lies on his back, his arms extended by his side and his feet stretched out, as if, finding escape impossible, he had laid himself down to meet death like a brave man. His dress consists of a short coat or jerkin and tight-fitting breeches, of some coarse stuff, perhaps leather. Heavy sandals, with soles studded with nails, are laced tightly round his ankles. On one finger is seen his iron ring. His features are strongly marked; the mouth open as in death. Some of the teeth still remain, and even a part of the moustache adheres to the plaster.

The importance of Signor Fiorelli's discovery may be understood from the results we have described. It may furnish us with many curious particulars as to the dress and domestic habits of the Romans, and with many an interesting episode of the last day of Pompeii. Had it been made at an earlier period we might, perhaps, have possessed the perfect cast of the family of Diomedes, as they clung together in their last struggle, and of other victims whose remains are now mingled together in the bone-house.—London Quarterly.

TO A GENT.

BELIEVE me, if all those ridiculous charms
Which I see on your watchguard to-day,
Were to-morrow locked up at the Lombardy Arms,
Thine uncle's advance to repay,
Thou wouldst still look the snob which this moment thou art,
(Let thy vanity think what it will,)
For those blazing-red buttons, that shirt front so smart,
And those studs, prove thy gentishness still.

MY FIRST DEAL IN HORSE-FLESH.

WHEN the Pet began to kneel and use her beseeching eyes, I knew full well that, although I may pretend to make a fight, tho battle was really finished.

"But," I said, "I really don't think, Beaty, that it's quite consistent in a country parson's daughter to go scampering about the country on horseback. You know how censorious people are. There are the Misses ———"

Pet put her hand upon my mouth at once, tossed back the bush of golden, silken hair from either cheek, and held up her finger,—

"Now, that is all nonsense, papa dear; besides, you know you are always talking about Mr. Kingsley and the value of muscular Christianity, and plunder his ideas for Sunday use sometimes," she said, screwing up her violet eyes in the most comical manner; "and now that you have an opportunity of putting these ideas in practice, you put me off with what the Misses ——— will say. Is it fair, now, sir, that you men-folk should keep all the muscular Christianity to yourselves, and not a spare bit to the women-folk?"

This was touching me hard, so I gave in at once.

"But supposing, Beaty, we could find you this fancy steed you talk about——"

"Supposing, papa!—there is no supposing about the matter. All you are asked to do is to find the money, and I'll find the dear delightful little horse; so that's settled. And you know it will be a positive saving, papa; for that beautiful habit of mamma's, which cost thirty-five guineas, will be perfectly destroyed by the moths, unless it is taken out and worn; so, you see, the cost of the horse will be more than saved, after all."

I did not see the cogency of the argument, it is true; but who ever thought of arguing with Beaty when she looked you through with her large and fathomless violet eyes? At least, not her papa; and possibly another, one of these days, will feel inclined to forget his logic also.

Beaty was as good as her word. One morning, at breakfast, she came running up with the Times, and, throwing herself down on her knees, in the old cuddling, irresistible fashion, exclaimed, "I've found him! I believe my good fairy has put this advertisement in on purpose to please me;" and she began to read:

TO BE SOLD, a HORSE OF GREAT BEAUTY, late the property of a deceased Gentleman. He is a beautiful Bay, with Black Legs, by Emilius, perfectly quiet to ride and drive, and has carried a Lady. Apply, before 10 A. M., at —— Mews.

"There, papa, if you are a good boy, you shall have a ride sometimes; and he will do for pic-nics, and to drive you over to Grimsby, where that tiresome old vicar always wants you to do duty for him. Did you ever hear of such a perfect animal!"

"Softly, Miss Beatrice," I said; "I am afraid all this is too good to be true. I shall be quite satisfied if he carries you."

"Now, then, dear papa, see that you go early, as such an animal is sure to be snapped up directly in Loudon, where a good horse is always worth his money."

I took the morning train the very next day, after many injunctions that I must on no account let the "horse of great beauty" slip through my fingers. I arrived at the mews in question at the appointed time. It was situated in a very quiet and respectable neighborhood, and was in itself a very orderly-looking place. Why do grooms take such pride in the windows of their sleeping-rooms? Every other window that I looked at was fenced in with a mimic five-barred gate, the palings painted white and the five-barred gate green. No doubt, these are but an expression of the country taste of the country-bred lads who come up to town to seek their fortunes and sink down into the cunning grooms one meets with at the corners of streets in May Fair, plotting treason against their masters with the corn-chandler. I asked in vain, for a long time, for the handsome horse, but no one seemed to know anything about him. At last I was told to apply at a particularly quiet and orderly-looking stable, where my informant told me he had "heerd of such a hoss" as I was looking for. Accordingly I knocked, but there was no answer. Tired of repeatedly knocking, I at last took the liberty of opening the door and walking in. The only person visible was a venerable-looking groom, who was engaged in cleaning a horse. "Wis'ss, wis'ss, wis'ss, wis'ss," went the rheumatic old man, either not hearing me enter or not deigning to take any notice of me, whilst intently engaged upon his duties. He was dressed in an old purple plush waistcoat, with old silver buttons with a crest upon them, and his neck was incased in a neatly-pinned white cravat. Evidently he belonged to some old household, where a certain traditional dress was maintained, even reaching to the stable-man. There was something in the old man that spoke of better days, and I was at once prepossessed in his favor. At last, as he took no notice of me, I went up closer to him, and asked if that was the horse that was advertised in the Times for sale; but the only response that he made was the same "wis'ss, wis'ss, wis'ss," his body bent quite double. At last, thinking he might be deaf, I slapped him gently on the back, on which he slowly rose to his full height, adjusted his footing in a very rickety manner and exclaimed:

"Yes, sir, they be, worse luck, and I wish I was going to be sold wi' 'em," and immediately renewed his eternal "wis'ss, wis'ss, wis'ss," as though he considered it an intrusion on my part to interrupt him in his duties.

"Come," I said to myself, "I must mollify this crusty, sterling old retainer, or I shall get nothing out of him. He evidently takes me for a Cockney." I tried what effect a shilling would have upon him, and immediately found that his country bluntness was no proof against the charm; in fact, he became quite communicative.

"Yes, gemman," he said, resuming for good his upright position, as well as his rheumatics would let him, "all these 'ere hosses in this stable is to be sold, and, as I said before, I wish I was going to be sold wi' 'em. They have all been under my hands ever since they was foaled. They are, or was, the property of Squire —— of —— Hall, in Northamptonshire, God bless him. He has now been dead three months, and his hosses was as much to him as his own childer. They tells me as how he left it in his will that they was to be sold without reserve, by his dear old friend, Squire ——, but they was only to go into good hands. If a good home was offered to 'em, the price was to be no consideration. He was a merciful man to his beasts, was t'ould squire."

The old man, like an old horse, began to warm to his work, and he took me round the stables, with that peculiar loose hobble which grooms somehow acquire in the stable.

"Ah! that were the master's own hoss," he exclaimed, affectionately patting an old hunter, "and this 'ere one carried the missus; she were a rare comely lady, and wanted some good stuff to be up to her weight, she did; and this was the pony that the young squire as was to be, used to ride, only he died; and poor master, he took on so about it, I do believe it was the death on him."

"And this one," said I, espying the bay with the black legs.

"Ah! sir," he said, "now you have hit it. I see you baint a bad judge of hosses. I see this ain't the first time you have had to do wi' 'em."

"Well," thought I to myself, "if this excellent old man wants to be sold with the lot, I won't object. He's just the sterling trurtworthy old man I would like to trust my little Beaty to."

It would almost seem as though the old servitor divined my thoughts, for he said:

"Ain't he handsome as paint, sir? That was he as carried Miss Grace, she as is dead and gone now, sir, wi' her first babe. Lord, sir, the whole village used to come out to see Miss Grace a-riding, and I scarcely knowed which looked the handsomest, she or this 'ere hoss;" and the old man rubbed his eyes with his sleeve.

I stopped for a moment, and whilst I appeared to be busy looking over the animals, I was thinking to myself what a wide difference there was between servants. Here was an old fellow, as rough and as dirty, to all outward appearance, as the bark of a tree, yet as tender-hearted as a child. What a contrast, I thought, to the "spick-and-span-new" grooms of the present day, whose only thought is, how they can do the animals out of their oats! There can be no doubt here, I thought, of the rare service of the antique world. This is one of the good old servants we used to hear our fathers talk about.

To return to business, however, the "horse of great beauty" was in a loose box, which showed off his points to perfection. He was a small horse, splendidly groomed, and in superb condition. He was, in short, the ideal horse for my Beaty; and I flattered myself that she would look quite as becoming upon him as Miss Grace.

"I suppose Squire ——— will allow a trial and give a warranty with him," I said carelessly, and as a mere matter of form.

"In course," said the old man; "the conditions is, that anybody that is likely to suit may have him as long as they like, to try 'un, and if they don't like 'un they have only to bring 'un back and have their money."

Nothing could be more straightforward.

"When will Squire ——— be here?" I inquired.

"Well, sir, I did hear tell that he had to attend a Bible meeting, at Exeter Hall, and that he might look in as he came by, about one; but, Lord bless'e, sir, the kind of gemmen as goes to the hall don't take no count of hoss-flesh; and all he cares about is, that they shall get into some kind hand as likes hosses. Besides, sir, he don't much care about selling this 'ere one, as he thinks he has a friend who will take the lot."

"Very well, John," I said, liking the look of the affair more and more, "I will be here at one."

At the appointed time I was at the stable, and, fortunately, the squire looked in.

He saw me, but took not the slightest notice of my presence, but conversed with the old groom in an undertone, and was evidently giving some directions to him about one of the animals. He was on the point of going away, when the old groom hinted to me that that was the squire, and if I had anything to say I had better make haste, as he was off again to an afternoon prayer-meeting at the hall.

Having apologised for my intrusion, I at once explained the object of my visit; and, as I did so, I could not help remarking the appearance of the squire and executor. He was dressed in black, and wore a white cravat, with an old-fashioned deep frill to his shirt, and gave me the idea of belonging to one of the learned professions—either a clergyman or physician of the old school; there was a leanness about his face, too, which gave him the air of an ascetic, but that his nimble eyes somewhat belied that character.

The principal gave me the same story about the horses as the old groom. He should be glad to get them off his hands, if he could find a good master for them; and, really, he knew very little about horses, and the charge of them interfered with business on which he had come up to town, which, he gave me to understand, was to attend the May meetings. At the same time, he felt it his duty to attend to the last wishes of his old friend, who was, he thought, a little sentimental about his horses, but these weaknesses were just the things that ought to be respected. He said this very carelessly, as though he were talking to himself rather than to me.

Everything was so fair and above-board, that I determined to conclude the deal at once.. I felt I was in such highly respectable hands, that I thought it would look like an insult to ask for a trial before paying, especially as I was to have a written warranty.

Just by way of airing him, he was trotted up and down the yard; and he certainly went superbly, with fine high action, and with eyes full of courage.

The money was paid, and the stamped warranty was given, and I directed the groom to send him to my own stable in town, and returned by the evening train to the rectory.

"Well, papa, what about the horse?" were the first words with which I was greeted by Miss Beaty.

"Well, my darling, it really is a superb creature, and will become you mightily."

"Didn't I tell you, papa," said she, kissing me, "that it would turn out well? You know I have a kind of presentiment about these things. You know I always get just what I want, just in the nick of time."

"Well, well, my dear, we shall see," I replied, pleased with myself and her also.

The next morning, on returning to town, I thought that, just for form's sake, I would have his paces tried by a good rider, before ordering him to be sent home. Accordingly, I got a groom from a neighboring mews. After giving my new purchase a good feed of corn, the groom mounted him. He certainly did not start very well; he swerved right round to begin with.

"He was only having a bit of play," the groom said, "after his corn."

He was trotted up and down, and the groom thought that, with regular work, he would go very well. At the same time, he gave "the office," as it is termed, to a fellow-groom that was standing by. Presently he said the horse had suddenly hurt his foot on a stone; and he certainly flinched with one foot whenever it was brought down on the hard road. It was very provoking; besides, why should the groom have winked in the way he did? It was all right, of course; but, perhaps, it would be but fair to have the opinion of a "vet." at once, instead of waiting for the three weeks' stipulated trial.

Accordingly, the "vet." was sent for, and came.

The moment he entered the stable, he gave the same comical sort of grin the groom had done.

"Ah! an old acquaintance," he exclaimed.

"Impossible," I said, somewhat hurt at his familiarity; "he has just come out of Northamptonshire."

"At all events, I have seen him bought and sold, over and over again, at Aldridge's," he rejoined.

"Why, he was late the property of Squire —— of —— Hall," I said, in amazement.

"Very good," replied the "vet.;" "but if you will be kind enough to inspect his near forefoot, you will find a sand-crack—a split hoof—very cleverly disguised with colored wax."

I did look at his foot, as desired; and there was the crack, so artfully filled up that I never should have discovered it myself.

"Why, I know the horse to be dead-lame," said the "vet.," "and there is no cure for it."

Dear me, how my old friend, the groom, must have been deceived; but, at least, I had a written warranty, and I determined to see him again.

The old groom was busy as before, "wis'ss, wis'ss, wis'ss." I told him what I had discovered, but he was as calm and stolid as ever.

"Well, you know, gemman, what Squire —— said. If you don't like 'un, return 'nn, and there's your money for you."

I almost felt indignant with the "vet." for creating any suspicion on my mind as to the transaction; and I mildly communicated to him, when I next saw him, my belief that the very respectable vendor was perfectly innocent in the matter, and that my money was quite safe.

"If you send back the horse," he replied, "you will never see either it or your money again. Take my advice, and send him to the next sale at Aldridge's, and put up with the first loss."

Against my will, I was at length convinced, and the "horse of great beauty" was knocked down for seven pounds. I am ashamed to say how much I gave for him; but let that pass. I have every reason to believe that he fell into the old hands, to whom, in fact, he was a regular annuity. I see the same advertisement appearing at regular intervals in the Times, and I have no manner of doubt that the old groom, the old physician, and the "horse of great beauty," with the wax-dressed hoof, go through their parts, during the season, with as much success and aplomb as on the occasion when I was the audience and the victim.

What Beaty said to me when I got home, and how I twitted her about her presentiment, it is not necessary to repeat. But this I know, the very respectable horse-coper must bait his hook with something different from a "horse of great beauty" before he gets another bite from the COUNTRY PARSON.

FEMALE VALUES.—The degraded position of women in China is well known. Nothing so much astonishes a Chinaman, who visits European and American merchants at Hongkong, as the deference which is paid to the ladies, and the position which they occupy in society. The servants even express their disgust to see ladies take their seats at the same table with gentlemen, wondering how men can so far forget their dignity. A few years ago a young English merchant was accompanied by his youthful bride to Hongkong, where the couple were visited by a wealthy mandarin. The latter regarded the lady attentively, and seemed to dwell with delight on her movements. When she at length left the room, the mandarin said to the husband, in his imperfect English: "What you give for that wifey of yours?" "Oh," replied the husband, laughing at the singular error of his visitor, "two thousands dollars." This our merchant thought would appear to the Chinaman a rather high figure, but he was mistaken. "Well," said the mandarin, taking out his purse, with an air of business, "s'pose you give her to me, I give you five thousand dollar." It is difficult to say whether the young merchant was more amazed or amused; but the grave air of the Chinaman convinced him that he was in earnest, and he was compelled, therefore, to refuse the offer, with as much placidity as he could assume. The mandarin, however, continued pressing, and went as high as seven thousand dollars. The merchant, who had no previous notions of the value of the commodity which he had taken out with him, was compelled at length to declare that Englishmen never sold their wives after they once came in possession of them—an assertion which the Chinaman was slow to believe. The merchant afterwards had a hearty laugh with his spouse, when he told her that he had just discovered her full value, as the mandarin had offered him seven thousand dollars for her.

IF he [Sir James Mackintosh] had to write on Pepper, he would say: "Pepper may philosophically be discussed as a dusty and highly-pulverized seed of an Oriental fruit, an article rather of condiment than dirt, which, dispersed lightly over the surface of food, with no other rule than the caprice of the consumer, communicates pleasure rather than affords nutrition, and, by adding a tropical flavor to the gross and succulent viands of the north, approximates the different regions of the earth, explains the objects of commerce, and justifies the industry of man.—Sydney Smith.

A BIRMINGHAM boy being asked whether some drillings which he offered at a shop were good, replied: "Yes, I saw father make them this morning."

NOTICE

The publication of "The Californian" takes place on Saturday mornings, and copies may be obtained in the City of all News-stands, and of our News-agents through the country. It will also be served by carriers on the morning of publicotion.

* Correspondents will address all communications, business and otherwise, to "The Californian," office, No. 728 Montgomery street, San Francisco.*

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 17, 1864.

CALIFORNIANS IN THE EAST.

THE number of Californians who voluntarily return from the Eastern States after accomplishing the long-cherished anticipation of "going home," is worthy of remark. Letters written by others, who have settled down beside their old hearthstones, show an ill-concealed yearning after their former pioneer home, or open dissatisfaction with their present location. No matter how deep his home affections, or how great the privation or bad fortune encountered here; no matter how pleasant the greeting of old friends or the enchantment of old scenes, the Californian's heart still yearns towards his western encampment. His soul is with the young Empire whose birth he saw, and whose growth he nurtured with a fostering hand. Travellers say that the cosmopolitan wanderer feels a strange longing to revisit the scenes of his wanderings, though at the close of a restless lifetime, and in this fascination may be found some explanation for the feeling.

The changed aspect which the war has produced in affairs may offer another explanation. But there are reasons which underlie all these. Though the Californian's life was said to be delusive, when the adventurer's first imaginings were cooled to actual realities, those realities were still above the level of Atlantic life. It was easy for him to learn that gold is not generally found in huge boulders upon the earth's surface, and that fortunes were not usually achieved in three months' labor; but it is difficult for the returned Californian to forget that work, such as he sees the day laborer perform for one dollar and a half, has yielded him a return of five or six dollars, in the glittering metal. If he enters into business again, the profit seem to him small and insignificant, even from his lowest California standard. He knows that for practical purposes, a certain sum in the Atlantic States is equivalent to a larger one in California; but though he can reduce his actual cash to the smallest circulating medium, he cannot readily change his California ideas to a practical currency. Socially, he is again at a disadvantage. The ceremoniousness of a long-settled community cannot agree with the free fellowship of his pioneer intercourse. It is said to be easy for man in the highest civilization to return to a state of nature; it is comparatively easy for an untutored savage to progress to a high state of refinement; but the civilized and enlightened man who has tasted the freedom of untrammelled intercourse finds it difficult to forego its allurements. In his matured experience he does not care to go again to school. He makes no allowance for the flight of Time, whose wing has merely fanned him in the excitement of a feverish dream. He cannot take up the thread of prosaic history after the episode of adventure. He is tormented like Sinbad, with a marvellous desire even in the midst of competence; and the spell of a Calypsian climate is over him still. He misses the equable serenity of the half-year summers, the clear exhilarating atmosphere, and the graceful yield of a spontaneous soil. Pinched by frosts in his Atlantic retirement, he looks back longingly to the warm rains that mark the winter of his old Pacific home; restless and perspiring through the sultry summer night in his Eastern dwelling, his fancy follows the setting sun to the cool starlit nights of his beloved Californiа.

The Yosemite-Washoe Collision.—This event, which so excited the public to the detriment of Captain Poole's reputation some six weeks since, has been the subject of official investigation by the Government Inspectors of Boilers and Hulls, and they state that "the fault was wholly with the pilot of the steamer Washoe," thus proving that the great popular verdict was again in the wrong boat. In steamboats, as in men, in cases of collision, the smaller has universally the popular sympathy, and as universally gets the worst of the collision. Steamboats in approaching each other have their well-defined rules of navigation, as universal as the "turn to the right" rule of the road, which, it appears from the evidence, the Washoe violated, and came near achieving at the same time a niche among the popular martyrs by her very transgression.

United States Branch Mint.—The following are the deposits, and localities from whence they were received, at the Branch Mint in this city during the month of August: Idaho Territory, 33,892.35 ozs.; California, 27,284.72 ozs.; Oregon, 6,208.69 ozs.; British Columbia, 1,577.53 ozs.; South America, 49.85 ozs.; foreign coin, 170.12 ozs.; China, 52.68 ozs. The coinage for the month has been: Silver, 123,000 pieces, worth $39,000; gold, 58,500 pieces, worth $1,170,000. Totals: 181,500 pieces; value, $1.209,000.

Too Late.—No 2 of "Our Club" will find place in our next issue.

FASHION IN SAN FRANCISCO, PAST AND PRESENT.

BY OUR FASHION EDITRESS.

FASHION is so capricious and tyrannical in her decrees that her votaries have long since ceased to wonder at or complain of them They content themselves by simply obeying them blindly and silently. Nearly always there is some show of reason in them, either in the ornamental or the useful way; but now and then she startles us by some invention, so absurd, so purposeless, so ungraceful, so unbecoming and so useless, that we cannot restrain our indignation. We murmur, we rebel, we resist until resistance only makes us conspicuous, and then we end by succumbing. We confess to ourselves that we might just as well have yielded gracefully in the beginning. We all remember, when hoops first came into fashion, how many of us declared and vowed that nothing should ever tempt us to wear them. We all know how much was said against them, what a regular crusade was waged upon them, how they were preached at from the pulpit, thundered at from the press, caricatured by picture-makers, ridiculed by the men. What was the consequence? Let us look from our windows and answer, How few there are, even at this late day, who dare appear without them? When Fashion grows weary of them she will issue her mandate, and "they will fold up their tents like the Arabs and silently steal away."

Twelve months ago, Fashion grew suddenly scientific, and plunged at once into all the mysteries of entomology and natural history. She covered herself all over with bugs of various kinds—beetles, and caterpillars, and butterflies, and snails, and speckled snakes, and horned frogs, and birds'-nests, and humming-birds. We read of one fashionable lady who went to a court ball bewreathed with beetles; another was covered with a swarm of Spanish flies, and glistened all over with green and gold; another was adorned with swallows, with outspread wings, on her shoulders, on her head, on her feet, all over her dress; while still another wore the stuffed figures of rabbits and partridges, and other small game suspended from her girdle and bordering her robe. We have seen the gauze dresses of the fair Cubans spangled all over with quivering fire-flies, shining like twinkling stars through rifts of fleecy clouds, and we thought it very pretty and poetical; but we can see no beauty in dragon-flies and black beetles.

This year Fashion has a new hobby: Jackets! Jackets with long tails, jackets with short tails, and jackets with no tails at all; large jackets and small jackets—but always jackets. The height of the mode at present is the Incroyable, the most ungraceful and unbecoming garment we have ever seen adopted by the sex. It looks very much as if a woman had put on her husband's swallow-tailed coat by mistake. They are decidedly more suggestive of pantaloons than petticoats for their accompaniment; yet they are beginning to be adopted by the ultra-fashionables, and we dare say will be very generally worn. They are made of many materials, merinos and cashmeres, and cloth and silk; even delicate India and Swiss muslins, ornamented with lace and ribbons, are put into requisition for them. We have seen several in black Thibet cloth lined with silk and trimmed with drop buttons and guipure lace, which were very much admired. They can be worn with skirts of any other color, and have the advantage of being always ready. When made of the same material as the dress they are less conspicuous, and consequently in better taste. These jackets are so fashionable in Paris that no dress is considered complete without them. They are worn in evening dress, cut low in the neck, with short sleeves either of the same material as the dress or of colored velvet, or silk over tulle and muslin skirts. Sashes are made to imitate them, the ends of the wide ribbon being sloped and fastened together behind with rosettes of laces and fancy buttons. The graceful little bolerinos still obtain favor in the eyes of the young and petite. They display the figure to great advantage, without being exactly tight, and they increase the height of the wearer—an effect not to be disregarded by those to whom Nature has been niggard in the way of inches. Nothing can be prettier or more youthful than these jaunty little jackets, with their soft, white muslin habit-shirts puffing through the slashed sleeves and showing like a fleecy cloud around the throat and bosom, with the long, broad loose sash floating down from beneath them to the very hem of the dress behind.

Hats in endless variety continue to be worn. They are all pretty in their way. As the old toper said of his favorite beverage, "One kind of whisky may be better than another kind, but there is none of it bad." So some hats may be prettier than others, but none of them are ugly. The small round hat with upturned brim, which created such a furore in Europe three years ago—the most becoming, the most stylish, as well as the most useless head-dress ever invented—is still occasionally to be seen, always attracting attention by the distingué air which it imparts to the wearer. The prevalent style, however, seems to be the Huguenot or Cavalier hat of silk or beaver, ornamented with feathers and long cords and tassels floating over the shoulders. For the country and for watering places, straw hats, with brims wide enough to shade the face, are worn. These are usually trimmed with box-plaits of ribbon standing up in the form of a ruche in front. A narrow ribbon of some becoming color box-plaited under the edge of the brim relieves the plainness, and gives a certain degree of lightness and elegance. Bonnets are always worn for visiting, for full dress, and for church. They are growing beautifully less, day by day—the sides press close against the cheeks and temples, and allow of only a moderate amount of trimming over the face. A few curtainless bonnets have made their appearance, but the style is as yet so new that few have dared to venture upon it. Doubtless, in time it will become universal, especially if the fashion of wearing the hair in waterfalls continues. The skirts of dresses when composed of rich, heavy materials, are made plain, with perhaps a scalloped edge—they are very long and full, and should be always gored. There is nothing new in the way of mantles and cloaks—winter wrappings have not yet made their appearance, even in the fashion-plates.

The climate of San Francisco is so peculiar that we have often wondered why ladies did not adopt some particular style of dress exactly suited to it. The fierce winds which prevail here for at least six months out of the twelve, render it almost impossible for a lady to walk in any comfort when arrayed in the distended hoops and trailing skirts of the present fashion. Some modification of the "Bloomer" will perhaps, in course of time, come to be adopted, but it will take a long time to overcome the popular prejudice against it. When ladies used to cross the Isthmus on mules, "Bloomers" were quite the fashion, and for country-walking, sight-seeing, climbing mountains and riding on horseback through thick woods, they are still in favor. We remember during the muddy, rainy winter of '51–'52, that an effort was made to introduce them here. One or two heroic women, with the fortitude of martyrs, arrayed themselves in trousers and tunics, and made their appearance upon the streets; but they were subjected to so much disagreeable notice that they had not the courage to persist. Yet nothing could have been better suited to the climate and the streets of San Francisco twelve years ago than the "Bloomer" dress. Ladies who could stay at home seldom or never ventured out, and those who were obliged to go out did so in fear and trembling. From Bush to Sacramento and Clay streets and back again was the business of a day. The streets were great sloughs of soft mud, dotted with little pools of muddy water of unknown depths. It was impossible to cross without sinking into the mud above one's boots, and the apologies for side-walks were not much better. A pretty little friend of ours stood on the corner of Montgomery and California streets, fairly appalled by the muddy tide which flowed between her and the opposite side. She made several attempts to cross, but the mud was so deep and she was so small that she still hesitated, wondering how she should get across, when suddenly a great rough man, in a red flannel shirt and diamond brooch, rushed through the mud, seized her gently in his arms, deposited her safely on the opposite side, and disappeared before she had time to express her astonishment. Boots were a blessing then, and men laughed at the muddy streets which were such a bugbear to us, and crossed dry-shod without any greater miracle than a pair of water-proofs. It was the fashion then to wear the boots on the outside of the pantaloons, and we have never seen the men of San Francisco look so handsome as they did on the first of January, '52, when they made their New Year visits in that becoming costume. Many of the streets were impassable for carriages. We can close our eyes and see a vision of Stockton street as it appeared in those days. It was then the most fashionable street for residences. A great black highway, defined by irregular sidewalks, the channel, a mass of sluggish mud filled with the wrecks of broken vehicles. There was not a spot free from mud whereon one could set a foot. There happened to be about that time a candidate for Street Commissioner, whose name (we think) was Divier; and we remember that over one of these unfathomable mud-pools some wag had put up a huge poster with the notice "For Street Commissioner, Dive'ere," which was a very fair local pun for those days.

We complain of the summer winds now, but the ladies of modern San Francisco have very little idea of the high winds which we used to have in the early days, before the great lines of brick houses which now offer such a barrier to their progress were built. Then they used to sweep over the city unhindered, dashing around corners, rushing through the streets, blinding the unfortunate pedestrians with sand and dust, knocking their hats off their heads, and snatching their parasols out of their hands, and, in some instances, blowing the skirts of their dresses over their heads. We were standing one day with a lady before one of Austin's windows in Sacramento street, when a sudden gust of wind came rushing by. We heard a smothered groan from our companion, and, turning, saw her struggling to extricate herself from the folds of her black silk dress, which was fluttering in the wind high above her head. She looked so like an hour-glass, half white and half black, that we could not help laughing at her, while at the same time we pitied her distress.

Sanitary Fund.—The Executive Committee acknowledge receipts since our last issue, as follows: From the Sanitary Cheese, $559 87; from the Camanche, $400 20; from fruit sold at the Industrial Fair, $44; from San Francisco, $145. Total, $1,149 07.

The heart that is at once softened by gratitude and the tear of joy will show its thankfulness in this at least, that it will be milder towards others.

SAN FRANCISCO, BY THE POETS.

NUMBER ONE.

NORTH BEACH—After Spenser.

LO! where the castle of bold Pfeiffer throws
Its sullen shadow on the rolling tide,
No more the home where joy and wealth repose,
But now where wassailers in cells abide.
See yon long quay that stretches far and wide,
Well known to citizens as wharf of Meiggs,
There each sweet Sabbath walks in maiden pride
The pensive Margaret, and brave Pat, whose legs
Encased in broadcloth oft keep time with Peg's.

Here cometh oft the tender nursery maid,
While in her ear her love his tale doth pour;
Meantime her infant doth her charge evade,
And ramhleth sagely on the sandy shore,
Till the sly sea-crab, low in ambush laid,
Seizeth his leg and hiteth him full sore.
Ah me! what sounds the shuddering echoes bore,
When his small treble mixed with Ocean's roar.

Hard by, there stands an ancient hostelrie,
And at its side a garden, where the bear,
The stealthy catamount, and coon, agree
To work deceit on all who gather there;
And when Augusta—that unconscious fair—
With nuts and apples plyeth Bruin free,
Lo! the green parrot claweth her back hair,
And the grey monkey grabbeth fruits that she
On her gay bonnet wears, and laugheth loud in glee!

ON A GREAT PUBLIC INSTITUTION.

A FASCINATION I cannot wholly account for has sometimes impelled me to visit a great public institution in this city, and to gaze upon the nervous, anxious crowd that throng its halls and staircases. This desire was the more remarkable, as the impression invariably left upon me, after each visit, was one of profound and depressing melancholy. But in the present instance I am governed by a sense of duty. A paper mysteriously left in my hand commands me to "appear and attend" before the Court of High Jinks for the city and county of San Francisco, to give evidence on the part of the plaintiff in the case of Richard Noakes vs. John Stiles. There is something so appalling and peculiar about this document, in which even my name looks unfamiliar and misspelled, in a space several sizes too large for it, that when I read it to my wife I find it difficult to disabuse her mind of the impression that it is only a preliminary to my immediate trial and incarceration for some capital offence. I cannot recognize nor call up the well-known features of my dear friend Dick Noakes in the sentence, "whereof Richard Noakes is plaintiff," although we have often spoken on this subject, and I have promised to tell all I know about that little stock transaction which brought about this lawsuit. Visiting thus, enpanoplied by the law, he is no longer a concrete individual whom I esteem, but an abstract Noakes, with a claim for justice, before whom I fear and tremble.

If I could only be allowed to tell the story my own way; if I could talk confidentially to the Judge, and relate to him some incidents of Noakes' early career; if I could be allowed to illustrate my story with an anecdote without being told it was irrelevant; if I could quote Rochefoucauld without being checked by the remark that the Court did not wish to hear what Rochefoucauld had said, I feel that I could help Richard. But, alas! I know how it will be. My friendship will subject me to suspicion. I shall be asked my name with an emphasis that will suggest my having indulged in a dozen aliases. I shall be openly accused of complicity with Noakes. That lameness of statement which naturally fills the mouth of friendship in a court of law is "flat perjury." Already I feel myself incompetent; but when the day comes, I stand, nervous too soon, in the doorway of the great public institution.

Like all great public institutions its design is consistent with a general idea of private discomfort; that being the manner in which architects, in all ages, have shown the distinction between public and private buildings. Ventilation is effected by exhausted receivers in the chambers and court room and thorough drafts in the halls and passages. The basement story is low, as though crushed by the superincumbent weight of the upper stories, or as if the speeches of counsel and the opinions of bench above were really too much for the building. As I glance through the iron grating to my right, I see a number of miserable men and women listlessly walking about, with head and shoulders bent and bowed as though they were wretched caryatides who supported the tottering fabric of the law overhead. Here they were, true progenitors of those mythical personages, John Doe and Richard Roe. Here were the real foundations of the great public institution; here was nourished the roots of that goodly tree whose earliest leaves were suits, complaints and summonses—whose later blossoms were judgments and executions—but whose final fruits were deceitful as the apples by the Dead Sea shore. But my business lies higher up in its branches, and I turn away with a sigh of relief from the spectacle of so much vice and misery.

I cannot find the Court-room of High Jinks unaided, I venture to ask information of one of those guardians of the law who loiter outside the Police office. He is communicative, but detains me long enough to be able to identify me hereafter, having the opinion, (which obtains with his profession generally, I think), that mankind are, as a class, undetected criminals, against whom there is simply an insufficiency of legal evidence. As I pass the Police Court-room I cannot resist a survey of its noisome recesses—of wonder at the peculiar class of spectators, many of whom seem to be professionally related to the prisoners in the dock—and of admiration of the apathetic official who guards its entrance.

I reach the Court-room of High Jinks at last, and find a case in progress. I see a foreshadowing of my fate in an unhappy witness undergoing a rigid cross-examination, who has sunk from a pinnacle of self-confidence to the lowest depths of self-abasement, who smiles painfully and imploringly at the counsel, contradicts himself and is convicted of a thousand absurdities in the lawyer's skilful manipulation. He looks longingly at the open door as I enter, as if meditating a precipitate flight, but speedily relapses into a very limp state and rubs his perspiring palms together feebly. The cross-examination is resumed. He (the witness) has stated that he has seen the plaintiff a great many times? The witness, with great cheerfulness and some show of confidence, has said so. Has he seen him ten times? Oh, yes! Has he seen him twenty times? Yes. Thirty times? The witness has seen him thirty times. Has he seen him forty times? The witness—very damp about the forehead and imbecile in smile—has seen him forty times. Now, will the witness remember he is on his oath? has he seen the plaintiff seventy-five times? The witness, gasping for breath—thinks—no, is certain—he has seen the plaintiff seventy-five times. The counsel would recall to the witness his solemn obligations ere he asks the next question—has the witness seen the plaintiff in the case of Muff vs. Puff ONE HUNDRED times? The witness, breaking down, wouldn't like to say. The counsel wants but one answer: yes or no. No! Then what does the witness mean by saying he has seen the plaintiff a great many times? The crushed witness makes no audible reply to this perfectly logical and masterly deduction, and is mercifully permitted to slink away.

I meet Dick Noakes, but a mysterious gulf seems to have opened between us since the service of that subpœna. There is no longer a frank interchange of sentiment. I have been seriously thinking, aided by the scene just transcribed, whether the words I heard the defendant in the case of Noakes vs. Stokes, utter, were really those I had given Noakes to understand, and for which I was subpœnaed. Might I not have been mistaken? Nay, so worked upon am I by the diabolical influence of this great public institution, that I begin to doubt the justice of poor Noakes' claim. Perhaps he sees it in my face; perhaps he would have liked me to have thrown the doubt in his favor; perhaps in very magnanimity he fears I might be betrayed by friendship into misstatement—but, whatever he thinks, he conceals. He coldly tells me he will call me when I am wanted, and turns away. I walk to the corridor and try to divert my uneasy thoughts by watching the people collected there, or passing in and out of the Court-room. It is easy to detect the professional and unprofessional man, the client newly summoned and the experienced litigant, the fresh witness and the old frequenter of the stand. I am tired of meeting the triumphant leer on the face of strange suitors when new points are made in their favor, who in pardonable but unpleasant egotism imagine their suit observed of all others. I am tired of the bullyragging of witnesses. I lean over the iron railing, and, gazing into the court-yard below, fall into a reverie.

Imagine night coming on in this place. When the Court-rooms are deserted, and the porters have swept out the last scraps of paper torn up by the feverish fingers of anxious suitors and badgered witnesses; when the key of the Clerk's office is turned upon legal bundles, pigeon-holed and piled away, where John Doe and Richard Roe—those urbane children of the law—are tucked in bed and lie quietly at rest; when a footstep in the passage echoes through all the gloomy rooms and loses itself in the canopy over the Judge's bench; when the sound of wheels die away from without and the cold sea-fog fills the corridors; when the lights are turned off, and only a glimmer straggles into the Court from the basement where Vice and Misery never sleep, and where the festering roots of this deadly Upas tree suck the baleful night dews. At such an hour and in such a place, what is to keep the bodiless spectres of dead-and-gone clients—the wraiths of orphans robbed of their inheritance, the pale shadows of defrauded widows—from thronging these stairways? Why should not the spirits of dead men gather round the closed door of the Probate Court and clamor for that intent which the technicalities of the law have shamefully perverted? Lo! they crowd the staircase, they glide in and out of the passages, they fill the Court-room. Cases, long since decided by honorable and learned Judges in the flesh, are reversed before this shadowy tribunal. They take possession of the Clerk's office and the great books of record rustle with the touch of their unsubstantial fingers. They—

But a voice breaks my phantasy. The case is called and I am wanted. I enter the Court-room. The Clerk repeats the oath in a monotonous voice, and with something of this strange fancy still upon me, I rise to speak the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.

BRET.

EVERY human being, conscious of honest intention and of a kind heart, may well wish that the man who dislikes and abuses him could just know him.

A BOOK FOR THE TIMES.

IN VIEW of the requirements of the advanced civilization on this coast, and the necessity of polite text-books and indigenous rules for social and elegant intercourse, THE CALIFORNIAN offers the following extracts from a new work shortly to be issued from this office, entitled:

THE CALIFORNIAN
COMPLETE LETTER WRITER.

No. 1. From a Mining Secretary.

DEAR SIR.—You are hereby advised that, in consequence of delinquent assessments, ten (10) shares in the Dedbilque Mining Company, standing in your name, were yesterday sold.

Yours, etc., JOHN JONES, Secretary.

No. 2. From a Stockholder.

DEAR SIR.—I am in receipt of your communication stating that in consequence of delinquent assessments ten (10) shares of the Dedbilque Mining Company, standing in my name, were yesterday sold. In reply, I would state that the shares seem to have followed the example of the shareholder.

I am yours, JOHN BROWN.

No. 3. From a Guardian.

MY DEAR SNIGSBY.—I arrived yesterday per steamer from the East, having in charge your intended bride. The voyage was an exceedingly pleasant one. I found the lady all that your glowing fancy painted. Thoroughly convinced of the correctness of your taste and judgment, and yielding to her delicate instincts, which revolted at receiving protection from one who was not a relative, I proposed, was accepted, and married her myself on the passage up. This will account for the non-appearance of her name on the passenger list. I enclose cards; also, a draft on you for her passage-money, as per agreement. Very truly, your friend,

BREEZY COOL.

No. 4. From an Editor to a Poet.

DEAR SIR.—I have received your letter in which you state "you enclose a Poem," and offer a proposition for its publication. As I am unable yet to accede to the first of your propositions, I cannot enter into a consideration of the second.

I am yours, etc., JEFFERSON BRICK.

No. 5. From a Lad at Boarding School to his Father in the City.

DEAR FATHER.—I am getting on very finely with my studies, and the second Punic war occurred shortly after the death of Augustus, and in consequence of the defections of Aristophanes. The distance from the earth to the sun is over fifty billions of miles, and if you fired a shot from a cannon, it would take twenty thousand years to reach it. It is also slightly flattened at the poles. Dear Father, I swapped with Bill Fisher my watch for ten shares in the Jupiter Gammon Mining Company, and want you to send me some money to pay assessments. All the boys went to see a bull-fight last Saturday, but I stayed in. It is wrong to see bull-fights when you have no money to go in.

Your affectionate son, THOMAS.

ENOCH ARDEN.*

PENDING the more extended notice of this Poem which we design to offer in our next issue, we extract the following exquisitely beautiful lines descriptive of the island refuge of the shipwrecked sailor:

THE mountain wooded to the peak, the lawns
And winding glades high up like ways to Heaven
The slender cocoa's drooping crown of plumes,
The lightning flash of insect and of bird,
The lustre of the long convolvuluses
That coiled around the stately stems, and ran
Even to the limit of the land, the glows
And glories of the broad belt of the world,
All these he saw; but what he fain had seen
He could not see, the kindly human face,
Nor ever hear a kindly voice, but heard
The myriad shriek of wheeling ocean-fowl,
The league-long roller thundering on the reef,
The moving whisper of huge trees that branched
And blossomed in the zenith, or the sweep
Of some precipitous rivulet to the wave,
As down the shore he ranged, or all day long
Sat often in the seaward-gazing gorge,
A shipwrecked sailor, waiting for a sail:
No sail from day to day, but every day
The sunrise broken into scarlet shafts
Among the palms and ferns and precipices;
The blaze upon the waters to the east;
The blaze upon his island overhead;
The blaze upon the waters to the west;
Then the great stars that globed themselves in Heaven,
The hollower-hellowing ocean, and again
The scarlet shafts of sunrise—but no sail.

There often as he watched or seemed to watch,
So still, the golden lizard on him paused,
A phantom made of many phantoms moved
Before him haunting him, or he himself
Moved haunting people, things and places, known
Far in a darker isle beyond the line;
The babes, their babble, Annie, the small house,
The climbing street, the mill, the leafy lanes,
The peacock-yewtree and the lonely Hall,
The horse he drove, the boat he sold, the chill
November dawns and dewy-glooming downs,
The gentle shower, the smell of dying leaves,
And the low moan of leaden-colored seas.

* Enoch Arden, and Other Poems. By Alfred Tennyson, D. C. L., Poet-Laureate. Boston: Ticknor & Fields. 1864.

FEMININE FRANKNESS.—The best of women (I have heard my grandmother say) are hypocrites. We don't know how much they hide from us; how watchful they are when they seem most artless and confidential; how often those frank smiles which they wear so easily are traps to cajole, elude, disarm—I don't mean in your coquettes, but your domestic models and paragons of female virtue. Who has not seen a woman hide the dullness of a stupid husband, or coax the fury of a savage one? We accept this amiable slavishness, and praise women for it; we call this pretty treachery truth. A good housewife is of necessity a humbug; and Cornelia's husband was hoodwinked, as Potiphar was—only in a different way.—Thackeray.

MR. MARK LEMON'S JEST-BOOK.

A BOOK of this sort deserves support on much the same ground as Chelsea or Greenwich Hospital. When a joke has served its country meritoriously for a long time, it should not be allowed to go hobbling about society subsisting on charitable laughter. As a matter of public decency, it is right that there should be some honorable retreat for veteran jests, and the only possible one is a book which will keep them from the streets, lodge them becomingly, and, while it effectually saves them from being over-employed again on active service, preserve them as examples to excite a healthy emulation in the rising generation. Taking them out of circulation in this wholesale way is, it is true, rather hard upon those persons whose colloquial status depends on what is called "a fund of anecdote." When a joke or story has not appeared very conspicuously in priut, it may be made use of with some degree of decency. But the most hardened retailer will scarcely run the risk of being referred to the page at which the authorized version of his mot is to be found. To make a collection, therefore, like Mr. Mark Lemon's is to do an incalculable injury to many amiable gentlemen who are much esteemed in some circles for their powers of dinner-table-talk. It is actually taking the soup out of their mouths. We must not, however, allow such an objection to weigh with us, eveu though the sufferers should, like the Americau ladies, take to using their own manulactures.

Injustice, too, must necessarily be done to many very excellent old jokes. It would require a synod of editors to provide for all that deserve to be laid up in ordinary. Every one, Mr. Mark Lemon says, "will miss some pet jest," and of course the missing jest will be considered by each far better than anything in the volume—just as the old soldier of the parish is always the bravest and most battered and most ill-used man in the country, in the eyes of his co-parishioners. But we do not think the charge of being "miserably incomplete," which the compiler scems to auticipate, can be fairly brought against the present collection. Mr. Mark Lemon had, to be sure, special advantages for a task of this sort, but it is only fair to say that he has employed them so as to produce the fullest and best jest-book that has yet appeared.

If we venture to find fault with him at all, it is rather on the score of things he has done than of the things he has left undone. For instance, there was no occasion whatever for inserting such defunct facetiæ as the school-boy rhyme about Dido dumb, or the story of the organist and the bellows-blower, or one or two others that we might mention. It is all very well to give an asylum to old jokes, but it is quite another thing to open a dead-house. In many instances, too, the same joke is repeated, sometimes in the very same words. Thus the miser's saying, "Charity is a private concern; what I give is nothing to nobody," appears at page 48 and again at page 331. Another miserly dictum, that of Elwes about keeping servants, occurs twice, at page 10 and also at page 246. Lord North's reason for not following his brother's example in subscribing to the Ancient Concerts is also given twice—the first time anonymously, as the joke of "a late noble statesman," the second with the names in full. Another case of the same sort is Hood's mot about "the republic of letters" being so called because authors had not "a sovereign among them." At page 148 we find Madame Pompadour asking Wilkes how far a man might go in England in his abuse of the Royal Family, and his reply: "I do not at present know, but I am trying;" but about sixty pages further on we are told that "Horne Tooke, on being asked by a foreigner of distinction how much treason an Englishman might venture to write without being hanged, replied that 'he could not inform him just yet, but that he was trying.'" Repetitions of this sort occur with greater frequency than is quite cousistent with careful editing.

The charge of spoiling is one of very much the same kind as that of having omitted jokes. People generally prefer a joke in the form in which they have always been accustomed to hear it, and are very apt to treat any alteration as a change for the worse. Still there are one or two instances in which we think the present version is not so good as the one we have heard. For instance, Jerrold's saying to the Scotch gentleman who explained that his name was not spelled in the same way as Mr. John Leech's is not improved by adding "in your name." The reply generally current is simply, "You're one of the Scotch Leitchs—with the i-t-e-h." The whole point of Sir Nicholas Bacon's answer to the criminal who pleaded for mercy on the score of kinship is lost by the omision of the man's name. In Bacon's Apophthegms, the original source of the story, it runs thus: "If it please you, my lord, your name is Bacon and mine is Hog, and in all ages Hog and Bacon have been near kindred." "Ay, but," replied Judge Bacon, "you and I cannot be kindred except you be hanged; for Hog is not Bacon until it be will hanged." Another case is Tom Sheridan's answer when his father threatened to cut him off with a shilling. As given here it was, "Then, sir, you must borrow it," which, we submit, is not so humorous as the other version, "You don't happen to have the shilling about you, now, sir?"—the latter suggesting that such a bequest exceeded all Tom's expectations, aud that, so far from being dismayed at it, he was quite willing to take it on the spot instead of waiting for it. It is a pity that the editor, while he was about it, did not attempt a collection of the good things that used to pass between the Sheridans, father and son. We have seldom had so marked an instance of the hereditary trausmission of wit, and of the way in which men of genuine wit strike sparks from each other. Some two or three are quoted here, but surely there are many more which might have been hunted out. Was it not Tom Sheridan who, when his senior said, "I wish to heaven you'd take a wife," replied, "Very good, sir; whose wife do you wish me to take?"

It would have been better, too, if Mr. Lemon had adopted some more systematic style of heading. Every here and there he seems to think it necessary to enter into competition with the jokes he is collecting. Thackeray's comparison of a certain noisy tragedian to "Macready and onions," is called "A Sage Simile." The Chancellor's remark, that a young barrister had "studied the wrong Phillips," is given under the title of "A fillip for him." There is a story of Lord Bottetot giving money to the mob that was burning him in effigy, that they might put ou faggots enough. His unpopularity was owing to the cider tax; and, therefore, the anecdote is headed "Con-cider-ate"—and so on. We do not look for dignity in a jest-book, but verbal antics of this sort might very well have been left to the pleasant gentlemeu who write burlesques, and their intelligent audiences. Even if they were tolerably good, they would still be out of place here. Metal upon metal is false heraldry, and a joke upon a joke is quite as great a mistake. But besides being, as we think, mistakes in taste, these headings are further objectionable as being utterly useless when arranged iu an index. A book of this sort does not pretend to be a very great, or a very wise, or a very good book; but it might at least try to be as good of its kind as possible, and this would have been better if there had been a serviceable index appended to it. In order to make use of the one given—to find out whether the collection contains some particular saying, or to refer to one which it does contain—it is necessary for the reader to make about half a dozen jokes of the above pattern on the required joke, and then try the alphabetical list for something like one of them. This may be a useful mental exercise, and if the book is to be considered as a jocose Gradus it is all very well, but it is rather hard upon those who are not particularly anxious to acquire the art and have no natural gift in that way. If Mr. Mark Lemon is strong, let him be merciful. We may quote against him a story of his own, to be found under the head of "Order! Order!": "A barrister opened a case somewhat confusedly. Mr. Justice Maule interrupted him. 'I wish, Mr. ——, you would put your facts in the same order; chrouological order is the best, but I am not particular. Any order you like—alphabetical order." So we feel on looking through Mr. Mark Lemon's capital collection of good things. It is a great pity he did not put them in some order, if not in the text at least in the index. To attempt to classify them scientifically, even if practicable, would perhaps have been pedantic, but it would have added much to the interest of the book if the jokes of each "eminent hand" had some distinguishing mark in the index. No matter how wide the range of subjects may be, there is always a curious family likeness among the jokes of any one wit. With a very little practice one can nearly always tell at first a genuine Jerrold from a Curran, or a Curran from a Sydney Smith. The Jerrold and Foote styles are, perhaps, those which resemble one another most closely, yet there is a considerable difference. There is a greater amount of animal spirits in Foote's sayiugs, and in general less acidity. Curran's resemble Foote's iu style, but are generally more pugnacious. They do not, however, go home like the polished stiletto of Jerrold, but rather come down with a ringing rap, like the delivery of a neatly-handled shillelagh. As a representation of Curran's style we may perhaps take his answer to the tobacconist who, having just set up a carriage, consulted him about a motto for the panels—a mot, by the way, omitted by Mr. Mark Lemon. Curran's suggestion was: "Quid rides," which he said had the double advantage of being applicable either as Latin or English. This style of joke has not died out with Curran. We heard of an instance of it the other day. Some counsel learned in the law were discussing the retirement of a certain attorney, whose philanthropy had chiefly taken the direction of getting up and conducting petty actions for damages. Among other things it was mentioned that he had purchased a handsome place in the country. "Considering the way he made his money," said one—a compatriot of Curran's—"he ought to call it son assault demesne." Jerrold's well-known reply about rowing in the same boat, "but with different skulls," is a good example of his style. Theodore Hook's jokes, on the other hand, are, for the most part, purely puns suggested by some quaint verbal similitude. They are to those of the Jerrold and Foote school much what the Cremorne rocket is to the Congreve. The name of Mr. Winter, the tax collector, suggested the idea that his actions are "summary," and the sign of the "Three Ravens" that the landlord must be ravin' mad. But of all the regular recognized jokers Sydney Smith is the one who has least in common with his fellows. His best things are, in general, not so much witty as humorous, but then the humor of them is undeniable. Described scientifically, it may be said to lie iu the sudden discovery of some extravagantly absurd relation between the things compared. Perhaps the joke which best illustrates his peculiar style is his saying to the child he saw stroking the back of a tortoise, "My dear, you don't fancy you're pleasing the tortoise? You might as well try to please the Deau and Chapter by stroking the dome of St. Paul's." In one respect there is a resemblance between the jokes of Sydney Smith and those of Theodore Hook. They are very seldom what may be called jokes with a purpose. Almost the only instance to the coutrary is his repartee to the French freethinker and materialist. "Very good soup, this," said Smith, as they sat at dinner. "Oui, Monsieur, ce'st excellente," was the reply. "Pray, sir, do you believe in a cook?" inquired Smith.

Smith was, we suspect, too good-natured a man to use his wit often as a missile. It may be a hard saying, nevertheless it is true, that a thoroughly good-natured man seldom makes a brilliant joker, and perhaps this is one of the reasons why jokers have from time immemorial, been fond of insinuating that good-nature and poverty of wit always go together. It serves as a kind of justification, or at least excuse, for their attacks on society. The supply of legitimate subjects for repartee is seldom sufficient to afford that constant practice which is essential to neatness of execution. Consequently, a joker, to keep his hand in, is frequently driven to operate on any harmless, unoffending person who may be unlucky enough to give him a chance, just as scientific anatomists operate on horses, dogs, and cats. Any one who looks through a book of this sort will see that a large proportion of the wittiest, smartest, most caustic jests in it are quite unprovoked, or at best can only plead as provocation the simplicity of the person at whom they are aimed. Pascal's aphorism, "Diseur de bons mots, mauvais caractere," is too severe, perhaps, but there is this much of truth in it, that, to be an accomplished "diseur de bons mots," it is necessary to discard to a great extent all consideration for the feelings of others. It may, to some extent, console those who cannot make brilliant hits that set the table in a roar to reflect that the faculty has its drawbacks, and another source of consolation may be found in the fact that it is rarely associated with an intellect of the first order. One or two of Ben Jonson's home-thrusts have come down to us, but we have no record of anything of the kind from the month of Shakspeare, unless it be Fuller's vague and wholly apocryphal allusion to the "wit combats" between him and Ben Jonson. Bacon, who unquestionably had the power, employed it very sparingly, and though Swift and Dr. Johnson shone in repartee, they have done little towards filling a jest-book compared with men of the calibre of Quin, George Selwyn, Foote and Horne Tooke.—Saturday Review.

LACONIC LOVE-LETTERS.

COURTSHIP, to be done "well," should be done "quickly." Many persons who waste time in the ambignities of a protracted correspondence will read with profit the following illustration of how it can be done briefly and to the point:

DEAREST: If that word is a mistake, throw this note in the fire. Excuse folly, result of last night's dance. Cab waiting 11: 30; train starts at 12; back to-night. No answer sufficient reply to your rejected—JOHN SHORT.

MISS SWEET is at a loss to express the embarrassment which she experienced on reading Mr. SHORT'S note.

MY DEAREST LOUISA: Received yonrs, and note the contents In haste, yours,—J. S.

DEAR MR. SHORT: Things must, of course, depend upon circumstances.—L. S.

MY DEAREST LOVE: £500 a year in the funds. £200 landed property. £600 mortgage at 4 per cent. Net profits of busiuess £800 per annum. At your feet.—J. S.

MY DEAR MR. SHORT: Connections? Religious principles?—L. S.

BELOVED OBJECT: Aristocratic. Orthodox. I adore my Louisa.—J. S.

DEAR JOHN: I own you have awakened an interest in my—what shall I say?—L. S.

MY ONLY LOVE: Bosom.—J. S.

MY DEAREST JOHN: What a goose you are!—L. S.

MY BEAUTIFUL BIRD: But then you are a duck. So now we understand one another. Accept the enclosed photograph.—J. S.

INCONSTANT ONE!: I retnrn it. You were seen last night in a private box in Covent Garden with Miss Jones. I am deceived. Farewell! Think no more of L. S.

FAITHLESS: I have paid no attentions to Miss Jones like those I understand you received from Capt. Brown. Distraetiou! Madness!—J. S.

JEALOUS! I scorn Capt. Brown. Torture! Cruel! Unkind!—L. S.

SILLY GIRL! Miss Jones is a griffin. Bosh!—J. S.

DEAREST, DEAREST JOHN: Can you forgive me?—L. S.

MY OWN ONE: my fond one. I believe you.—J. S.

MY HEART'S IOOL: Say no more.—L. S.

QUEEN OF MY SOUL: Three words only. Name the day.—J. S.

MY LOVE: My life: Whenever you like.—J. S.

MY PRECIOUS: Say, Wednesday.—L. S.

MY TREASURE: Very well. The sooner these things are settled the better. I'll see to every thing. Mind then, on Wednesday, St. George's, Hanover square, 11, sharp. Punctuality is the soul of marriage. Au revoir at the altar!—J. S.

LITHOGRAPHIC EMPLOYMENT FOR WOMEN.—It will interes our readers to hear that lithography affords highly profitabl work to some female artists, and that a few women of les qualifications are employed in the lower branches of the ar. Lithography is now being applied in such numerous ways tht fresh labor is eontiuually called into action by it; and te prospect is, that it will be remunerative to a consideralo extent. Women who have the talents necessary for tis work should take advantage of such an opening. The chroiolithographic process is attractive, and in sufficient demanc to stimulate the greatest efforts; ladies are among the ompetitors for the fame and profit of producing some of theest specimens published in this country. The ordinary braches of lithography are easily attainable, and are within the each of any who will spend a little time and money. The right mode of proceeding, for a woman, is to go to a good ithographer, and obtain his services as her instructor in the mchanical part of the business. She should see the publictions that treat on the subject, and thoroughly inform herself f the nature and capabilities of the art, and its various applictions. The materials and implements needful for this work ae not costly. First, there are the stones, which vary in siz and price, and then the tools, which are not numerous; about $25 will provide a sufficient stock of these matters for a beginner. The expense of the lessons we cannot tell; in any case, they will probably be the chief outlay in the proceeding. A lady who has made some proficiency in drawing will not require the attendance of a master for any length of time. We are permitted to mention, as an illustration, that a lady who engaged a first-rate lithographer as her teacher, three month ago, can now produce good pictures herself, and is competen to become a candidate for lithographic employment. Som prints of hers are before us that are highly creditable. Pra tice will enable a woman who has gone thus far to do ve remunerative work, and industry and cultivated skill will cduct her to its best rewards.

A FRENCH monarch being told in his last moments that he would soon be an angel in heaven, exclaimed, scornfully' I should have been quite content to remain King of Franc and Navarre!"

WHEN Cafarielli was told that Farinelli had been ade a sort of Prime Minister in Spain, he said: "No man derves it better, for his voice is absolutely unrivalled."

EXCITEMENT promotes the development of genius, as phosphorescent sea is the more brilliant the more it is agted.

THE GLASS OF FASHION.

LONDON AND PARIS.

A PICTURESQUE, and, we might with truth add, a classical style of arranging the hair has, by degrees, become an established fashion among those who take delight in the adornment of their persons. For morning toilettes the classical style predominates; the hair is crepés and bound close to the head, and at the back a large knot is worn; this knot is either combed over a frizette, or distributed into bows or plaits, the single knot or bow being the most popular; and then, colored ribbon-velvet is bound as a fillet round the head—the velvet should run at the top of the back hair and then flat round the front (either one or two rows according to taste); a bow of velvet is added to the front round, which bow is not fastened to the band but is slipped on to it. so that it can be placed at the side or top of the head at pleasure. For grown-up people the flat bow is worn, made of velvet one inch wide, but the rosettes formed with the narrowest ribbon-velvet are still very popular for children. The color of the velvet should always be regulated by that of the dress and trimmings.

But a far more elaborate style prevails with evening toilettes; the mass of hair is retained at the back, but the front is scaffolded with tier upon tier of puffs. We see the scantiest locks made to look magnificent, and false curls, false plaits, false bows, and false masses of hair at the back are as much a necessity as crinoline is. One lady tells us in confidence, when we admire the result, that her hair is padded with seven cushions! Another, that she has five cushions, a thick false plait, and a false bow of hair at the back, and that all these are necessary for the make up. This fashion of wearing bought hair is a recognised fact, which no one attempts to disguise, and it is only the very few who possess sufficient of their own to turn and twist and roll in all directions who suffer, as they never get credit for their veritable possessions.

But false or not false, we must confess that the effect of these elaborately arranged heads of hair in a ball-room is exceedingly picturesque; they look unstudied, and no two are alike. In Paris, the scaffolding of rolls and bands is crowned with a thick plait; but in London these plaits are not so much affected; the rouleaux taper at the top, and look light and feathery. Great care should be taken, when dressing the hair, to arrange the frizettes straight, so that the eye may not rest on uneven lines, and the result be altogether crooked. To avoid this, it is a good plan, when the second side is being arranged, to hold up a towel as a background, and by then looking in the glass any false line may be easily corrected. and the frizette or cushion laid in straight, so as to exactly correspond with the side already dressed.

With the hair arranged in this style, it would be impossible to wear a formal wreath, therefore the adornments should consist of detached bouquets grouped to suit the shape of the face, and the disposition of the rouleaux. White lilies mounted with diamonds are apparently favorite flowers with the Princess of Wales for this arrangement of hair. Her royal highness usually wears her hair rolled from the temples, a second roll to meet the first, and a massive knot at the back; a water-lily glistening with diamond dew-drops in the centre of the forehead, a second one below the left ear, and a third at the top of the back hair, on the part where the ornamental part of a tortoise-shell comb is usually visible. We need scarcely add that this disposition of such exquisite flowers and costly appendages is very becoming. The pomegranate flowers, flowers of the sorb or service tree, and rose-buds, are very much used for head-dresses of this style at the present moment. In Paris a branch of a citron tree, with half-opening flowers and buds mounted with roses and black lace; a bold butterfly lighting upon a magnificent rose du roi, with foliage glittering with dew-drops; a tuft of wild flowers and grasses, with dew-drops, and the bud of an arum in the centre, are three very fashionable evening head-dresses. The last-named ornament is also worn upon a dress; thus, a white tulle tunic spotted with gold, looped up with groups of grasses and arums over a white taffetas underskirt, embroidered in dead gold, called forth much admiration in the Imperial circle at Fontainebleau some ten days ago.

Embroidery of all descriptions has been greatly in favor at Fontainebleau; a very pretty toilette, worn by a bride, also excited admiration among the same select party. It was composed with a white gauze skirt over a light blue silk slip, the former being embroidered with shaded silk and with straw. The low bodice worked in the centre, to match the skirt, likewise the very short sleeves and long gauze sash. The hair ornamented with straw and pearl beads. This same bride wore, for breakfast, a black-and-white striped taffetas dress; the skirt trimmed to simulate a tunic, with crossway tucks of black and Hortensia-colored taffetas. The bodice was high, with long coat basques, laced with similar crossbands. The head-dress was formed of a half-handkerchief of white lace, a clustered mass of loops, made of Horteusia gauze, and a long and very wide black velvet bow.

Bonnets are now made on an entirely different plan, expressly to suit the manner of dressing the hair. The falling crowns, and the apologies for curtains, have gained a decided victory, for as many bonnets are now made without a curtain and with a soft crown, as with stiff crowns and curtains; and for one season in England, where change of fashions is unfrequent, this is a decided victory. Many of the white crinoline bonnets are made with a moderate-sized front, and a white net crown. Between the front and crown, upon the line which joins them, a deep piece of black lace is sewn. This falls over the crown, which is in the form of a net, and is drawn up and tied with long ends of black narrow ribbon, which are left hanging at the back, reminding one of reins. A spray of flowers is arranged at the left side, with a second to match in the inside. A black tulle bonnet arranged in this style would be found very useful for the coming season. Long black lace leaves are sometimes used for falling over the white tulle crowns instead of the black lace, and are both lighter and more effective.

During the past warm weather, shoes are very much worn instead of boots. They are trimmed with a large buckle and bow, and plain silk stockings are worn under them, with embroidered white clocks at the sides. The striped stockings are worn under boots, which still continue to be made with very high heels. For evening wear, shoes are again taking the place of boots, and either in their color or their trimmings, they should correspond with the dress which accompanies them.

Crinoline is fast disappearing in Parisian circles. At the watering-places abroad it is quite abandoned, and it is said that in another twelve months crinoline will be unknown in Paris.

COMMON SAYINGS AND STREET BOYS.

A CORRESPONDENT of a London paper says: "I am surprised that Mr. John D. Cartwright is ignorant of the origin of the ridiculous phrase, 'How's your poor feet?' It did not arise from the self-inflicted tortures of the way-worn wearer of tight boots, nor from the miseries of a gouty cripple; neither did it originate from the friendly solicitude evinced towards a Chelsea pensioner with two wooden legs. It first started into butterfly existence at the Volunteer Review of 1862, when one volunteer sympathizingly asked a comrade the kindly question at the close of the day's campaign. The interrogatory ran from rank to rank; it was then taken up by Unsworth, in his Stump Oration, and then poured in a lava flood of popularity all over London. Mr. Cartwright gives the street boy great credit for being a universal genius, and asserts that this erratic young gentleman can 'become a cartwheel' on the shortest notice; that he joins in the choruses of street 'niggers;' that he is on familiar terms with half the guards of the Strand omnibuses, and can jump on and off the foot-board while the vehicle is in motion. Mr. C. endows one street-boy with the qualities appertaining to half a dozen. It is only the most wretched beggar-boys who can or will turn a catten or Cath'rine-wheel; and to acquire the power of doing so necessitates the most laborious practice. A respectable crossing-sweeper would not condescend to learn the art. Who ever heard a street boy join in the chorus of any street singers, unless by means of a parting whistle? The boys who are on intimate terms with the conductors of the omnibuses are the boys who sell penny newspapers and comic publications, and they obtain the privilege of being placed on the free-list of the foot-board by giving the conductors a gratuitous "look" at the papers. There is another fact which Mr. Cartwright does not notice; which is, that the true 'street boy'—once Mr. Punch's own pet boy—is becoming a really scarce article. Some few years back he was an intolerable nuisance, and the undisputed lord of the way; but now he is singularly subdued, and is fast losing his distinguishing peculiarities. He never was the 'clever creature' his reputation would lead people to imagine. His sayings, considered so smart, are simply set cut-and-dried phrases, and as he utters them with an air of assurance, and glibly, and as they are pre-arranged to suit almost any occasion, he gains credit, like the parrot in the story, for being a wit. Where the greater number of street sayings come from, I agree with Mr. Cartwright, is a mystery which will probably never be unravelled, though so frequently discussed; but many of them (like the phrases 'How's your mother?' and 'Does your mother know you're out?' used about 1835,) originate in the Police Court, and a few in popular farces, and a very few are taken from music-hall songs. The saying of 'Who's your hatter?' was invented in 1855, when the immense ugly flop hats were first worn; and this was sometimes changed to 'Who's your barber?' as the Crimean war had made flowing beards fashionable. Street boys are greatly addicted to observations touching head-gear. There have been numerous sayings about hats current within the last thirty years: 'What a shocking bad hat!' 'All round my hat,' (taken from a comic song about 1835;) 'How much for your hat?' 'A pork-pie hat and a little feather;' 'Who put you into that hat?' 'Same old hat in Shoe-lane;' 'Who 'elped him up with that box,' etc. The volunteers gave rise to a few sayings: 'Who shot the dog?' 'Holler, boys, another gay!' 'Another pig in harness.' Public amusements sometimes, but rarely, suggest a saying: 'Have you seen Blondin?' 'Have you seen the Female Blondin' were used in 1861. 'Am I right, or any other man?' comes from Unsworth's fertile invention. Some sayings express their own meaning obviously: 'Oh, my! ain't we grand!' addressed to a person who evidences an over-weening self-importance; 'Didn't she seem to like it!' applying to a young lady pleased with the attentions of an accompanying cavalier; 'Your wheels are going round,' called in a warning tone to a person driving in a vehicle, to be followed (in case he is foolish enough to draw up to ascertain the cause of such a disaster) by the consolatory remark, 'Never mind, they've stopped now.' Some phrases appear to have neither rhyme nor reason, and defy those investigating philosophers who would seek to discover their origin. 'It's all serene;' 'You don't lodge here, Mr. Ferguson;' 'Leave us a lock of your hair;' 'Has your mother sold her mangle yet?' 'How are you off for soap?' (altered, at the time when the paper duty was first removed, to 'How are you off for paper?';) 'There you go with your eye out;' 'How are you, my r-r-r-rummy cove?' 'Teddy, I! Teddy, O! will you come before I go?' 'Who ate the puppy-pie under Marlow bridge?' 'Go home and tell your mother to chain up Ugly;' 'Who stole the donkey?' 'Go to Bath and get your head shaved;' 'The rabbit-pie policeman!' 'Lalla lietee! whay yau;' 'Go it, my pippins!' 'Pick up the pieces;' 'Who cut your mouth?' 'I'll warm you;' 'There's a cure!' 'There's a perfect cure!' 'There's a young man from the country!' 'Move on, Mr. —— (a blank left to be filled up by any name at pleasure,) don't you be a stoppin' up the way!' answered by 'All right, all right;' 'It's quite up to the knocker.' These and many others come from we know not where. 'I believe you, my boy,' was invented by Mr. Buckstone, and uttered by Mr. Paul Bedford, in the 'Green Bushes" in 1843.

An expert English fox hunter, provoked by a cockney horseman who had ridden over two of his hounds, could not forbear swearing at him for his awkwardness. "Sir!" said the offender, drawing up both himself and his horse, and assuming a very consequential look, "I beg to inform you that I did not come out here to be damned." "Why, then, sir, you may go home and be damned."

THACKERAY'S FOUR GEORGES.

GEORGE I.—STAR OF BRUNSWICK.

He preferred Hanover to England,
He preferred two hideous Mistresses
To a beautiful and innocent Wife.
He hated Arts and despised Literature;
But He liked train-oil in his salads,
And gave an enlightened patronage to bad oysters.
And he had Walpole as a Minister:
Consistent in his Preference for every kind of Corruption.

GEORGE II.

In most things I did as my father had done,
I was false to my wife and I hated my son:

My spending was small and my avarice much,
My kingdom was English, my heart was high Dutch

At Dettingen fight I was known not to blench,
I butchered the Scotch, and I bearded the French

I neither had morals, nor manners, nor wit;
I wasn't much missed when I died in a fit.

Here set up my statue and make it complete—
With Pitt on his knees at my dirty old feet.

GEORGE III.

Give me a royal niche—it is my due,
The virtuousest King the realm e'er knew.

I, through a decent reputable life,
Was constant to plain food and a plain wife

Ireland I risked, and lost America;
But dined on legs of mutton every day.

My brain, perhaps, might be a feeble part;
But yet I think I had an English heart.

When all the Kings were prostrate, I alone
Stood face to face against Napoleon;

Nor ever could the ruthless Frenchman forge
A fetter for Old England and Old George:

I let loose flaming Nelson on his fleets;
I met his troops with Wellesley's bayonets.

Triumphant waved my flag on land and sea:
Where was the King in Europe like to me?

Monarchs exiled found shelter on my shores;
My bounty rescued Kings and Emperors.

But what boots victory by land or sea?
What boots that Kings found refuge at my knee

I was a conqueror, but yet not proud;
And careless, even though Napoleon bow'd.

The rescued Kings came kiss my garments' hem:
The rescued Kings I never heeded them.

My guns roared triumph, but I never heard:
All England thrilled with joy, I never stirred.

What care had I of pomp, or fame, or power
A crazy old blind man in Windsor Tower?

GEORGIUS ULTIMUS.

He left an example for age and for youth
To avoid.
He never acted well by Man or Woman,
And was as false to his Mistress as to his Wife.
He deserted his Friends and his Principles.
He was so Ignorant that he could scarcely Spell;
But he had some Skill in Cutting out Coats,
And an undeniable Taste for Cookery.
He built the Palaces of Brighton and of Buckingham,
And for these qualities and Proofs of Genius,
An admiring Aristocracy
Christened him the "First Gentleman in Europe."
Friends, respect the King whose Statue is here,
And the generous Aristocracy who admired him.

THE SOLDIER-GRAVE OF OUR COUNTRY.—The Rev. Dr. Bartol thus eloquently describes it: "What a tomb, far and wide, over the parallels of latitude, the populous land has become! The soil of Kentucky and Tennessee, the swamps of the Chickahominy, the waters of the Mississippi and the Gulf into which it flows, the long line of the dreary hospitals on whose cots of pain some last breath is mercifully each moment drawn, will not restore the victims they have claimed. The burial places on the field of slaughter at Murfreesboro and Cedar Mountain, in the Valley of the Shenandoah, and around the heights of Vicksburg, yield not up their dead, till the heavens be no more, from the sod of the soldier's graveyard Have you thought what sort of a graveyard that one of the soldier is? It is no fair spot granted by municipal authority, or chosen by the select-men of the town, for a quiet resting-place to those who at length in the course of nature must expire, and where, as the bard tells us:

'The rude forefathers of the hamlet sleep.'

No beautiful fence of painted wood or more enduring iron surrounds it. No granite portico, engraved with soothing sentences of consolation or kindling words of inspired prophecy, overarches its entrance. No polished marble monuments deck each private enclosure, nor do pious hands plant flowers or fetch wreaths; nor is the place selected where the north wind, as one desired, blows freely, or some whispering pine or some yew tree will breathe the low, plaintive murmur of a perpetual dirge over the ashes of the loved and lamented. No; but when the leader of the host begs a truce to bury his dead, what asks he leave to do? To gash and trench the ground in what coarse and summary way, with brief prayer, and no hearse or procession; shovelling in the heaps of gory mortality, as he does the unvalued clay and gravel in which they are so hastily and superficially hid! Yet, if for conscience, if for country, if for man and for God, the souls once animating this dusty, disregarded refuse have contended, no glorious sepulchre, no mausoleum of Hadrian, no poet's grave in Westminster Abbey, or hero's obelisk in Père la Chaise, is nobler than the frequent rising mound, though holding, like those of the ancient tribes of the continent, only indiscriminate relics, not confounded in the sight of God, whose close companionship in the dust answers to that noble strife."

During a rebellion in Ireland the rebels became greatly incensed against an English banker who had done an extensive business with the Emerald Isle, and they took revenge by burning all his notes which they held or could obtain.

AN HOUR OR TWO WITH THE SPIRITS.

Glendower—I can call spirits from the vasty deep.
Hotspur—Why, so can I; and so can any man. But will they come when you do call for them?

OWEN GLENDOWER was, according to Shakspeare, (who has sent me a private communication from the other world to that effect,) a spiritualist in advance of his times, and Harry Percy, like many light-headed scoffers of the present day, simply a rattle-brained disbeliever.

Shakspeare furthermore does me the honor to inform me that he himself was a spiritualist, and did, as one of his astute commentators suggested, intend Prospero to be his own duplicate, as far as intercourse with the disembodied was concerned.

I make this statement with a full appreciation of its value. Let me, with due compliments, call the attention of Grant White and Payne Collier to it. Rowe, I venture to say, in all his researches, never made a discovery, however doubtful in its character, of half the importance of mine. There is, I imagine, some difference between a fact assured and a tradition. The good fortune that has enabled me to announce the valuable information is the more prized when I reflect that, with the immortal bard, I am now, like Warburton and others, on the highway to immortality myself.

Sitting with a few friends in a spiritual circle round a dinner-table, to-day, I received communications of such great consequence to the community, that Richard Cœur de Lion charged me on no account to sleep until I had prepared a general summary of them for publication. Asking him in what paper the spirits desired their invaluable messages printed, he answered: "In THE CALIFORNIAN."

The first communication that I received was from Robinson Crusoe. He told me that such, and not Alexander Selkirk, was his real name. Moreover that, in his life-time, he had never seen the island of Juan Fernandez. That when he was cast ashore, it was on the southwest coast of the Farallones; that he could not see the main shore on account of the fog that always, in his days, prevailed. Some such fogs are now occasionally visible, he said, but not often. De Foe, as a general thing, was accurate in his narrative. De Foe and he are bosom friends in the spirit-world.

He gave me information as to how and where I can find the relics of his solitary confinement. As, on inquiry, I learn that the island is but a few miles distant from San Francisco, I intend in a few days to proceed to the spot, and, if I find the treasures, to present them to the disappointed stockholders in the Cocos Island Expedition.

Being asked whom I would summon next, I answered: "Sinbad, the sailor."

Sinbad appeared promptly with "On deck, there! what now, sir?"

The following colloqny then ensued:

Q. "Where may I the most readily find riches?"
A. "On Mare Island, in the harbor of San Francisco."
Q. "Whereabouts on the island?"
A. "In three subterranean caverns."
Q. "How much?"
A. "Two hundred and fifty millions of doubloons."
Q. "How came so much treasure there?"
A. "Concealed by pirates."
Q. "When?"
A. "Is that any of your business?"
Q. "How can I find it?"
A. "Search for it."

Here I was informed that he had left me at the call of somebody at the Sandwich Islands.

In this connection I may as well state that I propose to raise a joint-stock company of responsible parties for the purpose of purchasing the island, and chartering a vessel to set sail for it at once on a voyage of exploration. The services of a clairvoyant can be secured without difficulty. Gentlemen desirous of participating in the enterprise can ascertain further concerning it by addressing, post-paid, the undersigned.

"Don Quixote has something to say to you, sir," said the medium, a lady whom we had invited to dine with us. "Something, he says, that will shake your credulity to its foundation."

"Not," said I, "since I have read and believed Cervantes' faithful recount of the good Don's adventures in Spain. Tell the redoubtable knight that at the mere mention of his name my credulity is in complete armor, mounted and ready for the onset."

Yes, poor Don! He must, if what he told me be true, (and there is no reason to doubt it,) be having a rough time of it down in the bowels of the earth, fighting single-handed and on foot—for Rosinante cannot be with him in the land of spirits—demons who are endeavoring to explode San Francisco with an earthquake. Vainly, he says, he has called upon Amadis de Gaul and the Knight of the Broken-head for assistance. They will not come, and now he sees that his own efforts, unaided, will ultimately be unavailing. He can, he knows, hold his own until the 31st of the present month, (September,) but on that day a cruel enchantress will unnerve his arm, the demons will assail him with redoubled fury, and—woe be the hour to San Francisco!—he will be as thoroughly vanquished as when on earth he vanquished the skins of wine. Then, on the same day, the demons will accomplish their infernal design. The city will be torn up into fragments at precisely 4 o'clock in the afternoon, according to the time of St. Mary's Cathedral clock. No portion of the city proper will be left standing except that portion which is built upon piles, and Pacific street. Citizens who have money and jewels are advised to deposit them in such quarters for safe-keeping. The main rent and crash will be in the vicinity of the brokers' offices. Double locks should be fastened to the doors of the county jail and calaboose in order that safety may in some degree be assured to their inmates. Meantime, a meeting should be held and presided over by the Mayor at Platt's Hall, or some other convenient place; speeches by the old stand-bys should be made, and resolutions expressing the sense of the meeting, in view of the approaching calamity, should be adopted without a dissenting vote.

Capt. Symmes, of Symmes' Hole notoriety, here made his appearance, informing Don that the demons were again at work. Don, it seems, enters the interior of the earth by way of Symmes' entrance at the North Pole. Don left us, and Symmes, saying that he had just come from the Arctic regions, complained of being very cold, and asked us for a glass of brandy. The medium, of course, drank it, or, rather, sipped it for him. He then requested us to drink his health. We all did so, and, highly delighted, he took his departure, saying that he left with us Old Mother Hubbard.

Old Mother Hubbard said that she had come to verify what Don Quixote had told us. However, there was one way in which the city could be preserved. Let the Board of Supervisors meet immediately and repeal the outrageous dog-law and all would be well. Because of that, and that alone, was the city doomed to destruction.

I next had Baron Munchausen called into the room.

"Baron," said I, "in your life-time you were a soldier of great repute, according to your own most wonderful recitals. You must, of course, take an interest in the civil war now raging in this country. Tell me, Baron, and tell me as truly as you were wont, which side is destined to win in the long run?"

"The Southern side," he replied.

"Leave me, oh, thou immaculate spirit of veracity," said I; and I had Don Quixote re-summoned.

"Don," I asked; "on which side are you in this struggle between the country and the South?"

"On the Southern side, leading on Jefferson Davis, whenever I can get a respite from the demons below," he answered.

"And so you call us of the North demons?" I asked.

"No," said he, "but you are an army of giants."

Don can see more clearly in the spirit world than he could in this.

"I no longer see giants in windmills," said he.

The spirit of Julius Cæsar next made its appearance.

"What!" I exclaimed. "Art thou that dreadful object that stole a march upon Brutus at Philippi?"

"The same," said he; "I come to give thee also a warning. The Presidential election is approaching. As thou hopest ever to be President thyself, guard well the ballot-boxes of California. Remember Washoe! Remember Virginia City! Beware! Like John at Patmos, thou art commanded to write. Look out sharply! There will be frauds at the election. Write! On that coming day in November I will meet thee again."

He said no more; but what he did say, as may be seen, was ominous. I recommend his remarks to the careful attention of political editors.

After a somewhat long interval, during which, it seems, for some reason—

"No spirit dare walk abroad,"

I succeeded in enticing to the table (round which, like mortals, spirits delight to gather) the immortality of genial old Izaak Walton.

"Where, Izaak," I asked, after the compliments of the day had passed between us, "is Webb—is Inigo—is the late agreeable editor of THE CALIFORNIAN?"

"Where he, this hot day, and you, and the new proprietor and editor, and Gov. Low, and Jim Riddle, and all other piscatorials that do not make a business of pleasure should be—at Lake Tahoe, catching mountain trout."

"Tell me, gentle Izaak," said I, "is Inigo successful? Can he play with trout as easily as he can with words?"

Before he could have time to answer, Paul Pry entered, saying:

"I hope I don't intrude; but I thought I would just step in and see what was going on."

This, as the medium told us, was evermore an interruption that sent the spirits off in disgust. Nor could they again be recalled soon. Only Richard, the Lion Heart, ventured this time to step forth. His message I have already given the reader. Faithfully have I obeyed his injunction. I have written the tenor of the spiritual communications to me, and now hand what I have written to the editor of THE CALIFORNIAN?

FLY-LEAF.

THE great principle of brotherhood works not by equality, nor by likeness, but by giving and receiving; the nations that are unlike, and the natures that are unlike, being bound into one noble whole by each receiving something from and of the others' gifts and glory.

WE have heard some of the first judges of whist say that it was not those who played the best by the true laws of the game that would win most, but those who played best to the false play of others; and this may be true of the great game of the world.

MUSICAL AND DRAMATIC.

THE Opera season at the Academy of Music is drawing to a close. Though it is probable that both management and troupe look cheerfully forward to a respite from their incessant labors, the community will regret the termination of an engagement that has yielded them rational enjoyment and recreation at a period when, very often, equivocal plays and ambiguous performances closed other doors to respectable seekers of amusements. The troupe, by no means infallible or free from individual imperfections and shortcomings, have as a whole, been uniformly zealous, ambitious, and prompt in their endeavors to please—failing, sometimes, to their credit be it said, only through too much ambition and over-tasking. Easy as it is to suggest individual change and improvement, it will be remembered that the comparative strength of the company is now equal to that of any troupe that have visited these shores. California patronage, though liberal, would hardly pay for an opera troupe that should meet the requirements of severe criticism and be thoroughly excellent. In the present company there are those who come fully up to the standard.

Maritana was brought out on Monday evening, for the first time by the Richings troupe. Miss Richings sustained the part of "Maritana," in a costume very becoming and characteristic. Mr. Hill, ("Don Cæsar de Bazan,") exhibited much zeal and some improvement. He received a deserved encore for his song. "Let me like a soldier die," which was given very spiritedly. The contralto's role gave her a fair opportunity to display the better qualities of her voice. She was encored in a favorite aria, and throughout the whole opera sustained herself with ability, besides looking very charming in her second page's dress. Mr. Seguin made a good-looking, well-dressed Spanish Prime Minister, but marred one of his best efforts by singing too slow, and thus aggravating and making too prominent his somewhat ejaculatory style. Mr. Peakes, as the King, was rather crude, and should have paid more attention to the study of his part. His love-making was a little too prononcé, and hardly in keeping with kingly courtesy. Like "Bottom," in the Lion's part, he should have modulated his voice, and "roared her as gently as any sucking dove, or an' 't were any nightingale." The concerted pieces were generally fair. Miss Richings' "Harp in the Air" was executed with much sweetness and expression—perhaps a trifle too slow to please some of her auditors.

The benefit of Mr. Peakes, on Wednesday night, brought out many to see him in his best character, i. e., "Devilshoof," in the Bohemian Girl. There is a lawlessness and brusquerie about "Devilshoof," which Mr. Peakes renders very cleverly, but which he sometimes has been observed to develop after a startling fashion in other roles. He seems to have studied the Bohemian Girl closely—it is to be regretted that he does not pay the same attention to other characters, and that he too often trusts to the intrinsic merit of his voice, rather than his style. Miss Richings was taken suddenly ill during the performance, but with considerable fortitude and nerve kept herself up till its close.

To-night the Daughter of the Regiment, for the benefit of Miss Kate Martin, an industrious and popular member of the troupe. Sunday, Norma, and Monday Fra Diavolo. On Tuesday evening Miss Jennie Kempton will have her first benefit, and we trust the merits of this lady will meet a full recognition in a crowded house. There is no necessity for reiterating here, what these columns have previously expressed, regarding the rich quality and full compass of her contralto voice—her excellent style and rendering of recitative, nor the graces of a charming face and figure. But we would take advantage of an occasion which brings her prominently before the public, to say a word in deprecation of the popular criticism on the defects of her acting. When it is remembered that this lady has never before played in opera, and that her debut was really made before a San Francisco public, they will the more readily excuse her for bringing the passiveness and inaction of the concert room to the operatic boards. Already she has profited by her experience, and is steadily improving in confidence and ease.

At Maguire's Opera House, Margaret Catchpole gave way to better company, and complimentary benefits ruled the week with more legitimate performances. Charley Thorne, en route to China, was the beneficiary, when The Ticket of Leave Man was given, and we trust received a fair share of the Tickets as well as the Leave. Pretty Miss Lulu Sweet took a benefit, with a good house, playing in the Mistletoe Bough. This afternoon, Eustache Baudin. To-night, the Carpenter of Rouen, for the benefit of Frank Mayo; and on Monday, Mr. Warwick, a former legislator, returns to his old love—the Drama—at this house.

THE PRESIDENTIAL SHOWMAN.

"Good Mr. Keeper, vich is the monkey and vich the lion?"
"Sir, you pays yer money, and you takes yer choice!"—[Sawdust Literature

"THE show is open, and the sport 's begun,"
Mac is the showman, leading in the fun,
And to the question asked him by the puzzled horde—
"Shall we the olive see, or flashing sword?"
Coolly replies
With downcast eyes,
In graceful accents and melodious voice:
"You vote my ticket, and—you take your choice!"

[S. F. Call.

RECIPES.

Magic Pastry.—2 table spoonfuls of pounded sugar, 4oz. of fine flour, 2 eggs. Mix all together very smoothly, and fry in lard.

Tea-Cakes.—½lb. of flour, 2oz. of sugar, 2oz. of butter, 2 eggs. Mix all together.

Brawn Jelly à la Macédoine.—This is an extremely pretty dish for a luncheon or supper party, and is also an inexpensive one. A pig's feet, the ears taken off below the root, the tongue, and any bits of skin that may be left from the meat, should be soaked in salt and water for a night, then nicely cleaned, and boiled gently in water for three hours. All the bones should next be taken out, the meat cut up, but not very small. The ears, with the pieces of skin, must be cut into strips, and the tongue lengthways into five or six slices; pepper, salt, and allspice being added to taste. All should be boiled together in the same liquor for another hour, care having been taken not to use more water at first than will keep the meat moist, and prevent its burning. A boiled carrot cut into very small pieces, and some scalded parsley chopped fine, shou'd be turned into the meat five minutes before it is done; and when completed the whole should be poured into moulds.

To Preserve Strawberries Whole.—The perfection and size to which this delicious fruit has now been brought, makes one constantly regret that in strawberry jam, however good the flavor may be, the beautiful appearance of the fruit is necessarily destroyed. Here is a recipe for preserving them whole. The strawberries must be gathered on a dry day, before they are very ripe, and their stalks left on. They should be placed separately on a dish, and twice their weight of pounded lump sugar strewed over them. Next, a few ripe scarlet strawberries crushed are put in a jar, with an equal weight of pounded lump sugar. They are covered closely down, and allowed to stand in a saucepan of boiling water until quite soft, and until all the syrup has come out of them. They should then be strained through muslin into a preserving-pan, boiled, and well skimmed, and when cold, the whole strawberries are put in and placed over the fire until they are milk-warm, when they should be removed and allowed to get quite cold. Again they must be put on the fire and made a little hotter than the last time, letting them cool afterwards, and this process should be repeated until they look clear, but they must never be allowed to boil, as that would cause the stalks to fall off. When cold, they may be placed in jars or glasses, with the stalks downward, filled up with the syrup. Papers dipped in brandy must be put over them, and they should be closely tied down.

Cream Cheese.—Put a quart of cream into a clean jug, with half a teaspoonful of salt stirred in, and let it stand a day or two till thickish. Then fold an ordinary glass cloth about six or eight times and sprinkle it with salt, then lay it in a sieve 8 inches in diameter. The sides of the cloth should come up well over the sieve. Then pour in the cream and sprinkle a little salt on it. Change the cloth as often as it becomes moist, and as the cheese dries press it with the cloth and sieve. In about a week or nine days it will be prime and fit to eat. The air alone suffices to turn the cream into cheese. Another way: Take about ¼ pint of cream, tie it up in a piece of thin muslin, and suspend it in a cool place. After five or six days take it out of the muslin and put it between two plates, with a small weight on the upper one. This will make it a good shape for the table, and also help to ripen the cheese, which will be fit to use in about eight days from the commencement of the making.

An Indian Salad.—Procure half a dozen coss lettuces (they run very small in the above country), 2 endives, a few gherkins, 1 pint of mustard and cress (mixed), 2 sticks of white celery, 1 clove of garlic, half a dozen leaves of garden mint, (podena,) a couple of green chillies picked fresh from the plant, and 2 beet-roots, boiled tender, and rendered cold. Let the whole be washed, rinsed, and afterwards dried in a clean cloth. Have a middling-sized mortar at hand, in which place a couple of whole anchovies or sardines (having previously cleansed them in a saucer of warm water), the yelks of 3 fresh fowls' eggs boiled hard, ½ oz. of chup sigro cheese, 1 tablespoonful of sweet Lucca or Florence oil, 1 ditto of pure mustard. Let the whole be well bruised together with a pestle till the same are fully incorporated; add to the above confection 1 gill of good palm vinegar and a modicum of salt. Introduce your esculent herbs into a large-sized salad-bowl, pouring the contents of the mortar over them, and mix them, when cut tolerably fine, with a wooden fork and spoon; propose a few chives with the beet-root cut into slices on the top of the salad, for such as may choose them, and distribute the whites of the eggs, cut into quarters, around the surface of the bowl. The vinegar produced from the toddy or juice of the cajour (date-palm,) is the most pungent sinlologue known, and this fact has brought the East Indian pickles into such celebrity among the epicureau classes of the English community.

N. B.—The juice afforded by date-palm is of a highly dulcedmous character, and furnishes the yeast in general use among the bakers and manufacturers of bread-stuffs throughout Hindostan.

A Dressing for Sandwiches.—Take half a pound of nice butter, three table-spoonfuls of mixed mustard, three spoonfuls of nice sweet oil, a little white or red pepper, a little salt, the yelk of one egg; braid this all together very smoothly, and set in on the ice to cool. Chop very fine some tongue and ham; a little cold chicken is very nice added. Cut the bread very thin; spread it with the dressing. Then spread over the meat, then the bread, and press it together very hard. Trim off the edges, that the sandwiches may be all one size.

The Fresh Meat Preserver. — A correspondent writing to a London journal, gives the following method of preserving fresh meats:

The subject of this discovery is a patent, and its object is for thoroughly preserving raw meat perfectly fresh and good through any temperature or weather. The first notice of it was given to me by a friend, who suggested its value for long yachting trips, but it must be manifest that its usefulness is of a very important character and width of range. I have personally tested the power of the material to do what it professes to perform, and have found that it both retards and prevents putrefaction in raw fresh meat, without in any way affecting its flavor or deteriorating its nourishing qualities. The application is by the mixing of a little powder (perfectly sweet and wholesome) with a certain quantity of water, and a simple momentary immersion in this liquid preparation is alone necessary. It is, therefore, obvious that to all large private establishments, as well as to hotel keepers, it must be of great use, more particularly to those who in sultry weather are far removed from markets. If your readers should desire the detailed results of my experiments upon legs of mutton, pieces of beef, salmon, a bullock's tongue, and a fowl cut into pieces, I shall be most happy to do so. In the mean time, anybody may prove the truth of the discovery by getting a cheap bottle of the stuff. But it should be borne in mind that the string or skewer by which the meat is to be hung up, should be placed in it before the immersion takes place, and that the meat itself should be kept from the fly. I should have mentioned that it wonderfully improves the suet and all fats.

Genuine Eau-de-Cologne.—One of the Farinas has published the following formula for this celebrated perfume, which we copy from the Zeitschrift des Norddeutschen Apotheker-Vereins:—" R. Benzoini (purified), 2 oz,; Ol. Lavandulæ, 4 oz.; Ol. Rosmarini, 2 oz.; by weight. Alcoholis fortioris, 9 gallons. To this solution are added successively: Ol. Neroli, Ol. Neroli petits grains, Ol. Limonis, of each 10 2-5 oz.; Ol. Aurantii Dulcis, Ol. Limettæ, Ol. Bergamii, of each 20 4-5 oz.; Tinct. Flor. gesanii. rosei q. s. Macerato for some weeks, then fill into flasks.

PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE.—This Institute, which has only been some three months started, has already become of great importance and benefit to our city, as evidenced by the number of sufferers from all diseases daily seen there, and the terms of praise and gratitude in which these sufferers speak of the Surgeons to the Institute. The Institute is conducted by Surgeons of well-known reputation in Europe, who possess some of the highest Medical Degrees to be obtained, and whose skill and success in the cure of Special Diseases, has been commented upon by such men as M. M. Ricord and Actow. These gentlemen have opened the Peake Medical Institute, 313 Montgomery Street, for the benefit of all sufferers from Special Diseases on this Pacific coast, who are now enabled to entrust their cures to Surgeons who have devoted years to the study of these diseases in the immense Hospitals of Paris and London, and who have gained reputations in Europe previously to their coming to our part of the world. We bear that these gentlemen give free consultations, and their charges are to be most moderate. It is really a long-wished for boon that is now satisfied by the opening of this Institute. Sufferers unfortunate enough to have any Special Diseases, can now be confident of obtaining the best treatment and thorough cures from educated and skilful Surgeons. se17-It

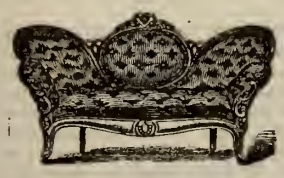
---

MR. CHRISTIAN PFISTER has the honor of calling public attention to his great assortment of Perfumery, Brushes, fine Hair-pins, Hair of all lengths and colors, Peruques, Toupes, Combs—tortoise-shell, buffalo and Irish horn, ivory and rubber; Cravats of all kinds; Jouvin's Gloves, ladies' and gentlemens'; silk Suspenders and common ones; Shirts and Collars; now styles of Head Dresses, etc. Having made new arrangements with Paris houses, it is within his power to offer to his numerous customers superior advantages over any others in the trade. Six artist coiffeurs will always be found ready for business in the gentlemen's room. A special apartment is provided for the coiffure of ladies.

RICHES HAVE WINGS.—Nothing illustrates this more forcibly than the recent fall in mining Stocks. Therefore, provide a certainty for your family in the future by insuring your life in the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company—cash assets, $6,500,000.

BIGELOW & BRO., Agents,
jy30-1m Over Parrott's Bank.

THE MOST EXTENSIVE,



BEST SELECTED, CHEAPEST,

—AND—

LATEST STYLES

—OF—

Furniture.

GOODWIN & CO.,

No. 528 Washington street,

Are constantly receiving, and have on hand a large assortment of FINE ROSEWOOD, MAHOGANY, and BLACK WALNUT PARLOR, LIBRARY and CHAMBER SUITS, with DINING ROOM SUITS TO ORDER.

☞ We guarantee both Price and Quality satisfactory to our Patrons.

GOODWIN & CO.,
jul8 No. 528 Washington street.

OCCIDENTAL HOTEL—Corner Montgomery and Bush streets, San Francisco.

This House possesses all the requirements of a FIRST CLASS HOTEL, its spacious READING ROOM, with large MINERAL CABINET and extensive COLLECTION OF SPECIMENS from the different Mining Regions of the Pacific Coast—BRANCH TELEGRAPH OFFICE connecting with Lines throughout the country—and NEWS STAND—all contributing to make it the Headquarters and Home for the Californian business man and tourist.

The TABLE of this House shall not be excelled by any.

BOARD, THREE DOLLARS PER DAY.

LEWIS LELAND & CO.,
my28 Proprietors.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

A PAPER FOR THE TIMES.

Devoted to Live Topics,

AND THE

BEST INTERESTS OF CALIFORNIA.

Is published

EVERY SATURDAY MORNING,

AT

728 MONTGOMERY STREET.

Nothing will be spared that will enable THE CALIFORNIAN to appeal to the Public for support, not only as the

BEST JOURNAL ON THE PACIFIC COAST,

But also as being

THE EQUAL OF ANY ON THIS CONTINENT!

Paper of a superior quality and weight is being made

EXPRESSLY FOR THE CALIFORNIAN,

THE BEST TALENT OF THE STATE

is employed upon THE CALIFORNIAN, and arrangements have been made with contributors abroad for

EASTERN AND FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE.

The voluntary notices bestowed by the press of the Eastern cities have been no less warm and congratulatory than those which we have received at the hands of our cotemporaries of the Pacific. Their verdict is unanimously in favor of

THE CALIFORNIAN,

and all join in pronouncing their unqualified approval of its unequalled merits.

Its reputation is now fully established. It is not

EXCELLED BY ANY LITERARY JOURNAL on the Continent.

Let the people of the mountains and the valleys

BUY THE CALIFORNIAN!

Let every lover of choice literature throughout the States and Territories of the Pacific coast

READ THE CALIFORNIAN!

Let no family be without this paper, which, as an Eastern cotemporary remarks, is creditable to the people who sustain it. Therefore,

SUBSCRIBE

FOR THE

CALIFORNIAN!

THE TERMS OF THE CALIFORNIAN are $5 per year by mail to subscribers, invariably in advance; 50 cents per month served by carriers.

All communications and correspondence must be addressed to "THE CALIFORNIAN,"

Office, No. 728 Montgomery street,

SAN FRANCISCO.

TO THE SICK AND AFFLICTED!

Peake Medical Institute,

Established by Experienced European Physicians for the certain, safe and permanent cure of all Special Diseases.

Consulting Surgeon, DR. PRATT, late of Paris, Member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England.

CONSULTATIONS FREE!

THIS INSTITUTE, CONDUCTED BY EUROPEAN PHYsicians of celebrity, who are graduates of the first Colleges and Universities of Europe, and who have acquired unsurpassed knowledge and skill in the cure of all special diseases during years of experience and study in the largest Hospitals of London and Paris, is to enable all sufferers from special or private diseases, to obtain with certainty safe and speedy cures from Physicians who have devoted entire attention to the various special diseases. These diseases have hitherto generally fallen into the hands of ignorant quacks and charlatans, and the amount of damage and number of deaths that are yearly owing to the ignorant treatment of these diseases by these men, it is impossible to calculate. With one drug alone—viz., Mercury—they annually destroy thousands of unfortunate sufferers, who are often confiding and unsuspecting enough to attribute to the disease what has been the effect alone of the medicine they have been so rashly taking for the cure of their disease.

OBSERVE THAT

The Peake Medical Institute will entirely remedy this great evil, by enabling sufferers from various special diseases which are so common on this coast to obtain, with as much certainty as if they were in London or Paris,

SPEEDY, SAFE AND PERMANENT CURES,

from educated, experienced and skilful European Physicians whose knowledge and skill in the cure of all special diseases is unsurpassed.

Thus confidence and certainty of a speedy cure may be felt by all sufferers going for advice to

THE PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE,

and they will likewise be saved from the danger of falling into the hands of ignorant quacks who throng this city and annually ruin and destroy the health and happiness of so many.

The Institute is fitted up commodiously and privately, and no expense has been spared in obtaining the very best instruments and appliances of modern European surgery and medicine.

The consulting surgeon, Dr. Pratt, Member of the Royal College of England and author of several works on special diseases, has been for years with the celebrated Ricord of Paris, where he acquired considerable celebrity for his great success in the cure of Special Diseases. Dr. Pratt has very high testimonials from some of the most eminent Surgeons of Europe and his treatment is such that he can promise a cure in almost every case.

MENTAL OR BODILY DEBILITY AND WEAKNESS

Arising from youthful excesses and indiscretions or from neglected and badly treated disease, will be treated at

THE PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE

In the most certain and successful manner and in a very short time, by a Surgeon who possesses unsurpassed knowledge and skill in the care of these harassing complaints having been associated with Ricord and other most celebrated surgeons for years, in the largest hospitals of Paris.

Persons who imagine that they are not well or whose strength and vigor is not what it should be, would do well by calling at the Peake Medical Institute (consultations being gratuitous) and getting the opinion and advice of the Surgeon, as in many of these cases the malady is entirely mental, aggravated perhaps, by some disorder of the general health, and a little skilful and kind treatment is all that is wanted to make the patient hearty, robust and happy.

All the after ill effects of special diseases, caused by neglect, bad treatment and mercury, will be speedily and permanently cured at the

PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE,

The sufferer being restored to hearty, strong and robust health.

RHEUMATISM, ULCERS AND DISEASES OF THE SKIN.

Sufferers from these diseases come to the Institute with the certainty of obtaining a perfect cure through the skill of a Surgeon, who devoted himself entirely to the cure of these diseases in the large hospitals of Europe, and who has such an unequalled experience in their treatment, that he has never yet failed in curing even the worst cases. Diseases, of even the longest duration, will be perfectly and quickly eradicated.

THE EYES. THE EYES.

DISEASES OF THE EYE will have especial and particular treatment at the Peake Medical Institute from a Surgeon who has the greatest skill in the cure of all the diseases of this most delicate organ, having been for years in the celebrated eye hospitals of Vienna and Paris, where he gained a rare and perfect knowledge and skill in the cure of all its diseases. All operations that are necessary will be performed with unequalled skill and success. Cataracts will be successfully couched or extracted.

THE PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE

Thus enables sufferers from any of the numerous forms of Special and Private diseases, to feel confident of obtaining a perfect and speedy cure from skilful and experienced European Physicians, of the highest education and unsurpassed knowledge in the cure of these diseases, and who are graduates of the first Colleges and Universities of Europe, as shown by their diplomas at the Institute. Persons who have become broken down in health from excesses of any kind or from long-standing disease or mercurial treatment, may come to the Institute with the certainty of obtaining great relief and in all probability a perfect cure, through the extensive knowledge and skill of the Physicians.

Sufferers in the country can receive treatment by mail on receipt of letter with all symptoms, etc.

TO THE LADIES.

PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE.

This Institute is conducted by experienced European Physicians who have given years in the large Hospitals of London and Paris to the study of the treatment and cure of all the diseases and irregularities peculiar to women.

The Consulting Surgeon, Dr. Pratt, late of Paris, Member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England, is the author of a valuable work "On Diseases Peculiar to Females," and ladies suffering from any of the diseases peculiar to the sex are respectfully informed that they can be certain of a safe and sure cure in a short time at the Institute. The Institute is commodiously and privately arranged. Ladies in the country can receive all directions and treatment for a speedy cure, on receipt of letter with symptoms, etc. Consultations free, in English, French, Italian and German.

Address:

PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE,
No. 313 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

Canton Tea Store, Established 1858.

GEO. S. HASKELL & CO.

IMPORTERS,
WHOLESALE AND RETAIL DEALERS
— IN —
JAPAN AND CHINA TEAS,
AND
GROCERIES.

Store fronting on
514 Market & 15 Sutter St.
☞ THREE DOORS ☜
BELOW THE MARKET HOUSE,
San Francisco.

Our Motto, ☞ "Large Sales at Small Profits for Cash. ☜

FAMILY NOTICE.

Bowen Brothers,

COR. MONTGOMERY AND CALIFORNIA STREETS,
SAN FRANCISCO.

Offer for sale:

Barton & Guesten's Salad Oil, the best in the world.
Boneless Sardines; a great luxury.
English Potted Meats.
Anchovy and Shrimp Paste.
Condensed Milk, preserved with refined Sugar hermetically sealed in cans for Army and Travelers' use. Its purity is guaranteed.
Bent's Water, Butter, Milk, Wine and Graham Crackers.
English, Stilton, Cheshire and Holland Cheese.
English Soups, assorted.
Pate de Foie Gras.
French Truffles and Mushrooms.
Spanish and French Olives, in kegs.
Spiced Oysters.
Dutch Herrings and Sardells.
English and American Bloaters.
Stuffed Olives and Mangoes.
Mess Mackerel.
Cider Vinegar.
Teas of every variety, imported expressly for our Family Trade.
Sugars of every kind direct from the Manufactory.

WINES AND LIQUORS,
Direct from Bond, Wholesale or Retail.

au6-tf

REMOVAL.

INSURANCE AG INST FIRE.

THE NORTH BRITISH AND MERCANTILE
INSURANCE COMPANY
OF LONDON AND EDINBURGH.
ESTABLISHED, 1809.

Capital, $10,000,000. Accumulated Funds, January 1, 1864, $11,169,140. Deposit in California under State law, $75,000. Limit on single Risks, $100,000. Bankers, Messrs Tallant & Co. Fire Policies on buildings and contents, throughout the Pacific States and Territories, granted on the most liberal terms. Losses promptly adjusted and paid here in U. S. Gold coin.

Office removed to 414 California street, opposite Alsop & Co. WM. H. TILLINGHAST, Agent.
au19 3m

MANHATTAN FIRE INSURANCE
COMPANY OF NEW YORK.

Cash Capital and Surplus.....$750,000
Deposit in San Francisco.....$75,000

COLUMBIA FIRE INSURANCE CO.,
OF NEW YORK.

Cash Capital and Surplus.....$600,000
Deposit in San Francisco.....$75,000

THE ABOVE MENTIONED WELL-KNOWN and responsible Companies, having complied with the law enacted at the last session of the Legislature, and deposited with Messrs. Donohoe, Ralston & Co.

$75,000 EACH,

As additional security to Policy-holders, will continue to insure
BUILDINGS,
MERCHANDISE,
FURNITURE,
And other property in California, Oregon and Nevada Territory, against Loss or Damage by Fire, upon the most favorable terms.

All Losses promptly paid in United States Gold Coin.

R. B. SWAIN & CO., Agents,
jn25-tf 206 Front street, corner of California.

JOSEPH A. DONOHOE, San Francisco. | EUGENE KELLY, New York.

DONOHOE, KELLY & CO.,
SAN FRANCISCO.

EUGENE KELLY & CO.,
NEW YORK.

Bankers.

EXCHANGE ON

NEW YORK,
BANK OF LONDON, - - - - London.
BANK OF IRELAND. jy2

SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES!

Motto—The Singer Sewing Machines are the only machines that can sew all kinds of cloth, and with all kinds of thread.

THE SINGER LETTER A
TRANSVERSE SHUTTLE FAMILY
MACHINES,

With recent improvements for
HEMMING, FELLING,
TUCKING, GATHERING,
BINDING, CORDING,
QUILTING, BRAIDING, etc.,

Are unrivalled for Family and light Manufacturing purposes. We invite the special attention of ladies to the Folding Top Cabinets, our latest improvement. They are the most useful, convenient and novel Cabinets yet introduced, and are worthy of examination.

SINGER'S STANDARD
MANUFACTURING MACHINES,

For Tailoring, Boot and Shoe Making, Harness and Carriage Trimming, are the cheapest, best and only Machine worthy of patronage for general purposes.

☞ Call and examine, or send for a pamphlet.

THE SINGER MANUF. COMPANY,
No. 139 Montgomery street.
WM. BRODERICK, Agent. se3-3m

FORTY-FOUR FIRST PREMIUMS
IN 1863!

THERE IS BUT ONE
FIRST
PREMIUM SEWING MACHINE.

The GROVER & BAKER SEWING MACHINE has been awarded Twenty-three First Premiums at State Fairs, and Twenty-one at City and County Fairs, in 1863, making Forty-four in all.

R. G. BROWN, Agent.
my28 329 Montgomery Street.

NOTICE TO SHIPPERS
—TO—
Red Bluff.

ON AND AFTER JULY 8TH, AND UNTIL further notice, the
RED BLUFF BOAT
WILL LEAVE SACRAMENTO
EVERY FRIDAY MORNING,
(Instead of SATURDAY MORNINGS, as heretofore.)
y16-tf J. WHITNEY, JR., President.

TELEGRAPHIC EXCHANGE
—ON—
NEW YORK,
PAYABLE IN GOLD,
For sale in sums to suit by
au20-tf WM. T. COLEMAN & CO.

EXCHANGE
ON NEW YORK,
In sums to suit, at the lowest rates, for sale by
au20-tf WM. T. COLEMAN & CO.

GREAT TRIUMPH!!

STEINWAY & SONS

Were awarded the FIRST PRIZE MEDAL at the late great INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION AT LONDON, over the two hundred and sixty-nine Pianos entered for competition from all parts of the world.

The Special Correspondent of the New York Times says: "Messrs. Steinway & Sons' indorsement by the Jurors is emphatic, and stronger and more to the point than that of any European maker."

A constant supply of the above superior instruments can be found at the Agent's,
M. GRAY, 613 Clay street.

PIANO TUNING done by a first-class Workman, from Steinway & Son's Factory, New York. my28

COMMERCIAL STEAM PRINTING
HOUSE.

FRANCIS, VALENTINE & CO.,
517 CLAY and 514 COMMERCIAL STREETS.

Every description of BOOK, JOB and POSTER PRINTING done in the best style and at the lowest rates.
BOOK-BINDING and RULING done to order.

PILES! PILES!! PILES!!!

Not piles of Gold nor yet of Silver so much coveted by all men, but the bleeding, blind, or external Piles can be easily and speedily cured by the use of
WOOD'S SUB-POSITORY.

It is a preparation totally distinct from anything heretofore offered as a remedy for this painful and often fatal complaint. The Sub-Pository is neither a pill, powder, wash or salve, and yet it has proved to be a certain remedy for the Piles. Do not doubt this assertion, nor delay testing the truth of it if you are troubled with the Piles—you will not be deceived in it.

Sold wholesale and retail by W. NEWELL,
jul1 No. 530 Merchant street.

ALLEN'S
LUNG BALSAM!

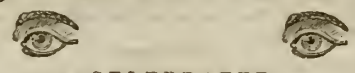
THE REMEDY FOR CURING
CONSUMPTION, COUGHS, COLDS,
ASTHMA, CROUP,
DISEASES OF THE THROAT, BRONCHITIS,
Pains and Oppression of the Chest or Lungs,
DIFFICULT BREATHING,
AND ALL THE
DISEASES OF THE PULMONARY ORGANS.

ITS ACTION IS EXPECTORANT, ALTERATIVE, SUDORIFIC, SEDATIVE, DIAPHORETIC and DIURETIC, which renders it one of the most valuable remedies known for curing diseases of the lungs. It excites expectoration, and causes the lungs to throw off the phlegm or mucus, changes the secretions and PURIFIES THE BLOOD; heals the irritated parts; gives strength to the digestive system, brings the liver to its proper action, and imparts, beyond the possibility of doubt, strength to the whole system. Such is the immediate and satisfactory effect, that it is warranted to break up the most distressing cough in a few hours' time, if not of too long standing. It is warranted to give entire satisfaction even in the most confirmed cases of Consumption. It is warranted not to produce costiveness, which is the case with most remedies, or affect the head, as it contains no Opium in any form. It is warranted to be perfectly harmless to the most delicate child, although it is an active and powerful remedy for restoring the system. There is no real necessity for so many deaths by Consumption, when ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM will prevent it, if only taken in time.

Sold by all Druggists. Price $1 per bottle.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,
Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,
au27 Corner of Clay, San Francisco.

DR. STEPHENS'



CELEBRATED
Eye Salve!

AN INFALLIBLE REMEDY FOR
DISEASES OF THE EYE,

Acute or chronic, ulceration of the lachrymal glands, film and weakness of the vision from any cause; it is the most effectual remedy ever discovered.

Sold by all Druggists.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,
Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,
au27 Corner of Clay, San Francisco.

CATARRH!

DR. H. GOODALE'S
Catarrh Remedy!

FOR CENTURIES CATARRH HAS DEFIED THE skill of physicians and surgeons. No medical work contains a prescription that will eradicate it. Nothing save DR. GOODALE'S REMEDY will break it up, radically destroying the principle of the disease, and precluding the possibility of a relapse. Medical men have attempted to explain what it is, but admit that they have not discovered its antidote. Dr. Goodale offers this simple definition of its character: It is a disorder which he DOES CURE and they DO NOT. This is the great fact which it imports the sufferer to know, and a single trial will establish it beyond a question. Price, $1. Sold by all Druggists.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,
Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,
au27 Corner of Clay, San Francisco.

KENDALL'S AMBOLINE!

THE GREAT
UNEQUALLED
PREPARATION
FOR
RESTORING, INVIGORATING, BEAUTIFYING
AND
DRESSING
THE
Hair!

IT IS A STIMULATING, OILY EXTRACT OF BARKS and Herbs. It will cure all diseases of the scalp and itching of the head, entirely eradicates dandruff, prevents the Hair from falling out, or from turning prematurely gray, causing it to grow thick and long. It is entirely different from all hair preparations, and may be relied on.

Put up in boxes containing two bottles—Price $1.

☞ Sold by all Druggists.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,
Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,
Corner of Clay, San Francisco.

REDINGTON & CO.'S ESSENCE OF Jamaica Ginger!

This valuable compound, which is now regarded as one of the most popular remedies in the domestic practice for various complaints of the digestive organs, such as Dyspepsia, Nausea, etc., is prepared solely from the WHITE JAMAICA GINGER, which is the best of all the varieties in use. In the preparation of

REDINGTON & CO.'S
ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER,

Great care is taken to have none but select Root, and in manufacture it in air-tight vessels, thus preventing the evaporation of its delicate essential oil, and preserving the true aroma of the Ginger. It thereby contains in its concentrated form all the valuable properties of the Jamaica Ginger, and is guaranteed to be free from any impurities whatever

It is a grateful stimulant and carminative, giving warmth and tone to the stomach equal to Brandy, without any of its injurious effects.

It will cure Nausea, caused by riding in railroad cars, or from sea-sickness, or other causes.

Miners and others who are exposed to the heat of the Sun often whilst working in cold water, should never be without

REDINGTON & CO.'S
ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER,

As by taking it as a tonic two or three times a day, it is almost a sure preventive to Chills and Fever; and to those who are farming the rich bottom lands of California it is likewise invaluable as a tonic, and should invariably be taken in the early morning before going to the fields, at the mid-day lunch, and before leaving off work at night.

Ask for REDINGTON & CO.'S ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER, and take no other, if you would always have a Pure and Reliable article.

An excellent external application for Gout, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, &c.

REDINGTON & CO., Proprietors,
416 and 418 Front street,
my28 San Francisco.

RAREY'S CONDITION POWDERS.

THE MOST POWERFUL AND BENEFICIAL AGENT known on the Stomach, Blood, Lungs and Bowels of HORSES, MULES, CATTLE, AND STOCK
of all descriptions.

GREAT BENEFIT TO HARD-WORKING HORSES.

All diseased Stock SPEEDILY and CERTAINLY CURED; healthy Stock will be brought into the very HIGHEST STATE of PERFECTION by giving them a SPOONFULL, wee

NO LIVERY STABLE SHOULD BE WITHOUT
RAREY'S
CELEBRATED CONDITION POWDERS!

All FARMERS and RANCHMEN should use constantly
RAREY'S
CELEBRATED CONDITION POWDERS!

TEAMSTERS and STAGE COMPANIES everywhere should keep constantly on hand and freely use
RAREY'S
CELEBRATED CONDITION POWDERS!

They are equal to a Life Insurance on all Stock, as will be fully appreciated on trial by all True Economists.

REDINGTON & CO., Sole Agents,
my28 416 and 418 Front Street, San Francisco.

DEATH'S DOINGS!

THE DEAD TELL NO TALES, 'TIS SAID. WHAT A pity 'tis 'tis true; for if they could, what a "skedaddling" there would be among the numerous quacks and impostors of the present time.

THE MEDICAL FACULTY

May differ in relation to the treatment of disease, but there is very little diversity of opinion among them as to its origin. The philanthropist does not contend that any man becomes at once a

DRUNKARD OR A THIEF.

Nor does the well informed physician maintain that any one becomes at once an invalid. He knows that almost all diseases are of slow growth; that the seeds of disease are often sown at a remote period, and only await some change of climate or condition of the individual to manifest themselves.

A COMMON COLD!

Is the forerunner of many a fatal disease; a leading symptom of Consumption; a general disturber of the human system, and

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP

Is the greatest barrier that can be thrown in the way of its progress. Its timely use will ward off Consumption, cure the Asthma, Bronchitis, Sore Throat, and the thousand and one other ills so sure to follow in its wake when too long neglected or improperly treated.

REDINGTON & CO., Agents,
San Francisco.
And for sale everywhere. se10-tf

$2,000 REWARD!

A REWARD OF TWO THOUSAND DOLLARS IS OFfered by the subscriber to any person who will discover or produce a better article for dressing and preserving the HAIR than the

TRICOMALICUM!!

known in California for many years for its wonderful properties.

The TRICOMALICUM, composed of substances tonic and strengthening, possesses the priceless quality of renewing the Hair, of destroying dandruff, and of dressing and keeping it in a perfectly healthy state.

PRINCIPAL DEPOT at the store of the Inventor,

CHRISTIAN PFISTER,

se3-tf No. 227 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

QUINCY HALL

Clothing Emporium!

THE Largest and Finest Store in the State is QUINCY HALL, 545, 547, and 549 Washington street, where can be found clothing of every description, of the finest quality and latest style. Hats, Caps and Furnishing Goods.

se3-tf

TYLER BROTHERS,

Importers, Wholesale and Retail Dealers in

School Books, Stationery,

PHOTOGRAPH ALBUMS,

PORTFOLIOS JUVENILE BOOKS, CHILDREN'S PICTURE BOOKS, FANCY ARTICLES, etc.,

NO. 632 WASHINGTON STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO.

au27-tf

REOPENED FOR THE SEASON.

THE CRYSTAL SPRINGS HOTEL,

Situated four miles from the San Mateo Railroad depot, in a most splendid valley, surrounded with large, beautiful, natural trees, is now open for the public. The road from San Mateo to the house has been recently macadamized, making it the finest drive in California. The House and Cottages have been refitted and thoroughly renovated. New spring beds and every modern improvement have been added to the sleeping department. The larder, as usual, contains all the delicacies of the season. Stages leave San Mateo depot on the arrival of the trains for Crystal Springs.

A fine stable is now opened at San Mateo by Messrs. Byrnes & Ames, who will furnish horses and carriages, or saddle horses, at low rates, to the public. Parties wishing rooms or meals, on arrival, can engage them by telegraph, via San Mateo.

jul1-tf TONY OAKES, Proprietor.

SQUARZA'S PUNCH.

First Premium, Sacramento, 1862.

First Premium at San Francisco District Fair, 1863.

First and Special Premium, Sacramento, 1863.

Wholesale and Retail.

my28 44 Leidesdorff street, San Francisco.

EDWARD BOSQUI & CO.,

517

CLAY STREET, SAN FRANCISCO.

BOOKBINDERS, PAPER-RULERS, AND ACCOUNT-BOOK MANUFACTURERS.

Blanks of all kinds printed and ruled to any desired pattern. my28

MRS. HENDRICKS,

No. 629 MISSION STREET,

Devotes herself exclusively to

EMBROIDERY, STAMPING AND PINKING,

And also does more work than any other person in her line. She has by far the best collection and the largest assortment of stamps in the city. Her patterns are the most carefully drawn, and her marking is the evenest and the easiest to work, especially for those who are not very skilful. The coloring of all others rubs out, and the figures, if not traced round with thread, are effaced before the work is done; but Mrs. Hendricks' coloring, on all kinds of stuff, is warranted to defy rubbing, though it can be easily washed out. She is an engraver and engraves her own stamps, and thus is enabled to supply herself with all the latest patterns fashionable in Eastern and European cities.

Any customer can get a new pattern cut without charge, if Mrs. Hendricks can use it afterwards. Although there are many others in the same business in San Francisco, all acknowledge the superiority of Mrs. Hendricks, and send the most difficult work to her. Ladies are invited to call and examine her patterns.

☞ Remember the number, 629 Mission street, San Francisco. jy30tf*

A LADY WISHES TO EXCHANGE LESsons in French, Music or Painting, for a room and board. Address "E. D. W.," care of W. H. BANCROFT, 609 Montgomery street. an13

ROSENBLATT'S

Palace of Fashion,

OPPOSITE THE OCCIDENTAL HOTEL.

FRENCH CORSETS, - - - ONE DOLLAR!

WE HAVE JUST RECEIVED BY THE LAST STEAMER Valenciennes and Point Lace Collars, Sleeves and Handkerchiefs, French Embroidered Bands, new style Hoop Skirts, Bustles, Russia Leather Bags, Onyx Breastpins and Ear-rings, Jet Chains and Bracelets, Hosiery, Gloves; Velvet, Cloth and Opera Cloaks,

Which are offered 25 per cent. less than New York Prices, on account of the high premium on gold, at

ROSENBLATTS PALACE OF FASHION,

123 and 125 Montgomery street.

Branch, 125 J street, between Fourth and Fifth streets, au20 Sacramento.

BOYS! BOYS! BOYS!

NOW IS THE TIME!

H. M. LOCKWOOD & CO.,

New No. 624) CLAY STREET, (Old No 176

Have received a Large Stock of

GENTS' AND BOYS' CLOTHING

—AND—

FURNISHING GOODS,

Which they are selling

AT VERY LOW PRICES.

Every Garment warranted. All are invited to call and examine our goods.

H. M. LOCKWOOD & CO.,

my28 624 Clay street, San Francisco.

H. LUCKE,

BOOTMAKER, AND IMPORTER

—OF—

FRENCH BOOTS, SHOES AND GAITERS OF THE LATEST PARISIAN MAKE AND MODE.

Lady customers can have their measures forwarded and their shoes made in Paris in the latest style and by the most celebrated manufacturers, at moderate rates.

No. 648 Washington street, below Kearny,

SIGN OF THE GOLDEN BOOT. jy30-3m

McRUER & MERRILL,

WHOLESALE AUCTION HOUSE,

204 and 206 California street.

Regular Sale Days - - - WEDNESDAYS and SATURDAYS (Advances on Consignments.)

NOTICE!

From this date Mr. A. P. EVERETT has an interest in our business. McRUER & MERRILL.

San Francisco, Octobe 20, 1862.

A. P. EVERETT, - - - - - - - - - Auctioneer.

jul1 3m

DR. GEORGE F. WOODWARD,

SURGEON U. S. PENSION BUREAU.

OFFICE, 127 MONTGOMERY STREET,

Opposite the Occidental Hotel, San Francisco.

jy30-tf

DR. J. H. HATCH,

DENTIST,

Graduate of the Pennsylvania College of Dental Surgery.

All operations pertaining to the profession thoroughly and skillfully performed. Entire satisfaction in all cases guaranteed.

Office, 645 Clay street, between Montgomery and Kearny street, San Francisco. au27

SAVE YOUR

E. F. BUNNELL, D.D.S.,

ROOMS, NO. 51 SECOND STREET.

DR BUNNELL WILL SAVE EVERY TOOTH THAT ACHES from exposure of the nerve, or refund the charge for the operation, and extract each tooth without pay in EVERY case of failure. Teeth filled with gold, artificial bone, and golden lithodeon. Plate teeth on vulcanite and gold enameled base, of surpassing beauty and comfort.

☞ All work warranted. Price low. ☜

N. B.—More than 1,000 aching teeth have been saved in succession, without the loss of one. au27-3m

REMOVAL.

DR. JOHN HEALD,

DENTIST,

OFFICE AND RESIDENCE: STEVENSON HOUSE,

Montgomery street, corner of California. Entrance on both streets. Rooms 12 and 13. jy30-3m

WONDERFUL TRIUMPH

IN AMERICAN DENTISTRY.

DR. BEERS & CO.,

617 Clay street,

ARE NOW MANUFACTURING THE NEW style of ARTIFICIAL TEETH so highly approved at the East, and which to be appreciated only requires to be seen. The Teeth, Gums and Plate are made of one entire piece of Porcelain without seam or joint, combining great strength and beauty with absolute purity and freedom from any metallic taste, while the coloring of the gums and the interior of the mouth are so perfect as to almost defy detection. All interested in the progress of the Arts are invited to examine samples of this work.

Superior Gold and Vulcanite Work also manufactured as usual, but at greatly reduced prices. jul8

LAWRENCE & HOUSEWORTH,

OPTICIANS,

IMPORTERS OF OPTICAL, MATHEMATICAL AND PHILOSOPHICAL INSTRUMENTS,

STEREOSCOPIC GOODS,

PHOTOGRAPHIC ALBUMS,

CARTES DE VISITE,

AND

JOSEPH RODGERS & SON'S

SUPERIOR CUTLERY,

No. 637 CLAY STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO,

(ESTABLISHED IN 1851,)

HAVE FOR SALE THE LARGEST STOCK ON THE PACIFIC COAST, consisting in part as follows:

720 dozen SPECTACLES, in Gold, Silver, Steel and Plated Frames.
305 dozen EYE GLASSES, in Gold, Silver, Steel, Horn, Shell and Rubber Frames.
150 dozen WIRE GAUZE GOGGLES.
300 dozen SPECTACLE GLASSES and BRAZILIAN PEBBLES.
350 dozen SPECTACLE and EYE GLASS CASES.

395 Opera and Mariae Glasses.	20,500 Card Photographs,
75 Telescope and Spy Glasses,	Photographic Albums,
178 dozen Magnifying Glasses,	600 Album Pictures—in oil colors,
80 doz. Pocket Compasses,	50 doz. Union Card Frames,
325 Hand Stereoscopes,	Joseph Rodgers & Son's CUTLERY,
74 Revolving Stereoscopes	100 doz. Table Knives,
1025 doz. Stereoscopic Views	260 doz. Pocket Knives,
Drawing Instruments in German Silver and Brass,	120 doz. Razors,
Boxwood and Ivory Scales,	50 doz. Razor Strops,
Microscopes in every Style,	130 doz. Scissors,
25 Magnetic Machines for Medical purposes,	SCISSORS, in Cases,
Aneroid Barometers,	100 doz. Gyroscope Tops,
	169 doz. Thermometers,
	25 doz. Hydrometers,
	Galvanic Batteries.

☞ COUNTRY TRADERS will consult their own interest by examining our Stock and Prices before purchasing elsewhere.

 ORDERS FROM THE COUNTRY promptly executed.

☞ CATALOGUES sent to any address FREE.

Address

LAWRENCE & HOUSEWORTH,

OPTICIANS,

637 CLAY STREET,

my28 SAN FRANCISCO.

R. G. SNEATH,

408 FRONT STREET, SAN FRANCISCO,

Importer and Wholesale Dealer in

GROCERIES, PROVISIONS, FLOUR, RICE

TOBACCOS, LIQUORS, ETC.

Branch House, - - SNEATH & BOARMAN, - - Red Bluff.

Forwarding Agent, D. W. EARL, Sacramento, who will receive and fill orders for all kinds of Goods on my account, and keep a large stock of Flour, Barley, Potatoes, Ground Feed, etc., etc. No charge for forwarding.

ALMADEN QUICKSILVER!

Orders for Goods not in my line furnished customers without extra charge. Orders for Goods in the Eastern markets attended to promptly. Daily Prices Current furnished when desired.

Orders respectfully solicited. jul1-1m

CONTINENTAL HOTEL,

SAN JOSE.

GEORGE T. BROMLEY.....Proprietor.

As a desirable place of resort for health or recreation, the above Hotel is not surpassed in the State.

Excellent accommodations for families, by the day, week, or month, on reasonable terms.

ju25

REMOVAL.

A. EDDY'S

Dancing Academy,

Platt's (Middle) Hall.

PUPILS TAUGHT IN ONE-HALF THE TIME OF elsewhere.

CLASSES—MONDAYS and FRIDAYS. Ladies at half-past 2 P. M.; Gents at half-past 7 P. M.

CHILDREN'S CLASSES—On SATURDAYS, at 2 P. M.; also, on WEDNESDAYS, at half-past 3 P. M.

Private instructions given separately or to classes, to suit the convenience of applicants.

SELECT SOIREES on alternate weeks. au6-tf

CARRINGTON & CO'S

GENERAL PURCHASING AGENCY,

No. 40 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Personal Orders, small or large, and for articles of every descriptions, PROMPTLY and carefully attended to.

Who wants anything from New York?

THIS AGENCY

Enables Country Residents to make purchases in the City without troubling busy friends, or mere acquaintances.

IF YOU WANT

Books, Prints, Clothing, Instruments, Music, Tools, Weapons, Sporting Implements, Fancy Stock, Jewelry, Silver or Plated Ware, Wines, Cigars, Fine Groceries, Furniture, in short, any Article, large or small, singly or in quantity, for Ladies' or Gentlemen's use or wear,

or for Dealers' Supplies, from a seal-ring to a steam engine—a Cameo or a Cashmere; lace or leather,

SEND ON YOUR ORDERS.

We can fill them on better terms than you could obtain if here; while our commission, even on large orders, is much less than the expense of visiting the city in person.

Orders under $10, from places within reach of our daily Expresses, (except for perishable articles,) can be paid for on delivery by Express; others should be remitted for, either direct, or through some city friend to be paid when filled. Every order should be as clearly worded as possible.

Orders may be given in French, Spanish or German.

COMMISSION CHARGE, - - - FIVE PER CENT.

Address:

CARRINGTON & CO.,

au6 40 Broadway, N. Y.

FARRAND'S OSCILLATING

Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALLED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REduction and amalgamation of Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY.

As a guarantee of what this machine will do, I propose, with any gentleman who will produce an Amalgamator that will work the same amount of ore in the same number of hours, with the same outlay of power, and produce the equal result, to deposit the sum of FIVE HUNDRED DOLLARS each, the money so deposited to be drawn by the person who shall be declared to have produced the best result. The money (the $500) by whichever party won to be paid over to some one of the benevolent institutions in this State, to be named by the party losing. This proposition is not made with the view of detracting from the merits of any Amalgamator now before the public, but for the purpose of placing this valuable improvement before such persons as may be interested in quartz milling, and to whom the matter properly belongs.

I CHALLENGE COMPETITION.

CALL AND SEE THE MACHINES WORK!

W. D. FARRAND.

R. L. OGDEN, Agent, Southeast corner of Montgomery and California streets, San Francisco. jy30tf

LOCKE & MONTAGUE,

IMPORTERS OF

STOVES AND METALS,

Nos. 112 and 114 Battery street,

jy2 SAN FRANCISCO.

GEORGE B. MERRILL,

ATTORNEY AT LAW,

Office, 520 Montgomery street, (over Messrs. Sather & Co.'s Bank,)

SAN FRANCISCO.

Gives special attention to the Probate of Wills and the Administration of Estates.

au20

JOHN GORMAN,

NOTARY PUBLIC AND CONVEYANCER,

No. 705 MONTGOMERY STREET,

(Near Washington,)

Metropolitan Block, SAN FRANCISCO.

jy9.

LEGAL.

ADMINISTRATOR'S SALE of Real ESTATE.

NOTICE IS HEREBY GIVEN, THAT IN PURSUANCE of an order of the Probate Court of the city and county of San Francisco, State of California, made on the 16th day of August, 1864, in the matter of the Estate of ANDREW ROBESON, deceased, the undersigned Administrator, with the will annexed, of said deceased, will sell to the highest bidder for cash, payable in United States gold coin, and subject to confirmation by said Probate Court, on MONDAY, the 10th day of OCTOBER, 1864, at 12 o'clock, noon, of that day, at No. 108 Front street, in said city and county, all the right, title and interest of the said Andrew Robeson at the time of his death, and all the right, title and interest that the said estate has, by law or otherwise, since acquired, other than or in addition to that of said deceased at the time of his death, in and to all that certain lot of land situated in said city and county, and described as follows:

Commencing at a point on the north line of Ellis street 77 1-2 feet west from the northwest corner of Mason and Ellis streets; thence running westerly along said line of Ellis street 20 feet, thence at a right angle northerly 60 feet, thence at a right angle easterly 20 feet, and thence at a right angle southerly 60 feet to the point of beginning.

And the said Administrator will receive offers or bids therefor at said place, No. 108 Front street, from this date till said 10th day of October, 1864

EDWARD F. STONE,

Administrator, with the will annexed, of Andrew Robeson, deceased.

D. P. Barstow, Attorney for Administrator, 24 Montgomery Block. se10-5t

IN THE COUNTY COURT of the city and county of San Francisco, State of California.—In the matter of the Petition of JOSEPH GENTH, an Insolvent Debtor.

Pursuant to an order of the Hon. Samuel Cowles, Judge of the said County Court, notice is hereby given to all the creditors of said Insolvent, JOSEPH GENTH, to be and appear before the Hon. Samuel Cowles, Judge as aforesaid, in open Court, at the court-room of said Court, in the City Hall, in the city and county of San Francisco, on MONDAY, the 26th day of SEPTEMBER, 1864, at 10 o'clock, A. M., of that day, then and there to show cause, if any they can, why the prayer of said Insolvent should not be granted, and an assignment of his estate be made, and he be discharged from his debts and liabilities, in pursuance of the statute in such case made and provided; and in the mean time all proceedings against said Insolvent be stayed.

Witness, my hand and the seal of said Court, this 22d day of August, A. D. 1864.

(Seal and stamp.) WM. LOEWY, Clerk.

By J. NAPHTALY, Deputy Clerk.

Burnett & Cleveland, Attorneys for Petitioner, 634 Clay street. au23-5t

IN THE DISTRICT COURT of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco.—FANNY L. GREEN, Plaintiff, vs. ROBERT E. GREEN, Defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said city and county of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to ROBERT E. GREEN, Defendant: You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff, in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days, (exclusive of the day of service,) after the service on you of this Summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this District, within twenty days; otherwise, within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree dissolving the bonds of matrimony existing between the plaintiff and defendant, and permitting plaintiff to resume her maiden name of Fanny L. Brown, and for costs of suit and general relief. And you are hereby notified, that if you fail to appear and answer the said Complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and Seal of the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 25th day of August, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-four.

Seal and Int. Rev. Stamp. WM. LOEWY, Clerk.

By WM. R. SATTERLEE, Deputy Clerk.

J. D. Stevenson, Plaintiff's Attorney. se3

BUY A GOOD ONE, OR NONE.—Many absolutely wortbless sewing-machines are now before the public, to purchase which would result in nougbt but disappointment and vexation to the owner. A cheap sewing-machine generally proves a dear bargain. Grover & Baker's have stood the test for many years; thousands are in use in this vicinity, and but one opinion prevails as to their worth, the advantages they possess for Embroidering, Braiding, Hemming, etc., and their wonderful simplicity renders them the best in use.

TO THE PUBLIC.—Having asked a suspension of opinion in relation to the collision between the steamers Yosemite and Washoe at Benicia, in July last, until a proper investigation of the facts should be made; and the indictment of the Grand Jury of Solano county not having been sustained by the Court of that District, I am at liberty to present the decision of the "United states Inspectors," rendered on the first day of September last, and which is embraced in the following letter:

WM. BURNETT, Esq., Supervising Inspector of Steamboats—Sir: We have this day closed the testimony concerning the collision between the steamers Yosemite and Washoe at Benicia, on the 1st of July, 1864.

The former on her regular trip from Sacramento to San Francisco, and the latter on her regular trip from San Francisco to Sacramento, came in collision at Benicia dock, in both attempting to make the landing at the same time. We find that the Washoe attempted to make the landing in an improper manner, considering the proximity of the other boat, to which, under the circumstances, the landing properly belonged; and we deem that the fault was wholly with the pilot of the steamer Washoe who having since (as we are informed) committed suicide, is now beyond our power to punish.

(Signed) R. H. WATERMAN,
United States Inspector of Hulls.
C. C. BEMIS,
United States Inspector of Boilers.

San Francisco, Sept. 1st, 1864.

This full and ample vindication of my conduct, and also that of my pilot, Mr Fouratt, is deemed by me a complete refutation of the unmerited attack upon our characters and competency, published at the time of the collision in some of the papers of this city.

E. A. POOLE,
Master Steamer Yosemite.

NEW BOOKS.

JUST RECEIVED,

—AT—

A. Roman & Co.'s.

TENNYSON'S NEW POEMS. Enoch Arden, and Other Poems. 12mo.

Imogene; or, the Marble Heart. By Pierce Egan, Esq.

The Finger Post to Public Business; containing the modo of forming and conducting Societies, Clubs and other orgauized associations, etc. 12mo.

Biographical Sketches of the Loyalists of the American Revolution. With an Historical Essay by Lorenzo Sabino. 2 vols.

Azarian; an Episode. By Harriet E. Prescott, author of the "Amber Gods," etc. 12mo.

Talks on Women's Topics. By Jennie June. 12mo.

The Coward; a Novel of Society and the Field in 1863. By Henry Morford, author of "The Days of Shoddy," etc. 12mo.

The Monomaniac; or, Shirley Hall Asylum. By William Gilbert. 12mo.

The Water Babies; a Fairy Tale for a Land Baby. Illustrated. By the Rev. Charles Kingsley. Square 16mo.

The Cradle of Rebellions; a History of the Secret Societies of France. By Lucien de la Hodde. 8vo.

Capt. Brande of the Centipede; a Pirate of eminence in the West Indies. 8vo. Illustrated. By Harry Gringo.

The Early Dawn; or, Sketches of Christian Life in England in the Olden Time. By the author of "Chronicles of the Schonberg Cotta Family." 12mo.

Margaret and her Bridesmaids. By the author of "The Queens of the Country," etc. 12mo.

Jomini's Life of Napoleon. Translated by Gen. H. W. Halleck. 4 vols. 8vo. With an Atlas of 60 maps.

Battle Fields of our Fathers. By Virginia F. Townsend. 12mo.

Poems by David Gray. With Memoirs of his Life and an Introductory Notice by R. M. Milnes. 12mo.

Out in the World. A Novel, by T. S. Arthur. 12mo.

Naomi Torreuti; or, the History of a Woman. By Gertrude F. Vingut. 8vo.

Libby Life, or Experiences of a Prisoner of War in Richmond, Va. 1863-4. By Lieut.-Col. Cavada. 12mo;

The Potomac and the Rapidan; Army Notes from the failure at Winchester to the reinforcement of Rosecrans 1863-3. By A H Quint, Chaplain 2d Massachusetts Regiment. 12mo.

The Gold Hunter's Adventure; or, Life in Australia. By a returned Australian. Illustrated 12mo.

Savage Africa; being the Narrative of a Tour in Equatorial and Western Africa. With notes on the Habits of the Gorilla, etc. etc. By W W Rende. With Map and Illustrations. 8vo;

A Woman's Philosophy of Woman; or, Woman Affranchised. An answer to Proudhon, Michelet, Legouve, and other modern innovators. By Mme. d'Hericourt. Translated from the last Paris edition.

Together with an extensive and complete stock of

Choice and Standard Books,

In all the departments of

LITERATURE, ART AND SCIENCE.

A fine collection of Standard authors in fine bindings, suitable for private Libraries.

☞ A full assortment of CHILDREN'S BOOKS, SCHOOL BOOKS, PHOTOGRAPHIC ALBUMS, etc, etc.

All for sale at the lowest Prices, wholesale and retail.

A. ROMAN & CO.,

BOOKSELLERS, PUBLISHERS AND IMPORTERS,

and 419 MONTGOMERY STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO.

sc17-1m

MAGUIRE'S OPERA HOUSE.

T. MAGUIRE - - - - - - - - PROPRIETOR.
C. L. GRAVES - - - - - - - STAGE MANAGER.
W. STEVENSON - - - - - - - TREASURER.

AFTERNOON PERFORMANCE TO-DAY,
FOR LADIES AND CHILDREN,
At HALF PRICES,
Commencing at 2 o'clock.

THE STAR COMPANY
In the thrilling drama of Eustache Baudin!

SATURDAY EVENING, SEPTEMBER 17th, 1864,
BENEFIT OF FRANK MAYO!

On which occasion will appear the charming comedienne,
MRS. W. H. LEIGHTON,
MRS. H. A. PERRY, AND THE STAR COMPANY

The performance will commence with the drama of

The Carpenter of Rouen!

Marteau, the Carpenter - - - - - - Frank Mayo
Duke de Sauhigne - - - - - - - L Archer
Grauder, a citizen - - - - - - - D. C. Anderson
Madelon - - - - - - - - Mrs H. A. PERRY
Mrs Grander - - - - - - - Mrs C R Saunders

To conclude with the popular farce of Sketches in India.

Sally Scruggs - - - - - - MRS. LEIGHTON

The Manager begs to announce that he has engaged the popular actor, Mr. J. H. WARWICK, who will appear on MONDAY EVENING NEXT.

PRICES OF ADMISSION.—Dress Circle and Orchestra Seats $1; Parquet 50c.; Gallery 25c.
Doors open at 7 o'clock. Performances will commence at a quarter before 8. sc17

NOVELTY! NOVELTY! NOVELTY!

WILSON, ZOYARA & CARLO'S
Great Circus!

THIS MAMMOTH COMBINATION OF CIRCUS TALENT
Is now PERFORMING EVERY EVENING until further notice, in the
LARGE AND ELEGANT PAVILION,
Adjoining International Hotel,

When there will be presented to the San Francisco public a host of novelties.

The CARLO GROUPE are new and make their first appearance in this city.

The Manager, Mr. JOHN WILSON, is determined that the entertainment shall excel in every particular, and be worthy of patronage; he having concentrated in this company not only the largest and most complete Circus in the World, but the elite of the Equestrian, Gymnastic, Acrobatic, Juggling, Vaulting and Posturing performers of the country.

PRICES OF ADMISSION.

Dress Circle - - - - - - - - - - $1 00
Second Circle - - - - - - - - - - 0 50
Reserved Chairs - - - - - - - - 50c extra

☞ Grand Afternoon Performance for families every Saturday.

Doors open at 7 o'clock; performances commence at 8.

sc3 JOHN WILSON, Proprietor.

EUREKA MINSTREL HALL,

Montgomery street, near Pine.

T. MAGUIRE - - - - - - - - PROPRIETOR
GEO. H. COES - - - - - - - STAGE MANAGER

GRAND OPENING NIGHT!

MONDAY EVENING - - - SEPT. 5TH.

THE EVER POPULAR
SAN FRANCISCO MINSTRELS!

Consisting of the following well known Artists:

Billy Birch,	Charles Backus,
D. S. Wambold,	Sig. R. Abecco,
George H. Coes,	Martin Simonsen,
Frank Medina,	S. Wasburg,
C. F. Shattuck,	Signor Pinto,
F. Harris,	E. Groh, and

MRS. FANNY SIMONSEN.

A grand CHANGE OF PERFORMANCE EACH EVENING.

NEW SONGS, ACTS, BURLESQUES, DANCES, etc., will be performed in rapid succession.

Dress Circle and Orchestra Seats, 50 cents; Parquet, 25 cents; Private Boxes, $5; Reserved Seats, 25 cents extra.
Doors open at 7 o'clock. Curtain will rise at 8 o'clock, precisely.

CALIFORNIA BRANCH

—OF THE—

U. S. SANITARY COMMISSION.

ALL COMMUNICATIONS AND REMITTANCES SHOULD be addressed to the

OFFICE, No. 240 MONTGOMERY STREET,
Southeast corner of Pine.

O. C. WHEELER, Secretary.

D. C. McRUER, Chairman Executive Committee.
R. G. SNEATH, Treasurer.

Office Hours: 9 A. M. to 4 P. M.

MAGUIRE'S ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

THOMAS MAGUIRE - - - - - - Sole Owner
Mr. PETER RICHINGS, - - - - - - Manager
G. T. EVANS - - - - - - Musical Director

LAST WEEK BUT ONE
—OF THE—
ENGLISH OPERA SEASON.

THE FIRST BENEFIT IN SAN FRANCISCO
OF
MISS KATE MARTIN,
WILL TAKE PLACE
THIS (SATURDAY) EVENING, SEPT. 17TH,
Upon which occasion
THE RICHINGS'
English Opera Troupe

will present for the last time Douizetti's popular opera of
THE DAUGHTER OF THE REGIMENT.

Principal characters by
Miss CAROLINE RICHINGS,
Miss Kate Martin,
Mr. W. J. Hill,
Mr. Edward Seguin,
Mr. H. C. Peakes,
Mr. Peter Richings.

TO-MORROW (SUNDAY) EVENING:
Bellini's opera of
NORMA,
for the last time.

MONDAY EVENING,
Auber's opera of
FRA DIAVOLO.
for the last time.

In preparation, and will be produced before the close of the season, Douizetti's opera of
DON PASQUALE.

PRICES OF ADMISSION—Dress Circle and Parquet, $1; Reserved seats, 50 cents extra; Family Circle, 50 cents; Gallery, 25 cents. sc10

GILBERT'S MUSEUM,

Market street, opposite Second street, over the Occidental Market.

F. GILBERT - - - - - - - - Proprietor
J. A. ROWE, - - - - - - - - Manager

OPEN EVERY DAY AND EVENING.

HOME AGAIN!
JAMES MURPHY, THE IRISH GIANT BOY,
Who has just returned from the interior.

This wonderful young man has grown some three inches in height, and is some sixty pounds heavier; he therefore now weighs over three hundred pounds, and stands nearly eight feet and a half high, making him really the most Colossal Giant—old or young, man or boy—the world ever saw. Don't fail to see him.

Also, just engaged, the celebrated
ALBINO FAMILY,
Consisting of brother and sister, with beautiful snowy, wavy hair, perfectly white skin, and pink eyes—the most novel, wonderful and instructive exhibition ever presented to the public. Every student of nature should witness this extraordinary phenomena.

Still astounding and startling the world, the
GREAT SNAKE-CHARMER, M. DE BAR.
Also, the great Mathematical Wonder,
THE LIGHTNING CALCULATOR,
From Barnum's Museum.
THE WONDERFUL TYROLEAN WARBLER

Will give his interesting Musical Exhibitions throughout the day and evening.

Notwithstanding the great expense attending this unprecedented array of novelties, the management announces the prices as before.

THE GREAT CEROPLASTIC GROUP OF LIFE-LIKE FIGURES, AND
UPWARDS OF 2,000 CURIOSITIES!

Also, a beautiful set of COSMORAMIC VIEWS, illustrating the PRINCIPAL CITIES OF AMERICA. There is also an AQUARIA GARDEN attached to the Museum.

The admission to the entire Exhibition is only 25 cents. Children, 15 cents. se3-1m

The Willows.

W. H. BARNARD, - - - - Proprietor.

THE HOTEL of this popular and fashionable place of public resort has been so far completed as to enable the lessee to open its Saloon and beautifully shaded grounds permanently for reception of visitors. The Grove has been culled and trimmed; the flower beds replanted and cultivated into fragrant bloom; the aquarium replaced, with the addition to its former feathered collection of four elegant black Australian Swans. The proprietor has also added a large collection of birds, embracing two Golden Pheasants and a brace of Silvar Pheasants.

The Theatre has been entirely remodelled; the stage newly decorated, new galleries erected, the seats rendered more comfortable, and the floors replaced.

The Shooting Gallery, the Ten Pin Alleys, and the Shuffle Boards have been replaced.

The Flying Horses for children, are in readiness to perform daily duty.

Ample stabling is attached to the premises, attended by polite and watchful grooms.

MURPHY & BRAY'S
CELEBRATED MINSTRELS,
Will give a performance in the Theatre every SUNDAY Afternoon.

Mr. E. WOODWARD, formerly known to the San Francisco public, will give his personal attention to the Bar.

On the first of August, the Lodging apartments Restaurant and Ladies' Refreshment Saloon of the WILLOWS were thrown open to the public. Ladies, gentlemen and children visiting the grounds will find ample entertainment and amusement. sc10-tf

GREGORY YALE,

ATTORNEY AT LAW,

OFFICE—On second floor of Sather & Co.'s Bank, corner of Montgomery and Commercial streets, Nos. 2, 3 and 4, San Francisco. jy2

HEALTH
AND AMUSEMENT,
COMBINED!
C. J. ROBINSON'S SELECT CLASSES,
In Dr. Dio Lewis's System of
LIGHT GYMNASTICS!

At MISS ALDRICH'S ACADEMY, Stevenson street,
Near corner of Market and Second streets, San Francisco,

For Scientific Physical Training and Recreative Exercise, in classes, by persons of all ages and conditions of health, and by both sexes, with light and movable apparatus, and an invariable and appropriate musical accompaniment. While the Exercises of the Light Gymnastics impart strength, grace, activity and symmetry to the person, they at the same time furnish an exhaustless fund of social enjoyment and mental recreation.

Mr. ROBINSON has recently been employed to teach this system in all the public schools of this city.

CLASSES meet on Tuesdays and Fridays at 8 P. M. For admission or further information, apply at the Academy.

Mr. ROBINSON will give instruction, on application to classes and private pupils, in VOCAL CULTURE and ELOCUTION, as taught by the best masters in the East. jy23-1m

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

The following steamships will be despatched in the month of SEPTEMBER, 1864:

SEPTEMBER 23d - - - - - GOLDEN CITY

From Folsom-street Wharf, at nine o'clock, A. M., punctually,

FOR PANAMA.

Passengers will be conveyed from Panama to Aspinwall by the PANAMA RAILROAD COMPANY, and from Aspinwall to New York by the ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

A. B. FORBES, Agent P. M. S. Co.,
sc3 Cor. Sacramento and Leidesdorff sts.

NICARAGUA ROUTE RE-OPENED.

650 MILES LESS OCEAN TRAVEL IN THE TROPICS THAN TO PANAMA!

SHORTEST AND QUICKEST ROUTE TO NEW YORK!

THE CENTRAL AMERICAN TRANSIT COMPANY will despatch the commodious and favorite steamship

AMERICA,

W. L. MERRY, Esq. - - - - - Commander,

FOR SAN JUAN DEL SUR, NICARAGUA,

ON WEDNESDAY, - - - SEPTEMBER 21ST,

From Mission street Wharf, at 10 o'clock, A. M., precisely

Connecting at GREYTOWN with the new and swift Steamship

GOLDEN RULE,

3,500 TONS, FOR NEW YORK.

The transit over the Isthmus is now in fine order. The passengers are conveyed from San Juan to Virgin Bay over a good macadamized road, a distance of twelve miles, in Concord coaches built expressly for this route. The balance of the transit is performed by steamers. The Company have two on the Lake and six on the River, capable of accommodating twelve hundred passengers with ease.

For information or passage, apply to

I. W. RAYMOND, AGENT, Agent,
Northwest corner Battery and Pine streets.
se10 Up stairs, San Francisco.

SAN FRANCISCO AND SAN JOSE RAILROAD.

CHANGE OF TIME.

On and after MARCH 1st, 1864, Trains will leave the Depot on Brannan street, between Third and Fourth, for San Jose and Way Stations, as follows:

Leave San Francisco at 8 A. M. and 4:30 P. M.
Leave San Jose at 7:30 A. M. and 4 P. M.

SUNDAYS.

On Sundays, Three Trains will be run, as follows:
Leave San Francisco at 8 1-2 and 10 1-2 A. M. and 4 1-2 P. M.
Leave San Jose at 8 A. M. and 4 and 7 P. M.

Passengers can reach the Depot by either the Third or Fourth street lines of city cars.

A. H. HOUSTON,
nu20 General Superintendent.

MARKET STREET RAILROAD.

CHANGE OF TIME TABLE.

ON AND AFTER APRIL 1, 1864, Trains will start from the City and the Mission as follows:

Between the hours of 8:30 A. M. and 6 P. M., every 40 minutes, instead of, as heretofore, every 30 minutes, thus

FROM THE MISSION.
9:40	10:20	11:00	11:40
FROM THE CITY.
10:00	10:40	11:20	12:00

And so on till 6 o'clock.

Before 9 A. M. and after 6 P. M., the running will be the same as before.

my28 F. McCOPPIN, Superintendent.

MECHANICS' INSTITUTE.

OPENING
—OF—
The Industrial Exhibition.

The Grand Pavilion was thrown open to the Publicon last SATURDAY) MORNING, and is now open daily for the reception of visitors.

The North Beach and Mission Railroad cars pass the Fair Grounds every few minutes.

Season Tickets for Lady and Gentleman - - $5 0
Season Tickets for one person - - - - - 3 0
Tickets for Single Admission - - - - - 50

Tickets may be had at the Institute, on California street, or of any member of the Executive Committee.

By order of the EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.

The California.

"SURELY THERE IS A VEIN FOR THE SILVER AND A PLACE FOR GOLD WHERE THEY FINE IT."

VOL. I.--NO. 18. SAN FRANCISCO, SEPTEMBER 24, 1864. TERMS { $5 A YEAR, BY MAIL, IN ADVANCE. 50 CENTS A MONTH, BY CARRIER.

CONTENTS:

ORIGINAL ARTICLES:

Pour Passer le Temps—by "Restless."
Our Club, No. 2—by Thersites.
An Adventure in Singaporo.
Phœnixiana.
Scientific Sketches.

THE COUNTESS DIANA—A Translation—Concluded.

POETRY—
San Francisco by the Poets.
Tennyson's Latest Work.

EDITORIALS:

The Going Man.
A Plea for Commonplaces.
Editorial Paragraphs
Religious Intelligence.

PHILOSOPHIC PARAGRAPHS:

Selected sayings of Wise Men.

SELECTED SKETCHES, STORIES, etc.

The Abbey Bridge.
"Late" is not "Never."
The Last of the Toll-Gate.
Two Venetian Pictures.
Rain and Umbrellas.
The Three Corpses.
The Glass of Fashion.
Earthquakes.
Lumley and Lola Montez.

POETRY—
The Song of the Light Artillery.
Song in Cymbeline.
The Cuckoo.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL:

A review of the Drama and Lyric Stage for the Week.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS:

Interesting Items from Exchanges.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

POUR PASSER LE TEMPS.

THE week opened with a mildness unparalleled in the annals of the Sundays of the past six months, and it was a glorious beginning. The churches were all well filled, and no city in the Union could show so large a population out-doors in proportion to its inhabitants. Peace and quietness prevailed everywhere. Early in the morning a few gentlemen Democrats, who had been running all night in their zeal for the cause, disturbed my slumbers by getting under my windows and shouting for Goerge B., Casserly, Pixley and sundry other gentlemen, who certainly would never authorize their names to be used in such an unceremonious way at daylight in the morning. Being a friend of Pixley's I could not tamely permit his name to resound through the streets such a beautiful Sunday morning, and I did my best to dampen their ardor by sousing down a bucket of water over the party; whereupon, one very obfuscated gentleman remarked that the rainy season had commenced in good earnest, and he believed he would go home for his "umbreller;" and the party broke up wiser and wetter men. Monday was rather inclined to be a blue day. It is generally so with housekeepers, I believe—a day when the master of the house (tho other six days) is requested to go early and come home late, which he does voluntarily, for, by common consent, washday is one of trials and vexations, and, summed up, is the pursuit of cleanliness under difficulties of a trying nature.

Stocks never sell well on Monday. The machinery of the week hardly gets in motion before Tuesday, and people do not get fairly over their Sunday naps—seem torpid and stupid; and that torpidity seems to extend to all branches of business except that of borrowing money, in which, transactions may be quoted "lively"—that is. there have been a great many lively attempts to borrow, with corresponding failures where the "collats" were not satisfactory, which they seldom are. As for borrowing on stocks, one would expect as soon to be able to hypothecato his grandmother. The money-lenders are willing to advance just the value of the stamps on the certificates, provided they have not been cancelled. The nice young men with their packages of bills for collection under their arms have been very lively this week, as there were two steamer-days; although it is not fair to swindle a man out of the amount of a bill on Mr. Raymond's steamer-day. The Nicaragua route does not justify a man in paying, or any one in dunning him. Not that tho routo is not a very good one, but the objection is to the excuse the departuro of that steamer seems to offer for dunning a man. There would be some satisfaction in living in this world if it was not for having to pay bills. Receiving money can be borne with, and we can put up with that bore; but to pay! Base is the slave, indeed, who pays—if he can help it; and no doubt those who collect, or try to, come to the conclusion that slavery in its worst phase exists in California.

—

THE transactions for the week that have come under my observation relate principally to grapes, several bunches of which changed hands; and I purchased a bunch that had changed hands so ofteu I couldu't distinguish whether they were Isabellas or Black Hamburgs. There's an old lady that sits on our corner and makes a fine display these windy afternoons. She faces wind and dust; and what with the perpetual feud going on between herself and her bonnet, which gets away and goes down tho street about once every half-heur—the sudden surprises and raids on her pile of fruit by small boys who carry flags of truce at half-mast, but uever abstain from surreptitious abstractions of the old lady's stores; the boys who show a morbid desire to do all their fighting before her, with a view to her acting as umpire, probably—she has a hard time of it. When she runs down the street for her bonnet the impish boys make a sudden dash on her grapes. She returns in time to charge on them around the corner, with fruitless results. Ad interim, a pair of dogs have had a personal misunderstanding under her temporary table and upset a box of apples, which roll under the horses' hoofs. And so it goes all day. It is illustrative of the trials of this life, and particularly life in California, where you can't set anything down and leave it a brief period with any safety; it finds somebody to pick it up, or you get picked up yourself in pursuit of a fleeing phantom, and if you have a little property, it is caught in between tho two big dogs, and their fight leaves you without any breath in your body or money in your purse. Meantime, buy that old lady's grapes and reward virtue, pationcе, great endurance, long suffering, and the pursuit of a few dimes under tho abovo described difficulties. You will always observe a tear in the old lady's eye, occasioned by melancholy reflections or—the dust.

—

HAPPENING to drop in at the Acadomy of Music the other evening, I was much pleased to soe how gently "mo boy Peakes" warbled, and how much better control he seemed to have of his voiee as "Oroveso," in Norma, thau as the King in Maritana. The improvement was marked and remarked by others, as well as myself, and the verdict was that it developed a good trait in Peakes to take his little dose of criticism so patiently, and show his appreciation of the good wishes of the public by striving to remedy the little faults that were laid before him for his good. He will find his reward for the application and study he seems now to be giving his roles; and we shall expect great things of him in Don Pasquale this evening. Our friends with the horns, too, seemed to have concluded to economizo a little on breath and blow more gently, so that somethiug else could be heard. In fact, everythiug seemed to be lovely the past week. And let not people forget that this evening terminates the season; those who have neglected to go will be sorry, and those who have attended oftenest will regret its close. But as we are to have next week several nice comedies by the Richiugs troupe, there is still a chance to see them in their best characters; and if the house is not filled nightly, then ought this community to be set down as unappreciative.

—

THERE is a time and place for all things and a time to throw bouquets, and a great many occasions when they ought not to be thrown—and one of those is when the recipient is in the deepest distress and depths of despair, and can't stop to pick it up, and there it lies at her feet where it is kicked and swept arouud, thus completely destroying the effect of her acting or singing; for while she appeals to heaven to save her, with an eye on the grooves of the scene slides overhead, the other is taking the bearings of the bouquet, and she executes a right or left "oblique" in her movements to avoid treading on it. There it persistently lies, a nuisance, and at the same time a caso of intended compliment that can't be overlooked; and it continues to get large and more in the way until the heroiue is obliged to wink at the hero, who doesn't take the hint uutil in the middle of his rhapsody, when he agrees to die, etc., but is obliged to postpono it to pick up the bouquet, which is handed to her with a flourish, and received with a bow, and a slight settling down of the body—thereby changing, interrupting and destroying tho effect of tho passage.

Somebody threw a bouquet on the stage for Miss Richings the other ovening, while she was in the midst of her solemn rites as a priestess, and about to bo blessed by friend Peakes in a long flowing beard and a ditto night gown, who was doing the fanatical old druidical "Pop" and who, by the way, subsequently failed to do the decent thing and stand up for his daughter. Peakes makes a gay old parson, but I think his style would be improved by hoops, to set him out a littlo. Somebody said little Joe threw the bouquet, but I can't think it, for Joe is a warm admirer of Miss Richings and an enthusiast on opera—never missing a night, and as competent a critic as any opera-goer in towu. Surely Joe wouldn't havo thrown his bouquet at such a moment.

If there is any one other nuisanee at the opera that is equal to inappropriate bouquet shying, it is to set before a chap who insists on beating time with his feet or drumming on tho back of your seat. To suddenly terminate the existenee of such an individual would be perfectly justifiable, and no jury of opera-goers would ever find a man guilty of any crime who executed the movement.

RESTLESS.

PHŒNIXIANA.

AMONG the numerous anecdotes of John Phœnix which have recently appeared, the following, which ought to be considered his boldest and best practical joke, seems to have been entirely overlooked:

About the winter of 1852, Phœnix, then a young bachelor Lieutenant, found himself on duty in Washington, where, in addition to his other business, he managed to fall iu love with the fair daughter of the Colonel who commanded him. (I mean the Colonel commanded him.) Whether his affection was returned or not is unknown, but one fine morning the Colonel summoned Phœnix to the private office and addressed him to the following effect:

"Mr. Phœnix, your abilities in your profession are so well known that I cannot, with justice, allow them to rust in the dull routine of bureau duties. A fine opportunity for distinguished service now offers, and I have given you a preference which you merit. Here are the drawings and specifications of a dam to be built upon the San Diego river. Thirty thousand dollars will be placed to your credit, and the steamer will sail from New York to-morrow. No thanks! You deserve all that I can do for you. Apropos: My daughter, knowing that you will be pressed for time, will not expect a formal leave-taking. Good-by, Mr. Phœnix! Dam the San Diego river to the best of your ability. I envy you the fine opportunity, although, as I have said, you deserve it. You owe me no thanks. Good-by!" So saying, he bowed the young man out of the office.

The steamer sailed, of course, (such is the phrase, which is about as sensible as to say "the sailer steamed,") next day, and in due time Phœnix arrived at San Francisco. After a proper course of delay, which he improved by making the reconnoisance of the railroad from San Francisco to the Mission along the "scentral route," he appeared in San Diego, and for three months that ancient city smiled and was gay.

In due course of timo the dam was built; but knowing that some original engineering was to be expected of him, Phœnix, while complying strictly with his orders and drawings, placed the structure, not across the river, but along one bank, up and down stream. "There!" said he, as he finished his last inspeotion, "there is a dam that will stand the test of time. When the river washes that dam away, let them send me out again. I will build another I will dam the San Diego river as long as I live."

—

CRINOLINE.—"A calculation has been made," says the Sala Public of Lyons, "on the subject of crinolines, which is worthy of attention. These dresses, in fact, require three metres more material than the ordinary ones. As no less than 20,000,000 of ladies' dresses are made every year in France, the additional quantity used is 60,000,000 of metres, which taken at the average price of 2f. a metre, makes a sum of 120,000,000f. In addition must be mentioned two extra petticoats required for those ample dresses, and the material for which costs 120,000,000f. more. The steel cages must bo also taken into account, and as they cannot be estimated at less than 15f. each, a further sum of 150,000,000f. must be added. These three sums together make a tribute of 390,000,000f., or about one-fifth of the State budget, paid to a ridiculous and inconvenient fashiou.

THE SONG OF THE LIGHT ARTILLERY.

ON the unstained sward of a gentle slope,
Full of valor and full of hope
The infantry swarms like a coming sea—
Why lingers the Light Artillery?

"Action, front!"
Whirling the Parrotts like children's toys,
The horses strain to the rushing noise;
To right and to left so fast and free,
They carry the light artillery.

"Drive on!"
The gunner cries, with a tug and a jerk,
The limbers fly, and we bend to our work;
The "handspike" in, and the "implements" out—
We wait for the word, and it comes with a shout:

"Load!"
The foes pour on their billowy line:
Can nothing check their bold design?
With yells and oaths of fiendish glee,
They rush for the light artillery.

"Commence firing!"
Hurrah! hurrah! our bull-dogs bark,
And their triple line is a glorious mark;
Hundreds fall like grain on the lea,
Mowed down by the light artillery.

"Fire!" and "Load!" are the only cries
Which are thundered and roared to the vaulted skies;
Aha! they falter, they halt, they flee,
From the hail of the light artillery.

"Cease firing!"
The battle is over, the victory won,
Ere the dew is dried by the rising sun;
While the shout bursts out like a full-voiced sea,
"Three cheers for the Light Artillery!"

[United Service Magazine.

TWO VENETIAN PICTURES.

NUMBER I.—THE PORTAL.

WE have but walked some two hundred yards when we come to a low wharf or quay, at the extremity of a canal, with long steps on each side down to the water, which latter we fancy for an instant has become black with stagnation; another glance undeceives us—it is covered with the black boats of Venice. We enter one of them, rather to try if they be real boats or not, than with any definite purpose, and glide away; at first feeling as if the water were yielding continually beneath the boat and letting her sink into soft vacancy. It is something clearer than any water we have seen lately, and of a pale green; the banks only two or three feet above it, of mud and rank grass, with here and there a stunted tree; gliding swiftly past the small casement of the gondola, as if they were dragged by upon a painted scene.

Stroke by stroke we count the plunges of the oar, each heaving up the side of the boat slightly as her silver beak shoots forward. We lose patience, and extricate ourselves from the cushions: the sea air blows keenly by, as we stand leaning on the roof of the floating cell. In front, nothing to be seen but long canal and level bank; to the west, the tower of Mestre is lowering fast, and behind it there have risen purple shapes, of the color of dead rose-leaves, all round the horizon, feebly defined against the afternoon sky—the Alps of Bassano. Forward still: the endless canal bends at last, and then breaks into intricate angles about some low bastions, now torn to pieces and staggering in ugly rents towards the water—the bastions of the fort of Malghera. Another turn, and another perspective of canal; but not interminable. The silver beak cleaves it fast—it widens: the rank grass of the banks sinks lower, and lower, and at last dies in tawny knots along an expanse of weedy shore. Over it, on the right, but a few years back, we might have seen the lagoon stretching to the horizon, and the warm southern sky bending over Malamocco to the sea. Now we can see nothing but what seems a low and monotonous dockyard wall, with flat arches to let the tide through it: this is the railroad bridge, conspicuous above all things. But at the end of those dismal arches, there rises, out of the wide water, a straggling line of low and confused brick buildings, which, but for the many towers which are mingled among them, might be the suburbs of an English manufacturing town. Four or five domes, pale, and evidently at a greater distance, rise over the centre of the line; but the object which first catches the eye is a sullen cloud of black smoke brooding over the northern half of it, and which issues from the belfry of a church.

It is Venice.

NUMBER II.—ST. MARK'S.

A yard or two farther, we pass the hostelry of the Black Eagle, and, glancing as we pass through the square door of marble, deeply moulded, in the outer wall, we see the shadows of its pergola of vines resting on an ancient well, with a pointed shield carved on its side; and so presently emerge on the bridge and Campo San Moisé, whence to the entrance into St. Mark's Place, called the Bocca di Piazza (mouth of the square) the Venetian character is nearly destroyed, first by the frightful façade of San Moisé, which we will pause at another time to examine, and then by the modernizing of the shops as they near the piazza, and the mingling with the lower Venetian populace of lounging groups of English and Austrians. We will push fast through them into the shadow of the pillars at the end of the Bocca di Piazza, and then we forget them all; for between those pillars there opens a great light, and, in the midst of it, as we advance slowly, the vast tower of St. Mark seems to lift itself visibly forth from the level field of chequered stones; and, on each side, the countless arches prolong themselves into ranged symmetry, as if the rugged and irregular houses that pressed together above us in the dark alley had been struck back into sudden obedience and lovely order, and all their rude casements and broken walls had been transformed into arches charged with goodly sculpture, and fluted shafts of delicate stone.

And well may they fall back, for beyond those troops of ordered arches there rises a vision out of the earth, and all the great square seems to have opened from it in a kind of awe, that we may see it far away—a multitude of pillars and white domes, clustered into a long, low pyramid of colored light; a treasure-heap, it seems, partly of gold, and partly of opal and mother-of-pearl, hollowed beneath into five great vaulted porches, ceiled with fair mosaic, and beset with sculpture of alabaster, clear as amber and delicate as ivory—sculpture fantastic and involved, of palm-leaves and lilies, and grapes and pomegranate, and birds clinging and fluttering among the branches, all twined together into an endless network of buds and plumes; and, in the midst of it, the solemn forms of angels, sceptred and robed to the feet, and leaning to each other across the gates, their figures indistinct among the gleaming of the golden ground through the leaves beside them, interrupted and dim, like the morning light as it faded back among the branches of Eden, when first its gates were angel-guarded long ago. And ground the walls of the porches there are set pillars of variegated stones, jasper and porphyry, and deep-green serpentine spotted with flakes of snow, and marbles, that half refuse and half yield to the sunshine, Cleopatra-like, "their bluest veins to kiss"—the shadow, as it steals back from them, revealing line after line of azure undulation, as a receding tide leaves the waved sand; their capitals rich with interwoven tracery, rooted knots of herbage, and drifting leaves of acanthus and vine, and mystical signs, all beginning and ending in the Cross; and above them, in the broad archivolts, a continuous chain of language and of life—angels, and the signs of heaven, and the labors of men, each in its appointed season upon the earth; and above these, another range of glittering pinnacles, mixed with white arches edged with scarlet flowers—a confusion of delight, amidst which the breasts of the Greek horses are seen blazing in their breadth of golden strength, and the St. Mark's Lion, lifted on a blue field covered with stars, until at last, as if in ecstacy, the crests of the arches break into a marble foam, and toss themselves far into the blue sky in flashes and wreaths of sculptured spray, as if the breakers on the Lido shore had been frost-bound before they fell, and the sea-nymphs had inlaid them with coral and amethyst.

And what effect has this splendor on those who pass beneath it? You may walk from sunrise to sunset, to and fro, before the gateway of St. Mark's, and you will not see an eye lifted to it, nor a countenance brightened by it. Priest and layman, soldier and civilian, rich and poor, pass by it alike regardlessly. Up to the very recesses of the porches, the meanest tradesmen of the city push their counter; nay, the foundation of its pillars are themselves the seats—not "of them that sell doves" for sacrifice, but of the vendors of toys and caricatures. Round the whole square in front of the church there is almost a continuous line of cafés, where the idle Venetians of the middle classes lounge, and read empty journals; in its centre the Austrian bands play during the time of vespers, their martial music jarring with the organ notes—the march drowning the miserere, and the sullen crowd thickening round them—a crowd, which, if it had its will, would stiletto every soldier that pipes to it. And in the recesses of the porches, all day long, knots of men, of the lowest classes, unemployed and listless, lie basking in the sun like lizards; and unregarded children—every heavy glance of their young eyes full of desperation and stony depravity, and their throats hoarse with cursing—gamble, and fight, and snarl, and sleep, hour after hour, clashing their bruised centisimi upon the marble ledges of the church porch. And the images of Christ and His angels look down upon it continually.—Ruskin's "Stones of Venice."

THE LAST OF THE TOLL-GATE.

SHALL I go round to the crescent, sir, and save the gate? It was thus that the unfeeling driver of a Hansom cab addressed me, through the trap in the roof of his vehicle, on the night of the 29th of June last.

"No, no," I said, in tones of virtuous indignation. "Don't let us cheat a dying institution: go through, and let me pay my last twopence."

I am willing to confess that I had often been a consenting party to that detour round the crescent. Not that I ever saved anything by it, for the driver always looked for the twopence in addition to his fare, and always had it, taking it in the light of a reward of merit; but such is the rooted aversion of a free and independent Britou, glorying in Magna Charta and popular representation, to anything in the shape of a tax for the support of those institutions in which he takes so much pride, that he will bestow his money upon the vilest of mankind rather than pay it into the hands of a paternal government, or any of its myrmidons. But on this occasion, the free and independent Briton was swayed by other feelings peculiar to his great nature. He was not going to hit an institution when it was down. So he went through the gate and paid his twopence like a man.

The toll-keeper seemed to be also conscious of the touching and pitiful nature of the occasion. For the first time since I, the independent Briton, had, to my cost, known him, he spoke civilly, and, in giving me change out of sixpence, actually said, "Thank you, sir." Not to be outdone in this respect, I said, "You're very welcome, I'm sure, for it is the last twopence I shall pay you."

"Oh, no, sir, I hope not," he replied. "There's all day to-morrow for you; we don't shut up for good, till twelve o'clock at night."

He seemed to say, "Don't despair; there is yet time and opportunity left to do a virtuous action." It was very kind of him. I was inclined to believe that to oblige me he would have been willing to continue the gate for a few days longer. I did not, however, desire that he should so far put himself out of the way on my account. I merely expressed my intention of paying a visit to the gate on the following day, delicately hinting at hospitality on my part. I was rejoiced to find that he would have no objection; that, in fact, he would be very happy to see me.

This was one of those happy days which men make at random on the spur of the moment, and which are worth the best and most elaborate efforts of thought and deliberation. If the truth must be told, I had always regarded that toll-gate keeper with awe, nay, with some feeling of dread. Like many other persons in authority, he seemed to be encased in an armor of unapproachableness, hedged round by a divinity that repelled all familiar advances. With a strong disposition towards statistics and useful knowledge, I had for some time desired to make his acquaintance, and to learn from his own lips something of the philosophy and experience of toll-gate keeping. I was curious to know whether the theory of a certain celebrated person with regard to the misanthropical nature of the pursuit was correct; or whether it was merely a malicious libel on the part of one who had been a victim to tolls. I was desirous to know if the keeper of a toll-gate regarded all mankind with the same aversion as all mankind regarded him; and perhaps I was curious to peep into the interior of that mysterious little round-house, and see a toll-keeper in the privacy of what might literally be called his domestic circle. I had long desired to fathom these things; but had never, with every elaboration of design, made the great advance towards them which I now achieved. Until this happy moment, when a mutual sentiment brought us together on a friendly footing, I had signally failed in my endeavors to approach the keeper of that toll-gate. I had often strolled down to the gate with the intention of engaging him in conversation, but my courage invariably failed me. I was afraid that he might think me impertinent. Again and again I walked round the little house, in the hope that my timidity might miss its footing and land me quite by accident in the confidence of the solemn functionary of whom all I knew was that his name was John Brown. In vain. I never succeeded in getting in his way, in running against him, or in any other way bringing myself under his notice. It would have been absurd to ask him the right time, for there was a big-faced clock in the front of the gate proclaiming the hour to all the passing world. I thought at one time, in the pride of my knowledge of human nature, of approaching Mr. Brown with a friendship's offering of a pot of beer extended in my hand; but I was warned against this course by the possibility (albeit I considered it a very bare one) of his being a teetotaller. I thought at another time, having observed that Mr. Brown was addicted to the weed, of smoothing my way with a bundle of cigars: but was deterred by a fear lest my motives might be misunderstood, and lest Mr. Brown should suspect me to be a spy of the Trust. I may say that I beat about Mr. Brown very much, learning many things from the perusal of the tablo of tolls concerning the charges for horses and asses, drawing and not drawing, and for wagons, vans, and carriages, the felloes of whose wheels were of certain dimensions, &c., but of Mr. Brown himself, nothing.

When I walked down to the gate the following afternoon, I became sensible that a great sensation was prevailing in the neighborhood. A great sensation had been prevailing in that neighborhood for some considerable time; but now it was spreading out far and wide, like a rising flood, swamping the whole district in a deluge of excitement. There was a manifest tendency of the walking population "down the road," and a marked disposition on the part of the shop-keepers, to gather in knots on the pavement, as if they expected fire-works or a comet. There was much discussion, too, which became more and more earnest as the gate was approached. I have reason to know that as a politician the High street is thoroughly radical; that it has a great idea of free trade, reduced expenditure, and abolition of taxes; that it is great, occasionally, at the Wilkes and Liberty Hall in Lower Platform street, on the rights of man, and the wrongs inflicted on society by a grasping hierarchy and a bloated aristocracy; that it is ready at any moment to vote for Bluter, and the right of meeting in the Parks, and that it hates all placemen, holders of sinecures, and the privileged classes generally. Yet, I found it to be the unanimous opinion of the High street, more particularly towards its lower end, that the demolition of the toll-gate would be highly prejudicial to its interests, that it was a most unwarrantable and unconstitutional proceeding, and that it was directly inimical to the rights of man keeping shop in that vicinity. There was a decided disposition to connect the abolition of toll-gates in general, and of that toll-gate in particular, with the baleful influence of a grasping hierarchy and a bloated aristocracy; and I am sure that the connection would have been logically and conclusively established if the High street had only seen how to do it. At one corner, the High street, being interested in beer and the choicest spirits at dock prices, including old vatted rum, was quite clear that in a mysterious manner, not capable of lucid explanation, but indubitable nevertheless, the removal of the toll-gate would have much the same effect on beer and spirits as an advance in the price of hops, or an increase in the excise duty. A little higher up, the High street, being interested in tobacco, as regards one window, and invisible perukes as regards the other, gloomily resigned itself to the conviction that when the gate was removed, society at large would give up smoking and cease to be bald. Next door but one, the High street, being professionally engaged in making up gentlemen's own material, had also made up its mind that the gate and the habits of civilization would disappear together, and that mankind would, with the stroke of twelve that night, incontinently return to nudity and blue paint. At a particular corner, on the pavement, the High street being concerned in trotters, saw in the destruction of the gate a fatal blow to pork, tending to the ultimate extinction of that useful though not ornamental animal, the pig; at the same time opening up a broad and clear road leading to the workhouse. In fact, the High street, though thoroughly radical when other persons are concerned, was, on this occasion, when the party concerned was the High street itself, eminently conservative.

On the other hand, the drivers and conductors of cabs and omnibuses, whose interests lay in a different direction, and whose views had no doubt been enlarged by a daily survey of mankind from 'Igate to the Abbey, contemplated the dissolution of the gate with undisguised satisfaction, while the juvenile population, at all times strongly iconoclastic, was preparing to celebrate the occasion in a becoming manner, and to seize the earliest moment, when the protection of the law should be withdrawn, to break the toll-gate's windows.

Through this terrible war of mental elements I made my way to the doomed gate, and, accosting Mr. Brown, hoped I saw him well, or at least as well as could be expected under the melancholy circumstances. How often it happens in life that the man whom, when you did not know him, you regarded as haughty and unapproachable, proves, when you do come to know him, to be the most affable fellow imaginable! I had not been two minutes in Mr. Brown's company, before I perceived that in walking round him and beating about him I had entirely mistaken Mr. Brown's nature and wasted my own time. I might have approached him with a peace-offering of a pot of beer, and been received with joy; I might have paved the way with a bundle of cigars, and found it the direct road to his affections. I imagined him to be a great frozen block of reserve, but I knew now that I might have melted him throughout with three-penn'orth warm. I conceived him to be a pillar of darkness; I discovered that I might have lighted him up with a pickwick.

Would Mr. Brown take anything? Mr. Brown's ready apprehension of the significance of this masonic form of interrogatory made me almost painfully sensible of the absurdity of having suspected him of teetotalism. Mr. Brown would take anything, but, for choice, old ale. The way in which one of Mr. Brown's boys, on receiving a shilling, annihilated time and space and disappeared through a double swing door leading to the region of old vatted rum, was suggestive of lightning. Did Mr. Brown smoke? Mr. Brown, casting his eyes towards the tall red chimney that erected itself from the flat roof of the toll-gate like an inflamed mark of admiration, said that he could; evidently implying that, as regards smoking, a flue with a short draught was a fool to him. For choice, Mr. Brown took returns—and I had hesitated to approach him with regalias!

Was Mr. Brown sorry that the gate was to be done away with? This timidly and gingerly, lest Mr. Brown might resent any interference with his private affairs. But Mr. Brown had no reserve. He put himself at once on the footing of a sworn witness on a highway committee.

"Sorry! Lor' bless you, sir, I shall be jolly glad when 12 o'clock comes, and it's all over. You wouldn't believe the life the 'bus men and the cabbies have been a leading me for a week past; ah, for a month a'most. To-day it has been dreadful. And you may be as good at chaff as you like, but you can't have an answer ready for every one. Me and my boys have been making up things to say all the morning, and we've given it to a few of them pretty hot, though, of course, some of them had the best of us. There's a surly old fellow as generally goes round the crescent and evades the gate when he can, but the other day he was obliged to come through.

"'Ah!' he says, 'there will be no gates after Friday.'

"'Oh, yes, there will,' I says; 'they're going to leave one on your account.'

"'Which gate is that?' he says.

"'Why, Newgate!' I says.

"You should have seen how he whipped into his horse and made off double-quick. Then, there's a saucy, cheeky sort of a chap as drives a Hansom says to me:

"'Hullo, John!' he says, 'what are you going to do when the gate's down? Start a baked tatur can, or go into the catch-'em-alive-oh line?'

"'No, neither,' I say; 'but I don't mind telling you what I intend to be up to. I'm going to do something to get put into the house of correction, and when I come out with a ticket-of-leave I'll be fully qualified to drive a cab.'"

While Mr. Brown was thus discoursing in the most communicative manner, he was constantly under the necessity of breaking off short to run and take the tolls; or, if it were not a vehicle of sufficient importance for his own notice, to shout to his two boys to take the tolls for him. And the two boys were always scurrying out into the roads and scurrying back again to drop coppers into the capacious pockets of Mr. Brown's white apron.

"There's some folks think, sir, that toll-keeping is an easy, idle kind of a life. They only see me for a minute as they go by, and that's all they know about it. If they was to stand here fourteen hours a day, as I do, they'd know different. You're never at rest a minute; there's always something a-going through. It's no use to sit down; you can't sit for two minutes together; and getting up and down like that is very trying to the legs. I know what toll-keeping is, sir. I've been in it all my life. I was born in a toll-gate down at Pangbourne—it wasn't like this, you know, it had rooms and all kinds of convenience—and that, perhaps, was easy; but here in London it's almost as bad as the tread-mill; that is, I should say it was, sir; of course I don't know for certain. It's not what it was, toll-keeping. Everything's redooced so, now-a-days. We're obliged to make a reduction for taking a quantity. Why, there's forty 'busses goes through this gate, each, on an average, fourteen times every day, and we take the lot for ten pound a week. It would be more than ten times that if we were to make them pay every time. But if we had done that, there wouldn't have been half the 'busses on this road. When a company thinks of starting, they come to us and say, 'What will you take us for?' And we say, so much; and if it's what they can afford, they come on the road, and if it's more than they can afford, they don't. But we're always liberal, sir. We let the cabs pass free when they're empty; that ain't a right, sir; it's a privilege which we allow them. And what's the return they make for that privilege? Why, when they've got a fare they go round the crescent, and then when they're empty they come back through the gate. That's what a cabman calls gratitude. I've known them flash little bits of newspaper cut up to look like tickets, to the boys when they've been larking and not taking much notice. I've been done that way myself, once or twice; I've caught a few out, though. I remember my old master, Mr. Levy, the contractor, bowling a cab-driver out in fine style. The man, after driving him more than a hundred yards on the Trust, took him sharp up the side of the crescent, and so evaded the toll. When he set Mr. Levy down at his house, and he'd paid him his right fare, he says, 'Ain't you going to give me the two-pence for evading the gate?' 'No,' Mr. Levy says, 'I won't do that, but as I'm the contractor for the tolls, I'll give a summons as early as I can to-morrow morning.' And he did, too; but he was a good sort, and wouldn't have taken no notice if the man hadn't been cheeky. I used to collect the post-duty under Mr. Levy; that was in the old coaching times, before railways. My station was down near King's-cross, and I used to take the tickets as the post-chaises went by, some of them bound for Gretna Green; for, somehow or other, sir, lovers were fond of running away to be married when it was a hard job to do it; but now, when there's railways and it's easy, they don't seem to care about it. Human nature, I suppose, sir? But taking post-duty was better than toll-keeping. I used to get a penny on every ticket, and I've often earned as much as eight pound a week. But the post-duty was done away with, and now the tolls is to be done away with. This gate has had a good many shoves at one time or another. It was up at St. Giles's once; but they shoved it on gradually to here, and now it's to be shoved right out into the country somewhere. No; I don't think I shall go with it; but I ain't afraid. I've always found that when one gate shuts, another opens. A gent said to me to-day, 'Why, Mr. Brown,' he says, 'with your figure and your aprons, you would be a credit to Doctors' Commons.' I'll drop into something, I dare say. I've been taking stock of the traffic on this road for the railway bill, and perhaps I'll get a job to take tickets for Puffing Billy. The 'busses and the cabs are all rejoicing because the tolls is to be done away with; but I tell them it will be all the worse for them in the end. Puffing Billy will come and knock them all off the road. No; I don't pay a rent for the toll. The contractor trusts to me to do the best I can for him."

After an interval for refreshment and the quiet digestion of all this toll lore, I revisited the gate at about 11 o'clock. The excitement was intense now. The little house was surrounded by a crowd of two or three hundred persons, male and female, the youthful portion showing a strong disposition to dance. Many of Mr. Brown's personal friends had arrived and were inside the toll-house, drinking Mr. Brown's health. Beer was coming over from the public house—in pots at first, in cans presently; eventually, as the hour of doom approached, in pails. Presenting myself at the door of the house, I was refused admission, but, on being recognized by Mr. Brown, was admitted—to the great envy of the unprivileged classes outside, who seemed to regard me somewhat in the light of one who had the entrée at court. Inside, Mr. Brown's friends were drinking out of the pots, out of the cans, out of the pails. Beer, beer everywhere, not only to drink but to stand in, sit in, swim in, if any one had been so inclined. Beer, too, was going on outside. The hilarity was becoming fast and furious. Mr. Brown was delighted. He put himself in the position of a host giving an al fresco nocturnal fête. He was glad to see everybody; anxious to make everybody happy. Music was suggested. Mr. Brown procured a boy with a tin whistle. The tin whistle being voted weak and inadequate to the occasion, Mr. Brown sent to some neighboring depot of music and secured the services of a band, consisting of a cornet-a-piston, a trombone and a drum. Beer having been administered to the band, it was hoisted up on to the roof of the gate, from which elevated position it played many favorite selections, while the mob below danced a sort of Carmagnole round the toll-house. A stranger coming up at that moment would have found it difficult to say, in view of the buckets of beer which still continued to be carried across, whether the occasion were a fire; or, in view of the wild revolutionary dance, whether the toll-house were a sort of Bastile, and the people were taking it by assault! Every vehicle that arrived was immediately surrounded by the mob, who seemed to derive some sort of savage satisfaction from seeing the last tolls paid. Wild shouts hailed the surrender of every two-pence, as if, (taking the revolutionary view of the matter,) the coins were the heads of tyrants, falling under the stroke of the guillotine. Heavily-laden omnibuses dashed through the crowd in triumph, the drivers flourishing their whips, the occupants of the knife-board standing and waving hats and handkerchiefs, while the conductors, with the politeness which distinguishes them, took sights at Mr. Brown, and shouted "Ya-ah!" at him as if he had been a wild beast having his teeth filed and his claws cut.

Time advances. Beer is hoisted up to the band in a bucket, and in a moment of impatient waiting for music, when all eyes are directed to the elevated orchestra, the trombone is seen upon all-fours drinking like a horse. Inside the house Mr. Brown's friends, too numerous for the limited accommodation, are beginning to drop and drag themselves among the beer, suggesting blue-bottles on a sloppy public-house counter. Considering that before the close of the proceedings beer actually found its way through the roof, it was a mercy some of them were not drowned.

"A quarter to twelve. Hurrah! Ten minutes to twelve. Hurrah!" A cab comes up with an unprotected female in it. The cab is immediately surrounded by the mob, and the unprotected female turns pale and shrieks. She is assured that it is not her life that is wanted, but only her twopence. A hundred hands are held out for the money, and though it is taken by strangers, it is immediately handed over to Mr. Brown. "Five minutes to twelve! Only five minutes more, Brown; suppose we burn the gate, and finish up with a bonfire!" Mr. Brown is so good-humored, and so thoroughly enjoying his "breaking up," that I really believe he would have made no objection to this proposition if it could have been carried into execution without immolating his friends. I doubt, however, if the toll-house in its then saturated state would have burned readily.

"One minute to twelve. Hurrah! hurrah!! hurrah!!!" A tremendous shout about this time; the band, with a fine apprehension of the nature of the occasion, fatuously playing the "Death of Nelson." A cab appears with another unprotected female, who, amid frantic acclamations, pays the last toll. "Twelve!" The protection and countenance of the law being withdrawn from the toll-house, crash goes a shower of Macadam through its windows. Happily Mr. Brown's friends are all prostrate, and the consequences are not tragic. Another shout, to which Mr. Brown responds by taking off and waving his white apron. And all is over.

Passing along a day or two after, I found nothing to mark the spot where the gate had stood but a little blue patch of Macadam, under which one might have supposed the toll-house to be buried. I hear, however, that the gate is not dead yet; that it has had another shove; and that, while being dragged bodily up the Eaton road by two horses, for whose strength and spirits it was a great deal too much, it was given into custody by a member of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals.—All the Year Round.

SONG IN CYMBELINE.

HARK! hark! the lark at Heaven's gate sings,
And Phœbus 'gins arise,
His steeds to water at those springs
On chaliced flowers that lies;
And winking Mary-buds begin
To ope their golden eyes;
With every thing that pretty bin:
My lady sweet arise;
Arise, arise. [Shakspeare.

A CHICAGO paper gravely remarks that "the longer the present war lasts, the more public opinion begins to settle down to the belief that it will by no means be a short one." The editor is quite firm in this belief.

EARTHQUAKES.

SO far as modern times are concerned, Iceland, the western coast of Spain and Portugal, the south of Italy and the Levant, have been the only portions of Europe where seriously destructive earthquakes have taken place. Though North America does not seem to have contributed very many earthquakes to the list just given, yet this is probably from the lack of records, as the whole region from California southwards, bordering on the Pacific, is subject to violent earthquakes. "Pacific" as the ocean may be, its borders are of a very different character, and both its Asiatic and its American coasts are so constantly visited with earthquakes that they with the islands of the Caribbean Sea, will stand first on the list of the earthquake districts of the globe. The Pacific Ocean is, in fact, fringed by a rocky, earthquake-visited territory. As to the times when earthquakes happen in the greatest numbers, there are but two facts which can be stated positively. The first is very singular, namely, that the greater part of the earthquakes which have been recorded occur near to the time of the new and of the full moon. It is, of course, very doubtful whether if we could throw into the calculation all the earthquakes which have gone by without biographer or record, we should still find the same curious rule holding good. Our recent earthquake of October 6th, was nearly as far as possible from the new and the full moon. Still, for all the hundreds, nay, thousands, of observed earthquakes, there is a preponderance of those which have selected either the time of full or of new moon for their occurrence; although no explanatory theory has yet been offered which we think worth presenting to our readers. The second fact is, that the majority happen in the colder half of the year. About four happen from October to March (both inclusive) for every three which occur in the other part of the year. The singular thing here is, that the same rule holds for the British, the Spanish, the French, and the Italian earthquakes. On the south side of the equator, where the months from October to March are the warm months, they have, so far as our records go, the smaller number of earthquakes; but as our accounts of earthquakes there are by no means so full as in Europe, we cannot be so sure of the conclusions to be drawn. Thus much may be said, as being matter of observation as to the times when earthquakes happen. History also seems to point to something like a rule for the recurrence of serious and numerous earthquakes somewhat after the middle of each successive century. To go back over the last four hundred years, we observe that in the last century, about the middle, (1755,) occurred the great Lisbon earthquake; and, subsequently, the great Calabrian earthquake; so also in the middle of the seventeenth century there were great earthquakes in the Mediterranean, and afterwards, towards its close, the great Jamaica earthquake; while, in the middle and later half of the sixteenth century, there were great earthquakes both in Europe and China. In each of these cases, the earthquakes mentioned were the chief earthquakes of the century. Whether the present century is to follow this precedent, we are hardly yet advanced enough to say. Certain it is that the first fifty years saw but few serious earthquakes, and that the last ten or twelve years have seemed to indicate a revival of the earthquake activity, both in the very serious catastrophes in the Levant, and in those which have occurred in the Eastern seas. —Churchman's Family Magazine.

MR. LUMLEY AND LOLA MONTEZ.—There is still another event remaining, in the circumstances connected with which there is something so strangely ludicrous that I can scarcely look back upon it without a smile. This event was the appearance, as a danseuse, of the late celebrated Lola Montez. It is not my intention to rake up the world-wide stories of this strange and fascinating woman, not long since passed from the world. Perhaps it will be sufficient to say frankly that I was in this instance fairly "taken in." A noble lord, (afterwards closely connected with the Foreign Office,) had introduced the lady to my notice as the daughter of a celebrated Spanish patriot and martyr, representing her merits as a dancer in so strong a light that her "appearance" was granted. The afterwards great Lola was received with rapture. Public press, opera-goers, all gave way to such immoderate fits of enthusiasm that it is difficult at this day to account for the strange infatuation which pervaded all ranks. True, the so-called Señora was singularly beautiful; her style was new, and there was something piquant and provocative in the surprise created. Yet she had no pretensions to the title of danseuse in any sense. To speak the plain truth, she was but the veriest novice in her art, which she had never studied as an art at all. I do not intend by this plain statement to declare that the French and Italian schools of dancing are alone to be endured by spectators of the highest class; for there is art in the Spanish school of dancing as well as in the others. But this spurious Spanish lady had no real knowledge of that which she professed. The whole affair was an imposture, and on the very night of her first appearance the truth exploded. Doubts already created were confirmed, and the true Spaniards indignantly refused to acknowledge the impostor as an exponent of their national dance. On the discovery of the truth, I declined to allow the English adventuress—for such she was—another appearance on my boards. And certain it is that I acted wisely, though I had to exercise the virtue of self-denial, as there is little doubt, from the reception she had met with on the first night, that the lovely woman would have drawn large sums of money to my treasury, for some time at least. In spite of the expostulations of the "friends" of the lady—in spite of the deprecatory letters in which she earnestly denied her English origin, and boldly asserted that she was a true "Lola," a genuine "Montez"—in spite even of the desire expressed in high places to witness her strange performances, I remained inflexible, and the false danseuse was never again allowed to exhibit her handsome person and her spurious graces at Her Majesty's Theatre.—Lumley's Reminiscences of the Opera.

THYSELF.—Look well into thyself; there is a source which will always spring up if thou wilt always search there.

THE COUNTESS DIANA.

[TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH OF MARIO UCHARD.]

XXVIII.

THREE days later, on a delicious afternoon in April, we entered the grand avenue of my Castle of Orbach. The old oaks and chestnuts, already covered with a tender foliage, spread their branches above us like a triumphal arch—the birds, flying from bough to bough, sang their sweetest songs, and all nature, trembling with love under the kiss of Spring, seemed to say to us, "Be happy, and live again!" Intoxicated with joy, I held Diana's hand, and as we sauntered along we seemed to be living over again the happy days of our infancy. We passed near a little lake where in former days the swans delighted to float, and, carried away by a memory of the past, Diana said to me, "Do you remember?" There I had one day defended her from an attack of a large black swan—a wonderful feat, which had covered me with glory in the eyes of all the neighborhood.

At a distance of three hundred yards from the castle, we stopped near a railing, behind which appeared, in the midst of lilac trees, an elegant Italian pavilion. It was Diana's home, built in the centre of a little park, which was enclosed within my grounds.

We had arrived a day sooner than expected, so that no one awaited us. At the call of the postilions, the people of the house, with Catherine at their head, came to meet us with cries of joy. We were greeted with hearty welcomes, and embraced tenderly by three or four old dependants, who had seen us grow up from infancy.

Before a quarter of an hour had passed, the whole world of the castle poured in upon us. The news of my pretended madness and subsequent detention had saddened these devoted hearts—they pressed around me, happy to see me so well and so lively. Schultz partook of the general intoxication, and rubbed his hands, which was always with him a demonstration of supreme satisfaction. He had forgotten his fears, his sadness, his misfortune. We wandered over the house and the grounds, while the children frolicked on the grass plats and gathered us bouquets. At each step, memory would recall some scene of other days, and with beating hearts our eyes would meet and ask, "Do you remember?"

While they improvised our dinner, we set out to visit my castle, where I made my entrée amidst the acclamations of the villagers; they had known my father, and recognized in me the son of a benefactor who was more than ever endeared to them since the reign of my guardian and Placide.

When evening came, and I found myself alone with Bastien, I thought over the events of the day as of a dream. In observance of my father's wishes, there had been no changes made in my childhood's home. I saw once more all that I had loved, and in fancy I saw the fairy-like mirage of the Future. Alas! a shadow would from time to time obscure my felicity. I would think of my poor Schultz. Should I cure him?

The following morning I was awakened by the sound of little pebbles thrown against my window-blind. It was Schultz, who came to make me his accustomed visit.

"Ho! ho!" said he, looking at the wax lights, almost consumed. "Some one has been sitting up late here. This is a bad system of things. But what am I doing? Here am I, forgetting I am no longer the medical adviser."

When I was ready, we hastened to Diana's house, where I found Granger, who had just arrived. The sight of him recalled to me the fact that I was prohibited by law. I had not yet thought of it, and I feared some annoying intelligence.

"Oh, heavens!" said I to him, "Do you come to place me again in chains?"

"In chains?" replied he, astonished at the reception I gave him.

"Pardon me, my friend," replied I, sorrowfully. "I had forgotten the prohibition which is laid upon me!"

"The prohibition!" said he, laughing. "But there is no more question about that, I assure you."

"What do you mean?" said I. "You forget the commission of guardianship?"

"It exists no longer. You are of age, and the fact of your being placed at liberty renders the judgment of no effect. I have just come to take your orders for a demand of withdrawal, which will at once place you in possession of your estates. . . .

During the last eight days, my dear William, everything has been arranged. I have regained my rights. I am free, master of my fortune, of my own will, of my life; and all is in train for carrying out my famous project.

I impoverish myself in diminishing the rental of my farmers. In this lies my principal occupation.

My dear friend, contemplate me from this time henceforward with the utmost respect. I am a young man of many possessions—rich in this world's goods. The thought of your two little millions causes a smile.

The affairs of Diana are also marvellously arranged. Thanks to the will of M. de Maufert, she inherits nothing from him.

I have made Bastien my steward, and I shall marry him to his Catherine. I shall also marry Madelaine, through the medium of Diana, and I shall marry you too, if you do not take care; and all this without prejudice to another marriage that I have in contemplation. Hasten to us if you wish to see an enchanted corner of this world, where the ideal reigns supreme. We expect you.

XXIX.

WILLIAM, I know all. You are but a traitor, at the best. You have hidden from me your sublime devotion, and you have lived two months near your friend—near Diana—a witness to the felicity which is your work, without revealing yourself. I owe you all, William—I know all, I tell you. The Count's adversary at Rhodes was yourself. And you have not permitted me to go down on my knees and thank that fraternal and brave friend who delivered the angel whom I adore. And it is chance? No, William; it is God who has revealed it all to me, and who wishes to give you a brother ready, in his turn, to yield up his life to you.

On board of the ship that brought, three months ago, our poor Diana to Marseilles, was a young man, who, seeing her alone and desolate, had overwhelmed her with respectful cares and attentions until they reached Paris. Day before yesterday this young man arrived here. Tremble, William! His name is M. de Varelles, Consul at Rhodes! He partook of our hospitality. Last evening, in the course of conversation, I asked him if he knew any of the details of the Count's duel with Sir George Ferry.

"Yes, indeed," said he, "I was a witness."

I then begged him to relate the story to me.

"It is a strange enough adventure," said he. "I must tell you that this Sir George, who was a great admirer of old ruins, was in the habit of roaming about each day in the close vicinity of the Byzantine fortress that the Count inhabited, for the purpose of sketching. You know the moody temper of M. de Maufert; he took offence at these assiduities, seeing in them some hostile intention. So much so, that one morning he refused him access to a broken-down rampart, whence he could see into his garden. Sir George resisted with the obstinacy of an antiquarian disturbed in his researches. The Count became irritated. Sir George laughed in his face. Then came a challenge, and the so-called Englishman asked me to assist him.

"What do you say? The so-called Englishman?"

"Yes, there is the mystery; he confided to me that he was a Frenchman, belonging to an ancient family of Alsace, and that his name was William Salzmann."

Ah, my brother, what did I not feel at the mention of your name—at the thought that I possessed such a friend as you. And thus, while I was despairing of ever again seeing my Diana, you had discovered her retreat; and our happiness is all your work. Oh, I want you to see how pure and radiant is that happiness! But what need I say to you who have seen Diana?

During the two months that you have passed near us, nothing has troubled the serenity of our dear Schultz, and my hopes for him strengthen day by day. But autumn approaches—that season so terrible for poor, disordered brains—and the least accident may render worthless the progress we have so laboriously obtained. Shall I save him? Diana, who is in my confidence, has suggested to me that it would be desirable to induce him to live at the chateau during this dreaded season—thus I can be near him at night, and watch over him.

XXX.

THE victory is complete, William. Autumn has passed, and our grass is covered with frost. Schultz has not felt any weakness. As we had intended, I installed him in a room next to mine. I have told him that he watched over me more than I did over him; for, having remarked that I visited him by stealth at night to see if he slept, he glided two or three times into my room. "What is the matter?" said I, at the first visit he thus made me.

"I come to show you that I have great courage," said he.

Finally, I let him alone. Often I saw him softly approach my bed and listen to me breathing. I would not stir, but feigned sleep. . . . Always occupied with thoughts of me he forgets himself. Oh, if I cure Schultz, what an enchanted existence will mine be!

We are waiting your return, William. Diana is anxiously expecting you, and looks upon you as on a brother. What would she say if she knew that you and Sir George Ferry were one and the same!

XXXI.

Two blissful years have passed away. I have a son of eleven months, blonde, rosy—"an angel escaped from heaven."

"This child will be a scoffer, like his father," said Diana, tossing our baby up in her arms."

"I deny it," I said, energetically, "it is his mother whom he most resembles."

The child looked at us and entertained us with a long discourse in his enchanting baby language. Schultz gravely hazarded a philosophical reflection. A discussion ensued, and Mina took part against her husband. He immediately lowered his tone.

This memorable scene took place in the hall, an immense gallery, where are to be found many rare tapestries, precious specimens of art, etc.; it is at once a museum, a music hall and a library. Here we assemble each evening, and look out on the park where all is calm, mysterious and dreamy.

"What are you reading, my friend?" said Diana to me one day, seeing me absorbed in a voluminous manuscript.

"My letters to William during the last three years. I asked them of him—"

Diana threw an uneasy glance towards the Doctor. She knew that I was meditating a final test of the sane state of his mind. I wish, in order to confirm his faith in himself, to place before him the picture of his former misery. If he bear this, he is safe for the future.

However, at the moment of engaging in this last combat with his reason, I tremble. If he should fail? And, to measure, as it were, the peril before me, I run over the pages; but scarcely am I engaged in this reading before my imagination is seized with a strange idea. These forgotten scenes of my life appear under a peculiar aspect. I seem to be participating in some fantastic legend, invented by a diseased brain, and as I read on it produces the effect of a bad dream.

They are all silent around me. Surprised at this, I raise my head and find them looking at me with great emotion, and Diana in tears. Schultz and Mina are trembling; Bastien stands behind them, very pale. I understand it all.

"Stop, stop, facetious Doctor!" said I, smiling; "it is not you that was insane."

"What! you think that—" . . .

"Indeed, I think it was—myself! It is as clear as day."

"Bravo! bravo!" said he, "insanity is buried!"

"Yes, forever!" said I, laughingly. "My friend, let me embrace you."

And I drew to my heart this brave friend. Then, throwing myself on my knees to Diana, she tenderly caressed me.

"Angel!" said I to her, "my reason is—thyself! It is thy love!"

"Ah, then," said she, "it can never again be extinguished."

Now you see, my dear William, how I was saved through my heart. I loved—I was loved in return. I had a godmother. And thus ends my conte bleu.

THE END.

THE VICISSITUDES OF AN ACTOR.—At the recent dinner at the Freemasons' Tavern, on the occasion of the presentation to Mr. Webster of a testimonial in token of his valuable services as Master of the Dramatic College, he, in reply to the Chairman's complimentary speech, related several anecdotes connected with his career as an actor, among which was the following: "After being in great difficulties, I applied to Mr. Beverley, who was about to open the Croydon Theatre. He engaged me as leader of the band at a guinea a week. Had a storm of gold fallen on me, it could not have delighted 'Semele' more than me. I felt myself plucked out of the slough of despond. I had then to support, board myself, and to get out of debt. I resolved to walk to Croydon, ten miles, every day, to rehearsal, and back to Shoreditch, on twopence per day—one pennyworth of oatmeal and one pennyworth of milk—and I did it for six weeks, Sundays excepted, when I indulged in the luxury of shin of beef and ox cheek. The gentlemen in the gallery pelted one in the orchestra with mutton pies, and in this pitiless storm we shared, as the pages of our music books could testify. At first indignation was uppermost, but on reflection we made a virtue of necessity, and collecting the fragments of the not very light pastry, ate them under the stage, and, whatever they were made of, we considered them ambrosia. At the end of the sixth week I had so pleased Mr. Beverley and his son Harry that I was asked to give a specimen of my terpsichorean abilities in a sailor's hornpipe for the son's benefit, with a view to an engagement for 'Harlequin' at the new Queen's Theatre, Tottenham Court Road. I essayed the task, buoyed up with hope; dashed on the stage; got through the double-shuffle, the toe and heel, though feeling faint; but at last, despite every effort, I broke down from sheer exhaustion of strength consequent upon a near approach to starvation. The curtain dropped on me and my hopes, and I burst into an agony of tears. However, this mourning was soon turned to joy, for Mr. Beverley bade me cheer up, for he had seen enough to know what I could do; and he engaged me as walking gentleman and 'Harlequin' for his London Theatre, where I made my first appearance as 'Henry Morland,' in the Heir-at-Law. From the Tottenham-street Theatre I went to the English Opera, now the Lyceum; from there to Drury Lane, thence to the Haymarket; from there to Covent Garden, the Olympic, the Adelphi; and here I am, such as I am."

WONDERS OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE.—The construction of the English language must appear most formidable to a foreigner. One of them looking at a picture of a number of vessels, said: "See, what a flock of ships!" He was told that a flock of ships was called a fleet, but that a fleet of sheep was called a flock. And, it was added, for his guidance in mastering the intricacies of our language, that, "a flock of girls is called a bevy, that a bevy of wolves is called a pack, and a pack of thieves is called a gang, and a gang of angels is called a host, and a host of porpoises is called a shoal, and a shoal of buffalo is called a herd, and a herd of children is called a troop, and a troop of partridges is called a covey, and a covey of beauties is called a galaxy, and a galaxy of ruffians is called a horde, and a horde of rubbish is called a heap, and a heap of oxen is called a drove, and a drove of blackguards is called a mob, and a mob of whales is called a school, and a school of worshippers is called a congregation, and a congregation of engineers is called a corps, and a corps of robbers is called a band, and a band of locusts is called a swarm, and a swarm of people is called a crowd, and a crowd of gentlefolks is called élite, and the élite of the city's thieves and rascals called the scoughs, and the miscellaneous crowd of city folks is called the community or the public, according as they are spoken of by the religious community or secular public."

To the old man, there is in the heart of a rose or a violet the fragrant echo of scores of dead springs.

ADVENTURE IN SINGAPORE.

ALTHOUGH more than ten years have now elapsed since the incident I am now about to narrato took place, all the circumstances connected with it remain so vividly impressed upon my memory that I could almost imagine it was only yesterday that it occurred.

I had been practicing my profession some two years in Hongkong; but as my health was commencing to give way, I had been obliged to get rid of my practice and take my departure for Europe, where I intended to recruit myself by a year's sojourn in Italy. I left Hongkong about the middle of June, as a passenger on board the ship Constance, Capt. Johnson, bound for London. On our way down the China sea, we put into the island of Singapore for fresh provisions, and on account of some little business the captain had to transact there. Never having been much of a lover of salt water, I gladly took advantage of our stay to recruit myself a little on shore, feeling about as happy as a prisoner would do who had just obtained a short reprieve from the Bastile; enjoying my temporary freedom immensely, while I felt a dreadful loathing at the idea of again being cooped up on board my prison-ship. Having taken temporary quarters at one of the hotels, I dawdled my time away very pleasantly in that magnificent island, (which is really like a paradise on earth,) strolling about the town, wandering through the fragrant nutmeg groves or lying quietly in some shady nook in the English Cemetery, moodily dreaming of those who there lay taking their last rest in the shade of the beautiful cinnamon trees, and recalling to my mind those beautiful lines of Mrs. Hemans:

"They grew in beauty, side by side
They filled one home with glee;
Their graves are scattered far and wide,
By mountain stream and sea.

I very much wished to see something of the interior of this beautiful island; but Capt. Johnson, who was a surly "Jack-in-office," had frightened me out of it by curtly telling me that he should sail at any moment he got a fair wind, and that he would not wait an hour for anybody. Nevertheless, on the second morning of my being on shore, as there was not a breath of wind, and as two or three weather-wise individuals assured me that there would be none for the next twelve hours, I set off for a little excursion into the country, with a guide and a pair of horses, intending to get back by the afternoon. I had a very charming little jaunt through the most magnificent country I had ever seen; and so entranced was I by the luxuriant foliage and beautiful scenery, that the time slipped by without my knowing it, and it was quite dark before I got back to my hotel in the town. I was at once informed, upon my arrival, that the Constance had weighed anchor half an hour before, and was then standing out of the harbor with a light breeze, so that I had no time to lose if I wanted to overtake her. In Singapore the ships all lie about a mile from the shore, and the only boats in the place are flat-bottomed Chinese affairs called "sanpans," each manned by one Chinaman, who, standing up in the after-part of the boat with his face towards the prow, pulls, or rather pushes, two oars, and so propels the boat. These boatmen are the lowest caste coolies, very strong and muscular, and very low and degraded. They can make these "sanpans" go well, even very fast, if they wish to.

But to go on with my narrative. Having hurried to the beach, I picked out the strongest coolie I could find from the crowd who at once surrounded me, and jumping into his boat, I showed him a handful of gold, telling him to go "muchee quick," and that I would give him "muchee boxes." It was now quite dark, but the Constance was showing a light for my benefit, about three miles out in the bay, and as the breeze was still very light, I felt pretty confident of catching her before she got out to sea. After again urging on the Chinaman till he fairly made the boat fly, I quietly reclined in the fore part of the boat, keeping my eyes on the light shown by the Constance, while I dreamily enjoyed the fragrance of my cigar. We were making such good way that we soon passed the dark, shadowy hulls of the ships at anchor in the bay, and commenced to get well out in the wake of the Constance. How vividly that scene comes before me now! Behind me stood the tall, muscular coolie, his little goggle-eyes peering out into the darkness, one leg slightly advanced before the other, panting, and seemingly putting all his strength into the oars. Far behind in the distance was the gloomy and shadowy outline of the shipping at anchor, gradually growing less and less distinct, and far ahead of us on the dark horizon the glimmering light of the Constance now and then appearing. Here and there a star could be seen, but very few, as it was a dark night. I myself lay reclining in the boat's prow, lazily puffing my cigar, and wondering if Fate would ever again bring me to the shores of Singapore.

We had been flying through the water thus for about half an hour when I suddenly became aroused from my dreamy state, and conscious that something was wrong. The noise of the oars had suddenly ceased, and the boat was stopping; but before I could turn round to see what the matter was, I received a heavy blow upon my right shoulder, narrowly missing my head, from a heavy boat-hook in the hands of the coolie. The truth flashed through me that the coolie was going to murder and drown me for the sake of my watch and money. It could never be found out, as my friends in Singapore would think that I had reached the Constance safely, whilst the captain of that vessel, imagining that I had remained in Singapore, would trouble himself no more about me. The idea was horrible I sprang towards the coolie to grapple him, in doing which I received another severe blow on my left arm, for the time disabling it; but with my right arm I seized his throat with all my power, and endeavored to strangle him. At the same time he grappled me, and we both fell, upsetting the boat, and so were precipitated into the water. I still kept hold of his throat with my right arm, and, as we sank, locked in this deadly embrace, I managed to draw my knife with my left hand, which had a little recovered its numbness, and, by a desperate effort, essayed to stab him in the right side. As the knife went "home" his grasp released, and, kicking out my legs, I freed myself from his carcase and rose to the top, where, being an expert swimmer, I soon reached the overturned boat and got up on its bottom. I watched for the coolie for some time, but he rose no more. He had met a just fate.

How I passed that night, drifting away to sea on the bottom of the boat, and how I passed the next two days in the same position, without water and exposed to the burning rays of the sun, I know not. It now seems to me like a frightful nightmare—unreal. On the third day, I was picked up by the Alma, one of the P. & O. Company's English mail steamers, quite by chance, and I was very ill for a fortnight. But I got well again and continued my journey to Europe in the mail steamer, arriving in London in five weeks after I was picked up.

About two months after my arrival, the Constance came into port. I made a point of meeting her in the docks, where I treated myself to the pleasure of horsewhipping Capt. Johnson, through whom I so nearly lost my life. For this I paid five pounds the next day: and here I ought to give the English credit for these sort of things. They understand them thoroughly, and keep a regular scale, so that you can beforehand limit the extent of your horsewhipping accurately to the depth of your pocket. I also recovered from Capt. Johnson my passage-money—thereby, as he thought, adding insult to injury.

I have never been to Singapore since, nor do I think I shall ever go there again, as sometimes "I battuti pagano l'ammenda."

E. H. L. P.

MUSICAL AND DRAMATIC.

THE benefit of Miss Jennie Kempton at the Academy of Music, on Tuesday evening, on which occasion Martha was repeated, was a flattering success, and one that must have swelled the heart as well as the purse of the fair beneficiary. Maritana was given for the last time on Wednesday night. On the following evening The Bohemian Girl drew a full house. The principal roles were sustained by Miss Richings, Mr. Hill, Mr. Seguin and Mr. Peakes. "Thaddeus" (Mr. Hill) seemed to be suffering from a cold or over-exertion early in the performance, but, with praiseworthy energy, combatted his indisposition, and won an encore for his singing When the fair land of Poland, which he gave with exceeding spirit. There is always so much earnestness, good conception and conscientious effort about this gentleman's performance that any severe criticism of the quality of his voice is apt to be disarmed. Mr. Peakes improves, and "Devilshoof" is one of his best characters, both in dramatic and lyric effect. Miss Julia Gould, as the "Gipsey Queen," rendered her part with creditable taste. The prima donna, though evidently suffering from the incessant and arduous tax on her powers, looked exceedingly pretty in her coquettish costume, and sang with her usual grace and brilliancy of execution. On Friday night, Martha was repeated to a very good house. Indeed, this last week of the Opera seems to have waked the people up to an appreciation of what they were about to lose, and the attendance throughout has been large.

To-night, the farewell of the troupe, close of the season, first and last night of Don Pasquale, and benefit of Miss Caroline Richings. Any one of these events is occasion enough for a crowded house. We might reiterate the praises of our fair English soprano, or enter into a critical disquisition on the qualities of her voice, its excellences and defects, and so be beguiled into an article far beyond the limits of this column; but there seems to be no necessity for it. As we go to press every seat in the dress-circle and parquet is taken, and standing-places in the lobbies pre-empted. Before this practical exhibition of the popular taste, our commendation and good wishes become bashfully silent. The modest rosebud we fling is hidden in the shower of bouquets that fall at the feet of the fair cantatrice.

On Wednesday next, a season of six nights of comedy will be commenced at this house by Mr. Peter Richings and his daughter, assisted by an excellent company. This is at the request of many of our citizens, who are anxious to see Mr. Richings again in those famous characters which rendered him their popular favorite in older communities and in older times. Without being too sanguine, we may safely predict full houses and appreciative audiences for this worthy actor and his accomplished daughter.

At Maguire's Opera House, the novelty of an original dramatic version of Three Times Dead, one of Miss Braddon's live novels, will be produced this afternoon and evening. The company will have enough to do, as the rapid action and numerous characters of the novel will require an ingenious display of dovetailing and double acting to carry the drama through, or else Manager Maguire will have to conscript all the available dramatic force of the town. The story has many points that should make a live and vigorous play. There is a kaleidoscopic quality about the characters—changing and shifting around from England to France, and back to England again, interwoven with rapidly-changing plot and counter-plot, and new and startling developments. It has more action and characters than Aurora Floyd, and should make a better adaptation for the stage. The leading characters have fallen into good hands, and if the dramatist has done his part judiciously, it will make a sensational and interesting play.

Mr. J. H. Warwick, an old California actor, and an ex-member of the Legislature, has been playing a round of morally instructive characters, in morally instructive pieces, and in the old morally instructive way, to moderately good houses, during the week. A new local piece entitled Assessments has been played as the afterpiece. Not having seen this piece, owing to the late hour of its appearance, we are unable even to give an idea of its plot, beyond its suggestive title.

At the Eureka Ministrel Hall, Abecco, Birch and Coes, the A B C sharps of minstrelsy, aided by Wambold, Backus, Martin Simonsen and lady and the other members of the company, are drawing good audiences, and from appearances will have no occasion to change their bass for months to come. We always like to drop in at the Minstrels, for we are sure to find a cheerful audience, who, like Swimley's boarders, always appear "happy and content"—an audience enlivened by many fair faces and many a silvery laugh.

The Circus is positively great in its success. Manager Wilson has such a strong company that he presents almost an entire new programme every night, and keeps it up, too; an endless variety of acrobatic feats, tricks, vaulting, posturing and juggling, The jugglery of the political world hardly compares with it, and the Great Circus gathers more people, nightly, under its immense tent than any of the political aspirants are able to congregate in the Plaza or on Montgomery street. They are all sound on the Circus platform, however, and intend to stick by it. There will be an afternoon performance to-day, and an extra good entertainment by the whole company, with a foot-race and prize gifts, when Manager Wilson will hold the reins, and of course will expect all his friends to rally round the ring. Two $50 silk dresses, or the coin to buy them if preferred, and ten other prizes, will be given to the lucky holders of the prize tickets.

The Museum has been a fixed institution of the city, and attracts its full proportion of the wonder-seekers. Among the big features there at present is Murphy, the Irish Giant, who is a bigger man than McClellan, or Lincoln either, by a foot or two—and that last is saying a great deal; the Albino Children; the great Snake Charmer, who handles poisonous rattlesnakes and copperheads by the dozen, and takes them to his bosom with surprising complacency. As he runs the risk of their turning on him and stinging him to death some day, perhaps there is a moral in the latter feat which the reader might apply.

DE BALZAC'S SELFISHNESS.—M. Sainte Beuve, in his last article on De Balzac, relates the following: "I remember some interesting revelations which I heard made one day about his strange pre-occupations and his author's selfishness while he was composing. How many times did De Balzac come in the middle of the night to Jules Sandeau's bed, while the latter was asleep, when they were both living under the same roof! He would startle him from sleep without the least pity, to show and to read to him dare dare that which he had just produced, all smoking and all hot. For he lived in his work as in Vulcan's cave, where he forged and hammered blow after blow on the anvil, and during all this time the outside world had no existence for him. If you spoke to him of your mother or of your sister, he would say, 'Very well, very well! but let us revert to realities; let us consider what shall we do with Nucingen and with the Duchess De Langeais.' He had reversed life; realities had become dreams to him. One day Jules Sandeau returned from his native town, where he had met with a painful loss by the death of a sister, when De Balzac met him, and, after a few questions about his family, abruptly said to him, as if he remembered what he was saying 'Come, come! enough of that sort of chat; let us go back to serious things.' He alluded to some new work he had on hand, Le Père Goriot, I believe."

THE "LOVELY MAZEPPA" BUSINESS.—The Lovely Mazeppas will very likely be among the principal star attractions next season. Ever since Adah Isaacs Menken started the bare-back, untamed business on her "fiery steed," that species of attraction has been on the increase. It is possible that a fresh sensation may be added to the repertoire of the Mazeppa ladies for the next campaign, as a new play called "Lady Godiva" has recently been written, copies of which are for sale by Mad. Macarte in our advertising department. If "Lady Godiva" is at all like the original, it will prove an immense go. Adah Isaacs Menken will probably soon astonish the British by her Mazeppa show, while her handsome face and beautiful form will excite the admiration of the men and the envy of the ladies in the great country where the good Queen Vic. reigns with such popularity. The lovely Menken will no doubt be the cause of many duels among her admirers in the metropolis. Boucicault, it is said, has the management of the Menken and her terrible steed, and will trot them both out at the proper time. We hear, also, that Kate Vance thinks of visiting England in the fall. While Adah and Kate are catering and capering for the amusement of John Bull, Leo Hudson, Kate Fisher, Oceana and Addie Andersou will sustain the Mazeppa business for the edification and gratification of Brother Jonathan. In addition to the Mazeppa drama, those ladies have a large number of other equestrian pieces in which to display themselves.—New York paper.

SOME men are so far-sighted, they look through and beyond objects, and swear they are not.

THE ABBEY BRIDGE.

ALTHOUGH it is quite possible that if the time should ever arrive when my friends find it necessary to prove that I am incapable of managing my own affairs—and it may be adduced as strong presumptive evidence of insanity—I must confess to a great weakness for locomotive engines. Let me strengthen the testimony by confessing, in fact, that this weakness extends to railways and all their belongings.

Of course, my readers must understand that I am no way professionally connected with locomotives. The weakness—if it is a weakness—is not that of professional enthusiasm. Roughly speaking, indeed, it can be reduced to two distinct hallucinations, which I here take the opportunity of submitting to Dr. Forbes Winslow and the rest of them for their consideration. First, that I have discovered poetry where others see only the effect of boiling water; and, second, that Smith, the engine-driver, as well as being oily, is in my eyes encircled by a halo of romance. Shall I (in anticipation of the inquiry above alluded to) plead my excuse for thus flying in the face of popular opinion? Shall I refer to that perfectly-legitimate type of poetic locomotion, the British stage-coach, and contrast it with the ferruginous machine of the present day, which, though pregnant with poetic associations to myself, others scarcely ever take the trouble to look at, and which is simply and austerely numbered 69? Going one step further, dare I bring Smith, the driver, as I see him standing upon the foot-plate of No. 69, leisurely attempting to remove the surplus oil from his black hands with a very suspicious piece of "waste," into contrast for one moment with the time-honored stage-coachman—with the man who, "wearing a broad-brimmed, low-crowned hat, a huge roll of colored handkerchief about his neck, knowingly knotted and tucked in at the bosom . . . . enjoys great consequence and consideration along the road; has frequent conferences with the village house-wives, who look upon him as a man of great trust and dependence . . . . who, when he dismounts, is generally surrounded by an admiring throng of hostlers, stable-boys, shoe-blacks, and those numberless hangers-on that infest inns and taverns, and run errands;" and, who, according to the author I quote, "look up to him as an oracle, treasure up his cant phrases, echo his opinion about horses and other topics of jockey-lore, and endeavor to imitate his air and carriage?"

Well, I have sufficient candor to make the comparison, and yet I must be allowed to reassert my prejudice in favor of Smith, the oily driver. The delusion, you see, is deep-seated, and the popular idea is not my idea. After this confession, then, the reader will more redily understand what it was that took me night after night, when I lived at Hindlesham, and at a time, too, when all sane people were asleep, to the Abbey Bridge; for the Abbey Bridge carried the Great North and South-western Railway over the river Swirl, and the Great North and South-western express train hurtled along this bridge every night at 11:30, or thereabouts, at its very highest speed.

It was a grand sight to witness this midnight passage of the express. But first of all, let me endeavor to describe the Abbey Bridge. Not that, in itself, it merits description, for it was in truth a very prosaic, utilitarian bridge, indeed—a mere flat table of a bridge, unadorned by parapet or battlement, unless a narrow rim of iron, raised about a foot from the surface on each side, and sloping towards the outer edge, could be dignified by that title, ruled by the accustomed four parallel lines of rail, and covered as to the rest of its surface with a layer of the accustomed cinders.

As its situation, however, redeemed it from being utterly contemptible, I should like to say a word or two about that. Resting, then, at each extremity upon the natural rock, the bridge itself hung above the surface of the water at a height of some eighty feet, and, viewed from beneath, looked, I must confess, but a fearfully frail structure to bear the trains safely over that seething, impetuous river; for the Swirl, in this part of its course, was impatient of confinement. Higher up, where it washed the "Haugh" land of the ruined abbey, it flowed wide and shallow, and dallied in little backwaters amongst the pebbles; but here it was bound in a rocky channel, which brooked no delay. There was nothing for it but a headlong rush through the region of those inexorable rocks, and the Swirl went at it with a will. Even here, however, the cliffs were not so stony-hearted but that they could afford, in narrow ledges here and there, precarious harbor for stunted birch, and heather-tufts, and clumps of blaeberry and brackeu, which did their best to soften the asperities of their rugged features. Which did their best, I say. But for all that, a look down from the dizzy height of the bridge upon the rugged, precipitous sides of these cruel rocks, down to where the black current of the river—flecked here and there with little bergs of foam—eddied and chafed in its narrow channel, now driven here, now there, by the great angular boulders, which, fallen from the parent rock, protruded their jagged points above the stream—was no very pleasant sight; least of all, for timid folk who gazed at it from the windows of the Great North and Southwestern carriages.

To the Hindlesham people, however, it was a favorite resort; and a much-frequented pathway led from the town to the bridge, passing on its way the ruins of the abbey, from which the latter derived its name—a pleasant, shady pathway, now down by the margin of the river, now high above it, but ever within sound of the rushing water, and ever enlivened by the sweet companionship of the garrulous Swirl.

It was where a low stone-wall only divided this path from the railway, and close upon the eastern end of the bridge itself, that my—well, if you like—my "eccentricity" took me night after night to watch for the night-express. I have reason to remember the place well. Standing there, and facing the railway, I remember that the line stretched away towards the left hand for a distance of some quarter of a mile, until it disappeared in a gentle curve in the wood. To the right, after crossing the Abbey Bridge, it continued a straight course towards Hindlesham.

The night-express being an "up"-train, approached from the left, its great cyclopean eye first lighting up the wood as it rounded the curve of which I have spoken above. But I could feel its approach long before it reached that point—feel it by some mysterious premonitions, which I should endeavor now in vain to describe, but which were well known to me then. It might have been by an almost imperceptible shudder of the air or earth, by a weird whisper in the trees (they had a presentiment of its coming, I know,) or by the hush which follow when nature seemed to hold her breath in expectation of the great rush and brattle which was soon to jar upon the stillness of the night, that I was thus forewarned. It might have been —— But why attempt to describe what is in itself indescribable.

And then it came—a fearful, fiery avalanche, sweeping through the silent night! irresistible, inexorable, scattering great white hot ashes in its path, an embodiment of ruthless swiftness and strength! Obedient to the touch of a child, and rushing on its midnight course with the strength of a thousand giants! divided from destruction by a tiny flange, and courting a fate too terrible to think of in its terrific flight! Truly as poetic an embodiment, O gentle reader, as the "Highflyer" or the "True Briton;" surely guided by a man a little more intelligent, and quite as poetic as the coachman whose leading characteristics I have touched upon above.

My business in Hindlesham had long precluded me from midnight walks, when I was unexpectedly brought back once more to my old post at the Abbey Bridge in this wise. A very dear friend who was passing through Hindlesham by the night-express, wrote to ask me to meet her at the station. Now, my correspondent was not aware that that particular train did not stop at Hindlesham, and it was too late, on the very day of her passing when I received her letter, to rectify her mistake. For all that day, however, I could not get the night-express out of my head; it haunted me the whole day long; mixed itself up in the most perplexing manner with the very important case of Regina and Higginbotham, upon which I was then engaged, and finally scattered all thoughts of work to the winds. This being the case, it was not surprising that I should find myself, at about eleven P. M., at the Abbey Bridge.

The night, I remember, was dark, though not so dark but that I could distinguish the outline of the trees and the tall, gaunt telegraph-posts, filing singly like spectres through the gloom. It was the darkness, in fact, of a summer-night.

Leaning upon the low stone-wall which I have spoken of as separating the path from the railway, I had—in harmony with the sweet tranquility of the night—fallen into a very pleasant reverie, in which the young lady then approaching in the night-express was not the least conspicuous feature, when I was somewhat astonished by the sound of footsteps upon the bridge. This was, I knew, an unusual circumstance at that time of night, and I waited with some curiosity to see who the late traveller might be. As I turned my head to listen, the footsteps ceased, but only for a moment, When they broke upon my ear again, however, I fancied that they were accompanied by a sound as of something being dragged over the loose cinders of the bridge. "It is some platelayer," I said to myself, "returning late from work, or who possibly has been despatched to attend to some necessary repair upon the line;" and I fell back again, not reluctantly, to the interrupted reverie, with the thousand pleasant thoughts which grouped themselves round the central figure—the young passenger of the night-express. A very pleasant dream it was, which, floating there as an indistinct, undefined melody in my young mind, has proved, thank Heaven, to have been the prelude to a fuller harmony—the key-note to a more perfect joy.

I cannot say how long I had been thus pleasantly occupied; I suppose, from what afterwards occurred, that it could not have been for any length of time. All that I remember is, that in one instant, without warning, without preparation of any sort, all the blood in my body was turned to sudden ice.

"Get over the wall, sir—get over the wall," said a voice in my very ear, "and you'll have a better view. By the Lord Harry, sir, it'll be a sensation header. Real water, and, by jingo, real rocks. Ha, ha! Come along, come along, or we shall miss it. The Colleen Bawn's a joke to it. Do you hear, sir? It'll beat the Peep 'o Day Boy to fits—ha, ha! fits—fits."

I was almost paralysed with horror. Having heard no footsteps, and wrapped in the dreamy cloudland of my speculation, the voice broke upon me as though the dead had spoken. The full horror of the situation, however, did not burst upon my mind at once. A glance, indeed, was sufficient to show me that a madman was before me—a madman who, as I gathered from his incoherent words, had doomed the coming train (with what intensity I felt then that it was freighted with all that I held dear on earth!) to a fate too terrible to think of. The diabolical ingenuity which he had employed, however, for his purpose, was happily then unknown to me; had I seen that, I should have almost despaired.

For one moment I doubted how to act; for one moment my thoughts failed to suggest any course of action, in the next I had formed an indefinite plan.

"Well," I said, turning so as to face the man, "but how are you to do it?"

"Ha, ha! do it!" he replied, "come and see, come and see. But I say," he went on, a momentary flash of suspicion coming across his mind, "you won't—won't tell anybody, will you?" and he peered into my face with a madman's cunning.

"Pooh! tell anybody!" I said, endeavoring to force a laugh; "who'd tell such a joke as that! I wouldn't whisper it; that is, if you'll let me see how the scenery's managed; where the trap is, you know, eh!"

"Oh, the trap," he replied, with a momentary recurrence of suspicion; "it's behind the scenes, you know;" and he laughed again, a hollow maniac laugh, which made night hideous.

I was over the wall by this time, and we were walking together towards the bridge. A very few yards brought us to the spot where the wretched man had been at work. Ay! there it was, as I had dreaded; a heavy balk of timber bound fast upon the rail with cord—bound with an intricacy and cunning which a madman only would have thought it necessary to use. How my heart sank within me as I saw it, for I knew that the night-express might reach the spot at any moment; I knew that it was at that instant hurrying on its way to meet the hideous fate which this wretched man had prepared for it, and the thought almost deprived me of the power of action. To use force, I had sense enough to know, would be dangerous, for a glance showed me that the madman was a strongly-built, powerful man, and I was aware that any madman is terrible in his strength. At this moment an expedient occurred to me which afforded some hope.

"Good Heavens!" I said to the man, "you've put the trap on the wrong line. You'll spoil all. Quick! off with it—it's all wrong—wrong," I almost shouted in my anxiety.

To my inexpressible relief, the madman seized the idea. Once possessed with it, he was down upon his hands and knees in an instant, endeavoring to carry my suggestion into effect.

With what terrible anxiety I watched the cord unwound! How slowly the coils loosened beneath the fingers of the wretched man, eager and anxious as he was! How I trembled as now and then a knot or intricacy of the cord impeded the work! How my heart ceased its pulsation, as ever and anon he would pause in his work to laugh a horrid laugh, and mutter inarticulately about a "jolly header!" But the wretched man was earnest in the task; "Spoil all, spoil all," he continued to mutter; "of course it would; why one would think I was mad not to have seen that!" and then he fell again eagerly to the removal of the obstruction.

And all this time I listened with an intensity which I cannot describe for any evidence of the coming train; but still no sound broke the stillness of the summer-night to tell of its approach. I heard the river fretting in its narrow channel eighty feet below. The distant chime of Hindlesham Church clock was borne to my ear faintly on the breeze, as it struck the quarter past the hour—the quarter past! then the express was due! I started; the madman even started to his feet, when the long whoop of an owl broke shrill and loud upon the startled ear of night; but still no sign of the night-express.

I began to breathe more freely as I urged him to his work. All might be well yet, I thought; when hark! the shudder in the air, the weird whisper in the trees, the thousand signs I knew so well, and the quick pulsation of the coming train reached my ear.

"Quick, quick!" I said, bending over the madman at his work—"quick, we shall miss it all;" but he laughed loud at my anxiety. He, too, had heard the train. "Hurrah!" he shouted, "she's coming—coming, the fiery devil's coming; and now on to the bridge—on to the bridge to see the header!" and the poor maniac left his work unfinished, and hastened on to the centre of the Abbey Bridge.

To seize the block of wood, was with me the work of an instant, and, to my inexpressible relief, I found it loose. I was not one moment too soon. Before I could remove the ponderous timber, indeed, the buffer of the engine caught it from my hand, and hurled it far into the night.

And not it alone! High above the noise and brattle of the passing train, I could distinguish the death-shriek of the poor maniac.

The fate which he in his madness had destined for the night-express had met him on the Abbey Bridge.

* * * * * * * * *

"Put a postscript in for me, dear. (It is my wife who speaks to me as I write.) Say that, though I shall be sorry if they think my husband mad, I am very, very thankful that his discovery of poetry in the locomotive took him one night to the Abbey Bridge at Hindlesham."—Chambers's Journal.

AFTER PRIVATE THEATRICALS.—Only Amateur Theatricals are now the vogue. The following remarks may be prettily made by any member or members of the delighted audience at the conclusion of any private performance:

No. 1. "You must be very tired after all your exertions."—"Well, to tell you the truth, I am rather," says Mr. Pipps, candidly, who has, by his own particular desire, played the chief character in three pieces.

His tone is that of a martyr to the amusement of society.

No. 2. "Oh, Mr. Symper, how could you make yourself so hideous? I'm sure I should never have known you."—Mr. Symper smiles feebly at this delicate flattery, and takes much credit to himself as an artiste. He has paid particular attention to his evening dress and general personal appearance, so that he may in no way be identified with the ruffian whom he has been impersonating.

No. 3. "It really went off admirably. I must congratulate you on your success."—Mr. Mivins looks foolish, and tries to persuade himself that his first appearance has not been such a failure after all.

No. 4. "What a beautiful dress that was! Where did you get it from?"—Mrs. Thaylyre would have preferred a complimentary remark upon her acting; but answers graciously, giving the name of the costumier.

No. 5. "Oh you made us laugh so! I was quite afraid that you would hear me!"—The distinguished Amateur, who has been playing the low comedian's part in a farce, inwardly wishes that the audience had laughed a little louder.

No, 6. "I've seen all those pieces played by professionals. I saw Charles Mathews play your part in the first piece, and I must say——" —"Ah, of course, you oughtn't to compare the two," says Amateur, deprecating stern criticism; howbeit he is of opinion that but for conventional prejudice he is not much behind that admirable comedian.

No, 7. "You must have played very often, Mr. Noodle," observes an amiable lady, with the sweetest smile. "You seemed so much at your ease on the stage."—Mr Noodle, who has made his entrance apparently through a wall instead of a door and has invariably found himself behind the person on the stage who was speaking to him, is, of course, delighted to hear it.

No. 8. "That wonderful look that you gave! I can't make out how you can do it!"—As the gentleman can't explain the matter satisfactorily himself, he merely sniggers, examines the carpet-pattern, and twiddles a couple of shillings in his waistcoat pocket.

No. 9. "How very well Mr. So and So, played," says some pleasant young lady, knowing that this remark is so peculiarly acceptable to a brother Amateur.—"Yes, oh yes, very well indeed," replies brother Amateur. Of course, this is a most hearty and honest opinion, and, equally, of course, he doesn't say to another brother Amateur that "he didn't think much of So and So's playing in that piece, did he, eh?"

These few suggestions for Drawing-room Conversations will, we feel sure, tend to promote such charitable sentiments as it is ever our object to implant in the large heart of existing Society.—Punch.

RAIN AND UMBRELLAS.

EDUCATED in the precepts of Say, of Malthus, and of Smith, initiated into the secrets of the most celebrated economists, the French officer sees every minute his theories of government overturned by powerful causes which clash against and destroy his best-laid plans.

Men always praise the Spartan and his black broth, Aristides and his poverty, Cincinnatus and his garden. All that is doubtless very fine; but if the most frugal Spartan had been garrisoned at Tours or at Saumur, he could not have resisted the attractions of an agreeable evening party or of a good supper; if Aristides in place of his modest tunic had been obliged to wear the dress of Schwartz or of Triboust, his poverty, noble as it was, might have brought him to Sainte-Pelagie; and even good Cincinnatus, if he had lived at the present day, would have listened to the offers of the Roman Senate, and preferred the prose of an easy carriage to the poetry of his plough.

I made these reflections while I concealed myself in my cloak, weighed down by the torrents of rain which beat upon me on every side. Being obliged to glide along the houses in order to escape the flow of a large stream which rolled into the street, I received in the corners of my hat, and felt trickle on my shoulders, the muddy current which washed the roofs and gutters.

Around me flitted to and fro, like fantastic apparitions, umbrellas of all forms and colors—the large green family umbrella, stretching out its long arms; the coquettish brown umbrella of the young woman, with whalebones modestly curved; the ancient umbrella of the house-keeper; the yellowish umbrella, tattered like an old tri-colored flag; the mystic umbrella of the devotee; the skeleton-like umbrella, without cover and without supports; the presumptuous and flaunting umbrella of the young clerk which tears in passing the feeble umbrella of the tenant; the shrivelled, patched, and re-turned umbrella; in short, there were no umbrellas which did not let fall on the way their cold tears on my head and face.

"And why," cried I, "should not an officer have an umbrella? Usage alone compels him foolishly to brave the moisture of the atmosphere; for I do not know a single regulation which has proscribed the simple shield which the citizen holds over his head."

It is, then, to usage—I should rather say to prejudice—that an officer sacrifices his dress and his health. * * * And why is it? We can preserve our stockings by covering them with boots; good gloves, well lined, may spread a comfortable glow over our hands; a woolen vest may softly press upon our bodies; a wig or a toupet may cover our heads and console us in our forlorn state; and yet we may not defend our hats from the storm, but may see them disfigured and lose forever their delicate contour; our epaulets may turn pale, our clothing may be wrinkled by the biting of the rain. But it is no longer any thing but barbarism and a folly.

An humble citizen, whose old clothes all together are barely worth an old pair of epaulets, walks gravely along under his dome of taffeta; and shall we, who scatter everywhere our yearly income, blush to shelter ourselves under the wings of an umbrella?

This is the old homage which the self-love of the soldier yields to the broken-down customs of a not very remote period, when external forms were honored; and it is hardly worthy of young military France thus to sacrifice itself to traditional prejudices

Officers under the old system had umbrellas and tents; but the Revolution did away with tents, and on the march to Kaiser-Lauterns Hoche made the Army of the Moselle throw to the wind their temporary shelter-tents. With the tents, swept away by ridicule, disappeared also the harmless umbrellas. The umbrella, off-spring of the tent, was in its turn despised by the soldier, who connected the idea of sybaritism with a most simple and most natural act—that of preserving oneself from injury.

The English officers are wiser than we: they put in one bundle a sword, a parasol, and an umbrella; and yet no gentleman thought of doubting the courage of the companions of Wellington. On this point let us be English; let us arm ourselves with umbrellas, and remember that we are permeable citizens, as well as soldiers.

"It is all over with France," some old soldier will cry out, "if officers adopt the umbrella! I have encamped without tents, having marched bare-headed under the scorching sun of Spain and through the wet marshes of Holland; and I have returned covered with laurels and rheumatism. Imitate me."

Alas! we cannot imitate you, glorious relic of a great empire; but if our country calls, be sure we will put our old umbrellas in their cases, and will depart bare-headed and without tents, and will march cheerfully from North to South, from East to West; but, since the Holy Alliance gives some peace to the people, let us have our umbrellas.

Otherwise, it needs as much courage for an officer to protect himself with an old umbrella in the midst of one of our gibing cities, as to go without tents on the fields laid waste by war. What is there, in short, more terrible than ridicule? What army in France can be compared with it? and what men are bold enough to brave it?

Be assured, these officers covered with umbrellas have a bold spirit; and they would display their bravery sword in hand in the face of the enemy, as they now display it before happy grocers under the cloth balloon of an old umbrella.

The cloak is, doubtless, a useful garment; but its principal part is to combat the cold; and if it is used as a shield against rain, it should be only on a journey or on rare occasions. Besides, the cloak is a bitter enemy of the epaulet; it binds it in a horrible manner; it twists it, tarnishes and breaks it so badly and so often that the poor thing can never regain its former comeliness. But the greatest inconvenience of the cloak is the forlorn state in which it leaves the unhappy hat, the most marked and most distinguishing ornament of an officer.

We judge of women by seeing their gloves and stockings alone—of an officer by his hat, by his head-dress. In fact, the accountant, the officer of a company, the gambler, the lover, the lounger, the school-master, the navy, all have hats which differ from each other in shape and position. The vulgar do not always know the intimate relations which exist between the curves of these head-dresses, the direction of the corners, or visors, &c., &c. But the practised eye of the soldier cannot be deceived; and I know a goodly number of expert military men who would say to an officer, "Show me your hat, and I will tell you who you are." Has Europe forgotten the magic little hat of the Emperor?* Has not America sent us her bolivars, her quirogas? Has not Spain hurled beyond the Pyrenees her historic coiffures? Then, too, the many-shaped cap of the Italian harlequin, that moral father of Mayeux and of Robert Macaire—does it not prove that hat is the man? What misery, then, is it to feel large drops of rain falling on one's hat, of seeing it sink in little by little, then change its character and take, in puckering, odd and ridiculous shapes! When one is exposed to the inclemency of the rain, he is tempted to seek refuge under the hospitable roof of some passing umbrella and to intrust himself to the convoy of some sly grisette.

The most savage hordes and the most civilized societies alike have never refused their soldiers the right of protecting themselves from the violence of the wind and the seasons. In the New World the Spaniards found the Americans armed with bows and arrows, and parasols made of the skins of wild beasts, imitated afterwards by the solitary Robinson Crusoe. The Roman soldiers protected their heads with helmets of metal, and still further with bits of leather put together to make a covering; and they called this defensive armor galea. Virgil, speaking of the Macedonian laborer who will some day find upon the battlefield of Philippi javelins eaten with rust, adds that his rake will also strike against the galeas:

"Aut gravibus rastris galeas pulsabit inanes."

The helmets of the barbarians who overthrew the Roman Empire were surmounted with light umbrellas in the form of wings and horns. All the nations of antiquity went even farther, and, not content with preserving themselves from the rain, kept a comfortable moisture on their shoulders and ears by putting under their helmets caps of wool or of felt, or, still better, by lining their head-pieces with sponges, or some other elastic and soft material.

Let us not, then, be more Roman than the Romans; let us act like the warriors of the old republic, who knew how to be soldiers on the battle-field and citizens in the forum; let us put on the cuirass before the enemy, but during our holidays let us dress ourselves in the ample robe of the Athenian.

The Middle Ages, chivalrous as they were, had also their instruments of war, their helmets and their breast-plates; but they did not despise, in the delights of peace, the soft hood, and the light cap with its floating plume, the velvet corset with its loose knots, and the open-work collar. * * *

When the battle-cry sounded, the knight cast off the fine clothes of the chateau; and it was the hand of his mistress which armed him for the war. "With her delicate white hands the lady began to tie and fasten the cords and straps. But think how patiently the knight submitted to this favor; he could not have wished already to have won the victory, because he would have lost that sweet mark of intimacy from her on whom he lived."† Let us conspire, then; let us conspire against prejudice. Let us adopt the umbrella; let us adopt the surtout in the great garrison towns, at Metz, at Strasbourg, at Lyons; but let myraids of military umbrellas circulate before the decorated warriors of the Empire, and, if puns chance to rain upon us, let us open our umbrellas and be philosophers.—Translated from "Esquisses Historiques de l'Armée Francaise."

*Napoleon I.
†Romance of Don Florès de Grecce.

Two National Academies.—Senator Sumner has introduced a bill in Congress "to incorporate the National Academy of Literature and Art, and also to incorporate the National Academy of Moral and Political Sciences," which reads as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That S. Austin Allibone, Pennsylvania; William C. Bryant, New York; Frederick E. Church, New York: George W. Curtis, New York; Richard H. Dana, Massachusetts; John S. Dwight, Massachusetts; Ralph W. Emerson, Massachusetts; Fitz-Greene Halleck, Connecticut; Oliver W. Holmes, Massachusetts; Henry W. Longfellow, Massachusetts; James R. Lowell, Massachusetts; Geo. P. Marsh, Vermont; Hiram Powers, Ohio; William W. Story, Massachusetts; Henry T. Tuckerman, New York; Gulian C. Verplauck, New York; William D. Whitney, Connecticut; John G. Whittier, Massachusetts; Joseph E. Worcester, Massachusetts, their associates and successors duly chosen, are hereby declared to be a body corporate for the study and cultivation of the ancient and modern languages, letters, and the fine arts, by the name of the National Academy of Literature and Art.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That George Bancroft, New York; Henry Ward Beecher, New York; Horace Bineney, Pennsylvania; Robert J. Breckenridge, Kentucky: Edward Everett, Massachusetts; Thomas Ewing, Ohio; Henry W. Halleck, Army of the United States, California; Samuel G. Howe, Massachusetts; Charles King, New York; Francis Lieber, New York; J. Lothrop Motley, Massachusetts; John G. Palfrey, Massachusetts; Wendell Phillips, Massachusetts; Alonzo Potter, Pennsylvania; Josiah Quincy, Massachusetts; Henry B. Smith, New York; Jared Sparks, Massachusetts; Robert J. Walker, District of Columbia; Francis Wayland, Rhode Island; Theodore D. Woolsey, Connecticut, their associates and successors duly chosen, are hereby declared to be a body corporate for the study and cultivation of history and the sciences which concern morals and government, by the name of the National Academy of Moral and Political Science.

Mary E. Wise, a female private of the 34th Indiana, Volunteers, presented herself at the Paymaster-General's office recently, and drew her pay for two years of military service. She was in numerous engagements in the West, and had been wounded three times, the last at Lookout Mountain by a ball in the shoulder. She was then dressed in male attire, and was conveyed from the battle-field to the hospital. On the Surgeon coming round to dress her wound, her sex was discovered, and she was mustered out of service.

THE CUCKOO.

[The earliest English song, "with or without musical notes" is written in praise of the cuckoo. Ritson refers it to about the year 1250, while Sir John Hawkins gives it to the middle of the fifteenth century.]

Sumer is icumen in
Lhude sing cuccu.
Groweth sed and bloweth med
And springth the wde nu
Sing cuccu.

Awe bleteth after lomb.
Lhouth after calue cu.
Bullue sterteth, bucke uerteth
Murie sing cuccu.
Cuccu cuccu.

Wel sings thu cuccu
Ne swik ye nauer nu.
Sing cuccu nu, sing cuccu.
Sing cuccu, sing cuccu nu.

THE THREE CORPSES.

THIS is no old wife's story, say the people of St. Suliac; it is a true history, and the facts occurred before the lamentable days of '93.

Four or five young men of the bourg of St. Suliac, returning from of the neighboring villages, passed, between eleven and twelve o'clock at night, through the graveyard. They had advanced but a few steps, when they perceived before the reliquary three women kneeling in prayer; they approached the women, advising them to accompany them home. In vain; the devotes remained motionless, not even turning their heads. Their silent immobility made the young men feel a little uneasy.

"They are mortes (dead women) boys; let us pass on," said the most religious of the band, crossing himself.

"Not a bit of it!" said another. "Women never made me fly yet; dead or alive I'll see them nearer. Let he who loves me follow me!" So saying, he advanced towards the kneeling group.

"Don't go, Archange," remonstrated his companions; leave the women alone; they are not, perhaps, what they appear, and if you trouble them you may come to grief."

But Archange, without respect for the place or heed for the counsels of his friends, advanced to where the women still knelt, and addressed some words to them. Receiving no answer, he snatched off the coiffe of one of the women, and returned to display it to his comrades.

"What have you done?" they exclaimed. "Suppose she comes to reclaim her coiffe?"

"I'll give it her back, but not without a kiss, for she appeared to be very pretty."

"Pretty or ugly, it is a great shame for a fellow to take off a woman's cap like that."

The young men separated; and Archange went home, put the coiffe in his cupboard, and went to bed and to sleep without thinking any more of the matter.

But the next morning on opening the cupboard, what a sight met his eyes! He started back with a cry that brought all the family around him: in the place where he had put the coiffe lay a skull.

Archange, too terrified to touch the dreadful object, shut up the cupboard, and went forthwith to confession.

"My son," said the priest, "your sin is great, but, thanks to repentance, it may yet be repaired. At midnight the skull will again become a coiffe; take it without fear, but piously and solemnly, and place it on the head of the dead woman whose repose you have troubled. But before doing this you must get some neighbor to entrust to you a young child at the breast; you must carry it in your arms, and do not let it go for an instant either on your way to the churchyard, when you are near the dead women, nor even on your way home. Go now, and do never again trouble the rest of the dead."

At midnight the young man opened the cupboard, the skull had disappeared, and there lay the coiffe. He took it with a shudder and proceeded to the cemetery, carrying in his arms a little baby which his sister had entrusted to him. There were the three dead women; gently he advanced to the bare-headed one, and reverently placed on her head the coiffe he had taken from her the previous night.

At that moment she sprang up and gave him such a sounding box on the ear that he remained half stunned; then the three disappeared with these words:

"Imprudent youth, thou art lucky to have counsel of one wiser than thyself; had it not been for the angel thou bearest in thy arms, to night thou wouldst have slept with us in the tomb where we have slept a hundred years"

From that night Archange never entered the churchyard save on his way to church: and his companions and the rest of the young men imitate his respect for the dead.

A Heartless Lovelace.—Talking of Lovelaces, there was a rather amusing story of my old friend, Dan McKinnon, of the Guards. He was very good-looking, and a great favorite with the fair sex; and, at the time of which I speak, many, many years ago, he was beloved by a Miss C.; and ill-natured people say that they "loved not wisely, but too well." Unfortunately, people do not fall simultaneously out of love as they do into it, and, as generally occurs, the lady proved the most faithful of the pair. When Miss C. could no longer doubt that she was forsaken, and that some more fortunate rival had taken her place, she wrote a letter full of despair and reproaches, with threats of suicide, commanding McKinnon to send her back the lock of hair which she had given him in happier days, etc. The barbarian gave no written answer to this passionate appeal, but sent his orderly to the lady, (who was a person of high birth and aristocratic connections,) with a large packet or portfolio containing innumerable locks of hair, from grey to flaxen, from raven to red, with a message that she was to choose from among them her own property. Miss C.'s answer was to dash the whole collection into the fire.—Capt. Gronow's Recollections, etc.

"Swear not at all," said a chaplain to a trooper. He replied, "I do not swear at all, but only at those who annoy me."

NOTICE

The publicotion of "The Californian" takes place on Saturday mornings, and copies may be obtained in the City at all News-stands, and of our News-agents through the country. It will also be served by corriers on the morning of publication.

* Correspondents will address all communications, business and otherwise, to "The Californian," offiee, No. 328 Montgomery street, San Francisco.*

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1864.

Removal.—The publicatioa and editorial rooms of The Californian are removed to No. 328 Montgomery street, betweea Piue and California streets.

Contributor.—The author of "Wanted a place," will pleasc sead address, or call at this office, ia regard to other MS. submitted.

THE GOING MAN.

THE President of the Saaitary Commission returned to the East yesterday. His six months' stay in California was devoted to zealous labor in the cause of which he was the fonuder and representative. He traversed the State, visited Oregoa, organized Branches of the Commission, and systematized the irregular aad spasmodic offerings of the State, as he had of old orgaaized and systematized the charities of the Natioa. He established reservoirs in the coantry districts to catch the smallest tricklings of their bounty, or to hold the overflowing torreats that would rise to the quick impulses of the California breast. He maaaged to fiad time to fill the vacant pulpit of his lamented friend, and to elevate the patriotic aad literary taste of the people by eloquent lectures and addresses. Up to the hour of his departure he was devoted to our service, aad speat the last night of his sojouru here ia patriotic exhortatiou to the enthusiastic multitude that trouged Platt's Hall to look upon him for perhaps the last time.

Though the leave of abseace which he speut in labor here had beeu graated him only as a recreatiou aad release from his untiriag work in the East—though his coming was mainly a solema duty to the memory of oae whom the whole people join him ia lamentiag, aad though his presence belongs to the locality of battle-field aad hospital—California would have selfishly prolouged his stay. He left us at a momeat whea we feel we most need his preseuce. We do uot fear that the charities he fostered will lauguish in his abseace, or that Californians will permit the impressioas he carries with him of their good will aad generosity to suffer disappointment. But we miss the magnetism of his presence, his eloquent voice and dignified bearing, the gentle iafluence of his spiritual calling, the weight of his years and experience, and the example of his self-sacrificing labors, during the uext two mouths when partisan fires will be kindled aad the strongest passions aroused; when we will waut forbearaace as well as firmaess, prudence as well as courage, devotiou as well as eathusiasm, to compass the re-electiou of Abraham Liucolu and the perpetuatioa of the Uniou oa au hoaorable and enduriag basis.

Rhetoric for the Mob.—For their own sakes, it is to be hoped that the weak-miaded young men, who, mistaking iguoraace for courage, aad the exaltatiou of liquor for enthusiasm, attempted to iuterrupt the Union meetiug of Weduesday uight, will not misunderstand the circumstances which led to their getting off so cheaply. The history of all mobs shows that they are only effective whea they take people by surprise. A secoad attempt might end in a collision ia which orgaaized law aud order would prove more than a match for rowdyism and vaporiag, with other results that, on the score of humanity, eveu Uniou mea would regret. In the meaa time it is to be hoped that all good frieuds of the Uniou will rely rather ou their moral and numerical strength iu the preseut campaiga thau on the terrible physical lever they could briag to bear if they choose, and without yielding in firmness, display all possible courtesy and forbearauce to their weaker opponents.

Printers' Cemetery Fund.—A complimentary beuefit iu aid of the Printers' Cemetery Fund has beeu tendered by John Wilson, Esq., to the Eureka Typographical Union, for Monday eveuing, Septcmber 26th, to take place at the Circus. As the cause is a good oae, and the object a modest claim for that rest hereafter which the craft dou't always enjoy in life, we trust the benefit will be a bumper.

Sanitary Fund.—The Executive Committee acknowledge the following receipts since our last issue: From Columbia, for September, $105; from the Camanche, $361 80; from the Saaitary cheese, $232 45; from "Old Sanitary," $45; from employes of Bulletin, $20; from Pilgrim Sunday School, $11 50. Total, $774 95.

Col. W. D. Mann, 5th Michigaa Cavalry, has, from loug experience in the field, suggested improvements in cavalry aad infaatry accoutrements, which have been indorsed by many g neral officers, including Gen. Grant. His suggestions have been accepted by the Ordnance Department, and large orders have been given. This change will largely preveat hernia, heretofore prevalent in the army, growing out of the excessive weights suspended from the soldier's waist-belt.

TENNYSON'S LATEST WORK.

IF we except Enoch Arden, a greater portion of the coutents of this volume has been already published. Sea Dreams, The Grandmother, and Tithonus may be found in Ticknor & Fields' complete edition of the poet's works, published in 1863. The Welcome to Alexandra, which, like most of Tennyson's professioaally laureate pieces, contains but one or two vigorous liaes amid much that is hard aud mechanical, has already showu its popularity by being subjected to half a dozen parodies. The novelty aud interest of this little volume centres in Enoch Arden, whose exquisite measure seems a lingeriug echo of that music which charmed us iu the Idylls of the King.

Oae is apt to regret that the poet changed the title of his book before it went to press. It had beeu previously announced as the "Idylls of the Hearth." Enoch Arden is in legitimate succession from the Idylls of the King. Though the scene is laid in humble prosaic life—thongh the plane of experience is lower, the same tender sacrifice and knightly honor which adorned the "table round," breathes in the atmosphere of Enoch's cottage. But the hero and heroine are equal abstractions; "Enoch Ardea" aud "Annie" are as far removed from us as "King Arthur" and "Guiniviere;" they affect us not as flesh and blood, but as exquisite poetic conceptions personified; they are beiags created for the time to talk, act, and think Tennyson. That they are better, purer, aad ia every way nobler thaa common humanity, however, is not the fault of the poet, but of humanity; uor is the lesson that they teach us to be lightly passed over though it be taught from aa exalted staudard.

The plot is simple. A shipwrecked sailor, given up for lost, returns, after many years' captivity ou a desert isle, to his aative village to fiad his beloved and loving wife inaocently married to his former rival. The coutemplation of their happiaess, which the knowledge of his return would forever blight, lifts him to the height of sublime self-sacrifice. He turns away, without discovering himself, nor discloses his terrible secret, except in his dyiug moments as a message to his wife. The pathos of this iacident is dramatically heightened by the poet's skill in dimly suggesting an idea of retribution and compensation ia Enoch's suffering. Philip, who duriug Enoch's courtship silently worshipped Aunie, thus stumbled upon the proofs of her affectioa for Arden:

> "Then, on a golden autumn eventide,
> The younger people making boliday,
> With bag and sack and basket, great and small,
> Went nutting to the hazels. Philip stayed
> (His father lying sick and needing him)
> An hour behind; but as he climbed the hill,
> Just where the prone edge of the wood began
> To feather toward the hollow, saw the pair,
> Enoch and Annie, sitting hand-in-hand,
> His large gray eyes and weather-beaten face
> All-kindled by a still and sacred fire,
> That burned as on an altar. Philip looked,
> And in their eyes and faces read his doom;
> Then, as their faces drew together, groaned,
> And slipt aside, and like a wounded life
> Crept down into the hollows of the wood;
> There, while the rest were loud in merrymaking,
> Had his dark hour unseen, and rose and past
> Bearing a life-long hunger in his heart.

Enoch Arden, returning from his weary island captivity hears the story of his wife's second marriage, but doubtful yet, seeks his owa cottage, where the light

> "Allured him as the beacon blaze allures
> The bird of passage, till he madly strikes
> Against it, and beats out his weary life," aad finds his place occupied by

> "Philip, the slighted suitor of old times,"
>
> * * * * * * *
>
> "Now when the dead man come to life beheld
> His wife his wife no more, and saw the babe
> Hers, yet not his, upon the father's knee,
> And all the warmth, the peace, the happiness,
> And his own children tall and beautiful,
> And him, that other, reigning in his place,
> Lord of his rights and of his children's love—
> Then he, though Miriam Lane had told him all,
> Because things seen are mightier than things heard,
> Staggered and shook, holding the branch, and feared
> To send abroad a shrill and terrible cry,
> Which in one moment, like the blast of doom,
> Would shatter all the happiness of the hearth.
>
> He therefore turning softly like a thief,
> Lest the harsh shingle should grate under foot,
> And feeling all along the garden-wall,
> Lest he should swoon and tumble and be found,
> Crept to the gate, and opened it, and closed,
> As lightly as a sick man's chamber-door,
> Behind him, and came out upon the waste.

The similitude in the suffering of Philip and Enoch is artistically managed, and loses no effect from its apparently unconscious development.

There are few lines in the Idylls of the King, to which this poem naturally suggests a comparison, that exceed in mastery of measure, delicious cadeuce aud perfect atmosphere, the description of > ——"the glows

> And glories of the broad belt of the world," seeu from Eaoch's islaad-refuge. How sensitive the ear and how delicate the manipulation that produced the line we have italicized ia the following passage!

> "The slender coco's drooping crown of plumes,
> The lightning flash of insect and of bird,
> The lustre of the long convolvuluses
> That coiled around the stately stems, and ran
> Ev'n to the limit of the land."

Who but Teanyson would have dared and overcome the ludicrousness which always iuvests such plurals? How beautifully are the cadences adapted to the sense as the verse glides from

> "The league-long roller thundering on the reef,"

to—

> "The moving whisper of huge trees that branched
> And blossomed in the zenith, or the sweep
> Of some precipitous rivulet to the wave;"

Or, as it blends with the monotone of the exile's watch:

> "No sail from day to day, but every day
> The sunrise broken into scarlet shafts
> Among the palms and ferns and precipices;
> The blaze upon the waters to the east;
> The blaze upon his island overhead;
> The blaze upon the waters to the west;
> Then the great stars that globed themselves in Heaven,
> The hollower-hellowing ocean, and again
> The scarlet shafts of sunrise—but no sail."

Throughout the poem the language aad figures are touchingly simple; but of a simplicity that must have required more care aad labor than the most ornate and florid imagery. It is the most perfect compositioa of the whole volume, and there are few lovers of Tennysoa who will aot feel the old enchantment creeping over them as they linger at its close, or who will not be lifted into a purer atmosphere, with a tenderer trast in their own humanity and the poet's insight, as they turu away from Enoch's bedside with this dying cadence in their ears:

> "Then the third night after this,
> While Enoch slumbered motionless and pale,
> And Miriam watched and dozed at intervals,
> There came so loud a calling of the sea,
> That all the houses in the haven rang.
> He woke, he rose, he spread his arms abroad
> Crying with a loud voice, 'a sail! a sail!
> I am saved'; and so fell back and spoke no more.
>
> "So passed the strong heroic soul away.
> And when they buried him the little port
> Had seldom seen a costlier funeral."

A PLEA FOR COMMONPLACES.

WHEN we come to reflect how large is that class of mankind who are restricted to two adjectives—and those generally superlatives—we should be more toleraat of the Commonplace. Origiaality of expression is always refreshiag; charmiag is that delicate shading of epithet which distinguishes good composition; but think uot uakindly of that respectable portioa of the human family—including so many of its fairer members—who pass their existence among scenes and in the coutemplation of objects that are either "splendid" or "disgustiug;" who have lived in felicity with infelicities in their speech, who have died Christians with pious commonplaces on their lips. The healthiest minds do not refuse this pabulum. There are few good talkers who are really vital from the start. There is an iaclined plane, propped ap by commonplaces aad exaggerations, and lubricated with truisms, down which they are launched iato the sea of conversatioa. In the course of a man's life-time he is obliged to repeat many unimportaut statements; that he should go aboat for a new expression is asking too much—the aatural indoleace of his natare forbids it. So he adopts words aad seatences that have passed carreat, that are equivalents or symbols of a fact that is commoa property—not peculiarly his, aud uot aecessary to stamp with his own individuality. This kind of currency may be depreciated, but the laws of commanity make it a legal tender for conversational debts; he would be foolish who would reject it, because he has the real coia locked up aad is conscious that it is at a premium.

The daily press, which is continually repeatiag itself, falls naturally into commonplaces. All attempts to avoid it only terminate in extravagance of sentiment or ambiguousaess of statemeat. Humor and poetry are sometimes employed to relieve the monotonous repetition of fact. We have seen a reporter attempt to surmount the dead level of his police reports by indulging in a facetiousness that, in view of his subject, became fiendish aad sardonic, aad another perpetrate a misstatement for the sake of a felicitous comparison. Few newspaper writers have the moral courage to accept inevitable commonplaces. We may read the daily papers and calculate with certainty that the perpetrator of a peculiar crime will be denominated "a fiend in human shape," whatever that remarkable object may be. We may rest satisfied that the murderer will be "launched iato eternity." We may calculate to hear of "disciples of Coke," and "disciples of Galen," because "doctors" and "lawyers" are commonplaces; of "conflagrations," iu place of fires. We must be more tolerant of the dramatic critic, who having exhausted his native lexicon, takes up with such doubtful expressions as the "rendition of a role;" who speaks of "effective acting," and talks of "deserved encomiums." We must look forward with patience for the coming time when the Commonplace shall be adopted—no, we mean "inaugurated."

The London Times, of July 17th, after rehearsing the results of some experiments made at Shoeburyness with an Armstrong 600-pounder, concludes that this weapon is capable of smashing through the strongest sea-going armor-clad that could be got to float, at a distance of 4,000 yards, or even more. It then informs its readers that "the Americans have now literally hundreds of 600-pounder guns, and have just succeeded in casting, at Pittsburg, a 20-inch gun to throw a spherical shot of 1,600 pounds." It thinks the result of the experiments it reports proves that we are "altogether wrong" in trusting to heavy shot at low velocities, and frankly acknowledges that there is no charge of powder that could be expected to send the 1,600-pound shot out of its gun which would not at close range "be sure to tell with almost sinking effect on the very best of our iron-clads."

SAN FRANCISCO, BY THE POETS.

NUMBER TWO.

SOUTH PARK—AFTER GRAY.

THE foundry tolls the knell of parting day,
The weary clerk goes slowly home to tea,
The North Beach car rolls onward to the bay,
And leaves the world to solitude and me.

Now fades the glimmering landscape on the sight,
And through the Park a solemn hush prevails,
Save, in the distance, where some school-boy wight
Rattles his hoop-stick on the iron rails;

Save, that from yonder jealous-guarded basement
Some servant-maid vehement doth complain,
Of wicked youths who, playing near her casement,
Project their foot-balls through her window-pane.

Can midnight lark or animated "bust"
To these grave scenes bring mirth without alloy?
Can shrill street-boys proclaim their vocal trust
In John, whose homeward march produces joy?

Alas! for them no organ-grinders play,
Nor sportive monkey move their blinds genteel;
Approach and read, if thou canst read, the lay,
Which these grave dwellings through their stones reveal:

"Here rests his fame, within yon ring of earth,
A soul who strove to benefit mankind—
Of private fortune and of public worth,
His trade—first man then sugar he refined.

"Large was his bounty, and he made his mark;
Read here his record free from stains or blots:
He gave the public all he had—his Park;
He sold the public—all he asked—his lots!"

SCIENTIFIC SKETCHES.

NIL ADMIRARI—let nothing astonish you—was a favorite expression and very good for Horace's day, at a time of slothful luxurious contentment; and even to-day, in an age of earnest activity, of mental intensity, is much accepted, and most unworthily by many, who drift on the surging tide of progress unmoved, because unconscious of its strength and direction.

It peculiarly suits the Oriental's taste and intellectual habits, dealing in fancies and allegories, and shapes his religion as well as his life; for all things to him come of course, and as far as he cares or knows, without cause. Thought is an effort, and all effort is an annoyance, and hence no surprise seizes him even when himself blown from the mouth of a British gun—for surely God is great and Allah is his Prophet, and that is enough for mortal man to know.

Much of this self-satisfied feeling characterizes the later times of the Roman Republic and the first days of the Empire. Luxury and the dominion of the world had done their work upon the hearts and minds of men; love had been displaced by desire, and sensual gratification, under the Circean inspiration, had crushed all finer feeling and intellectual cultivation. Men no longer sought the Promethean fire, but lived on the cry of "Panem et circenses!"—give us bread and amusement—and most adroitly did their Emperors encourage the feeling, and thereby secure a temporary relief from political agitation.

In those times we look in vain for any new creations; the mind had sunk below the level of invention. How startling to Cicero would have been the invention of the watch, to Augustus and his people how repulsive the idea of disfiguring their beautiful Appian way with the stiff rigid parallel iron lines of a double railroad track!

It was impossible for such a people, who had largely lost sight of their past glory, to care much for the present or to expect or desire anything of the future. Steeped in sensual pleasure, no question of profound or even serious nature was allowed to disturb the death-like silence of their mental Eden. No search was made for the causes of things, and hence their effects, however extraordinary, never excited an emotion of surprise nor moved them to wonder.

The explosion of a heavy piece of ordnance, if such had existed in those days, would have produced no other sensation but that of disgust at the direfully-horrid noise it made, nor would the proposition, that the sound from such an explosion had no existence in itself, was not a quantity but the mere effect of an impulse, dependent upon certain conditions for its perception, have received from the material mind of the day a more serious attention.

But let us in our day look awhile at this latter proposition, for it strikes us strangely and well worthy of consideration as one of the curiosities of science, especially when we think that the most prolonged and probably the most intense and exquisite of all our enjoyments come through the ear, and that it is upon the sense of hearing that the most startling impressions are made. To give it application and state it more strongly, although the illustration is not new, we say that a cannon fired in a perfect desert produces no sound. Can this be true, when all our experience controverts the idea, and tells that sound must follow the explosion? It seems as impossible as the existence of ice to the East Indian, who could form no conception of water in a solid state, having never seen it except as a fluid. Reason, however, goes beyond this and corrects the prejudices and false teachings of a crude experience, when it discovers to us that sound is not produced by the projection of anything through the air, but is a motion of vibration, an undulation of aerial swells, which strike upon the tympanum of the ear as waves upon the shore, and produce through the auditory nerve to the brain the perception which is known as sound. Two things, therefore, are requisite to the production of a sound—the tympanic membrane of the ear, and the medium through and by which the impulses are conveyed to the tympanum, and the absence of either is fatal to sound.

As we rise from the sea-level to a more rarified atmosphere, sound becomes feebler, as proved by De Saussure, who fired his pistol at the top of Mont Blanc, (altitude 16,000 feet,) to test the fact; still feebler as we approach a vacuum, in which a bell, however hardly struck, gives no sound whatever, as shown by Hawksbee with the air-pump. On the other hand, as the sun emits no light to the blind, so motion causes no sound upon the defective ear; and hence, for a stronger reason, no sound can exist where—as in our supposititious case of the perfect desert—no ear exists upon which it can fall.

GUNPOWDER INVENTED BY A PRIEST, PRINTING BY A SOLDIER.—Yes, Invention has but little respect for the proprieties of time, place or person, and violates them all, singly and at times together, in one and the same act of its caprice, often suggesting, in the most unsuitable place and unseasonable hour, to the most improbable person, bright thoughts and important secrets. Reason may work by regular rule, for logic is stiff, formal and rigid—but intuition follows no law, and its results are known only by its electric flash. How unseemly the appearance of Dr. Watson, Bishop of Llandaff, and how pointed the witticism, when twitted at Court by George III. for his perverse ingenuity in improving the manufacture of gunpowder, instead of composing some work on moral philosophy or pulpit dialectics! Who can tell what led the celebrated lawyer Fearne, absorbed in the abstruse doctrines of his Contingent Remainders, to the discovery of a new scarlet dye? And now in our own time, and but very recently, we have the announcement of the invention by Dr. Swift, M. D., aided by Dr. Chase, M. D., two doctors of medical cure, of an explosive compound of diabolical strength and nature. By a mechanical combination of carbon (charcoal) placed in an exhausted air-receiver with sulphurated hydrogen, of which it absorbs 90 to 100 times its own bulk, a compound is produced by these gentlemen, of easy manufacture, great economy, and most destructive effect.

On all known principles of mental action and its laws, we would as reasonably expect a thunderbolt from a clear sky as an element of death from the hands of a savior. The fact, nevertheless, is so—irreconcilable, maybe, to the human intellect and incapable of solution, but no more so than many of the other mysteries of nature and of religion that work out life from death, and reward from punishment, personal or vicarious. But who denies on this account the right to investigate these mysteries; for is it not strictly true and logical that the gift of reason implies the right to use it?

Yet some of the anomalies of science are certainly very curious, and, while exciting grave doubt and distrust of a reason competent to conform them to law, are still most entertaining subjects of thought. We see the same in Literature and History—eccentricities, so to speak, which, although not explicable on very clear grounds, may yet be made to assume some degree of light. It is the old story of the conflict between error and a false generalization on the one hand, and truth and correct deduction on the other. As "precious odors are most fragrant when crushed," so the clash of thought and the pressure of opposition serve to express the truth and intensify its beauty. From the discussion of error much good has come; from its acceptance as truth at times, (as we shall see in one prominent instance, at least,) benefits have abundantly flowed upon mankind. From Alchemy—most reverently received in its day, sprang the splendid structure of modern chemistry reared upon its ruins, now hideous to deformity in our sight. The reign of Superstition ended and Religion followed on the discussion and dissection of its absurdities and doctrinal depravities; and by the force of generalization based on authentic data and the inductive system, History swept away the falsities of an incoherent Tradition. When Dr. Black, in the last century, gave out his theory of latent heat and sustained it by numberless experiments, apparently beyond question, men received it as conclusively demonstrated, and the great Watt, acknowledging its value, proceeded to draw most important deductions from its law in the construction and improvement of the steam engine. But was it true? No, wholly false; for, however valuable as a source of suggestion to others, the assumption of the fact, strongly supported as it was by argument and experiment, has been proved by Prof. Tyndall, of the Royal School of Mines, in his late able work on "Heat considered as a Mode of Motion," to be utterly fallacious, and goes most pointedly yet strangely to show how error may lead directly to beneficial results, and, ultimately, by indirection, to the discovery of light.

TRISMIGISTUS.

The U. S. Draft Rendezvous for Connecticut, Vermont, and Rhode Island is located at New Haven, under the command of Col. Albemarle Cady, of the 8th U. S. Infantry. It has a fine location, on a point of level land formed by the confluence of two rivers, and affords comfortable quarters for 2,500 or 3,000 men.

MR. Secretary Stanton has gratified the country by resuming the publication of his despatches to Gen. Dix, the opportunity for proclaiming reports of successful achievements inviting him to appear again upon the bulletin boards.

PHILOSOPHIC PARAGRAPHS.

WHEN the Devil goes to his prayers he means to cheat you.

A COMPLIMENT is usually accompanied by a bow, as if to beg pardon for paying it.

ARE we really more enlightened than our ancestors? Or is it merely the flaring-up of the candle that has burned down to the socket, and is consuming that socket, as a prelude to its own extinction? Such at least has been the character of those former ages of the world, which have prided themselves on being the most enlightened.

LAODAMEIA died; Helen died; Leda the beloved of Jupiter, went before. It is better to repose in the earth betimes, than to sit up late; better, than to cling pertinaciously to what we feel crumbling under us, and to protract an inevitable fall. We may enjoy the present while we are insensible of infirmity and decay; but the present, like a note in music, is nothing but as it appertains to what is past and what is to come. There are no fields of amaranth on this side of the grave; there are no voices, O Rhodope, that are not soon too mute, however tuneful; there is no name, with whatever emphasis of passionate love repeated, of which the echo is not faint at last.

THE forms of politeness universally express benevolence in superlative degrees. What if they are in the mouths of selfish men, and used as means of selfishness? What if the false gentleman almost bows the true one out of the world? What if the false gentleman contrives so to address his companion, as civilly to exclude all others from his discourse, and also to make them feel excluded? Real service will not lose its nobleness. All generosity is not merely French and sentimental; nor is it to be concealed, that living blood and a passion of kindness does at last distinguish God's gentleman from Fashion's. The epitaph of Sir Jenkin Grout is not wholly unintelligible to the present age. "Here lies Sir Jenkin Grout who loved his friends, and persuaded his enemy: what his mouth ate his hand paid for; what his servants robbed he restored; if a woman gave him pleasure, he supported her in pain; he never forgot his children; and whoso touched his finger drew after it his whole body."

As much virtue as there is, so much appears; as much goodness as there is, so much reverence it commands. All the devils respect virtue. The high, the generous, the self-devoted sect will always instruct and command mankind. Never was a sincere word utterly lost. Never a magnanimity fell to the ground, but there is some heart to greet and accept it unexpectedly. A man passes for that he is worth. What is he engraves itself on his face, on his form, on his fortunes, in letters of light. Concealment avails nothing; boasting nothing. There is confession in the glances of our eyes, in our smiles, in salutations, and the grasp of hands. His sin bedaubs him, mars all his good impressions. Men know not why they do not trust him; but they do not trust him. His vice glasses his eye, cuts lines of mean expression in his cheek, pinches the nose, sets the mark of the beast on the back of the head, and writes, O fool! fool! on the forehead of the king.

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

REV. H. W. BELLOWS, D. D., and Rt. Rev. Bishop Kip, left on the steamer of the 23d inst. Bishop Kip proceeds to Europe by English steamer from Aspinwall, to visit his son, whose health is critically impaired. Dr. Bellows returns to his New York congregation, leaving the pulpit, which he temporarily filled after Mr. King's death, in the possession of the new pastor, Rev. Horatio Stebbins, who has been formally installed.

THE Congregationalists will hold the regular annual meeting of the General Association at Oakland, October 5th.

A NEW Presbyterian church will be dedicated at Oakland to-morrow.

THE California Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church commenced their twelfth session on the 21st inst., in this city.

THE denominational status of Bowdoin College, which has occasioned much anxiety in years past, has been fixed by the selection of three orthodox trustees. To this statement the Pacific significantly adds: "This secures a gift of $50,000 from Prof. Boody and relieves many minds. Uncertainties are not healthful to progress or good feeling. The motto of a college, as of all men, should be—First know you are right, that is Orthodox, then go ahead." How far the $50,000 of the liberal-minded Boody tended to produce this progression to rectitude, the Pacific does not state.

LOCAL MILITARY ITEMS.

THE resignation of Lieut. James Monroe, Utah Territory Infantry, has been accepted, to take effect September 20, 1864.

Col. Francis J. Lippitt's term of service in the California Volunteers having expired, he asks to be mustered out of service, which has been granted.

The 2d and 6th Infantry companies, with the headquarters of the latter regiment, serving in the district of Humboldt (except Capt. Douglas's company at Round Valley,) take post as follows: 2d Infantry at Presidio Barracks; headquarters and companies of the 6th Infantry at Benicia Barracks.

The companies of the 2d Infantry of Drum Barracks, Forts Miller and Yuma, take post at the Presidio—Fort Miller being temporarily abandoned.

Company B, 2d Cavalry, C. V., take post at the Presidio, preparatory to being mustered out of service, its term having expired.

ARMY AND NAVY PERSONAL.

General Kilpatrick has resumed his command in the Army of the Cumberland.

It is understood that Major-General Hooker will not be assigned to any command at present.

Williams College, in Massachusetts, has given the honorary degree of LL. D. to Major-General Butler.

Colonel Ebenezer W. Pierce, of the 29th Massachusetts, had arrived at his home in Freetown, Mass., in a very low state of health.

Major-General Brooks, who recently resigned his commission in the United States Army, has been stopping in Pittsburg, Pa., recruiting his health.

Colonel E. W. Rice, of the 7th Iowa, commanding 1st brigade of Brigadier-General Corses's division, 16th Army corps, has been made a brigadier-general.

Brigadier-General Payne has been assigned to the command of General Hinck's division of colored troops, and has proceeded to Petersburg and assumed command.

Colonel Chapman, of the 3d Indiana Cavalry, and Colonel McIntosh, both commanding brigades in Sheridan's cavalry, have been appointed brigadier-generals.

Colonel John Boyle, Adjutant-General of Kentucky, has resigned his office and removed from Frankfort to Louisville to engage in his profession as a lawyer.

Brigadier-General Robert O. Tyler's friends in Hartford have subscribed a handsome sum of money to purchase for him a sword; the Ames Company, of Chicopee, will make it.

Brigadier-General John R. Brooke is fast recovering from the effects of his severe wound, received in the battle of Cold Harbor, Va. He is still, however, unable to join his command.

Brigadier-General J. B. Carr, lately commanding at Yorktown, has arrived at Bermuda Hundred, and taken command of a division of colored soldiers across the Appomattox from Point of Rocks.

The President has removed Colonel Bomford, Provost-Marshal-General of Pennsylvania, and appointed Captain Dodge, Mustering and Disbursing officer of that State, to fill the vacancy.

It was extensively published a few weeks ago that Lieut. Manadier, Battery K, First United States Artillery, was killed. It was stated that he was killed at Reams' Station; but it is now ascertained that he was wounded and is a prisoner at Richmond.

The President has accepted the resignation of the following officers: Captain Charles H. Lewis, 16th U. S. Infantry; Captain Lewis Wilson, 19th U. S. Infantry.

Captain O. H. Moore, 6th U. S. Infantry, and Lyman M. Kellogg, 18th U. S. Infantry, have been reinstated.

First Lieutenant J. B. Fay, Fifth New Hampshire, for sometime past acting as Post Adjutant and A. A. Q. M. at the depot for stragglers, etc., in Concord, N. H., has been relieved from his duties and ordered to rejoin his regiment. His duties at Concord will be peformed by Major J. M. Whittlesey, U. S. A., military commander.

The officers of the Second Brigade, First division, Cavalry corps, Army of the Potomac, a few days ago, as a token of their respect and esteem, presented Colonel Devlin a splendid horse and accoutrements. The presentation was formally made by Colonel Nichols in an appropriate speech, and was responded to in a happy manner by the recipient.

The officers of the French steam frigate Guerriere, now lying in Newport harbor, were on Friday evening of last week the guests of the officers of the Naval Academy, in the Naval Academy building. The band of the 15th U. S. Infantry was stationed in the main entrance hall, and discoursed some fine music during the evening. A grand supper constituted the principal feature of the evening.

In the case of Colonel W. M. Grosvenor, sentenced by general court-martial, convened at New Orleans, La., May 4, 1864, to be dismissed from the service, an examination of the record was ordered by the President of the United States, who, upon the report of the Judge-Advocate-General, has ordered that the disability be removed on the ground that the sentence appears not to be sustained by the evidence.

A New York paper speaks of Brigadier General R. O. Tyler as an officer "who was highly distinguished and lost a foot either at Spottsylvania or the Wilderness." General Tyler received a severe wound in the right foot at Cold Harbor, on the 3d of June, but did not lose that important member. Under skilful treatment the foot has been saved, and although the process of recovery will necessarily be slow, there is a prospect that General Tyler will not even be lame.

Lieut.-Col. Wm. H. Owen, Fifth Corps Quartermaster, and Capt. J. D. Crittenden, Quartermaster of the Artillery Brigade, have just been appointed full Colonels, and ordered to report to Washington as the Inspector Generals of the Army, under the late Act of Congress reorganizing the Quartermaster's Department.

Maj.-Gen. Curtis arrived at Omaha, Nebraska, on the 16th. He was to leave for the West, shortly, to adopt decisive and efficient measures for the protection of the overland mail route and immigration.

Lieut.-Col. Elias M. Greene, late Chief Quartermaster of the Department of Washington, has been appointed Assistant Quartermaster-General, with the brevet rank of Brigadier-General, and assigned to duty in the Department of Ohio and the Cumberland. He is succeeded by Capt. Elliston of New York, who is promoted to the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel.

Capt. Dawson of the 2d New York Artillery, a son of the editor of the Albany Journal, who was severely wounded at Petersburg, but who is convalescent, received a commission as Major for gallant and meritorious service in the battles from the Wilderness to Petersburg.

Lieut. James A. Ekin, Chief Quartermaster of the Cavalry Bureau, has been promoted to the rank of Colonel in the regular army, and placed in charge of the First Division of the Quartermaster's Department.

So much of the order from the War Department as relieved Assistant Quartermaster-Gen. Swords from his present duty in Cincinnati has been revoked.

Lieut. L. M. Gardner, First California Cavalry, has been reprimanded by general orders from the War Department, for addressing a letter to the State Department charging the Quartermaster's Bureau on the Pacific coast, in general terms, with fraud. A careful investigation, by a military court, has ascertained that the accusations were without any foundation whatever.

[The officer above mentioned was until recently stationed at Sacramento, and while there addressed a letter to Secretary Seward, offering, if he (the Secretary) would have him ordered East, to make some astounding disclosures of frauds in the Quartermaster's Department on the coast, and more particularly at Sacramento. His letter was referred back to headquarters of this Department, and an investigation ordered. Lieut. Gardner, when called upon to name the parties guilty, declared that he referred to no particular officer, but to the agent of the Quartermaster's Department at Sacramento. A Court-martial was ordered, and all the charges made by Lieut. Gardner, assisted by a Lieut. Knight—who made himself very officious in the matter—were fully and rigidly investigated, and every opportunity given them to substantiate the charges; but they utterly failed to make out a case, and the parties accused were fully and honorably acquitted of any and all charges then and there made. And it appears the Court recommended that Lieut. Gardner be dismissed the service, but he escapes with a reprimand. It will be a good lesson for several other gentlemen of the Cavalry, who have heretofore done more talking than duty.]

Daniel Wormer of New York, who contracted to deliver 1,200 horses to the Government in February last, at St. Charles, Mo., has been tried by court-martial for failure to fulfil, found guilty, and sentenced to pay damages in the sum of $2,000 to the Government, and to be imprisoned until paid. The President has approved, but directs his enlargement upon filing bonds and security satisfactory to the Secretary of War to pay the amount.

[The way of the contractor is hard in these days, if the officer does his duty. According to the orders from the Quartermaster-General's office, any officer purchasing animals for the service is required to examine into his physical and moral character, and certify that he has looked into the animal's mouth; and then follow dental statistics. Finally, he brands his initials on the mule's neck, and the contractor and officer are both held responsible for the loyalty and general good behavior of that mule the balance of the war. Contractors hereabouts may take warning from the fate of our friend Daniel, who appears to have been an unfortunate wormer into somebody's *dis*favor, and was a worm that got picked up by some early bird.]

Sentence of Surgeon-General Hammond.—Brig.-General William A. Hammond, Surgeon General of the United States, was tried by a court-martial, continued by order of the President at Washington on the 15th of January, 1864, consisting of Major-Gen. R. J. Oglesby, United States Volunteers, President; Brig.-Gen. W. S. Harney, U. S. A.; Brig.-Gen. W. S. Ketchum, Brig.-Gen. G. S. Greene, Brig.-Gen. W. W. Morris, Colonel United States Artillery, Brig.-Gen. A. P. Howe, Brig.-Gen. J. P. Slough, Brig.-Gen. H. E. Paine, Brig.-Gen. J. C. Starkweather, with Major John M. Bingham as Judge-Advocate. The charges are in substance as follows: "Favoritism to friends, receiving inferior articles at prices of first-class, disregarding the law relative to contracts, extravagant purchases," etc., and was found guilty on all the charges. The findings of the court were approved, and his sentence was that he be dismissed the service and be forever disqualified from holding any office or trust under the Government of the United States.

[Surgeon J. K. Barnes, who has latterly acted as the head of the Bureau, stands next in the line of promotion to fill the vacancy, and fully deserves the position.]

The following sentences by Court-martial have been reported:

To be Dismissed.—Capt. Wm. Chaunel, Co. D., 7th Rhode Island Volunteers, for misconduct in the presence of the enemy, and conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman.

Capt. James Blaisdell, Co. H., 9th New Hampshire, for conduct prejudicial to good order and military discipline.

First Lieut. Judson Knickerbocker, 14th New York Artillery, for cowardice.

Capt. D. B. Kaufman, 48th Pennsylvania Volunteers, for gross conduct before the enemy.

Second Lieut. George S. Wilkes, 180th New York Volunteers, and to forfeit all pay and allowances now due or to become due him, for conduct prejudicial to good order and military discipline.

Second Lieut. Charles H. Mayo, 8th unattached company heavy artillery Massachusetts Volunteers, for conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman.

Capt. Joseph J. Ladd, 8th New Hampshire Volunteers, for speaking disrespectfully of his commanding officer.

Asst. Surgeon John D. Johnson, U. S. Volunteers, for conduct prejudicial to good order and military discipline. Remitted and commuted to a reprimand in general orders.

To be Dishonorably Dismissed.—First Lieut. Alfred Graff, Co. G., 143d Pennsylvania Volunteers, to forfeit to the United States all pay and allowances accruing to him as an officer from and after the 8th day of May, 1864, and that the crime, name, place of abode and punishment of the accused be published in the newspapers in and about the camp and of the State of Pennsylvania, the State from whence the accused came and where he usually resides, for misbehavior in the presence of the enemy and absence without leave.

First Lieut. Joseph Cogan, Battery H, 1st Pennsylvania Reserve Light Artillery, for conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman, to the prejudice of good order and military discipline.

Capt. F. W. Hartt, Asst. Quartermaster U. S. Volunteers, with loss of all pay and allowances now due or to become due, for knowingly and wilfully defrauding the Government of the United States.

To be Cashiered.—Lieut.-Col. Richard E. Cross, 5th New Hampshire Volunteers, for disobedience of orders.

Second Lieut. John Q. Adams, 30th U. S. colored troops, with loss of all pay and allowances, for disobedience of orders, violation of the 44th and 50th articles of war and breach of arrest.

First Lieut. William Thomas, Co. D, 2d Maryland Veteran Volunteers, with loss of all pay and allowances, to be forever disqualified from holding any office of trust or emolument under the United States, to be confined at hard labor at the Dry Tortugas, or such other Government work as the General commanding may direct, for the term of one year, for absence without leave and conduct prejudicial to good order and military discipline.

First Lieut. John Hoy, Co. E., 179th New York Volunteers, for drunkenness on duty, conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman, and breach of arrest.

Other Sentences.—First Lieut. J. W. Glass, 104th Pennsylvania Volunteers, to be reprimanded in general orders by the Major-General commanding the Department of the South, for using reproachful and provoking speech to a soldier.

Samuel S. Smoot, a contractor for supplies for the army, to pay to the United States a fine of $10,000, and be confined in such place as the Secretary of War may designate until such fine be paid, provided such imprisonment shall not exceed three years.

William A. Jones and J. Paul Jones, of the firm of J. P. Jones & Co., late sutlers of the 16th regiment Massachusetts Volunteers, found guilty of unlawfully obtaining and appropriating Government property, and sentenced to pay a fine of $2,500 and to be imprisoned until said fine was paid, were sent to Fort Delaware, where they will remain for one year, unless the fine is paid before the expiration of that time.

Following are the dismissals which have been reported for the week ending August 6;

Additional Paymaster George P. Folsom, U. S. Vols., to date August 1, 1864.

First Lieutenant William G. Anderson, Adjutant 4th Indiana cavalry, to date July 11, 1864, for absence without leave, having been published officially and failed to appear before the commission.

Lieutenant Horace K. Stille, 13th Pennsylvania cavalry, to date July 30th, 1864, for desertion.

Lieutenant M. H. Preston, 3d Delaware Vols., to date July 30, 1864, for absence without proper authority.

Second Lieutenant Amesley B. Smith, 16th New York cavalry, to date July 29, 1864, for drunkenness on duty, breach of arrest, and attempting to purloin from a Government stable a saddle and bridle belonging to an officer.

The order heretofore issued, accepting the resignation of Captain A. J. Vidal, partisan rangers, has been revoked, and he has been dismissed, to date August 4, 1864, for desertion.

Dismissals Confirmed.—The orders of dismissal heretofore issued in the following cases have been confirmed:

Captain Carl Von Heintze, 5th United States colored troops, for worthlessness and cowardice.

First Lieutenant William P. Miner, 13th Connecticut Volunteers, to date July 16, 1864, for absenting himself from his guard without permission from proper authority, for breach of arrest, and for being grossly drunk in the field, in camp, and in the city of New Orleans.

Second Lieut. Charles L. Francis, 65th U. S. colored infantry, he having tendered his resignation in consequence of inexperience and incompetency.

Dismissals Approved.—The orders of dismissal heretofore issued in the following cases have been approved:

First Lieut. John M. Sharp, 148th New York Volunteers, to date, July 29, 1864, for, after having been arrested upon charges of cowardice and misbehavior before the enemy, breaking his arrest, and leaving for his home, without trying to get a certificate of physical disability upon which to ground a resignation.

Second Lieut. Z. C. Robinson, 3d New York cavalry, to date July 28, 1864.

MISCELLANEOUS.

By direction of the President, Captain Edward L. Hartz, Assistant Quartermaster, U. S. Army, has been dropped from the Army rolls, to date February 1, 1864.

The order heretofore issued dismissing Second Lieutenant H. J. Webber, 59th Indiana Volunteers, has been revoked, and he has been honorably discharged, to date February 1, 1864.

The following officers heretofore dismissed are restored, with pay from the date at which they rejoin their regiments for duty:

Capt. Frank B. M. Bonsall, 28th Pennsylvania Vols., provided the vacancy has not been filled by the Governor of his State.

Second Lieut. Frank Reynolds, 1st U. S. Artillery.

Capt. Daniel D. T. Gordon, Assistant Quartermaster U. S. Vols., dismissed by sentence of a General Court-Martial, has been restored to his former rank in the service.

The proceedings, findings and sentence of a General Court-Martial in the case of Second Lieut. Charles Wood, 38th Wisconsin Vols., has been disapproved, the records failing to show the offence of which he was convicted, and he will be released from arrest and restored to duty.

The residue of the sentence in the case of 2d Lieut. J. S. Walter, 13th Pennsylvania Cavalry, has been remitted, on the ground of his bravery and former good conduct, without remitting forfeiture of pay during imprisonment, and he has been restored to his commission in his regiment.

By order of Maj.-Gen. Hunter, dated July 29th, the following officers, for deserting their commands at the recent battle of Winchester, and during the subsequent retreat, and for spreading false and exaggerated reports of the losses of the army after going to the rear, are dismissed from the military service, subject to the approval of the President:

Capt. John L. Hicks, 13th New York Cavalry; Capt. Hallowell, 143d Ohio Volunteer Infantry; Capt. D. S. Caldwell, 143d Ohio Volunteer Infantry; Capt. J. H. Spencer, 9th West Virginia Infantry; Capt. John Johnson, 12th Pennsylvania Cavalry; First Lieut. D. R. Disbow, 1st New York Lincoln Cavalry; First Lieut. Wm. A. Williams, 143d Ohio Volunteer Infantry; Lieut. Jones, 13th Pennsylvania Cavalry; Asst. Surgeon U. S. Newson, 91st Ohio Volunteer Infantry; Asst. Surgeon O. Q. Nellie, 2d West Virginia Cavalry; Capt. D. E. Gross, 20th Pennsylvania Cavalry; Major J. H. Thorp, 20th Pennsylvania Cavalry.

THE GLASS OF FASHION.

LONDON AND PARIS.

TO all intents and purposes, so far as fashions and novelties are concerned, the two cities are dead. London is shut up at its West-end, and Paris swarms with travellers, who may be remarkable for their alternate fits of grumbling and jollity, but not for the taste they display in their toillettes. But travelling costumes do not admit of much taste being introduced therein, the useful and the comfortable elements should prevail, and alas! for the styles to which modern fashions have accustomed our eyes, the comfortable does not now prove always the most becoming.

We all know how trying a white kid boot proves even to a small, daintily-made, well-formed foot. "Trying" is an essentially feminine word when applied to any article of dress, and seems to express a vast deal more under similar circumstances than "unbecoming," which, perhaps, would be the more correct term. But white kids are the fashion, so we must wear them; they are more economical than satin, as they endure more dancing without fraying. Colored heels are now very generally adopted, and we have much pleasure in announcing the more recent introduction of colored toes or tips—pointed, not square ones. This insertion of color has exactly the same effect upon the white kid boot that a dark trimming has upon a light dress—it detracts from its size, at least in effect. The color of the kid tip should correspond with that of the heel, and both, with the ornaments upon the dress; thus a white tarlatane trimmed with blue would be accompanied with white kid boots, with blue heels and tips. A white silk trimmed with pink should have white boots with pink heels and tips.

The old-fashioned shoes are gradually coming into favor again; they are made of patent leather, with high heels. Those which we have seen were elaborately stitched with white silk, and were strapped in front with a beautifully-cut steel buckle. Those ladies who object to the trouble of buttoned boots, and to the pressure of elastic sides, will find these shoes very comfortable wear, and as they are made very high in front, there is not so great a difference between the appearance of a boot and shoe as might be supposed. The newest description of slipper is satin embroidered with chenille.

In answer to many inquiries as to the best materials for the loose bodices now so much in vogue, we may remark that all depends upon that of the skirt with which these bodices are to be worn. For silk grenadine, and Chambery gauze skirts, no material is more becoming for the bodice than the crepe lisse, trimmed with ruches of black and white blonde, or, more simply, with insertion, laid on flat. The crepe lisse is very soft and becoming, but it is of too fragile a texture for any hard wear. For very light silk skirts the crepe lisse may be also worn, ornamented with braces and sash of the same color as the skirt. For silk skirts, suitable for afternoon wear, we recommend the nainsook muslin bodice, made with deep linen cuffs and small linen collar. The muslin should be tucked, both in the back and front, with tiny tucks, and a narrow Valenciennes edging should be added to the cuffs and collar. For morning wear, foulard and China crepe are both excellent materials; the former is far less costly than the latter, consequently is more patronized. Ruches or quillings of ribbon, braid, narrow black ribbon-velvet, and muslin-embroidery, are all used for trimming both the crepe and foulard.

A Parisian correspondent of a London paper says: The middle of the month of August is consecrated in the generality of French families to small gatherings. There are so many women in France who are christened "Mary," that I might say without exaggeration that upon Assumption Day the entire country is en fete. The Emperor's fete also falls upon that festival, and I hear rumors of a large ball which is to be given at St. Cloud upon the occasion, but of this I will write fuller particulars when it takes place.

The toilettes which are in preparation for these midsummer fetes are very simple in character, consequently there is a great charm about them. Natural flowers, for instance, will be much used for head-dresses; young ladies, especially, are now adopting this fashion. The hair is also frequently plaited, a coronet is worn with the hair rolled back from the temples, and a large cluster of plaits is arranged at the back. With white dresses there is nothing more elegant than the mother-of-pearl combs. Curls are frequently worn behind the ear, and around the plaits small garlands of flowers are entwined; these are flexible, being mounted upon ribbon instead of upon wire, and are grouped in bunches, such as lilies of the valley, clematis, hare-bells, etc. Another original style which has lately become fashionable is to turn back the hair straight from the forehead in a rolled bandeau; to plait the hair at the back in a wide tress, and pin this straight up the centre of the head, the ends being fastened underneath the bandeau; at each side of this plait sprays of flowers, ears of corn, and corn-flowers are disposed so as to produce the effect of being kept down by the tress of hair.

The Empire style of head-dress is also adopted, but of course modernized to suit the present fashion. Small curls play upon the forehead, and ringlets fall at the back; a bow of ribbon is fastened at the side.

Tassels are also extensively used in trimming dresses. They are very suitable for summer, and are less costly than either lace or gimp. The following dress, ornamented with them, was worn lately by the Princess Mathilde: The material was silk gauze, striped Havana brown and white. The front of the skirt was trimmed en tablier, with four cross-way bands of sky-blue taffetas. These bands were wide, graduated as they ascended, and were sewn on to describe three vandykes; between each vandyke there was a long sky-blue silk tassel. Two pointed pockets completed the ornaments in front of the skirt, which was cut in the Gabrielle form. The bodice was a coat piped between all the seams with sky-blue silk, and turned back with sky-blue revers; the sleeve was an epaulet, vandyked at the edge, tassels were placed between each vandyke, and with smaller tassels sewn at the points. At the back the long tails of the coat were turned back at each side with a cross-cut band of sky-blue taffetas, fastened down with a mother-of-pearl button, and trimmed with narrow white lace. This form of coat is very pretty, but only suitable for dressy occasions. White muslin coats, piped with colored silk to match the dress, are also very much worn.

The great amusement at the country-seats during the present season is horse exercise. Coquetry, which is introduced everywhere and into all toilettes, does not fail to insinuate itself into what should be the severe style of the riding costume. For country wear, the most elegant habits are made of white piqué and nankeen. The white piqué is braided thickly over with black soutache. The fashion of a coat bodice is very much in unison with a habit, the bodices of which are made with short basques and with a waistcoat; the skirt, bodice and waistcoat all being made of the same material. The form of the basque varies, but it is always of a moderate length; that which is generally preferred is small, and rounded in the form of a spoon. Small patterns, like a sheaf of corn, are most suitable for braiding, and each sheaf is joined with a button; cloth buttons are used for piqué habits, and steel for cloth ones.

In town, dark-colored cloth habits, such as black, bottle green, and marine blue, are alone worn, and these are ornamented with sateen braids and with small hanging bell-buttons, made of steel.

For summer wear, the alpaca will be found lighter than cloth, or even than what is called "lasting," and a white pique waistcoat gives a less sombre effect to the toilette. The waistcoat is sometimes turned back with revers and bound with narrow white braid; an extremely narrow blue or groseille neck-tie is worn under the collar. The hat for town wear is, in form, like that worn by men, only it is lower in the crown; but in the country a more fantastic style is adopted. A beaver hat in the Louis XIII. form, with a long feather, and the Amazone straw hat, bound with velvet, and ornamented with a tuft of feathers, are the two favorite shapes. The casquette (cap) is also worn on horseback: the most fashionable sort is made of straw, with a black-velvet peak, and it is trimmed with green cock's feathers, and a long green gauze veil floating at the back.

Some of the ugliest garments which have been in vogue of late are the negligés paletots which the ladies are wearing at the seaside. The color, the cut, the material, and the buttons, all remind me forcibly of a servant's livery. Generally, the material preferred is coarse red flannel; the paletot is wide at the back, with two pockets, and gilt buttons bearing some emblem—a flower, a coronet, a bee, etc. The white flannel mantles are the least ugly of all, but still they are far from pretty; there are also white mantles striped with color, and trimmed with porcelain buttons.

I see that the long circulars, made of fancy cloth, and lined with silk, and silk hoods at the back, are again appearing; the short double capes in either cashmere or twilled cloth are also fashionable. These latter are very convenient when travelling, and as the capes are made separately, one or both can be worn according to the temperature. The largest cape is edged with a thick pinked-out ruche of the same material. This style of mantle is also frequently made in that soft thick silk called faille, and the second is simulated with either a cross-way band or any other trimming, a slit at each side being made to allow the arms to pass through. This garment looks like a talma at the back; if it is ornamented with guipure and jet, a guipure hood is always added.

The following cape was lately made for the Empress: The material was iron-grey cashmere, lined with sarsnet to match, stitched round with white, and buttoned all down the front with large bell-buttons of filigree silver; there was an ornament round the top of the mantle, which had the effect of a necklace; it was made with a long button fringe headed with balls of filigree silver. This mantle was intended to be worn when strolling in the garden or park, and is original without being eccentric. Another cape in the same style was also made last week for the daughter of the Empress of Brazil; the material was sky-blue cashmere lined with white silk, and ornamented round the edge with sixteen rows of backstitching in white silk. The stitching is now always worked by a sewing-machine, and is one of the simplest trimmings used—it is very fashionable and always in good taste.

"LATE" IS NOT "NEVER."

"OF course, murder will out; ay, and then there's God's vengeance upon the murderer, and the rest of it. Yes, and you believe all that; ah, tant mieux; but, shall I tell you a history?"

"Well, the night is fine, as our October nights here are apt to be; the coffee is not bad; the ice, that orange and distaccio, among others, far from despicable; the tobacco passable; you are disposed to listen; there is a crowd here in Florian, which is equivalent to solitude, for no one knows what his neighbor is chattering; Anna Bazzuri in Beatrice has excited you far beyond sleep, albeit the Campanile clock has tolled out its solemn ONE. They will let you in at Daniele's at any hour at which you choose to ring the bell which hangs delcussée, on the Piazza del Shiavoni, so half an hour, more or less, signifies little. I am not indisposed to talk, and will tell you a story. Bottega! un caffe e fuoco."

Let me place my interlocutor before my readers. A man whom a careless observer might have described as old, for his hair was grey, "but not with years," as you discovered when you looked at him. There was a roundness of contour, a vigor, a flexibility in his movements, that pertained not to advanced age, and belied the promise of the grizzled hairs, in which but few chestnut remnants recalled their earlier hue. All this showed that the aspect of age was but the disguise of prematurely blasted youth, and arrested attention on the person who, one fine night, in St. Mark's Square, Venice, thus bespoke him who now writes. There was bright moonlight; the broad square was afloat in radiance; the many-domed, multi-pinnacled cathedral loomed out like some Cyclop-work in frosted silver; down the arcades streamed lines of idlers, purposelessly gloating over the glittering goldsmith's ware at the arched angle of the "Merceria," or the equally glistening, if less costly, objets de Venise, the shell gauds of the neighboring traveller traps. In Florian and Sattil overflowed a mass of loungers, frothing over into the outer breadth of the Piazza playing chess, drinking coffee, eating ice, hatching treason, abusing the Austrians; it was 1859, and the Lombard campaign was imminent. There is your scene, now for the dramatis personæ.

Imprimis. Your servant, not very tall; stout (his enemies say squat, but that's mendacious,) auburn of hair (the detractors aforesaid call it red, but that's their ill-nature,) not ill-looking (his private opinion,) very expressive countenance, and gentlemanlike exterior—of course.

Secundo. The narrator, nothing out of the common; none of your melo-dramatic heroes, not the slightest flavor of daggers and trap-doors about him, all nineteenth century, modern and polished. He was prematurely grizzled, not his fault, as he said, but his misfortune. The man could moon all day over Basilica, chiesa, or Accademia; was unwarying in sight-seeing, the most exhaustive of tests; had a wrist of catgut in a salle d'armes; could sit up till daylight at opera, or post-opera orgie; seemed to renounce sleep and disown fatigue, yet had the exterior of elder manhood. He lived as one beyond all sordid necessities, all the waifs and strays of Venice flocked around him as to a certain haven for mendicity, and the omnipotent Austrian police was cap-in-hand to him in all places. I never understood him, and ended by giving him up.

Let him speak for himself.

"I think I hinted that murder now and then managed to slip through the meshes of our wisdom; of course, you will say that to be safe it must be subtile, that the coarse, violent asssasin pays a premium on detection.

"I knew a man, a 'party,' if you like, since the mot is popular. Where did we live? well, say India; Hindostan is wide. Suppose we call him Smith, the forgery may be pardoned.

"I knew him—not a bad creature, kindly and well enough disposed towards his fellow men. We will describe him as a subaltern of Native Infantry, aged nine-and-twenty or so, and married for the past three years; his wife, a fairly pretty woman, some four years his junior. He was a popular, pleasant man, and content with his lot. But—ay! there's always but—this man, in a sort of fool's paradise, lived content. When, without any particular warning, his wife clouded; his wife fell ill, grew worse, medical men did their best, (we won't say to kill her,) and the end of it was that she he loved 'lay a dying.'

"'My dear fellow, nerve yourself, we can do no more, she will die,' so spoke the regimental doctor, and the rumble of his departing rolled out the requiem of his hearer's longings, and he knew that all the devotion of years was coming to naught, and he had to tell her. How was it to be done? God knows how, but in some incoherent wise it was accomplished, and, out of his insanity, knowledge came to her. She knew that she must die; and he, more shattered of heart than she, grovelled by her couch, and, what? –prayed? Did he? I suspect he must have gone nearer to what you would have called blaspheming.

"When a hand touched his, and a voice spoke; 'Tom, don't break that simple man's heart of yours about me,' and somehow there was a hard cynical ring in the tone which grated on the husband. 'I am not worth it, Tom. I have carried about me, long enough, the weight of a deception, the burden of a lie. In my own despite, in the candor of death, I am speaking out. I shall teach you to curse me, my poor Tom; but I must tell you, I cannot die and hoodwink you. Your manly faith has not faltered, and I must, at last, be true.'

"What was going to be disclosed, what black arcana were to be revealed! He sat in paralysis, she went on, and of what she said this is the epitome.

"Suddenly ordered on service (his regiment had taken part in the Sutlej campaign) he, like so many others, had to leave his wife behind, and alone. One they knew had, in the long weariness of those lonely days, wormed himself into her confidence, her affections, had triumphed and remained exultant. On her fell sickness, repentance, confession, death; on her husband, solitude, without even a loving regret to mitigate its bitterness—he remained unscathed.

"Well, well: and Nemesis? Listen. A January afternoon, a broad expanse of level yellow-green (a crop of wheat and pease; these things ripen then in India,) a line of coolies, two Englishmen, gun in hand, away buzz the quail—brrr, brrr,—piff, paff—'my bird,' 'your eye wiped, old fellow,' 'hold on load,' etc., etc., 'all right,' 'line bandho,' 'chulo'—brrr, brrr,—piff, paff,—piff, paff,—'Oh, my God!' and a hurry of feet, and a man down, and blood on the trampled corn, not blood of quail!

"And while men of dark skin hurry away on foot to seek aid, one fair-skinned and fair-haired man, unharmed, bends over another who lies prone in the ripening harvest. The wounded man is very pale, the sound man, with fingers compressing the wound in his companion's thigh, to all appearance very earnest for his welfare. Brown-hued humanity is hurrying hither and thither. The white man, unhurt, watches closely the injury done by his unlucky shot (his uncocked gun had exploded suddenly,) a space is left around the twain. Then speaks he who is unscathed.

"'Bryan, you will never more mislead wife of mine.'

"And he removes his finger from the severed artery.

"And straightway the wounded man, who, with every fibre in his shot-shattered frame has been holding on to life, abjures existence; looks up in his friend's face, sees in it what extinguishes all vitality in him, tries to speak and fails, and in the sudden horror—dies.

"And murder will out? Bon a savoir! Bottega! un gelato di limonada."

He ate his ice, looking just a little pale, for he had excited himself as he went on. We strolled round the Piazza: and then, passing in front of the cathedral and the palace, parted at the corner of the Piazzetta. In a day or two afterwards, the rail rolled me away toward Milan and Turin.

This odd story has since recurred to me, while, at times, I recall scraps of my quondam associate's conversation, which had in them hints of many years spent abroad, and in torrid climes. And again, he had a way of looking at the Austrian troops, whenever he saw them under arms, and a quick appreciation of defects or good points in their tenue or their manœuvres, that had in it a smack of the barrack yard and parade ground.

Had he ever lived in India, I wonder? Was it, perchance, his own story which he had thus half-scoffingly sketched?—who knows? He was just the kind of a man whom I should decline to trust, if feeling that I had played him any trick for which he was likely to bear me malice.

OUR CLUB.

NUMBER TWO.—INITIATIVE.

SOME trivial and misiuformed persons have seen fit to speak disparagingly of "Our Club." From remarks that have come to our ears, we have been led to believe that they belong to that class who always undervalue others' possessions, disparage tho worth of luxuries in which they cannot indulge, and talk gossip of the person who administers to the souls in the church with taller steeple than their own. Some persons of the femalo sex, also, whose literary taste is amply satisfied with daily reference to the newspaper record of matrimony and death, and an occasional glauce at priuted recipes for the preparation of poultices and pastry, are prodigal of sneers at "sech lit'rary people as them young fellers that b'long t' the Club." Notwithstanding these offensive remarks from persons who live in the immediate proximity of the mausion, where we enter to seek such intellectual pabuium as the evening may furnish, several of the Club —the Editor, for one—have noticed, iu passing, a decided fluttering of curtains and an uneasy motion of shutters, as of some curious person, concealed within, endeavoring to obtain a furtive glance at The Club in walking costume. We have, besides, found the auxiliaries of such persons, as if they might catch some pearl as it dropped from the lips of wisdom, standing at the outer door, burdened with inquiries concerning the welfare of persons who, all the world was perfectly well aware, lived at the next door, or asking dishonestly for the residences of persons who never lived anywhere—the mere fictions of their idle curiosity. These evidences of malicious envy are bnt petty grievances to the npright members, who would feel that they had indeed attained to but little philosophy, if they could not listen undisturbed to wayward tongues. Such persons may think now that this paper will let slip some diamond secret, which they would give their bonds for future discretion to possess; but I sincerely promise that my friend, the Editor, will carefully criticise all these papers, and add his prudence with my own in keeping forever concealed such facts as might hint to sagacious readers any solution of Club problems, which should never be solved by those who are not invited.

The first hour that one passes in that mystic circle is one which almost any one would mark with a white-stone—as if he had come to lose an ever-cherished hope, and now must bury it forever. The hope must have boen one that looked to some future day of maturity and wisdom, when he could stand up in the presence of great men; but, now, in his first hour in this singular presence, in the golden silence through which, at intervals, come dropping out the silver words from where the Doctor's mild face is beaming, and the pearly rhythm of the Professor's wit, that gathers in the chimes of temperate laughter, and the dignified organ-swell of the Philosopher's gravity, he feels as if he had been nourishing a dream that now was passing out unnoticed through the ivory gate. I call that a mystic presence, which was indeed so, till my poor, infant eyes were open to comprehend its significance. How could I, only a meagre, jagged sentence of the world's prosaic volume, at once chime in with the rhythm of this poetic page. Such was this little room, small enough as the carpenter measures, but bounteous in utterances of marvellous wisdom. Would you seriously wonder if I told you how I went that night unto my rest, bearing away on my tongue the flavor of unearthly sweets, and in my dreams was carried into the presence of sages whose graves the world cannot point out? Did I not wonder when I awoke, if my poor brain, that was not used to any but light potations of wit and wisdom, would not succumb to the wild intoxication of great learning? In the monotone of my former life, I had not felt that there was anything but a poetic tinkling in the suggestion that "a little learning is a dangerous thing;" but, now, through terrible confusion of wits, the experience of undreamed-of dreams, and a new thoughtfulness, I was to come and gird myself anew, and believe that one ought to "drink deep, or taste not the Pierian spring." Had I not forgotten to bear away in memory the photographs of the natural citizens among whom I had passed an evening hour, but, instead, had placed about them the halo which their exalted wit seemed to bestow upon them? I might have remembered, and so been more subdued, the fragile fame of that nervous disciple, whom Nature did not endow with superhuman strength, unless it be in intellect, and that the swift-footed Achilles of the circle was not panoplied, except it were in the armor of manly beauty. Achilles wears the latest pattern of "helps-to-read;" but his familiarity with all the classic poets and the morsels of quaint learning, with which he will occasionally startle the Club, makes parties forget, then at least, that his personal beauty is in the beaming eye, or that the brilliancy of that organ may be magnified a trifle; in that we have to be on the outside and the eye is on the inside of the spectacle.

It really takes a long time ere the novice can look around into every face with a mild and undazzled eye. The Doctor did not utter any articulate sound during the exquisite agony of my novitiate, and I did not fail to breathe a solemn Benedicite upon him for his discretion. I remember that it was enough for me to see his unconquerable mildness and the thoughtful eye that all the time was thinking and speaking, and telling me, that the rich current of his speech, when once it flowed, could bear on its bosom rich argosies of maturity —bold logic that, if it would, could annihilate the unuttered scepticism that slept in my breast—philosophy that could unravel unanswered problems. I believe that the Philosopher was considerate of my modest ignorance, and he, who seems to live only to utter great tomes of learning, kindly spoke out only duodecimos and sexdecimos, purposely avoiding those deep fords of learning which only giants can cross, and without uttering, only suggesting the magnificent sentences that were sleeping on his lips and in his brain. I had seen the Editor so many times before, that, had any one inquired, I should certainly have said I knew him truly, yet, in this before unknown sphere, where he conversed in sympathy with these very sagacious gods, I began to comprehend his stature and to reproach myself with thinking so meanly, as I had done, of a fellow-mortal of varied superior attainments. Although I had before met and been overshadowed by the learning of professors, it was only in the dignified reserve that guarded their public ministration, that I had seen them, not when I could catch the melody that mingles with their private greetings, or taste of the divine mirth that would heal every man's melancholy. And, in the shadows of crowds, I had seen the unobtrusiveness of that nervous disciple, but I did not divine that I should one day ask him to let me call him the young Charles Lamb, and promise that I would never interrupt the flow of geniality and cleverness. I know he is not a clerk in the India House, but he goes in and out every day in uprightness where wise and opulent merchants go, and where there is such continuous song of the Eagles as would make duller souls always melodious with virtue. It was not strange that I should recognize at a glance the countenance of Achilles, for his movements all carried with them a divine significance; but as I contemplated his bravery and beauty, I wondered if he still clung to the worship of the mythologic gods, and if in this circle he found none as great as Agamemnon, King of Men. But it would be strange if his modern life had brought no beauteous Helen to raise up cohorts against his terrible power. He is so strong that he can always be generous, and if he has not to fight that another may be crowned with his own crown, I know that he will fight bravely his own fight, and will only conquer the gentler foes upon his knees.

I cannot lead you as gently up the declivity, which I had long tried to ascend from the valley of my inexperience, to where I could better contemplate the grandeur of these lofty cliffs on which all these were standing, as I myself had perforce to go, and to-day I have not yet found a level that can approach theirs; but I must always use the tallest stilts whenever I speak, that my voice may not seem to come from below, and when I cannot stand longer so, I find that I may cultivate a solemn but approving silence, which, though it be only my native dullness, may perchance appear like wisdom. If I can, I shall sometime note the great utterances that are ever falling, and let you hear them—for I find I cannot ask you to come and sit around our board—although the Doctor has intimated that it would be an error to carry out into the world's chill atmosphere the warm humor and kindly thoughts that so much nourish our heads and hearts. Some very curious persons, who have been reading this column, half believe they have already found me betraying something of the mystery, which I did not intend, and which they only have the perception to recognize. I shall be always watchful that I tell nothing which every one will not understand. What if I should really utter those mystic sentences that belong to the inner shrine, and which had such terrible and sublime effects when first whispered to the great comprehensions of the Doctor and the Philosopher!

THERSITES.

PARLOR MAGIC

How to tell a number you have never seen: Think of a number you have never seen, and then tell it to any body who will listen to it.

FOR BOARDING HOUSES.

Get a large leg of mutton, weighing abont eight or nine pounds, and have it hot for dinner. If you have it for supper, and there is any of it left, besides the bone, it will be a most extraordinary piece of magic.

Buy half-a-dozen new handkerchiefs; after counting them, place them in a draw. Lock the latter carefully, and take the key with you. Be absent during the day, and on your return count the handkerchiefs. You will find one of the best handkerchiefs missing. The question is, by what magic can it have disappeared, for the key of your draw has been in your pocket all the while?

The same with your coals, and sugar, and candles, and the half-pcuce you leave in your pockets. You have only to turn your back for a minute, and you will find, on looking again, that they have all disappeared.

In the same mysterious manner will gin be turned into water, and brandy turn from brown into pale. Pens, ink, and paper, also will disappear most miraculously—no one being able to tell how; whilst hair-oil or pomatum, and such other requisites for the toilette, were never known to keep longer than the first day.

HINTS FOR THE NURSERY.—The treatment of a new-born child should be kind, but not cordial—and especially not Godfrey's cordial.

Children should be encouraged to rise with the lark—but the lark should not consist of a bolstering match, or any similar occupation.

Milk is the best food for infants, but curd should be avoided, nor should the child have its whey.

Pie-crust is bad for children, and in the nursery neither pie-crusts nor promises should ever be broken.

If a child should by accident eat anything poisonous, a good emetic may be obtained from the rust of old iron. Perhaps it would be safer to cram down the infant's throat "a wise saw," or a rusty proverb.

THE moment a man is satisfied with himself, everybody else is dissatisfied with him.

JERROLDIANA.

Dogmatism is a puppyism come to its full growth.

Self-defense is the clearest of all laws; and for this reason: the lawyers didn't make it."

I've heard people say, truth lives in a well; if so, I'd adviso you to take an early dip in the bucket.

My notion of a wife at forty is that a man should be able to change her, like a bank note, for two twenties."

"That cat has got a cold," said a friend to Jerrold, pointing to a domestic favorite. "Yes," Jerrold replied; "the poor thing is subject to cat-arrh!"

The highest and most valuable of all the female virtues—a virtue that Eve herself was certainly not born with—is to be a quick dresser.

Never own that a woman is right. Do it once, and on the very conceit of it she'll be always wrong for the rest of her life.

Jerrold was showing off the accomplishments of a favorite terrier. "Does he beg?" asked a visitor. "Beg!" replied Jerrold, "ay, like a prince of the blood."

Some people were praising the writings of a certain Scot. Jerrold remarked: "I quite agree with you that he should have an itch in the temple of Fame."

Ask a woman to a tea-party in the Garden of Eden, and she'd be sure to draw up her eyelids and scream: "I can't go without a new gown."

To feel the chains, but take especial care the world shall not hear them clank! 'Tis a prudence that often passes for happiness.

Women are all alike. When they're maids they're mild as milk; once make them wives, and they lean their backs against their marriage certificates, and defy you.

"Do you know," said a friend to Jerrold, "that Jones has left the stage and turned wine merchant?" "Oh, yes," Jerrold replied; "and I'm told that his wine off the stage is better than his whine on it."

Consider the whole world an orchard, guarded by the man-traps and spring-guns of laws; you have only to know where the laws are laid, that, though you intrude upon them ever so closely, you are never caught or hit by them.

There are three things that no man but a fool lends, or, having lent, is not in the most hopeless state of mental crassitude if he ever hope to get back again. These three things are books, umbrellas and money.

Jerrold went to a party at which a Mr. Pepper had assembled all his friends. Jerrold said to his host, on entering the room: "My dear Mr. Pepper, how glad you must be to see all your friends mustered!"

When Morris had the Haymarket Theatre, Jerrold on a certain occasion had reason to find fault with the strength of the company. Morris expostulated, and said: "Why, there's V.; he was bred on these boards!" Jerrold—"He looks as though he had been cut out of them."

Jerrold had a favorite dog, that followed him everywhere. One day, in the country, a lady who was passing, turned round and said, audibly: "What an ugly little brute!" Whereupon Jerrold, addressing the lady, replied: "O, madam! I wonder what he thinks about us at this moment?"

At an evening party, a very elderly lady was dancing with a young partner. A stranger approached Jerrold, who was looking on, and said: "Pray, sir, can you tell me who is the young gentleman dancing with that very elderly lady?" "One of the Humane Society, I should think," replied Jerrold.

Jerrold was seriously disappointed with a certain book written by one of his friends. This friend heard that Jerrold had expressed his disappointment, and said to him: "I hear you said it was the worst book I ever wrote." Jerrold—"No, I didn't. I said it was the worst book anybody ever wrote."

A gourmet joined a social club to which Jerrold belonged, and opened a conversation on dining. "Now, nobody," said the Loudon Savarin, "can guess what I had for dinner to-day!" The company declined to speculate, whereupon the gourmet said, with an air: "Why, calf's-tail soup!" Jerrold—"Extremes meet!"

One day Mr. Tillbury entered a room where Jerrold was talking with some friends. Macready was about to produce Macbeth at Covent Garden. Tillbury complained that he had been cast for the Physician, having previously been entrusted with the more genial part of the Witch. Jerrold—"Made you the Physician! Humph! that is throwing physic to the dogs with a vengeance!"

A very popular medical gentleman called on Jerrold one day. When the visitor was about to leave, Jerrold, looking from his library window, espied his friend's carriage, attended by servants in flaming liveries. Jerrold—"What! doctor, I see your livery is measles turned up with scarlet fever."

One evening, at the Museum Club, a member very ostentatiously said, in a loud voice: "Isn't it strange, we had no fish at the Marquis's last night? That has happened twice lately. I cannot account for it." "Nor I," replied Jerrold, "unless they ate it all up stairs."

She conceived that a servant ought to be a sort of nun, and from the moment she enters your house should take leave of all the world beside. Has she not her kitchen for willing hands always to do something? And then, for company, doesn't she see the butcher, the baker, the dust-man—to say nothing of the sweeps?

My son, if poor, see wine in the running spring; let thy mouth water at a last week's roll; think a threadbare coat the "only wear," and acknowledge a whitewashed garret the fittest housing-place for a gentleman. Do this, and flee debt. So shall thy heart be at peace, and the Sheriff be confounded.

A man who hated national prejudices invited an English uncle to a French restaurant to "dine 'em out" of him. After dinner he said to him: "What do you think of the French now, uncle?" "Not so bad," he replied, with a look of contrition. "Not so bad, if they wouldn't eat frogs." "You recollect the third dish—delicious, wasn't it?" The old fellow smacked his lips with recollections of delight. In that dish there were two-and-thirty frogs." The uncle insisted upon falling ill immediately, was carried home, went to bed, scratched his nephew out of his will, and died. Would it be believed?—a nurse was found to swear that in his last moments she heard 'em croak! See what comes of national prejudice.

DOMESTIC RECEIPTS.

Pineapple Fritters.—Take ½lb. of fine flour, I½ pint of new milk, the yelks of 4 fresh eggs, add make the same into a light batter, adding the whites of 2 eggs (first beaten into a light froth). Bruise ½ a dozen slices of sound ripe pineapple into a pulp, and stir it well up with the batter, adding at the same time a little nutmeg and cinnamon, grated fine. Introduce a clean pan over a brisk clear fire, and ladle out the batter into the pan as you may require it, according to the size of your fritters. Fry them in fresh butter, turning them only once, when they will assume a brown, crisp complexion. When quite done, remove them into a dish, sprinkling over them a dessert-spoonful of crushed sugar. Apple and currant fritters can be prepared after a like manner. The cinnamon can be dispensed with if objected to.

To Pot Trout.—Take from 6 to 8 trout from ½lb. to ¾lb. in weight each. Gut, scale, and wipe them dry, in a clean cloth. Then dispose of them in a shallow dish, about 2½ inches in depth, containing a very small portion of water at the bottom, enough to supply a sufficiency of steam to pass through them. Add to them a supply of ground mace, ground black pepper, salt, and 2 or 3 bay leaves, covering the dish over with a tin protection, and consign the same to a slow oven, to admit of the fish to be steamed through. When the prongs of a fork will pass readily into them, they will be done, and may be taken up. When cold remove the bay leaves, and let them be well covered with clarified butter. A flat board should be superimposed over the orifice of the dish, to prevent the air from entering it.

Biscuit Pudding.—This is a very delicate and nice pudding for an invalid, and is made so simply that it is generally found useful in cases of illness. Grate 3 large Naples biscuits, pour upon them 1 pint of boiling milk or cream, and cover them down closely. When cold, add the yelks of 4 eggs, the whites of 2, some nutmeg, a little brandy, ½ a spoonful of flour, and some sugar to taste. Boil this for 1 hour in a basin or mould, and serve it up with melted butter, wine, and sugar.

A Potato Escallop.—Obtain 1lb. of sound potatoes in their skins, wash and boil them until the same are thoroughly done (if they are of a mealy character the better). Remove the rinds, and mash them in a mortar, with ¼lb. of sweet butter, adding grated nutmeg, pepper, and salt to your liking. Abstract the meat from a fresh crab, ready boiled, adding ¼ pint of red shrimps, divested of their shells, and mix them up with your potato meal. When the ingredients are fully incorporated, introduce the same into tin escallops, or strong saucers, disposing of the latter in a hot oven with a clear slow fire. Let them stand until a rich brown crust presents itself upon the surface of the saucers, when they may be taken up and served at table. The foregoing constitutes an economical luxury when shell-fish is in full season.

Tomato Marmalade.—Take ripe tomatoes in the height of the season (in autumn they are insipid), weigh them, and to every pound of tomatoes allow 1lb. of sugar. Put the tomatoes into a large pan or a small tub, and scald them with boiling water, so as to make the skin peel off easily. When you have entirely removed the skins, put the tomatoes (without any water) into a preserving kettle, wash them, and add the sugar, with 1oz. of powdered ginger to every 3lb. of fruit, and the juice of 2 lemons, the grated rind of 3 always to every 3lb. of fruit. Stir up the whole together, and set it over a moderate fire. Boil it gently for 2 or 3 hours till the whole becomes a thick smooth mass, skimming it well, and stirring it to the bottom after every skimming. When done put it warm into jars, and cover tightly. This will be found a very fine sweetmeat.

WELSH RAREBIT.—Cut a pound of cheese in slices a quarter of an inch thick; put a piece of butter the size of an egg in a small frying-pan. Lay in the cheese, cook it about five minutes, and add two eggs well beaten, a dessert-spoonful of mixed mustard, and a little pepper. Stir it up; have ready some slices of buttered toast; turn the cheese over it, and send it to table very hot. It is also very good cooked without the eggs.

PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE.—This Institute, which has only been some three months started, has already become of great importance and benefit to our city, as evidenced by the number of sufferers from all diseases daily seen there, and the terms of praise and gratitude in which these sufferers speak of the Surgeons to the Institute. The Institute is conducted by Surgeons of well-known reputation in Europe, who possess some of the highest Medical Degrees to be obtained, and whose skill and success in the cure of Special Diseases, has been commented upon by such men as M. M. Ricord and Actow. These gentlemen have opened the Peake Medical Institute, 313 Montgomery Street, for the benefit of all sufferers from Special Diseases on this Pacific coast, who are now enabled to entrust their cures to Surgeons who have devoted years to the study of these diseases in the immense Hospitals of Paris and London, and who have gained reputations in Europe previously to their coming to our part of the world. We hear that these gentlemen give free consultations, and their charges are to be most moderate. It is really a long-wished for boon that is now satisfied by the opening of this Institute. Sufferers unfortunate enough to have any Special Diseases, can now be confident of obtaining the best treatment and thorough cures from educated and skilful Surgeons.

MR. CHRISTIAN PFISTER has the honor of calling public attention to his great assortment of Perfumery, Brushes, fine Hair-pins, Hair of all lengths and colors, Perruques, Toupes, Combs—tortoise-shell, buffalo and Irish born, Ivory and rubber; Cravats of all kinds; Jouvin's Gloves, ladies' and gentlemens'; silk Suspenders and common ones; Shirts and Collars; now styles of Head Dresses, etc. Having made new arrangements with Paris houses, it is within his power to offer to his numerous customers superior advantages over any others in the trade. Six artist coiffeurs will always be found ready for business in the gentlemen's room. A special apartment is provided for the coiffure of ladies.

RICHES HAVE WINGS.—Nothing illustrates this more forcibly than the recent fall in mining Stocks. Therefore, provide a certainty for your family in the future by insuring your life in the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company—cash assets, $6,500,000.

BIGELOW & BRO., Agents,
Over Parrott's Bank.
'y30-1m

BOYS! BOYS! BOYS!

NOW IS THE TIME!

H. M. LOCKWOOD & CO.,

New No. 624) ‖ CLAY STREET, ‖ (Old No 176

Have received a Large Stock of

GENTS' AND BOYS' CLOTHING

—AND—

FURNISHING GOODS,

Which they are selling

AT VERY LOW PRICES.

Every Garment warranted. All are invited to call and examine our goods.

H. M. LOCKWOOD & CO.,
my28 624 Clay street, San Francisco.

H. LUCKE,

BOOTMAKER, AND IMPORTER

—OF—

FRENCH BOOTS, SHOES AND GAITERS OF THE LATEST PARISIAN MAKE AND MODE.

Lady customers can have their measures forwarded and their shoes made in Paris in the latest style and by the most celebrated manufacturers, at moderate rates.

No. 648 Washington street, below Kearny,
SIGN OF THE GOLDEN BOOT. jy30-3m

DR. GEORGE F. WOODWARD,

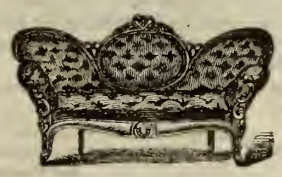
SURGEON U. S. PENSION BUREAU.

OFFICE, 127 MONTGOMERY STREET,

Opposite the Occidental Hotel, San Francisco.

jy30-tf

THE MOST EXTENSIVE,



BEST SELECTED, CHEAPEST,

—AND—

LATEST STYLES

—OF—

Furniture.

GOODWIN & CO.,

No. 528 Washington street,

Are constantly receiving, and have on hand a large assortment of FINE ROSEWOOD, MAHOGANY, and BLACK WALNUT PARLOR, LIBRARY and CHAMBER SUITS, with DINING ROOM SUITS TO ORDER.

☞ We guarantee both Price and Quality satisfactory to our Patrons.

GOODWIN & CO.,
jul8 No. 528 Washington street.

QUINCY HALL

Clothing Emporium!

THE Largest and Finest Store in the State is QUINCY HALL, 545, 547, and 549 Washington street, where can be found clothing of every description, of the finest quality and latest style. Hats, Caps and Furnishing Goods.

se3-tf

TYLER BROTHERS,

Importers, Wholesale and Retail Dealers in

School Books, Stationery,

PHOTOGRAPH ALBUMS,

PORTFOLIOS JUVENILE BOOKS, CHILDREN'S PICTURE BOOKS, FANCY ARTICLES, etc.,

NO. 632 WASHINGTON STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO.

au27-tf

A LADY WISHES TO EXCHANGE LESSONS in French, Music or Painting, for a room and board. Address "E. D. W.," care of W. H. BANCROFT, 609 Montgomery street. au13

TO THE SICK AND AFFLICTED!

Peake Medical Institute,

Established by Experienced European Physicians for the certain, safe and permanent cure of all Special Diseases.

Consulting Surgeon, DR. PRATT, late of Paris, Member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England.

CONSULTATIONS FREE!

THIS INSTITUTE, CONDUCTED BY EUROPEAN PHYsicians of celebrity, who are graduates of the first Colleges and Universities of Europe, and who have acquired unsurpassed knowledge and skill in the cure of all special diseases during years of experience and study in the largest Hospitals of London and Paris, is to enable all sufferers from special or private diseases, to obtain with certainty safe and speedy cures from Physicians who have devoted entire attention to the various special diseases. These diseases have hitherto generally fallen into the hands of ignorant quacks and charlatans, and the amount of damage and number of deaths that are yearly owing to the ignorant treatment of these diseases by these men, it is impossible to calculate. With one drug alone—viz., Mercury—they annually destroy thousands of unfortunate sufferers, who are often confiding and unsuspecting enough to attribute to the disease what has been the effect alone of the medicine they have been so rashly taking for the cure of their disease.

OBSERVE THAT

The Peake Medical Institute will entirely remedy this great evil, by enabling sufferers from various special diseases which are so common on this coast to obtain, with as much certainty as if they were in London or Paris,

SPEEDY, SAFE AND PERMANENT CURES,

from educated, experienced and skilful European Physicians whose knowledge and skill in the cure of all special diseases is unsurpassed.

Thus confidence and certainty of a speedy cure may be felt by all sufferers going for advice to

THE PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE,

and they will likewise be saved from the danger of falling into the hands of ignorant quacks who throng this city and annually ruin and destroy the health and happiness of so many.

The Institute is fitted up commodiously and privately, and no expense has been spared in obtaining the very best instruments and appliances of modern European surgery and medicine.

The consulting surgeon, Dr. Pratt, Member of the Royal College of England and author of several works on special diseases, has been for years with the celebrated Ricord of Paris, where he acquired considerable celebrity for his great success in the cure of Special Diseases. Dr. Pratt has very high testimonials from some of the most eminent Surgeons of Europe and his treatment is such that he can promise a cure in almost every case.

MENTAL OR BODILY DEBILITY AND WEAKNESS

Arising from youthful excesses and indiscretions or from neglected and badly treated disease, will be treated at

THE PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE

In the most certain and successful manner and in a very short time, by a Surgeon who possesses unsurpassed knowledge and skill in the care of these harassing complaints having been associated with Ricord and other most celebrated surgeons for years, in the largest hospitals of Paris.

Persons who imagine that they are not well or whose strength and vigor is not what it should be, would do well by calling at the Peake Medical Institute (consultations being gratuitous) and getting the opinion and advice of the Surgeon, as in many of these cases the malady is entirely mental, aggravated perhaps, by some disorder of the general health, and a little skilful and kind treatment is all that is wanted to make the patient hearty, robust and happy.

All the after ill effects of special diseases, caused by neglect, bad treatment and mercury, will be speedily and permanently cured at the

PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE,

The sufferer being restored to hearty, strong and robust health.

RHEUMATISM, ULCERS AND DISEASES OF THE SKIN.

Sufferers from these diseases come to the Institute with the certainty of obtaining a perfect cure through the skill of a Surgeon, who devoted himself entirely to the cure of these diseases in the large hospitals of Europe, and who has such an unequalled experience in their treatment, that he has never yet failed in curing even the worst cases. Diseases, of even the longest duration, will be perfectly and quickly eradicated.

THE EYES. THE EYES.

DISEASES OF THE EYE will have especial and particular treatment at the Peake Medical Institute from a Surgeon who has the greatest skill in the cure of all the diseases of this most delicate organ, having been for years in the celebrated eye hospitals of Vienna and Paris, where he gained a rare and perfect knowledge and skill in the cure of all its diseases. All operations that are necessary will be performed with unequalled skill and success. Cataracts will be successfully couched or extracted.

THE PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE

Thus enables sufferers from any of the numerous forms of Special and Private diseases, to feel confident of obtaining a perfect and speedy cure from skilful and experienced European Physicians, of the highest education and unsurpassed knowledge in the cure of these diseases, and who are graduates of the first Colleges and Universities of Europe, as shown by their diplomas at the Institute. Persons who have become broken down in health from excesses of any kind or from long-standing disease or mercurial treatment, may come to the Institute with the certainty of obtaining great relief and in all probability a perfect cure, through the extensive knowledge and skill of the Physicians.

Sufferers in the country can receive treatment by mail on receipt of letter with all symptoms, etc.

TO THE LADIES.

PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE.

This Institute is conducted by experienced European Physicians who have given years in the large Hospitals of London and Paris to the study of the treatment and cure of all the diseases and irregularities peculiar to women.

The Consulting Surgeon, Dr. Pratt, late of Paris, Member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England, is the author of a valuable work "On Diseases Peculiar to Females," and ladies suffering from any of the diseases peculiar to the sex are respectfully informed that they can be certain of a safe and sure cure in a short time at the Institute. The Institute is commodiously and privately arranged. Ladies in the country can receive all directions and treatment for a speedy cure, on receipt of letter with symptoms, etc. Consultations free, in English, French, Italian and German.

Address:

PEAKE MEDICAL INSTITUTE,
No. 313 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

CARPETS.

WE have just received and are now opening

NEW AND MAGNIFICENT STYLES OF WILTON

—AND—

Royal Velvet Carpets,

The finest Goods ever Imported into this State, to which we invite particular attention. Also a New Stock of

BRUSSELS CARPETS,

THREE-PLY AND INGRAIN CARPETS,

OIL CLOTHS, ALL WIDTHS AND STYLES,

PAPER HANGINGS, BROCATELLE CURTAIN REPS, SILK DAMASK,

WINDOW SHADES, MATS, ETC., ETC.

House-keepers and others in want of the above goods, will find our stock the most complete, and our

PRICES THE LOWEST IN THE CITY!

KENNEDY & BELL,

Southwest cor. Montgomery and California streets.
se24

SELLING OFF,

TO CLOSE BUSINESS,

ON ACCOUNT OF LEAVING FOR THE EAST.

ROSENBLATT'S

Palace of Fashion,

Number 125 Montgomery street.

OPPOSITE THE OCCIDENTAL HOTEL.

Branch, 125 J street, between Fourth and Fifth streets, Sacramento.

WILL SELL THE ENTIRE RICH STOCK OF REAL LACE Collars, Sleeves, Pocket Handkerchiefs, Hoop Skirts, Russia Leather Bags, Hosiery, Fancy Boxes, Fans, Portemonnaies, and Silk, Velvet, Cloth and Opera Cloaks,

AT HALF THE USUAL PRICES.

Real Point Lace Collars at $2 50
French Corsets 1 00

☞ STORE TO LET, and FIXTURES FOR SALE.
se24-1m

NOTICE TO SHIPPERS

—TO—

Red Bluff.

ON AND AFTER TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 20th, the steamers of the California Steam Navigation Company

WILL LEAVE SACRAMENTO

FOR RED BLUFF,

EVERY TUESDAY AND FRIDAY,

At 7 o'clock, A. M.

se24-tf J. WHITNEY, JR., President.

PHINEAS BANNING,

FORWARDING AND COMMISSION AGENT,

WILMINGTON & LOS ANGELES,

—DEALER IN

LUMBER, COAL, IRON, FLOUR, GRAIN, etc., etc.,

And Proprietor of the United States Mail Stage Line between Los Angeles and Wilmington. se24

SAN FRANCISCO AND SAN JOSE RAILROAD.

CHANGE OF TIME.

On and after OCTOBER 1st, 1864, Passenger Trains of the San Francisco and San Jose Railroad Company will run as follows:

Leave San Francisco at 8:30 A. M., 10:30 A. M., and 4 P. M.

Leave San Jose at 8:10 A. M. and 3:40 P. M.

SUNDAY TRAINS

Leave San Francisco at 8.30 and 10:30 A. M. and 4 P. M.

Leave San Jose at 8:10 A. M. and 3.40 and 6:30 P. M.

FREIGHT TRAINS

Leave daily (Sundays excepted) as follows: San Francisco at 4:45 P. M.; San Jose at 6 A. M.

A. H. HOUSTON,
se General Superintendent.

OCCIDENTAL HOTEL—Corner Montgomery and Bush streets, San Francisco.

This House possesses all the requirements of a FIRST CLASS HOTEL, its spacious READING ROOM, with large MINERAL CABINET and extensive COLLECTION OF SPECIMENS from the different Mining Regions of the Pacific Coast—BRANCH TELEGRAPH OFFICE connecting with Lines throughout the country—and NEWS STAND—all contributing to make it the Headquarters and Home for the Californian business man and tourist.

The TABLE of this House shall not be excelled by any.

BOARD, THREE DOLLARS PER DAY.

LEWIS LELAND & CO.,
my28 Proprietors.

MARKET STREET RAILROAD.

CHANGE OF TIME TABLE.

ON AND AFTER APRIL 1, 1864, Trains will start from the City and the Mission as follows:

Between the hours of 8:20 A. M. and 6 P. M., every 40 minutes, instead of, as heretofore, every 30 minutes, thus

FROM THE MISSION.

9:40	10:20	11:00	11:40

FROM THE CITY.

10:00	10:40	11:20	12:00

And so on till 6 o'clock.

Before 9 A. M. and after 6 P. M., the running will be the same as before.

my23 F. McCOPPIN, Superintendent.

GREGORY YALE,

ATTORNEY AT LAW,

OFFICE—On second floor of Sather & Co.'s Bank, corner of Montgomery and Commercial streets, Nos. 2, 3 and 4, San Francisco. jy2

Canton Tea Store, Established 1858.

GEO. S. HASKELL & CO.

IMPORTERS,
WHOLESALE AND RETAIL DEALERS
— IN —
JAPAN AND CHINA TEAS,
AND
GROCERIES.

Store fronting on
514 Market & 15 Sutter St.
☞ THREE DOORS ☜
BELOW THE MARKET HOUSE,
San Francisco.

Our Motto, ☞ "Large Sales at Small Profits for Cash. ☜

FAMILY NOTICE.

Bowen Brothers,

COR. MONTGOMERY AND CALIFORNIA STREETS,

SAN FRANCISCO.

Offer for sale:

Barton & Guesten's Salad Oil, the best in the world.
Boneless Sardines; a great luxury.
English Potted Meats.
Anchovy and Shrimp Paste.
Condensed Milk, preserved with refined Sugar hermetically sealed in cans for Army and Travelers' use. Its purity is guaranteed.
Bent's Water, Butter, Milk, Wine and Graham Crackers.
English, Stilton, Cheshire and Holland Cheese.
English Soups, assorted.
Pate de Foie Gras.
French Truffles and Mushrooms.
Spanish and French Olives, in kegs.
Spiced Oysters.
Dutch Herrings and Sardells.
English and American Bloaters.
Stuffed Olives and Mangoes.
Mess Mackerel.
Cider Vinegar.
Teas of every variety, imported expressly for our Family Trade.
Sugars of every kind direct from the Manufactory.

WINES AND LIQUORS,

Direct from Bond, Wholesale or Retail.

au6-tf

REMOVAL.

INSURANCE AGINST FIRE.

THE NORTH BRITISH AND MERCANTILE,
INSURANCE COMPANY
OF LONDON AND EDINBURGH.
ESTABLISHED, 1809.

Capital, $10,000,000. Accumulated Funds, January 1, 1864, $11,169,140. Deposit in California under State law, $75,000. Limit on single Risks, $100,000. Bankers, Messrs Tallant & Co. Fire Policies on buildings and contents, throughout the Pacific States and Territories, granted on the most liberal terms. Losses promptly adjusted and paid here in U. S. Gold coin.

Office removed to 414 California street, opposite Alsop & Co. WM. H. TILLINGHAST, Agent.
au19-3m

MANHATTAN FIRE INSURANCE
COMPANY OF NEW YORK.

Cash Capital and Surplus.....$750,000
Deposit in San Francisco.....$75,000

COLUMBIA FIRE INSURANCE CO.,
OF NEW YORK.

Cash Capital and Surplus.....$600,000
Deposit in San Francisco.....$75,000

THE ABOVE MENTIONED WELL-KNOWN and responsible Companies, having complied with the law enacted at the last session of the Legislature, and deposited with Messrs. Donohoe, Ralston & Co.

$75,000 EACH,

As additional security to Policy-holders, will continue to insure
BUILDINGS,
MERCHANDISE,
FURNITURE,
And other property in California, Oregon and Nevada Territory, against Loss or Damage by Fire, upon the most favorable terms.

All Losses promptly paid in United States Gold Coin.

R. B. SWAIN & CO., Agents,
ju25-tf 206 Front street, corner of California.

JOSEPH A. DONOHOE, San Francisco. | EUGENE KELLY, New York.

DONOHOE, KELLY & CO.,
SAN FRANCISCO.
EUGENE KELLY & CO.,
NEW YORK.

Bankers.

EXCHANGE ON

NEW YORK,
BANK OF LONDON, - - - - London.
BANK OF IRELAND. jy2

SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES!

Motto—The Singer Sewing Machines are the only machines that can sew all kinds of cloth, and with all kinds of thread.

THE SINGER LETTER A
TRANSVERSE SHUTTLE FAMILY
MACHINES,
With recent improvements for
HEMMING, FELLING,
TUCKING, GATHERING,
BINDING, CORDING,
QUILTING, BRAIDING, etc.,

Are unrivalled for Family and light Manufacturing purposes. We invite the special attention of ladies to the Folding Top Cabinets, our latest improvement. They are the most useful, convenient and novel Cabinets yet introduced, and are worthy of examination.

SINGER'S STANDARD
MANUFACTURING MACHINES,

For Tailoring, Boot and Shoe Making, Harness and Carriage Trimming, are the cheapest, best and only Machine worthy of patronage for general purposes.

☞ Call and examine, or send for a pamphlet.

THE SINGER MANUF. COMPANY,
No. 139 Montgomery street.
WM. BRODERICK, Agent. se3-3m

FORTY-FOUR FIRST PREMIUMS
IN 1863!

THERE IS BUT ONE
FIRST
PREMIUM SEWING MACHINE.

The GROVER & BAKER SEWING MACHINE has been awarded Twenty-three First Premiums at State Fairs, and Twenty-one at City and County Fairs, in 1863, making Forty-four in all.

R. G. BROWN, Agent.
my28 329 Montgomery Street.

$2,000 REWARD!

A REWARD OF TWO THOUSAND DOLLARS IS OFFERED by the subscriber to any person who will discover or produce a better article for dressing and preserving the HAIR than the

TRICOMALICUM!!

known in California for many years for its wonderful properties.

The TRICOMALICUM, composed of substances tonic and strengthening, possesses the priceless quality of renewing the Hair, of destroying dandruff, and of dressing and keeping it in a perfectly healthy state.

PRINCIPAL DEPOT at the store of the Inventor,
CHRISTIAN PFISTER,
se3-tf No. 227 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

TELEGRAPHIC EXCHANGE
—ON—
NEW YORK,
PAYABLE IN GOLD,
For sale in sums to suit by
au20-tf WM. T. COLEMAN & CO.

EXCHANGE
ON NEW YORK,
In sums to suit, at the lowest rates, for sale by
au20-tf WM. T. COLEMAN & CO.

GREAT TRIUMPH!!

STEINWAY & SONS

Were awarded the FIRST PRIZE MEDAL at the late great INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION AT LONDON, over the two hundred and sixty-nine Pianos entered for competition from all parts of the world.

The Special Correspondent of the New York Times says: "Messrs. Steinway & Sons' indorsement by the Jurors is emphatic, and stronger and more to the point than that of any European maker."

A constant supply of the above superior instruments can be found at the Agent's,
M. GRAY, 613 Clay street.

PIANO TUNING done by a first-class Workman, from Steinway & Son's Factory, New York. my28

COMMERCIAL STEAM PRINTING
HOUSE.
FRANCIS, VALENTINE & CO.,
517 CLAY and 514 COMMERCIAL STREETS.

Every description of BOOK, JOB and POSTER PRINTING done in the best style and at the lowest rates.
BOOK-BINDING and RULING done to order.

PILES! PILES!! PILES!!!

Not piles of Gold nor yet of Silver so much coveted by all men, but the bleeding, blind, or external Piles can be easily and speedily cured by the use of

WOOD'S SUB-POSITORY.

It is a preparation totally distinct from anything heretofore offered as a remedy for this painful and often fatal complaint. The Sub-Pository is neither a pill, powder, wash or salve, and yet it has proved to be a certain remedy for the Piles. Do not doubt this assertion, nor delay testing the truth of it if you are troubled with the Piles—you will not be deceived in it.

Sold wholesale and retail by W. NEWELL,
jul1 No. 630 Merchant street.

REDINGTON & CO.'S ESSENCE OF Jamaica Ginger!

Tbis valnable compound, which is now regarded as one of the most popular remedies in the domestic practice for various complaints of the digestive organs, such as Dyspepsia, Nausea, etc., is prepared solely from the WHITE JAMAICA GINGER, which is the best of all the varieties in use. In the preparation of

REDINGTON & CO.'S
ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER,

Great care is taken to have none but select Root, and to manufacture it in air-tight vessels, thus preventing the evaporation of its delicate essential oil, and preserving the true aroma of the Ginger. It thereby contains in its concentrated form all the valuable properties of the Jamaica Ginger, and is guaranteed to be free from any impurities whatever

It is a grateful stimulant and carminative, giving warmth and tone to the stomach equal to Brandy, without any of its injurious effects.

It will cure Nausea, caused by riding in railroad cars, or from sea-sickness, or other causes.

Miners and others who are exposed to the heat of the Sun often whilst working in cold water, should never be without

REDINGTON & CO.'s
ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER,

As by taking it as a tonic two or three times a day, it is almost a sure preventive to Chills and Fever; and to those who are farming the rich bottom lands of California it is likewise invaluable as a tonic, and should invariably be taken in the early morning before going to the fields, at the mid-day lunch, and before leaving off work at night.

Ask for REDINGTON & CO.'S ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER, and take no other, if you would always have a Pure and Reliable article.

An excellent external application for Gout, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, &c.

REDINGTON & CO., Proprietors,
416 and 418 Front street,
my28 San Francisco.

RAREY'S CONDITION POWDERS.

THE MOST POWERFUL AND BENEFICIAL AGENT known on the Stomach, Blood, Lungs and Bowels of HORSES, MULES, CATTLE, AND STOCK
of all descriptions.

GREAT BENEFIT TO HARD-WORKING HORSES.

All diseased Stock SPEEDILY and CERTAINLY CURED; healthy Stock will be brought into the very HIGHEST STATE of PERFECTION by giving them a SPOONFULL, wee

NO LIVERY STABLE SHOULD BE WITHOUT
RAREY'S
CELEBRATED CONDITION POWDERS!

All FARMERS and RANCHMEN should use constantly
RAREY'S
CELEBRATED CONDITION POWDERS

TEAMSTERS and STAGE COMPANIES everywhere should keep constantly on hand and freely use
RAREY'S
CELEBRATED CONDITION POWDERS!

They are equal to a Life Insurance on all Stock, as will be fully appreciated on trial by all True Economists.

REDINGTON & CO., Sole Agents,
my28 416 and 418 Front Street, San Francisco.

DEATH'S DOINGS!

THE DEAD TELL NO TALES, 'TIS SAID. WHAT A pity 'tis 'tis true; for if they could, what a "skedaddling" there would be among the numerous quacks and impostors of the present time.

THE MEDICAL FACULTY

May differ in relation to the treatment of disease, but there is very little diversity of opinion among them as to its origin. The philanthropist does not contend that any man becomes at once a

DRUNKARD OR A THIEF.

Nor does the well informed physician maintain that any one becomes at once an invalid. He knows that almost all diseases are of slow growth; that the seeds of disease are often sown at a remote period, and only await some change of climate or condition of the individual to manifest themselves.

A COMMON COLD!

Is the forerunner of many a fatal disease; a leading symptom of Consumption; a general disturbor of the human system, and

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP

Is the greatest barrier that can be thrown in the way of its progress. Its timely use will ward off Consumption, cure the Asthma, Bronchitis, Sore Throat, and the thousand and one other ills so sure to follow in its wake when too long neglected or improperly treated.

REDINGTON & CO., Agents,
San Francisco.
And for sale everywhere. se10-tf

ALLEN'S
LUNG BALSAM!

THE REMEDY FOR CURING

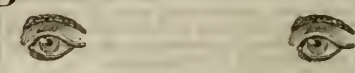
CONSUMPTION, COUGHS, COLDS,
ASTHMA, CROUP,
DISEASES OF THE THROAT, BRONCHITIS,
Pains and Oppression of the Chest or Lungs,
DIFFICULT BREATHING,
AND ALL THE
DISEASES OF THE PULMONARY ORGANS.

ITS ACTION IS EXPECTORANT, ALTERATIVE, SUDORIFIC, SEDATIVE, DIAPHORETIC and DIURETIC, which renders it one of the most valuable remedies known for curing diseases of the lungs. It excites expectoration, and causes the lungs to throw off the phlegm or mucus, changes the secretions and PURIFIES THE BLOOD; heals the irritated parts; gives strength to the digestive system, brings the liver to its proper action, and imparts, beyond the possibility of doubt, strength to the whole system. Such is the immediate and satisfactory effect, that it is warranted to break up the most distressing cough in a few hours' time, if not of too long standing. It is warranted to give entire satisfaction even in the most confirmed cases of Consumptim. It is warranted not to produce costiveness, which is the case with most remedies, or affect the head, as it contains no Opium in any form. It is warranted to be perfectly harmless to the most delicate child, although it is an active and powerful remedy for restoring the system. There is no real necessity for so many deaths by Consumption, when ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM will prevent it, if only taken in time.

Sold by all Druggists. Price $1 per bottle.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,
Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,
an27 Corner of Clay, San Francisco.

DR. STEPHENS'



CELEBRATED
Eye Salve!

AN INFALLIBLE REMEDY FOR
DISEASES OF THE EYE,

Acute or chronic, ulceration of the lachrymal glands, film and weakness of the vision from any cause; it is the most effectual remedy ever discovered.

Sold by all Druggists.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,
Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,
au27 Corner of Clay, San Francisco.

CATARRH!

DR. H. GOODALE'S
Catarrh Remedy!

FOR CENTURIES CATARRH HAS DEFIED THE skill of physicians and surgeons. No medical work contains a prescription that will eradicate it. Nothing save DR. GOODALE'S REMEDY will break it up, radically destroying the principle of the disease, and precluding the possibility of a relapse. Medical men have attempted to explain what it is, but admit that they have not discovered its antidote. Dr. Goodale offers this simple definition of its character: It is a disorder which he DOES CURE and they DO NOT. This is the great fact which it imports the sufferer to know, and a single trial will establish it beyond a question. Price, $1. Sold by all Druggists.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,
Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,
an27 Corner of Clay, San Francisco.

KENDALL'S AMBOLINE!

THE GREAT
UNEQUALLED
PREPARATION
FOR
RESTORING, INVIGORATING, BEAUTIFYING
AND
DRESSING
THE
Hair!

IT IS A STIMULATING, OILY EXTRACT OF BARKS and Herbs. It will cure all diseases of the scalp and itching of the head, entirely eradicates dandruff, prevents the Hair from falling out, or from turning prematurely gray, causing it to grow thick and long. It is entirely different from all hair preparations, and may be relied on.

Put up in boxes containing two bottles—Price $1.

☞ Sold by all Druggists.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,
Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,
Corner of Clay, San Francisco.

LAWRENCE & HOUSEWORTH,

OPTICIANS,

IMPORTERS OF OPTICAL, MATHEMATICAL AND PHILOSOPHICAL INSTRUMENTS,

[ST REOSCOPIC GOODS,

PHOTOGRAPHIC ALBUMS,

CARTES DE VISITE,

AND

JOSEPH RODGERS & SON'S

SUPERIOR CUTLERY,

No. 637 CLAY STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO,

(ESTABLISHED IN 1851,)

HAVE FOR SALE THE LARGEST STOCK ON THE PACIFIC COAST, consisting in part as follows:

720 dozen SPECTACLES, in Gold, Silver, Steel and Plated Frames
305 dozen EYE GLASSES, in Gold, Silver, Steel, Horn, Shell and Rubber Frames.
150 dozen WIRE GAUZE GOGGLES.
300 dozen SPECTACLE GLASSES and BRAZILIAN PEBBLES.
350 dozen SPECTACLE and EYE GLASS CASES.

395 Opera and Marine Glasses,	20,500 Card Photographs,
75 Telescope and Spy Glasses,	Photographic Albums,
178 dozen Magnifying Glasses,	600 Album Pictures—in oil colors,
80 doz. Pocket Compasses,	50 doz. Union Card Frames,
325 Hand Stereoscopes,	Joseph Rodgers & Son's CUTLERY,
74 Revolving Stereoscopes	100 doz. Table Knives,
1025 doz. Stereoscopic Views	260 doz. Pocket Knives,
Drawing Instruments in German Silver and Brass,	120 doz. Razors,
Boxwood and Ivory Scales,	50 doz. Razor Strops,
Microscopes in every Style,	130 doz. Scissors,
25 Magnetic Machines for Medical purposes,	SCISSORS, in Cases,
Aneroid Barometers,	100 doz. Gyroscope Tops,
	169 doz. Thermometers,
	25 doz. Hydrometers,
	Galvanic Batteries.

☞COUNTRY TRADERS will consult their own interest by examining our Stock and Prices before purchasing elsewhere.

 ORDERS FROM THE COUNTRY promptly executed.

☞CATALOGUES sent to any address FREE.

Address

LAWRENCE & HOUSEWORTH,

OPTICIANS,

637 CLAY STREET,

my28 SAN FRANCISCO.

R. G. SNEATH,

408 FRONT STREET, SAN FRANCISCO,

Importer and Wholesale Dealer in

GROCERIES, PROVISIONS, FLOUR, RICE

TOBACCOS, LIQUORS, ETC.

Branch House, - - SNEATH & BOARMAN, - - Red Bluff.

Forwarding Agent, D. W. EARL, Sacramento, who will receive and fill orders for all kinds of Goods on my account, and keep a large stock of Flour, Barley, Potatoes, Ground Feed, etc., etc. No charge for forwarding.

ALMADEN QUICKSILVER!

Orders for Goods not in my line furnished customers without extra charge. Orders for Goods in the Eastern markets attended to promptly. Daily Prices Current furnished when desired.

Orders respectfully solicited. jul1-1m

CONTINENTAL HOTEL,

SAN JOSE.

GEORGE T. BROMLEY.....Proprietor.

As a desirable place of resort for health or recreation, the above Hotel is not surpassed in the State.

Excellent accommodations for families, by the day, week, or month, on reasonable terms.

jn25

REMOVAL.

A. EDDY'S

Dancing Academy,

Platt's (Middle) Hall.

PUPILS TAUGHT IN ONE-HALF THE TIME OF elsewhere.

CLASSES—MONDAYS and FRIDAYS. Ladies at half-past 2 P. M.; Gents at half-past 7 P. M.

CHILDREN'S CLASSES—On SATURDAYS, at 2 P. M.; also, on WEDNESDAYS, at half-past 3 P. M.

Private instructions given separately or to classes, to suit the convenience of applicants.

SELECT SOIREES on alternate weeks. su6-tf

CARRINGTON & CO'S

GENERAL PURCHASING AGENCY,

No. 40 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Personal Orders, small or large, and for articles of every descriptions, PROMPTLY and carefully attended to.

Who wants anything from New York?

THIS AGENCY

Enables Country Residents to make purchases in the City without troubling busy friends, or mere acquaintances.

IF YOU WANT

Books, Prints, Clothing, Instruments, Music, Tools, Weapons, Sporting Implements, Fancy Stock, Jewelry, Silver or Plated Ware, Wines, Cigars, Fine Groceries, Furniture; in short, any Article, large or small, singly or in quantity, for Ladies' or Gentlemen's use or wear,

or for Dealers' Supplies, from a seal-ring to a steam-engine—a Cameo or a Cashmere; lace or leather,

SEND ON YOUR ORDERS.

We can fill them on better terms than you could obtain if here; while our commission, even on large orders, is much less than the expense of visiting the city in person.

Orders under $10, from places within reach of our daily Expresses, (except for perishable articles,) can be paid for on delivery by Express; others should be remitted for, either direct, or through some city friend to be paid when filled. Every order should be as clearly worded as possible.

Orders may be given in French, Spanish or German.

COMMISSION CHARGE, - - - FIVE PER CENT.

Address:

CARRINGTON & CO.,

su6 40 Broadway, N. Y.

REOPENED FOR THE SEASON.

THE CRYSTAL SPRINGS HOTEL,

Situated four miles from the San Mateo Railroad depot, in a most splendid valley, surrounded with large, beautiful, natural trees, is now open for the public. The road from San Mateo to the house has been recently macadamized, making it the finest drive in California. The House and Cottages have been refitted and thoroughly renovated. New spring beds and every modern improvement have been added to the sleeping department. The larder, as usual, contains all the delicacies of the season. Stages leave San Mateo depot on the arrival of the trains for Crystal Springs.

A fine stable is now opened at San Mateo by Messrs. Byrnes & Ames, who will furnish horses and carriages, or saddle horses, at low rates, to the public. Parties wishing rooms or meals, on arrival, can engage them by telegraph, via San Mateo.

jul1-tf TONY OAKES, Proprietor.

McRUER & MERRILL,

WHOLESALE AUCTION HOUSE,

204 and 206 California street.

Regular Sale Days - - - WEDNESDAYS and SATURDAYS

(Advances on Consignments.)

NOTICE!

From this date Mr. A. P. EVERETT has an interest in our business. McRUER & MERRILL.

San Francisco, October 20, 1862.

A. P. EVERETT, - - - - - - - - - Auctioneer.

jul1-3m

SQUARZA'S PUNCH.

First Premium, Sacramento, 1862.

First Premium at San Francisco District Fair, 1863.

First and Special Premium, Sacramento, 1863.

Wholesale and Retail.

my28 44 Leidesdorff street, San Francisco.

EDWARD BOSQUI & CO.,

517

CLAY STREET, SAN FRANCISCO.

BOOKBINDERS, PAPER-RULERS, AND

ACCOUNT-BOOK MANUFACTURERS.

Blanks of all kinds printed and ruled to any desired pattern. my28

MRS. HENDRICKS,

No. 629 MISSION STREET,

Devotes herself exclusively to

EMBROIDERY, STAMPING AND PINKING,

And she does more work than any other person in her line. She has by far the best collection and the largest assortment of stamps in the city. Her patterns are the most carefully drawn, and her marking is the evenest and the easiest to work, especially for those who are not very skilful. The coloring of all others rubs out, and the figures, if not traced round with thread, are effaced before the work is done; but Mrs. Hendricks' coloring, on all kinds of stuff, is warranted to defy rubbing, though it can be easily washed out. She is an engraver and engraves her own stamps, and thus is enabled to supply herself with all the latest patterns fashionable in Eastern and European cities.

Any customer can get a new pattern cut without charge, if Mrs. Hendricks can use it afterwards. Although there are many others in the same business in San Francisco, all acknowledge the superiority of Mrs. Hendricks, and send the most difficult work to her. Ladies are invited to call and examine her patterns.

☞ Remember the number, 629 Mission street, San Francisco. jy30tf*

DR. J. H. HATCH,

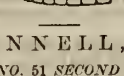
DENTIST,

Graduate of the Pennsylvania College of Dental Surgery.

All operations pertaining to the profession thoroughly and skillfully performed. Entire satisfaction in all cases guaranteed.

Office, 645 Clay street, between Montgomery and Kearny street, San Francisco. su27

SAVE YOUR



E. F. BUNNELL, D. D. S.,

ROOMS, NO. 51 SECOND STREET.

DR BUNNELL WILL SAVE EVERY TOOTH THAT ACHES from exposure of the nerve, or refund the charge for the operation, and extract each tooth without pay in EVERY case of failure. Teeth filled with gold, artificial bone, and golden lithodeon. Plate teeth on vulcanite and gold enameled base, of surpassing beauty and comfort.

☞ All work warranted. Price low.☜

N. B.—More than 1,000 aching teeth have been saved in succession, without the loss of one. au27-3m

REMOVAL.

DR. JOHN HEALD,

DENTIST,

OFFICE AND RESIDENCE: STEVENSON HOUSE,

Montgomery street, corner of California. Entrance on both streets. ROOMS 12 and 13. jy30-3m

WONDERFUL TRIUMPH

IN AMERICAN DENTISTRY.

DR. BEERS & CO.,

617 Clay street,

ARE NOW MANUFACTURING THE NEW style of ARTIFICIAL TEETH so highly approved at the East, and which to be appreciated only requires to be seen. The Teeth, Gums and Plate are made of one entire piece of Porcelain without seam or joint, combining great strength and beauty with absolute purity and freedom from any metallic taste, while the coloring of the gums and the interior of the mouth are so perfect as to almost defy detection. All interested in the progress of the Arts are invited to examine samples of this work.

Superior Gold and Vulcanite Work also manufactured as usual, but at greatly reduced prices. jul8

THE CALIFORNIAN.

A PAPER FOR THE TIMES.

Devoted to Live Topics,

AND THE

BEST INTERESTS OF CALIFORNIA.

Is published

EVERY SATURDAY MORNING,

728 MONTGOMERY STREET.

Nothing will be spared that will enable THE CALIFORNIAN to appeal to the Public for support, not only as the

BEST JOURNAL ON THE PACIFIC COAST,

But also as being

THE EQUAL OF ANY ON THIS CONTINENT!

Paper of a superior quality and weight is being made EXPRESSLY FOR THE CALIFORNIAN,

THE BEST TALENT OF THE STATE

Is employed upon THE CALIFORNIAN, and arrangements have been made with contributors abroad for

EASTERN AND FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE.

The voluntary notices bestowed by the press of the Eastern cities have been no less warm and congratulatory than those which we have received at the hands of our cotemporaries of the Pacific. Their verdict is unanimously in favor of

THE CALIFORNIAN,

and all join in pronouncing their unqualified approval of its unequalled merits.

Its reputation is now fully established. It is not

EXCELLED BY ANY LITERARY JOURNAL on the Continent.

Let the people of the mountains and the valleys

BUY THE CALIFORNIAN!

Let every lover of choice literature throughout the States and Territories of the Pacific coast

READ THE CALIFORNIAN!

Let no family be without this paper, which, as an Eastern cotemporary remarks, is creditable to the people who sustain it. Therefore,

SUBSCRIBE

FOR THE

CALIFORNIAN!

THE TERMS OF THE CALIFORNIAN are $5 per year by mail to subscribers, invariably in advance; 50 cents per month served by carriers.

All communications and correspondence must be addressed to "THE CALIFORNIAN,"

Office, No. 728 Montgomery street,

SAN FRANCISCO.

FARRAND'S OSCILLATING

Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALLED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REduction and amalgamation of Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY.

As a guarantee of what this machine will do, I propose, with any gentleman who will produce an Amalgamator that will work the same amount of ore in the same number of hours, with the same outlay of power, and produce the equal result, to deposit the sum of FIVE HUNDRED DOLLARS each, the money so deposited to be drawn by the person who shall be declared to have produced the best result. The money (the $500) by whichever party won to be paid over to some one of the benevolent institutions in this State, to be named by the party losing. This proposition is not made with the view of detracting from the merits of any Amalgamator now before the public, but for the purpose of placing this valuable improvement before such persons as may be interested in quartz milling, and to whom the matter properly belongs.

I CHALLENGE COMPETITION.

CALL AND SEE THE MACHINES WORK!

W. D. FARRAND.

R. L. OGDEN, Agent, Southeast corner of Montgomery and California streets, San Francisco. jy30tf

LOCKE & MONTAGUE,

IMPORTERS OF

STOVES AND METALS,

Nos. 112 and 114 Battery street,

jy2 SAN FRANCISCO.

GEORGE B. MERRILL,

ATTORNEY AT LAW,

Office, 520 Montgomery street, (over Messrs. Sather & Co.'s Bank,)

SAN FRANCISCO.

Gives special attention to the Probate of Wills and the Administration of Estates. an20

JOHN GORMAN,

NOTARY PUBLIC AND CONVEYANCER,

No. 705 MONTGOMERY STREET,

(Near Washington,)

Metropolitan Block, SAN FRANCISCO.

jy9.

LEGAL.

ADMINISTRATOR'S SALE of Real ESTATE.

NOTICE IS HEREBY GIVEN, THAT IN PURSUANCE of an order of the Probate Court of the city and county of San Francisco, State of California, made on the 16th day of August, 1864, in the matter of the Estate of ANDREW ROBESON, deceased, the undersigned Administrator, with the will annexed, of said deceased, will sell to the highest bidder for cash, payable in United States gold coin, and subject to confirmation by said Probate Court, on MONDAY, the 10th day of OCTOBER, 1864, at 12 o'clock, noon, of that day, at No. 108 Front street, in said city and county, all the right, title and interest of the said Andrew Robeson at the time of his death, and all the right, title and interest that the said estate has, by law or otherwise, since acquired, other than or in addition to that of said deceased at the time of his death, in and to all that certain lot of land situated in said city and county, and described as follows:

Commencing at a point on the north line of Ellis street 77 1-2 feet west from the northwest corner of Mason and Ellis streets; thence running westerly along said line of Ellis street 20 feet, thence at a right angle northerly 60 feet, thence at a right angle easterly 20 feet, and thence at a right angle southerly 60 feet to the point of beginning.

And the said Administrator will receive offers or bids therefor at said place, No. 108 Front street, from this date till said 10th day of October, 1864.

EDWARD F. STONE,
Administrator, with the will annexed, of
Andrew Robeson, deceased.

D. P. Barstow, Attorney for Administrator, 24 Montgomery Block. se10-5t

IN THE COUNTY COURT of the city and county of San Francisco, State of California.—In the matter of the Petition of JOSEPH GENTH, an Insolvent Debtor.

Pursuant to an order of the Hon. Samuel Cowles, Judge of the said County Court, notice is hereby given to all the creditors of said Insolvent, JOSEPH GENTH, to be and appear before the Hon. Samuel Cowles, Judge as aforesaid, in open Court, at the court-room of said Court, in the City Hall, in the city and county of San Francisco, on MONDAY, the 26th day of SEPTEMBER, 1864, at 10 o'clock, A. M., of that day, then and there to show cause, if any they can, why the prayer of said Insolvent should not be granted, and an assignment of his estate be made, and he be discharged from his debts and liabilities, in pursuance of the statute in such case made and provided; and in the mean time all proceedings against said Insolvent be stayed.

Witness, my hand and the seal of said Court, this 22d day of August, A. D. 1864.

(Seal and stamp.) WM. LOEWY, Clerk.
By J. NAPHTALY, Deputy Clerk.

Barnett & Cleveland, Attorneys for Petitioner, 634 Clay street. au23-5t

IN THE DISTRICT COURT of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco.—FANNY L. GREEN, Plaintiff, vs. ROBERT E. GREEN, Defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said city and county of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to ROBERT E. GREEN, Defendant: You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff, in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days, (exclusive of the day of service,) after the service on you of this Summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this District, within twenty days; otherwise, within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree dissolving the bonds of matrimony existing between the plaintiff and defendant, and permitting plaintiff to resume her maiden name of Fanny L. Brown, and for costs of suit and general relief. And you are hereby notified, that if you fail to appear and answer the said Complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and Seal of the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 25th day of August, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-four.

Seal and Int. Rev. Stamp. WM. LOEWY, Clerk.
By WM. R. SATTERLEE, Deputy Clerk.

J. D. Stevenson, Plaintiff's Attorney se3

H. P. WAKELEE,

CORNER OF MONTGOMERY AND SUTTER STREETS,

IMPORTER OF

F. M. Farina's Cologne,
Lubin's Perfumes and Soaps,
Prout's Tooth and Hair Brushes,
Low's Old Windsor and Honey Soap,
Esu Lustrale, Pomades, Tooth Powders,

DRESSING CASES,

And other elegant articles for the the Toilet.

Agent for Nelson's Extract of ROSE AND ROSEMARY, for the Hair. se24

NELSON'S EXTRACT OF
Roses And Rosemary.

THE FOLLOWING IS A BRIEF NOTICE of some of its principal virtues, as a mild stimulative, corrective and preservative agent for the hair:

Infancy.—It insinuates its balsamic properties into the pores of the head, nourishes the hair in its embryo state, accelerates its growth, sustains it in maturity, and continues the possession of healthy vigor, silky softness, and luxuriant redundancy, to the latest period of human life. Genial and purifying, it dispels all scurf and impurity, and renders the use of the fine comb unnecessary.

The Beard, Whiskers, and Mustachios.—Its extraordinary power in promoting the growth of the hair is singularly displayed in creating these ornaments of manhood.

Curl and Embellishment.—In dressing the hair nothing can equal its effect, rendering the hair so admirably soft that it will lie in any direction, producing beautifully flowing curls, and, by the transcendant lustre it imparts, rendering the coiffure inexpressibly attractive.

Grey Hair.—Its nourishing properties are eminently successful in the prevention of Grey Hair, and in numerous instances, in the restoration to its original color.

Baldness.—Its productive powers are constantly and surprisingly shown in cases of Baldness, so that in numerous instances where other specifics have been tried in vain, this celebrated Oil has effected a complete restoration of Beautiful Hair.

Sea-Bathing and Violent Exercise.—After indulging in either of these, so apt to exhaust the nourishing matter secreted at the roots or bulbs of the hair, the Roses and Rosemary will be found most efficacious, both in preserving and in immediately restoring the hair to its usual appearance of health with renovated brightness.

Its invaluable properties have obtained the patronage of every Court of the civilized world; and the high esteem in which it is universally held, together with numerous testimonials constantly received of its efficacy, affords the best and surest proofs of its merits.

Sold by all Druggists, and by H. P. WAKELEE, corner of Montgomery and Sutter streets, and corner of Bush and Montgomery streets. se24

BURDELL'S
Oriental Tooth Wash.

SOUND AND WHITE TEETH

Are Indispensable to Personal Attraction, and to Health and Longevity, by proper mastication of the food.

THIS UNIQUE PREPARATION IS OF INESTIMABLE value in preserving and beautifying the Teeth, strengthening the Gums and in imparting a delicate fragrance to the breath. It eradicates tartar from the Teeth, removes spots of incipient decay, and polishes and preserves the enamel, to which it imparts a PEARL-LIKE WHITENESS.

Its anti-sceptic and anti-scorbutic properties exercises a highly beneficial and salutary influence; they arrest the further progress of the decay of Teeth, induce a healthy action of the Gums, and cause them to assume the brightness and color indicative of perfect soundness; while, by confirming their adhesion to the Teeth, they give unlimited enjoyment and fresh zest to appetite, by perpetuating effective and complete mastication. It speedily removes those ravages which children sustain in the teeth, owing to the improper use of sweet and acid substances.

Sold by all Druggists, and by H. P. WAKELEE, Corner Montgomery and Sutter streets, and corner Bush and Montgomery streets. se24

LAWRENCE & COMPANY'S

PATENT IMPROVED

Flesh Gloves and Straps!

For Producing a Healthy State of the System by Friction, Without the Risk of Tearing the Skin, as all the Ordinary Horse-Hair Gloves are liable to do.

THE GREAT VALUE OF THE HORSE-HAIR Renovator as a therapeutic agent, when applied to the human body, is now too well known to every one who has paid the least attention to the importance of a healthy action of the Skin, to require further comment.

The superior advantages of the Patent Flesh Gloves and Straps, manufactured under this Patent, are that, by a peculiar process in the machinery employed in their manufacture, the points of the Hair are brought perpendicularly to the surface, thereby removing the liability to tear the Skin (a very general complaint against the ordinary kind,) rendering them more pleasant to use, at the same time enabling the process of friction to be much more effectually performed; they are, indeed, a positive luxury to use, apart from their salutary effects.

The peculiar fabric manufactured expressly for the use of Ladies deserves their special attention; it has been highly recommended by the most eminent of the medical profession, and given universal satisfaction to those who have used it.

For sale by H. P. WAKELEE, se24 Cor. Montgomery and Sutter streets.

THE OXFORD WASHING PAD.

This article, suggested by an Oxford man, for removing Stains from the Hands, being found to thoroughly answer the purpose, has established fair pretensions to become of universal use, which it is rapidly doing.

Manufactured by LAWRENCE & CO., and sold by H. P. WAKELEE, se24 Cor. Montgomery and Sutter streets.

FOLSOM STREET PROPERTY
FOR SALE!

COMPRISING TWO 50-VARA LOTS ON THE NORTH side of Folsom street, fronting also on Clementina street. Will be sold as a whole, or in subdivisions of 25 by 80 feet.

WM. LEFFINGWELL, se24-tf 619 Montgomery street.

MAGUIRE'S OPERA HOUSE.

T. MAGUIRE - - - - - - - PROPRIETOR.
C. L. GRAVES - - - - - - STAGE MANAGER.
W. STEVENSON - - - - - - TREASURER.

AFTERNOON PERFORMANCE TO-DAY,
FOR LADIES AND CHILDREN,
At HALF PRICES,
Commencing at 2 o'clock.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON AND EVENING, SEP. 24,
MR. J. H. WARWICK,
AND THE GREAT STAR COMPANY,
Will appear in the exciting original drama of

Three Times Dead!

OR, THE TRAIL OF THE SERPENT,

Dramatized from Miss Braddon's great novel of that name.

Peters (the Dumb Detective,) - Mr. J. H. Warwick
Jabez North (Count Raymond) - - - Frank Mayo
Richard Marwood - - - - Pierpont Thayer
Gaston de Luney - - - - - Louis Aldrich
Valerie De Cevennes - - - - Mrs H. A. Perry
Mary Williams - - - - - Miss Lulu Sweet
Old Madge - - - - - - Mrs C R Saunders

PRICES OF ADMISSION.—Dress Circle and Orchestra Seats $1; Parquet 50c.; Gallery 25c.

Doors open at 7 o'clock. Performances will commence at a quarter before 8. se17

NOVELTY! NOVELTY! NOVELTY!

WILSON, ZOYARA & CARLO'S
Great Circus!

THIS MAMMOTH COMBINATION OF CIRCUS TALENT

Is now PERFORMING EVERY EVENING until further notice, in the

LARGE AND ELEGANT PAVILION,

Adjoining International Hotel,

When there will be presented to the San Francisco public a host of novelties.

The CARLO GROUPE are new and make their first appearance in this city.

The Manager, Mr. JOHN WILSON, is determined that the entertainment shall excel in every particular, and be worthy of patronage; he having concentrated in this company not only the largest and most complete Circus in the World, but the elite of the Equestrian, Gymnastic, Acrobatic, Juggling, Vaulting and Posturing performers of the country.

PRICES OF ADMISSION.

Dress Circle - - - - - - - - - $1 00
Second Circle - - - - - - - - - 0 50
Reserved Chairs - - - - - - - 50c extra

☞ Grand Afternoon Performance for families every Saturday.

Doors open at 7 o'clock; performances commence at 8.

se3 JOHN WILSON, Proprietor.

EUREKA MINSTREL HALL,

Montgomery street, near Pine.

T. MAGUIRE - - - - - - - - Proprietor
GEO. H. COES - - - - - - - Stage Manager

GRAND OPENING NIGHT!

MONDAY EVENING - - - SEPT. 5TH.

THE EVER POPULAR

SAN FRANCISCO MINSTRELS!

Consisting of the following well known Artists:

Billy Birch, Charles Backus,
D. S. Wambold, Sig. R. Abecco,
George H. Coes, Martin Simonsen,
Frank Medina, S. Wasburg,
C. F. Shattuck, Signor Pinto,
F. Harris, E. Groh, and
MRS. FANNY SIMONSEN.

A grand CHANGE OF PERFORMANCE EACH EVENING.

NEW SONGS, ACTS, BURLESQUES, DANCES, etc., will be performed in rapid succession.

Dress Circle and Orchestra Seats, 50 cents; Parquet, 25 cents; Private Boxes, $5; Reserved Seats, 25 cents extra. Doors open at 7 o'clock. Curtain will rise at 8 o'clock, precisely.

CALIFORNIA BRANCH

—OF THE—

U. S. SANITARY COMMISSION.

ALL COMMUNICATIONS AND REMITTANCES SHOULD be addressed to the

OFFICE, No. 240 MONTGOMERY STREET,
Southeast corner of Pine.

O. C. WHEELER, Secretary.

FREDERICK P. LOW, President.
R. G. SNEATH, Treasurer.
D. C. McRUER, Chairman Executive Committee.

Office Hours: 9 A. M. to 4 P. M.

QUINTESSENCE OF
ENGLISH GARDEN LAVENDER FLOWERS,

Prepared from Ingredients imported expressly for the purpose by

H. P. WAKELEE, Druggist,
Montgomery street, cor. Sutter, San Francisco.

Lavender has always maintained the highest rank as a perfume in England, but owing to the inferior qualities usually imported, has almost fallen into disuse in the United States. When pure and distilled from the flowers, it is the most delicate and refreshing perfumes in use. This preparation is recommended as the pure essence of Garden Lavender Flowers. se24

MAGUIRE'S ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

THOMAS MAGUIRE - - - - - Sole Owner
Mr. PETER RICHINGS, - - - - - Manager
G. T. EVANS - - - - - Musical Director

FAREWELL
—OF THE—
English Opera Seaason,

THIS (SATURDAY) EVENING,

AND THE

BENEFIT OF
MISS CAROLINE RICHINGS,

Upon which occasion will be presented for the first and only time, Donizetti's comic opera of

Don Pasquale!

Don Pasquale - - - - - - Mr. H. C. Peakes,
Ernesto - - - - - - - - Mr. W. J. Hill
Doctor Malatesta - - - - Mr. Edward Seguin
Norina - - - - Miss CAROLINE RICHINGS

NOTICE.—As a tribute to the Beneficiary, and in consequence of the unusual demand for seats,

THE PRICES OF ADMISSION

upon this occasion will be restored to their original standard: Dress Circle, Parquet and Family Circle, ONE DOLLAR. Gallery, FIFTY CENTS.

Between the Second and Third Acts, Mr. P. RICHINGS will address the audience.

TO-MORROW (SUNDAY) EVENING:
For the Benefit of M. CHARLES.
Italian Opera and French Vaudeville.

COMPLIMENTARY BENEFIT

IN AID OF THE

Printers' Cemetery Fund!

TENDERED BY JOHN WILSON, Esq.,

TO THE

EUREKA TYPOGRAPHICAL UNION,

WILL TAKE PLACE

On Monday Evening, September 26th, 1864,

—AT—

WILSON, ZOYARA & CARLO'S
GREAT CIRCUS.

GILBERT'S MUSEUM,

Market street, opposite Second street, over the Occidental Market.

F. GILBERT - - - - - - - Proprietor
J. A. ROWE, - - - - - - - Manager

OPEN EVERY DAY AND EVENING.

HOME AGAIN!

JAMES MURPHY, THE IRISH GIANT BOY,

Who has just returned from the interior.

This wonderful young man has grown some three inches in height, and is some sixty pounds heavier; he therefore now weighs over three hundred pounds, and stands nearly eight feet and a half high, making him really the most Colossal Giant—old or young, man or boy—the world ever saw. Don't fail to see him.

Also, just engaged, the celebrated

ALBINO FAMILY,

Consisting of brother and sister, with beautiful snowy, wavy hair, perfectly white skin, and pink eyes—the most novel, wonderful and instructive exhibition ever presented to the public. Every student of nature should witness this extraordinary phenomena.

Still astounding and startling the world, the

GREAT SNAKE-CHARMER, M. DE BAR.

Also, the great Mathematical Wonder,

THE LIGHTNING CALCULATOR,
From Barnum's Museum.

THE WONDERFUL TYROLEAN WARBLER

Will give his interesting Musical Exhibitions throughout the day and evening.

Notwithstanding the great expense attending this unprecedented array of novelties, the management announces the prices as before.

THE GREAT CEROPLASTIC GROUP OF LIFE-LIKE FIGURES. AND

UPWARDS OF 2,000 CURIOSITIES!

Also, a beautiful set of COSMORAMIC VIEWS, illustrating the PRINCIPAL CITIES OF AMERICA. There is also an AQUARIA GARDEN attached to the Museum.

The admission to the entire Exhibition is only 25 cents. Children, 15 cents. se3-1m

The Willows.

W. H. BARNARD, - - - - Proprietor.

THE HOTEL of this popular and fashionable place of public resort has been so far completed as to enable the lessee to open its Saloon and beautifully shaded grounds permanently for reception of visitors. The Grove has been culled and trimmed; the flower beds replanted and cultivated into fragrant bloom; the aquarium replaced, with the addition to its former feathered collection of four elegant black Australian Swans. The proprietor has also added a large collection of birds, embracing two Golden Pheasants and a brace of Silver Pheasants.

The Theatre has been entirely remodelled; the stage newly decorated, new galleries erected, the seats rendered more comfortable, and the floors replaced.

The Shooting Gallery, the Ten Pin Alleys, and the Shuffle Boards have been replaced.

The Flying Horses for children, are in readiness to perform daily duty.

Ample stabling is attached to the premises, attended by polite and watchful grooms.

MURPHY & BRAY'S
CELEBRATED MINSTRELS,

Will give a performance in the Theatre every SUNDAY Afternoon.

Mr. E. WOODWARD, formerly known to the San Francisco public, will give his personal attention to the Bar.

On the first of August, the Lodging apartments, Restaurant and Ladies' Refreshment Saloon of the WILLOWS were thrown open to the public. Ladies, gentlemen and children visiting the grounds will find ample entertainment and amusement. se10-tf

HEALTH
AND AMUSEMENT,
COMBINED
C. J. ROBINSON'S SELECT CLASSES,
In Dr. Dio Lewis's System of
LIGHT GYMNASTICS!

At Miss ALDRICH'S ACADEMY, Stevenson street,

Near corner of Market and Second streets, San Francisco,

For Scientific Physical Training and Recreative Exercise, in classes, by persons of all ages and conditions of health, and by both sexes, with light and movable apparatus, and an invariable and appropriate musical accompaniment. While the Exercises of the Light Gymnastics impart strength, grace, activity and symmetry to the person, they at the same time furnish an exhaustless fund of social enjoyment and mental recreation.

Mr. ROBINSON has recently been employed to teach this system in all the public schools of this city.

CLASSES meet on Tuesdays and Fridays at 8 P. M. For admission or further information, apply at the Academy.

Mr. ROBINSON will give instruction, on application to classes and private pupils, in VOCAL CULTURE and ELOCUTION, as taught by the best masters in the East. jy23-1m

NEW BOOKS.

JUST RECEIVED,

—AT—

A. Roman & Co.'s.

TENNYSON'S NEW POEMS. Enoch Arden, and Other Poems. 12mo.

Imogene; or, the Marble Heart. By Pierce Egan, Esq.

The Finger Post to Public Business; containing the mode of forming and conducting Societies, Clubs and other organized associations, etc. 12mo.

Biographical Sketches of the Loyalists of the American Revolution. With an Historical Essay by Lorenzo Sabine. 2 vols.

Azarian; an Episode. By Harriet E. Prescott, author of the "Amber Gods," etc. 12mo.

Talks on Women's Topics. By Jennie June. 12mo.

The Coward; a Novel of Society and the Field in 1863. By Henry Morford, author of "The Days of Shoddy," etc. 12mo.

The Monomaniac; or, Shirley Hall Asylum. By William Gilbert. 12mo.

The Water Babies; a Fairy Tale for a Land Baby. Illustrated. By the Rev. Charles Kingsley. Square 16mo.

The Cradle of Rebellions; a History of the Secret Societies of France. By Lucien de la Hodde. 8vo.

Capt. Brande of the Centipede; a Pirate of eminence in the West Indies. 8vo. Illustrated. By Harry Gringo.

The Early Dawn; or, Sketches of Christian Life in England in the Olden Time. By the author of "Chronicles of the Schonberg Cotta Family." 12mo.

Margaret and her Bridesmaids. By the author of "The Queens of the Country," etc. 12mo.

Jomini's Life of Napoleon. Translated by Gen. H. W. Halleck. 4 vols. 8vo. With an Atlas of 60 maps.

Battle Fields of our Fathers. By Virginia F. Townsend. 12mo.

Poems by David Gray. With Memoirs of his Life and an Introductory Notice by R. M. Milnes. 12mo.

Out in the World. A Novel, by T. S. Arthur. 12mo.

Naomi Torrenti; or, the History of a Woman. By Gertrude F. Vingut. 8vo.

Libby Life, or Experiences of a Prisoner of War in Richmond, Va. 1863-4. By Lieut.-Col. Cavada. 12mo;

The Potomac and the Rapidan; Army Notes from the failure at Winchester to the reinforcement of Rosecrans: 1861-3. By A H Quint, Chaplain 2d Massachusetts Regiment. 12mo.

The Gold Hunter's Adventure; or, Life in Australia. By a returned Australian. Illustrated 12mo.

Savage Africa; being the Narrative of a Tour in Equatorial and Western Africa. With notes on the Habits of the Gorilla, etc. etc. By W W Reade. With Map and Illustrations. 8vo;

A Woman's Philosophy of Woman; or, Woman Affranchised. An answer to Proudhon, Michelet, Legouve, and other modern innovators. By Mme. d'Hericourt. Translated from the last Paris edition.

Together with an extensive and complete stock of

Choice and Standard Books,

In all the departments of

LITERATURE, ART AND SCIENCE.

A fine collection of Standard authors in fine bindings, suitable for private Libraries.

☞ A full assortment of CHILDREN'S BOOKS, SCHOOL BOOKS, PHOTOGRAPHIC ALBUMS, etc, etc.

All for sale at the lowest Prices, wholesale and retail.

A. ROMAN & CO.,

BOOKSELLERS, PUBLISHERS AND IMPORTERS,

and 419 MONTGOMERY STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO.

se17-1m

MECHANICS' INSTITUTE.

OPENING
—OF—
The Industrial Exhibition.

The Grand Pavilion was thrown open to the Publicon last SATURDAY) MORNING, and is now open daily for the reception of visitors.

The North Beach and Mission Railroad cars pass the Fair Grounds every few minutes.

Season Tickets for Lady and Gentleman - - $5
Season Tickets for one person - - - - - 3 00
Tickets for Single Admission - - - - - 50

Tickets may be had at the Institute, on California street, or of any member of the Executive Committee.

By order of the EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.

The Californian.

"SURELY THERE IS A VEIN FOR THE SILVER AND A PLACE FOR GOLD WHERE THEY FINE IT."

VOL. I.--NO. 19. SAN FRANCISCO, CCTOBER 1, 1864. TERMS { $5 A YEAR, BY MAIL, IN ADVANCE. 50 CENTS A MONTH, BY CARRIER.

CONTENTS:

ORIGINAL ARTICLES:

Pour Passer le Temps—by "Podgers."
On an Extinct Public Institution—By "Bret."
A Notable Conundrum—By "Mark Twain."
My First Cavalry Charge—By "Podgers."
My Carte de Visite—By "Fly-leaf."
Scientific Sketches—By "Trismegistus."

POETRY—
San Francisco by the Poets—No. 3.
The Campaign Poet.

EDITORIALS:

Minor Matters.
Inigo Redivivus.
An Hour with the Past.
Editorial Paragraphs
California as Seen by a Stranger.

HAPPENINGS OF THE WEEK:

A Digest of Passing Events.

SELECTED SKETCHES, STORIES, etc.

The Jubilee Lozenge.
Moral Influence of Furniture.
The Beggar Woman of Locarno.
Friendship Between the Sexes.
Three Tropical Pictures.
Gimmal Rings.
Evil Results of Good Composition.
Alpine Inspiration.
Jerroldiana.

POETRY—
Endymion on Latmos.
Bugle Song.
The Swallow.
The Soldier's Wife.

DRAMATIC:

A review of the Drama for the Week.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS:
Interesting Items from Exchanges.

DOMESTIC RECEIPTS.
Practical Receipts for the Household.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

POUR PASSER LE TEMPS.

DEAR CALIFORNIAN.—I am almost tempted to begin the old story and boast of the Italian climate of California again, the past week has been so delightful and so balmy. Wednesday was one of the most magnificent days I ever knew in California or anywhere else, and those who had horses and did not go to ride missed it; and those who could afford to hire and did not drive to the Beach missed it, too; although they have the consolation of knowing that they missed the whale, which, if they only knew it, was something to be congratulated upon. A miss may be as good as a mile in ordinary matters; but the mile away would be preferred by any one who had gone past his whaleship just once. I remember when the last "monster of the deep" was exhibited at Harry Tichenor's "Ways" at the foot of Second street, there were no two ways about the ancient and very fish-like odor pervading in that neighborhood, during the time it was there; and the clothes of visitors generally retained the odor. On getting into the omnibuses you could always smell those who had been to see the creature. The one on the beach is a great nuisance; but I don't know who will or can remove it—it is an unpleasant object to those who wish to drive on the sands. And where can be found such a delightful drive! It is a well-established fact that when the wind is blowing fearfully and disgustingly in town it is nearly calm on the beach, and an inhalation of the pure salt air (to windward of the whale) is good for the lungs, and conducive to an appetite that will strike terror to the hearts and livers of the keepers of hotels and boarding-houses.

Next to a good laugh comes a good appetite; and if dyspepsia don't come in the shape of peuance, the better the appetite the better for you. It is better than a good "drink-itite." Speaking of that, what a luxury this perpetual thirst seems to be to some people! I heard one of those drink-luxuriating fellows who, on taking his first Sherry-Cobbler, wished his neck as long as the flamingo's that his enjoyment and swallow-osity might be eked out like linked sweetness. Fortunately, there are two good Samaritans on the Beach route, Dickey at the Ocean House, and Foster at the Cliff. I see, by the way, that another house of entertainment has been put up near the Cliff House, which, if ever occupied, the man must have joined the army, as I see he is a left-tenant—it don't seem, however, to have a tenant, either at will or any other kind. That it will, however, is certain, for there is more or less business for all. Foster will probably get more and the other man less—the Cliff having the advantage of location. We can sit on the balcony, listen to the ever-discontented waves that dash with a hoarse moan against the rocks, as if vexed in spirit at the restraint to their onward march. Did any person ever see a quiet sea-shore where the broad ocean had its full and majestic sweep, and its vast expansive bosom to throb unbroken by bays and inlets? What reveries one falls into while sitting in that over-hanging balcony, looking out upon the treacherous ocean and listening to the dashing waves that make the rocky base fairly tremble, and dreamy visions of the past and future pass in misty indistinctness before his half-shut eyes!

And how the sea lions scoff and jeer your architectural efforts at castle building, while you dream on and lazily watch the contortions of the clumsy beasts as they worry over the sharp rocks, and, like men, endure many a hard knock in summit-seeking! And yet, while you are thus engaged and shut out all the world from your thoughts, you are suddenly recalled to this terrestrial sphere by a punch in the ribs from a cane or the time-worn trick of some one coming behind, taking the two sides of your head in their palms, holding you in that position and exclaiming, "Who is it?" Your first impression is, that you will toss him over the cliff into the sea below. Your next is that you had better accept his invitation to drink. You have sat there so long that you feel you owe Foster rent or patronage.

There was a long spy-glass on that balcony, upon the glass of which some wag had stuck a large fly, and I was amused at the criticisms upon the general appearance of the seahons as viewed then through it. A lady just from New York by the last steamer, in quest of a quiet family to board with, in consideration of a salary of thirty dollars a month, and all her evenings to herself, exclaimed: "Just look at the legs of him! Is them the things ye call centarpades?" She had an indistinct idea that sea-lions were a sort of centipedes, the projecting "pieds" of the fly assisting in the delusion.

—

ON Wednesday evening the Academy of Music opened with the comedy of Extremes, in which Mr. and Miss Richings took the principal parts, and have really to carry the whole piece. The character of "Higgins," the politician and would-be Member of Congress, was capital and well played, and being a busy one, gave Mr. Mayo no time to do anything else. Of Miss Richings, as the "Widow Crosby," and Mr. Richings as the confirmed old bachelor, "Mr. Mildmay," it is unnecessary to speak. As neither of them are ever at fault, there is no opportunity for criticism. I could not but admire Mr. Mildmay's patience and forbearance, however, with the old darkey. That character is decidedly extravagant, and I should have knocked the old rascal endwise about twenty-five times for his impudence, had I been Mr. Mildmay. Miss Kate Martin played her part capitally, as did also Mrs. Saunders, who seemed to do the cuffing and ear-pinching part with a heartiness that appeared very much like reality. Our temporary friend, "O, Moses," was not so far out of the way when he prophesied that the politicians would dissolve the Union, or try to. The piece, although written years ago, contains many hits at the present times; and human nature is about as prevalent now as then, and not greatly improved.

—

A GREAT discussion has arisen over the very stout body of "Don Pasquale," as to the appropriateness of the dress of "Me boy Peakes" in that character, at Miss Richings' benefit. The unsettled question as to the date of the piece, or time when "Don Pasquale" was supposed to exist—there being no data—leaves the question of costume open to the taste of the player. I have always seen it something after the style of friend Peakes on the occasion referred to, although not running quite so much to immensity of body. It has been played, however, in the costume of various ages or eras, but, in nearly all instances as a stout individual. And the text would seem to justify it, for "Norina" says, in the second act, in that little playfulness of spirit she treated the Don to:

"A man decrepid, sir, as you—as heavy and as fat, sir, too—can never take a lady out decently for a promenade."

—which is a literal translation from the original Italian. I think by common consent Peakes could be allowed to reduce his fair proportions just a little, and relieve himself and the audience of the fatigue of his carrying so much weight in the part. It is my private opinion that "Don Pasquale" was an Alderman, lived on the fat of the land, and came honestly by all he had, himself.

—

I SEE that there is a Committee soliciting contributions for the suffering people at Santa Barbara. They may call upon you. Do give these poor souls something, however little; don't wait to be called upon—contribute your mite. Don't forget, when you pick up THE CALIFORNIAN to read its well-filled pages after a hearty dinner, that these poor people have neither. They probably could exist without the intellectual feast THE CALIFORNIAN would give them; but food for the body they cannot do without, at least not long. They are about as near existing on nothing now as they can, and live. Let us not forget how hard it is to see women and children suffering for the crumbs that fall from our tables. Cast your bread upon the waters by the Senator, and it will "come" to them in a very few days. We cannot relieve all the suffering in the world, it is true; but what we can do, we should. It is our duty to do all the good we can, for who knows which of us may soon stand in need of the charity of our neighbors and friends? Can a man do a better deed than contribute his aid in the cause of suffering ones, and, above all, alleviate starvation.

—

IT was a rich treat to witness the delighted and happy countenances of the school-children at the Fair, the other day. Their little rosy faces shone with glee and yellow soap, and they were as gay and frisky as kittens. Bless their little hearts! why should they not have a good time? The present are their happiest days; the future, with its cares and anxieties, will come soon enough—too soon for many, who will never know again, perhaps, so happy a day as that at the Fair. How they enjoyed the music and the sights! Their eager eyes took everything in, from Mr. Faucherie's crocodile quartz-crusher and amalgamator, (which they did not understand much better than the grown children,) to the piles of fruit, which had more attractions than aught else. I'll warrant many of them dreamed of big red apples and bunches of grapes, and awoke to the sad fact that those were things of the past, and, perhaps, of the future, but not the present. How cunning the well-dressed children of the present day do look in their comical, diminutive toggery! To see a little three-year-old in the latest fashion of sack, and jaunty little hat-and-feather, seriously and soberly contemplating the wonders of the windows on Montgomery street; then my little gentleman in his Zouave jacket, velvet breeches, cap and cane, resembling a full-grown man as seen through a reversed opera-glass. There are some children that one is instinctively tempted to seize upon and bear off bodily from their astonished mothers to a candy shop, and regale them, just to see the happiness it gives. Oh! what heart-aches I see in the future for those little gentlemen with the canes! There are some little blue-eyed coquettes in embryo that will make raids upon those hearts that won't heal without leaving marks. Sweeter and prettier children never were born than one sees in our streets; and if there is a man with a heart in him that don't love them, let him be led out to immediate execution! Have no mercy on him—for there's something wrong about a man that don't love children; and I say "put him out" of existence! knock him on the head! I confess to a weakness for the little "tots," and never can resist the desire to kiss every pretty child I meet; and if their faces are unkissably dirty, I rub away with my handkerchief until I disclose space enough to accomplish it. If they are too dirty, I suppose one might fall back on the mothers with Christian resignation. Mere supposition, however; I never tried it. PODGERS.

CALIFORNIA BRANCH OF U. S. SAN. COM.—The work of organizing and forming distinct societies to systematize and render this popular charity regular and permanent, progresses steadily throughout the State. Agents commissioned by the Branch are now engaged in canvassing the interior. In this Agency, the President of the Commission is ably represented by his son, R. N. Bellows, and the President of the California Branch by his nephew, C. A. Low, who are now zealously prosecuting the good work. If perseverence, talent, good humor, and entire sympathy with their labor can avail, the ultimate success of these gentlemen is assured.

SANITARY FUND.—The Executive Committee acknowledge the receipt, since our last issue, of the following further sums: From the Sanitary Cheese, $176; from the Camanche, $332 40; from Lower Lake, $60 in Legal Tender notes; from Vallejo, $35; from San Pablo, $18; from San Leandro, $10 in Legal Tender notes; City collections, $4,231 65 in coin, and $167 in Legal Tender notes. Total, $4,793 05 in coin, and $237 in Legal Tender notes.

ENDYMION ON LATMOS.

HIGH on the Latmian hills, with the twilight deepening round him,
Couched in a mossy dell Endymion lay in his beauty,
Lulled into sleep by the sound of the pines, and the voice of the mountain
Streamlet that leaped down the vales and took all the echoes with laughter.
Silently, 'mid the reeds, his flocks were feeding round him,
Flocks of sheep, and dewy-eyed kine, and goats nimble-footed.
Beautiful as a dream, Endymion lay on the mountain,
Beautiful as a dream, in the purple glory of evening.

Slowly, on all the hills, the broad-winged darkness descended,
Slowly the stars came out in the silent measureless heaven.
Solemn, in silvery beauty, one moonbeam stole on the woodland,
Deeply slumbered the shepherd alone on shadowy Latmos.

Solemn in silvery beauty, one moonbeam stole o'er the woodland,
Stole o'er the bosky dells, and touched the side of the mountain,
Slowly it crept up the sward to where, under the whispering pine-trees,
Deeply slumbered the shepherd, alone on shadowy Latmos.

Rested the silvery moonbeam and streamed on his marvellous beauty,
Streamed on his golden hair and forehead's roseate marble,
Streamed on his limbs of snow, out-stretched by the glimmering waters.
Fair as the twilight star, or Phosphor that heralds the morning,
Fair as the boy Ganymede, that dwells with the happy immortals,
Was he, the youth on whom Artemis gazed on shadowy Latmos.

Shepherds, beware of Selené; ah! cold is the smile of Selené,
Beautiful on the hills is the light of starry Selené,
Beautiful, cruel, and cold is the glance of starry Selené;
Chilled to the heart by her kiss, Endymion slumbers on Latmos,
Never again to awake, ah, me! to the glory of living.

Ai, that the gift of the gods should be so fatal to mortals!
Year follows year, and race follows race, but Endymion wakes not.

Maids in the Latmian valleys bewailed for the beautiful shepherd,
Wept for his golden hair, and his ready foot in the Choros,
Wept for the summer eyes when they wandered with him on the hill-side.

Men in the Latmian valleys lamented the swift-footed shepherd,
Missed his sure spear in the chase, and skilful arm in the Discos,
Missed his glad pipe on the hills, with the low of the homo-coming heifers.

Dim grew his name as a dream, and never again in the woodland,
Never again on the hills, was seen the beautiful shepherd.
Ai, that the gift of the gods should be so fatal to mortals!

THREE TROPICAL PICTURES.

THE CERRO— HAVANA.

I WAS very comfortably lodged, for a few days, in one of the hotels in the Cerro. This suburb consists mainly of a single street some three miles in length, the half of it nearest the town being occupied by shops and the homes of shop-keepers, and the other half by the villas and chateaux belonging to the wealthy merchants of the city, and official personages of distinction. The most of these stand directly upon the street, though a few are situated a little distance from it, in the midst of groves and gardens. In passing along this more rural part of the Cerro, one gets a view of beautiful green lawns, of pretty collections of flowers, of tropical shrubbery growing in the greatest luxuriance, and of palms towering over all, no less gracefully than proudly, toward the sky. The mansions are gay with bright colors, the white being everywhere striped with pink, sky blue, and apple green. At evening, also, nothing of the kind can be more charming than a drive through this portion of the Cerro; for the houses—the piazzas included—are all brilliantly lighted with gas, and have their doors and windows thrown wide open. The passer-by, looking directly through the halls, sees pretty vistas beyond leading to orange gardens, or terminated by vases of bright-colored flowers. He also sees the members of the family gathered in groups on the piazza, or arranged, according to age and sex, in two formal rows of rocking-chairs. There they sit, the ladies opposite the gentlemen, and rock themselves the whole evening through. The Spanish fans make a pleasant breeze when none blows in at open doors and windows; the flowers diffuse through the rooms a sweet perfume; the blaze of gas makes every countenance visible, even from the street; exhibits all the toilets, and every article of the furniture, the volante which stands in a corner of the hall included. You hear, as you pass, the song, and see the dance. You hear, also, the mellifluous hum of the soft Spanish voices, and their musical, ringing laugh; and you see even the fingering of the piano, and the thrumming of the strings of the blue-ribboned guitar.

A CUBAN RAILWAY.

THE country through which the road passes, being occupied chiefly by sugar plantations, is beautiful throughout, and, in some places, picturesque. The palm trees, of the sight of which one never tires, escorted us in groups and groves the whole distance to Havana, as the stars had previously done on our way along the coast to Matanzas. And scarcely less graceful than the palms were the thickets of reeds, which grew in clusters by the roadside. If the former trees reminded us, by the color of their stems, of the white birch of our Northern home, so the delicate leaves, slender branches, and bending heads of the latter brought to mind, also, the graceful foliage of this well-called lady of the woods. The mango tree resembles our chestnut, presenting a dense mass of green leaves, the extremities of which, at this season, are tipped with the orange and purple of the bursting buds. Interspersed together were everywhere to be seen magnolias, with their large, glossy, dark-green leaves; tall pines of a delicate shade of bluish green, and lightly fringed with needles; and orange trees at the same time golden with fruit and white with blossoms. Here towered the ceiba tree with its strong, graceful stem, and wore its crown of rich green leaves above the tops even of the palms. The darker maneys were loaded with fruit grey-colored; the sapota tree with fruit of brown; the tamarind drooped with pods; the calabash was hung with round balls; the leaves of the banana were swayed by the wind, revealing its fruit clusters and buds of violet; while only here and there the cypress cast from its mournful boughs a frown on the smiling face of the landscape. Up many a lordly stem climbed the female fig—yuagua embra—holding it in a beautiful though fatal embrace; the lovely convolvulus, entwining itself around the trunks of dead monarchs of the woods, decked them with palls of white flowers; and innumerable tops of tall trees were tufted with various parasitical plants, the orchids and the aloes, all their flowers laughing in the sunlight, or dancing in the wind. Many misshapen forms, indeed, come to view in these tropical woods; and in the midst of all this abounding life there is constant decay. But the grace of parasitical plants creeping everywhere, and beautiful with every tint of flowers, is hung like a veil over the deformity of nature.

The undergrowth of shrubbery, likewise, is most luxuriant, and shows much gorgeous coloring. The wild passion-flowers are of many different varieties; the hedges are covered with several kinds of convolvulus; the fever-flower flaunts in flame and gold; the species of aloe plant, called peta, burns a stately candelebra with fire of yellow; the mangroves hold out to the passer-by white chalices full of perfume; the apple rose scents the air around it so deliciously as to hold all footsteps, as in an enchanted circle, spell-bound; the wild heliotrope runs modestly by road and pathsides; while everywhere fly, amid the flowers and the sunshine, humming birds and butterflies, and countless insects, all flashing with the tints of precious stones and the bow in heaven. All the forms of nature were high-colored—flowers, foliage, the sky, and even the ground itself. Indeed, the red dust which occasionally filled the railway carriages painted as well as powdered all our faces, and imparted to our travelling dresses a tinge quite as warm as that of the landscape. But, in spite of the clouds of dust which we had to encounter at some few points on the road, it was a pure delight to breathe the air of the open country; and I remember that, after our luncheon of oranges, bought from the palm basket of the Chinese brakeman, we not only pronounced the juice equal in sweetness to that of the apples which tempted the first of women, but would have it that the island itself was not a very bad copy of the original Eden.

SANTA CRUZ.

THE house in which I was so fortunate as to stay during my visit to the island, stood midway on a hillside covered with green canes, and sloping gracefully to the sea shore. It was therefore convenient both for the morning bath and the afternoon ride on the heights. Convenient, also, was it for seeing the sun go down in the sea; for the horizon of waters compassed, at this point, almost an entire semicircle. We found excellent companionship in the mild, tropical ocean, the waves of which were constantly making, both by day and night, a pleasing murmur, rarely changed to a roar. The ground swell brought up shells and corals. In the quiet bays the grave pelicans dived, rapid as the thunderbolt, all day long for sprats; and, returning at evening to their accustomed resting place, sailed sometimes directly over our heads, silently as the falling due, and holding both wing and breath for a long distance. The shadows of passing rain clouds coming over the hills out of the northeast, often blackened the blue of the ocean in certain portions of it, while others were glittering in sunlight; and the April-like showers which fell from time to time were generally accompanied by brilliant rainbows, sometimes double, or triple, or even quadruple—rainbows in clusters, like the clustered pillars in Gothic cathedrals. Often rising out of the depth of a valley, climbing the hillsides, and sweeping through the sky down into the ocean, they brought to mind the shining angel in the Apocalypse, who stood with one foot on the sea and the other on the land. On calm days, the shores, in places where there were coral reefs below the water, would be as green as the deepest emerald; at other times, the long line of rocks and beaches would be completely frosted with foam. Not only the colors of the sunset were reflected on the broad expanse of waters, but throughout the day a flitting purple light was often spread by passing clouds over the waves. In the early evening, the moon, when but one day old, drew a thread of silver from the horizon to the land; while the full moon poured a perfect flood of illumination over hills, valleys, and the sea. The limestone road which wound around the foot of the hill below us, running on the edge of the shore, shone then as if covered with hoarfrost; and the numerous forms of the palm trees bordering it were doubled by their shadows. So transparent, indeed, is the atmosphere in these latitudes, that, in calm weather, not only the islands of St. Thomas and St. Johns, lying forty miles to the northward, may be seen distinctly by the naked eye, but Porto Rico comes into view, and reveals its mountains at a distance of a hundred miles, floating among the clouds. Various other small islands also loom up, at such times, out of the misty distance; so that the beams of the chambers of the firmament seem to be resting upon them.

Directly behind the house was the garden. A door opening from one of our rooms into this, it was pleasant to sit looking, on one side, toward the sea, and, on the other, upon flowers and green leaves. It was pleasant to step out, as the morning was coming up behind the eastern hills, among the roses and the lilies, and many sweet-scented shrubs, and tall trees bearing flowers. At this hour I always realized best that I was in the tropics. As if in the natural state and condition of man, I stepped from my room into this little tropical Eden, wherein was no sin, but only the gushing light of the Southern morning; only the freshness of the sunrise air, in temperature just fitted to sense and feeling; only the green, glossy foliage, and buds and blossoms of every hue and fragrance. Here, from the tops of tall trees, the glowing scarlet cordia blossoms saluted, high in air, the rising sun; while those of the burning love shrub, and of the soldier's plume, equally full of fire, but growing lower, welcomed him to the ground. Great clusters of oleanders, also, reddened the morning air; and groves of full-blown yellow cedar trees, mingled with high Spanish jessamines, gave back to the sky more than its own effulgence of molten gold. How gorgeous these tropical flowers! How strange to the sight these broadly-spreading giant trees, and these puffed and swollen Guinea tamarinds, their trunks resembling in color the hide of the elephant! But the palm trees are the most beautiful of all, though now, unfortunately, more or less scathed by disease; and they may be seen, throughout the island, skirting the roadsides, and tufting, here and there, the hilltops.

GIMMAL RINGS.

THE real gimmal ring was composed of but two hoops, and therefore considered a proper emblem of love, each hoop being free to all appearance, yet not separate, and both being made to join, being complete or perfect only when joined, thus representing, it was supposed, the married state; or, at any rate, what the married state ought to be.

When gimmal rings were first invented, (we owe them to French skill,) they were formed of a gold and silver hoop, a distinction evidently intended to characterize the lady and gentleman; but whether the gold represented the husband or the wife, I leave others to determine.

Gimmals were in great request as rings of affiance. It was the custom for the lover to put his finger through one ring, and his lady-love her finger through the other, on the occasion of their engagement being formally made known. They were then, it might be truthfully said, yoked together, "typifying," says a quaint old writer on this custom, mutual forbearance and a participation of authority." Do such ideas cross the minds of young men and maidens in the present day, I wonder? I fear me much that the notion of absolute monarchy holds place in the female brain, during the period of the engagement at least, to be rudely displaced, when the "treacle-moon" is over, by the stern reality of obedience. "Mutual forbearance" is, alas! too often a myth, and a "participation of authority" a delusion and a snare. I really think gimmal rings ought to come into fashion again, if it were only to remind one of mutual obligations. Imagine, for one moment, the following scenes: "My dear Maria, you really are so devoted to your books and your correspondents that I never can get a moment's attention," exclaims Harry, on waking up from his comfortable nap by the fire-side, finding his pretty little wife at her writing-table. Maria, about to make a sarcastic allusion to Harry's staying up to the last possible moment in the city, and to his making a point of falling asleep immediately he has eaten his dinner, looks down at her gimmal ring, thinks of "mutual forbearance," and admits that Harry is really very indulgent if she happens to be late in the morning, that he never grumbles like Mr. —— if she takes a quarter of an hour instead of five minutes to put on her bonnet when he is waiting to take her to the Royal Academy; so the books are shut up, the table pushed away, and Maria, with a smile on her face, is all attention in an instant. Again: "George, I am very anxious that you should discharge Thomas," cries Celia, one morning, after hearing sad complaints of the said Thomas from the cook, who asserts that "he never does nothink that he is engaged to do in the house, and that he is a worrit and a trouble to her life." "My dear," exclaims George, in a masterly tone, "I do not wish you to interfere with the men servants; they are under my control." Celia "holds up her ring," a participator in authority. "Master George, remember I discharged my treasure, Dawson, because she neglected your orders, immediately, and I now expect due attention paid to my complaint." George, contrite and touched by the gimmal ring, concedes.

> Thou sent'st to me a true love-knot, but I
> Returned a ring of gimmals, to imply
> Thy love had one knot, mine a tripple tye, sings old Herrick in his Hesperides. The gimmal alluded to by the poet must have been more elaborate, and, I should say, less fitting as a type of the married state than the true double gimmal ring; but they were often made, like the ring shown me by my French friend, of several hoops.

Shakspeare mentions "gimmals" in several places. In Henry IV. he says, "their arms are held together by gimmals;" and in Henry V., speaking of their horses, he makes "Graudpree" say:

> ——the gimmal bit
> Lies foul with chaw'd grass, still and motionless.

So the word gimmal would seem to imply a double link, or, as some have called it, a joint-ring. Dryden has an allusion to these rings in Don Sebastian, and Phillips, in his World of Words, says that gimmals signifies twins; but I feel no desire to meddle with the origin of the word; I simply want to draw attention to the rings, and wish to know if there are many of them to be met with in the present day.

Apropos of rings, do you know why the wedding-ring is placed on the fourth finger? "Because (I was told the reason a few days since) it cannot be extended by itself; it must be in company with some other finger; but all the rest can be stretched out singly to their full extent." I have been trying to test this, and I find that I can stretch my fourth finger quite as well as I can my third, so I feel inclined to doubt the truth of the assertion, for I do not fancy that my fingers are more elastic than other people's. Perhaps some of your readers will try, and let us know if they discover that the fourth finger of their left hand is more helpless than its fellows.

RACHEL STUDYING HER PART.—It seems from the testimony of M. Janin, one of Rachel's most profuse admirers, that "the Muse of Israel" was anything but the laborious student which might have been inferred from the changeless style of her acting. Referring to the revival of Esther, and to Rachel's failure when she tried the part, M. Janin very coolly suggests that she understood nothing about it, having never read the Old Testament. (She died, recollect, in strict Hebraism, though her rooms were decked with St. Veronica handkerchiefs, rosaries and crucifixes.) The lively critic goes on to clench this supposition with a fact, communicated to him, he says, by M. Alexandre Dumas, the younger. When Rachel was rehearsing in the elder Dumas's play, the part of "Mlle. de Bell Isle," which Mars had created so admirably—at the moment when "La Marquise" says to the heroine, "Do you recollect the ill fortune of Fouquet?" Mlle. Rachel made an admirable gesture. "Good," cried Alexandre the Greater, "that is just it. You know, then, the story of Fouquet?" "I!" was the answer; "not a word! But when you say to me, 'Do you recollect the ill fortune of Fouquet?' of course I must tremble and be afraid. What need is there for me to trouble myself about M. Fouquet and his ill fortune?"—Athenæum.

BUGLE SONG.

The splendor falls on castle walls
And snowy summits old in story;
The long light shakes across the lakes,
And the wild cataract leaps in glory.
Blow, bugle, blow, set the wild echoes flying:
Blow, bugle; answer, echoes, dying, dying, dying.

O hark, O hear! how thin and clear,
And thinner, clearer, further going!
O sweet and far, from cliff and scar,
The horns of Elfland faintly blowing!
Blow, let us hear the purple glens replying:
Blow, bugle; answer, echoes, dying, dying, dying.

O love, they die in yon rich sky,
They faint on hill or field or river:
Our echoes roll from soul to soul,
And grow forever and forever.
Blow, bugle, blow, set the wild echoes flying,
And answer, echoes, answer, dying, dying, dying.

[Tennyson.

ADVERTISEMENT ROMANCE.

THERE is a story of a German student who tried to read Stuart Mill, but gave it up in disgust, because the English philosopher was too clear for him. This is an objection which may perhaps be not unjustly applied to many of our modern novels. I don't mind confessing that, with Dundreary, "I like to wonder." I may be singular in my taste, but I do enjoy a narrative full of gaps and mysteries. There is more excitement in restoring an antique from a limb or a torso, or in building up a skeleton from a few morsels of bone, than in examining the figure when presented in complete and perfect form. I dare say the Venus de Medici would never have such a hold on people's minds, had there not been such cause for speculation as to the attitude of the missing arms. In the same way, I think that in telling a tale the reader's curiosity should not be too completely satiated; something should be left for his own imagination to work out. Now, it is the main charm of the class of romances to which I would direct attention, that they are told in snatches; that they are often perplexingly enigmatical; and that, at the best, they are mere outlines. They also derive interest from the circumstance, that they are founded on facts, and are generally written by one or other of the principal characters. A very good book of stories was once made up out of the scrap-pictures on a fire-screen, and I think an abundant stock of thrilling tales may be obtained from the second column of the front page of the Times.

This column of small print is indeed a perfect microcosm of the accidents and experiences of life. We have portrayed here every phase of passion, every shade of tragedy, with here and there a touch of comedy, or perhaps a gleam of farce. "Lost" is the burden of nearly every chapter. It has been calculated that a dog and a half is lost in London every day, and I should say that the average of runaway boys is much the same. The following are two very common cases: "The Young Gentleman who Left his Mother in Upper King Street, Russell Square, on Monday evening, and said he would enlist, is earnestly requested to Return Home at once."—A Young Gentleman, 20 years of age, about 5 feet 8 inches in height, of fair complexion and prominent features, left his Home on Friday, and has not since been heard of. He is supposed to have assumed the name of 'Harris,' and to have engaged himself to a theatrical manager in the country. Any communication from himself or others will be welcomed by his parents." Young men who go off with the soldiers or the players are generally not loth to return home again, after a short experience of the boards or the barrack-yard; but here are two forms of appeal which might perhaps quicken their return; one coaxing: "XY.—Come to Mum at once all will be forgiven;" the other peremptory: "Tom, call on your Uncle at 2 W. S. immediately." Unfortunately, there are too many prodigals in such desperate plight that they can scarcely bring themselves to disclose their real position to their friends, or trust to the assurance that "every thing has been satisfactorily arranged." What terribly graphic pictures of desolate homes, heart-broken friends and blighted hopes, are sometimes painted in the broken words of these forlorn-hope advertisements. Here is one: "Dear C——.—You are implored to Return at once to your sorrowing family. If not, their ruin and dispersion are inevitable. Your poor mother is dying." In another we have a sketch of the subsequent career of a runaway youth: "C. P. F., (age 50,) son of a captain in the Horse Guards, and formerly an Eton boy, and who many years since left his home, and has lately been heard of as having been coachman in a private family, has become entitled to valuable interests in freehold estates, and is requested to communicate with," etc.

There is a robustness in the character of a man, which secures for him, no matter how low he has sunk, many chances of retrieving his position; but with a woman, one false step is fatal! Hence we turn a darker page in the catalogue of the lost and missing, when we come to such as these: "Missing, since the 15th of this month, a Young Lady, 16 years of age, of prepossessing appearance, wavy, auburn hair, small brown eyes, and beautiful complexion, of remarkable good figure, dressing, when leaving home, in a small brown and white check silk dress, black silk mantle with capuchin, straw bonnet with blue strings, linen marked 'M. A. R. W.' Supposed to be now in company with a foreigner wearing a slight moustache, but no whiskers."—Left her home, in Paris, on the evening of the 10th inst., and, no doubt, now in England with her "companion," a Young French Lady, of great beauty, aged 20, rather tall, nose slightly aquiline. Immediately before disappearance, had on a low dress of blue figured silk, with short sleeves, hair dark brown, rolled up behind, and fastened with comb, very long drop ear-rings, which she wears constantly, a necklace of two rows of large gold beads, and gold bracelets. Speaks English tolerably." Mark the different style of description in each case—how the one advertiser is almost engrossed with the thought of the fine clothes and the jewels which the poor girl carried off, while the other notes, with a detail which must have been an agony to the heart, the personal attractions of the hapless child. The "foreign young lady" seems to have a taste for absconding, especially in masquerade. In the following case, the fugitive was recovered, as we learn from a subsequent advertisement: "Mysteriously Disappeared, a Foreign Lady, of superior education, twenty-three years of age, middle stature, intelligent features, pale complexion, light-brown hair, and dark-blue eyes. Passed through Calais, on her way to England, last Tuesday evening. After leaving the Minories, in a four-wheel cab, at a quarter past ten o'clock on Saturday last, she was seen for the last time at the Great Eastern Railway Terminus, with a black bag and mahogany case, a coronet engraved on brass plate. She was habitated in male attire, as a young artist, wearing a hat, a gray suit, under an Inverness cape."

This "second column" is the wall through which Pyramus and Thisbe, kept asunder by cruel fate, whisper their love, hopes and fears. Although none but the brave deserve the fair, the title of the former is not always recognized in this mercenary world, or else a gallant warrior would not be driven to this mode of communicating with the idol of his heart: "Pekin Palace.—Under orders for Canada. Can I see you before leaving?"—Here is romance in the suburbs: "Our Terrace.—My Beloved, I live only in the assurance of your truth and love. Pray Write." Only fancy the misery of these two lovers—so near, and yet so far apart; only two houses perhaps, between them. Jones probably passes the door of the angel's cage every morning as he stalks gloomily off to the city, with his umbrella under his arm; and at night, I dare say, he prowls about the street, in the hope of seeing her shadow on the blind, or catching a glimpse of herself in the hall, when the maid takes in the evening beer. Do you think young Jones does not wish that there were dragons and giants guarding the place? Wouldn't he run up the steps, blow the magic horn, summoning the monsters to deadly combat, cut off their heads, and carry away Jemima Smith in triumph? But you can't cut off the head of your angel's father, or bowl over your angel's mother, can you? And if they slam the door in your face, all you can do is to pour your sorrows into the Times, at so much a line. Let us hope that Our Terrace may one day be enlivened by a grand wedding, and that Smith père may be seen after the breakfast, waving a blessing (having been rendered inarticulate by emotion and champagne) to Jones and his bride as they dash off in their carriage to catch the express for Dover.

Some months ago, a "Voice from the Sands of Africa" was continually calling through the advertisement speaking-trumpet to Miss E—— G—— (daughter of Israel), who, in the year 1844, was 18 years of age, and whose residence (during that period) was east of Cornhill." Should we be wrong in guessing Houndsditch? It appeared that a gentleman had died in Africa, no doubt, leaving certain wishes on record as to the disposal of a sealed parcel. Does not this read like a page out of the Wandering Jew? Do you not recollect the sealed casket that plays such a prominent part in Eugène Sue's romance? It is, however, love faithless rather than faithful which is most frequently displayed in this strange library of matter-of-fact romance. Here is love, desertion and romance, in four thrilling chapters, which, using some license as to dates, I venture to bring together, as forming a grand complete drama of passion and despair. They tell the story fully; one can easily guess the prologue. 1. The woman still trustful: "Was it really your own wish—your own plan? . . I did not deserve it! . . . . I cannot so soon forget, but I have forgiven! Unless you mention something known to us only, I shall never consider it yours.—Lost L——." 2. The woman, after an interval of silence or explanation, convinced of her lover's perfidy: "It is enough: one man alone upon earth have I found noble. Away from me for ever! Cold heart and mean spirit, you have lost what millions—empires—could not have bought, but which a single word, trustfully and nobly spoken, might have made your own to all eternity. Yet are you forgiven: depart in peace. I rest in my Redeemer" 3. The man: "With remorse and misery beyond telling, I find myself alone. Be merciful! Pray let me send what money you want; it would be the greatest consolation. God bless!—C." 4. The Chorus: "The assistance came too late—she died in the night!"

In the begining of 1861, an advertisement appeared in the Times, which invested the picturesque valley of Brohl with a new and melancholy interest, as the scene of a tragedy which may perhaps one day form a legend of the Rhine. It was as follows:

"Publication.—In an almost impenetrable ravine in the declivity of Mount Rheineck, which is situated immediately on the banks of the Rhine, between Brohl and Niederbreisig, (a district of the Tribunal of First Instance of Cobleuce, Rhenish Prussia,) on the 22d of last March, was found the Body of some person, a female, from 20 to 30 years of age or thereabouts, concealed in a recess covered with large stones. The period of decease could not be precisely determined. Death was caused by a ball shot from a gun, which traversed the breast and back. Description—height, 5 feet 2 or 3 inches; hair, fair; teeth, sound, small, and irregularly set in lower jaw. Dress—1. Chemise, cambric, 3 feet 6 inches long, the upper hem forming a running string, with two eyelet-holes, two fine and even cords passing through; in the centre of the round breast of the chemise, and below the eyelet-holes, the initials 'A. H. 36' are embroidered in Gothic characters, in relief, half an inch long. 2. A night-gown of fine white dimity, collar turned down, 2 feet 3 inches, with white mother-of-pearl buttons; some remains of a fine material, with brown and white stripes, (jaconet muslin,) in the white stripe is a small winding white line, with red spots. In the vicinity of the body have been found the remnants of a petticoat, 3 feet 2 inches long; it is composed of fine white dimity, striped, the same material as the night-gown—on the upper edge, which is an inch and a half broad, with white ribbon strings, are embroidered in white letters, 2½ lines, in relief, and in large characters of the German printed alphabet, the initials 'M. R. 6.' The bottom hem is finished with a cord in linen thread. The fine quality of the materials and the elegant make of all those articles indicate that the victim belonged to a rich class. In consequence of the state of putrefaction and external destruction, it is impossible to notice other marks of recognition. I request of any person who can give information concerning this unknown individual, and the circumstances of her death, to be so good as to furnish me with the particulars, else to communicate them to the nearest magistrates. The articles of dress above mentioned, together with the lower jaw, are deposited for inspection at my office.

"The Crown Prosecutor-General, (Signed) "De Rodenberg.
"Coblence, 25th April, 1861."

What a story Poe could have spun out of these materials! The victim was not a resident in the neighborhood where her remains were found, or some clue to her identification would have been obtained without advertising in England. Her dress was clearly for summer wear. Probably she was on a pleasure-tour. That the murderer was not led to the crime by any cause which rendered his own life a burden, is proved by the care with which he hid away the evidence of his guilt. The unhappy girl was somehow an obstacle in his path, and having effectually set her aside, he went away to reap the fruit of his designs. Did he live to read the Times of 25th April, 1861, and to learn that the desert had given up its dead?

Doubts as to whether a man be alive or dead occasionally give rise to very singular advertisements. Perhaps the most curious of this class was one which appeared a few years back, and to which Dr. Wynter refers in one of his interesting essays. It ran thus: "To the Party who Posts his Letters in Princes Street, Leicester Square: Your family is now in a state of excitement unbearable. Your attention is called to an advertisement in Wednesday's Morning Advertiser, headed: 'A Body found drowned at Deptford.' After your avowal to your friend as to what you might do, he has been to see the decomposed remains, accompanied by others. The features are gone; but there are marks on the arm; so that, unless they hear from you to-day, it will satisfy them that the remains are those of their misguided relative, and steps will be directly taken to place them in the family vault, as they cannot bear the idea of a panper's funeral." This, as the doctor remarks, must be either an appeal to the dead, or a menace to the living, to bury a wrong man in the family vault. A recent advertisement of a similar kind is also very singular: "Reward of One Thousand Marks (Hamburg currency.)—The engineer Rotherham, born in Norwich, was missed in St. Pauly, (suburb of Hamburg,) December 15th, 1857, and his supposed body found on April 27th, 1858, in the Elbe, near Hamburg. The undersigned, whose house the above-named was in the habit of frequenting, was on suspicion brought to trial, as his abode could not be found out, and the body which was found four months later in the Elbe was looked upon as that of the missing one. The result of this trial has not established the fact of a murder, nor proved that the body found was that of the above-mentioned Rotherham. As it is, therefore, not improbable that the above-named engineer, Rotherham, is still alive, and in this case it will be of great importance for me to ascertain this, I promise to everybody, being able to give me satisfactory explanation respecting the stay or abode of Rotherham, or of the body found, the above-named reward of 1,000 marks. The same will be given even to the relations of Rotherham who may be able to give me the required proof respecting the actual residence of Rotherham, by testimonies of magistrates or credible gentlemen.—T. H. C. Brandes, 16 and 17 David street, Hamburg, December, 1863."

After the tragedy comes the farce. Here is a droll piece of impudence: "Adoption.—Any lady or gentleman (Episcopalian) of fortune, feeling disposed to adopt or take an interest in a respectable young man, (gentleman-like, aged 31,) of energetic business habits, and unexceptionable character, now engaged with an eminent decorator, may address 'Orphan;'" etc. You will observe that this interesting "Orphan" of thirty is particular in restricting the inestimable privilege of adopting him to members of the Church of England—he could not think of extending it to a dissenter! If the "Orphan" is still under the sad necessity of earning his own living, he would do well to apply to the author of the following announcement, who has very practical notions of the great gain of godliness: "To Christian Parents.—A piously disposed young man can be accommodated with a comfortable sitting-room and bed-room, in a decidedly Christian family; he would have every home-comfort, and the inestimable advantages of a godly example; in return for which, liberal terms would be required;" etc.

Modern Poetry.—The apparent tendency of the best English poetry of this age is to become more and more thoughtful, and more condensed in expression. The most absolute grace and neatness of style, the truest simplicity or the most ample majesty of diction, are insufficient to give long life to thinness or poverty of thought. Studies from the antique and sketches from nature may show both carefulness and truth of drawing, but, unless they bear some relation to one or other of the deeper questions which human life or human imagination now and always presents, their acceptance as first-rate works of art will be only temporary. As the machinery of verse-making, like all other machinery, becomes more widely and thoroughly understood, the mind of the reader seeks more directly for something in the verse which is not merely the result of clever mechanism. The merest school-boy of versatile talent and cultivated ear does not want Tennyson's original genius to put together a poem that, upon the first blush, may look like a leaf out of In Memoriam or the Idylls of the King. The very facility of such imitation at once makes the reader more anxious to find the true ring of the genuine metal, and the real poet more careful to weight his words with as much thought as they can properly carry. In this wise it sometimes happens, even with the first class among our poets, that the fulness of thought overbalances the power of expression, and the most persevering and enthusiastic readers are compelled to sigh: "Oh, for a crib!"

When you find a person a little better than his word, a little more liberal than his promise, a little more than borne out in his statement by his facts, a little larger in deed than in speech, you recognize a kind of eloquence in that person's utterance, not laid down in Blair or Campbell.

Merit readily recognizes merit. Certainly he cannot have it who doesn't know it when he sees it.

A Temperance lecturer said: "Parents, you have children or, if you have not, your daughters may have."

MY FIRST CAVALRY CHARGE.

DURING the siege of Vera Cruz, it so happened that I found myself an idler about camp, having been shipwrecked the evening of the day I arrived in the harbor, where the elements made short work of my vessel and cargo. I amused myself watching the progress of the siege, and the effect of shot and shell upon the doomed city. I was sharing the tent of a friend, Lieut. L., of the Dragoons, and was lolling lazily on a blanket, one hot afternoon, trying to keep cool, when I heard the bugle give the signal for saddling up, and heard a desultory firing out towards the line of our pickets. At that moment Lieut. L. entered, and seizing his sabre and pistols, buckled them on hastily, saying: "Come, there's a little fun ahead: the Lancers have driven in our pickets, and my company is ordered to drive them back. Come along and take a hand." I said: "Give me a horse and I'll go along; but as for taking a hand—I'm not paid for reducing the census." Jumping up, I seized my hat and emerged from the tent in time to see a couple of dead men taken from the backs of two led horses—one a corporal and the other a private of the company, on duty as pickets. They had both been shot through the body and pierced by lances, presenting a horrible sight, the blood streaming from their wounds and running down the sides of the horses. There was a muttering of threats and curses among the soldiers as they saddled their animals hastily, and soon the line was formed and the sergeant reported "all ready." Turning to a corporal, the Lieutenant asked: "Have you a spare horse for this gentleman?" The corporal looked at me with a glance that I thought had a gleam of mischief in it, and, touching his cap, answered "Yes, sir." The steed was soon brought, all saddled and ready—by no means an inviting-looking animal, but I saw that he had plenty of bone and muscle, and as time was precious, there was no stopping to criticise. I mounted, and away we went at a brisk gallop. My horse had evidently been "laying-up" for a few days, and "felt his oats," for every few moments he would indulge in a most unearthly squeal, laying his ears back, and executing a sudden movement known in California as "bucking;" but as I rather prided myself on my horsemanship, I did not object to these demonstrations, especially as I saw that I was an object of considerable interest to the soldiers, who were watching my progress, evidently expecting some denouement; while the corporal who gave me the horse would occasionally sidle up and inquire "how his Honor liked the horse?"

"He is a rum one to look at, corporal," said I, "but I reckon he's a good one to go."

"You may well say that, sir," said the corporal; "it is Sergeant Tim Mooney's horse, sir, who took a little too much commissary whisky, your Honor, and fell off, sir, and broke his arm, and he is now in the hospital; and that's the way your Honor comes to get the baste to-day."

We galloped over the sand hills a distance of about three miles, when a picket came dashing up and pointed out a long line of Mexican cavalry, drawn up to receive us, their position defined by the fluttering pennons on their lances. The order to "halt" was given, and to dismount to tighten girths, and see that pistols and sabres were in order. This took up a moment's time, and we again moved forward. I had been riding with the Lieutenant, who now took his position on the right of the company with the bugler, and gave the order to "forward" at a walk. My old horse began at this stage of proceedings to execute a series of evolutions quite puzzling to me; he would give a little jump, thrust his nose out, jerking the reins out of my hands, then playfully prance side-ways, end-ways, all sorts of ways. It was in vain that I cried "Whoa! you beast, be quiet!" He evidently wanted to take his accustomed place in the ranks, and was suspicious that something was going on, and wanted to be there. I planted my feet firmly in the stirrups, wound the reins around my hands and held him down; but the perspiration rolled down my face in streams. My friend looked around, and, seeing that I was doing some hard work, cried out: "What's the matter?" "Oh, nothing, only this old cuss is awful on the bit." He apparently noticed for the first time that I had no weapons, and said: "You have no sabre! how stupid in me not to have given you one and a pair of pistols." I said: "It is of no consequence; I don't intend to get anywhere near a necessity for using them." "Well, then," said he, "better stop soon, for I am going to charge those rascals in a moment." He gave the order, "Trot!" I glanced ahead and saw that we were within a few hundred yards of the Lancers, who were drawn up ready to receive us, ten times our number, and sanguine of the easy victory and capture of our little band.

I thought the thing was getting serious, and, hauling up my beast with an effort, remarked: "I think I will stop here." At that instant the bugle sounded the "Charge." The first note had hardly floated upon the air before I felt myself suddenly raised from the saddle, and I then made the unpleasant discovery that my beast was making some tall leaps and a desperate effort to overtake his comrades. I tugged away at the reins, and hallooed "Whoa!" but I might as well have pulled on the Chrysopolis with a full head of steam on. Away he went, over sand-heaps and through the chaparrel. Presently, I found myself on the right of the company, in the front rank, plunging forward at a fearful rate. I had just time to see a line of horses, men and lances before me, and down we bore upon their ranks, with a yell and a hurrah. There was a concussion, a confused mass of men and horses, and I found myself on the neck of my steed in a cloud of dust, with sabres flashing around me, and horses and men under me. I succeeded in regaining my seat; but on we went, and over them. In the confusion of the moment I had only time to see a stalwart Mexican poising his lance, and I thought my time had come—that it was all over with me—when my horse struck the lighter one of my enemy full in the breast. Down he went, and man and horse rolled under the hoofs of my Rosinante. I had floored and ridden over him. On, on we went! I looked to see where I was, and observed my friend, the Lieutenant, standing in his stirrups, and laying about him with his sabre; and every time it descended, a Lancer went down under its skull-cleaving blows. I saw a dismounted Lancer spring up and aim a blow at him with his clubbed escopeta; but the Lieutenant also saw it, parried it with his sabre, and, with a swooping blow, clove the head of the Lancer as if it had been an egg-shell. There was a cheer, and the Mexicans were flying before us. I say us, for I was among the first and foremost, in spite of myself. The blood of my charger was up; with ears laid back and mouth open, he looked, as he was, a devil incarnate. And no wonder they scampered before him. Like chaff they were scattered, and not till we reached the little town of Medlin, twelve miles from Vera Cruz, did we halt.

My old horse stopped when the rest did, and, were it not that the bugle sounded "Halt!" would probably have been going on until now. Exhausted, breathless—the perspiration rolling off my face in streams, my pants torn and pulled up to my knees, my hands blistered, my legs bruised, and nearly dead with heat and thirst, I tumbled rather than dismounted from my horse, and lay, just where I fell, in the shade of an adobe house—a pretty well used-up man. My friend, the Lieutenant, rode up, and, discovering me, cried out: "Good for you, my boy! Got your blood up and wouldn't stay behind, eh? I saw you riding them down. You shall be mentioned in my report. A little fool-hardy, though. I wouldn't have given two cents for you at one time—came mighty near getting your quietus!" I said nothing—couldn't—too much out of breath. I heard many compliments about me from the men; such as "Plucky chap, that—ought to enlist," etc.

Just then, the Corporal who gave me the animal rode up. "Ah, your honor, you were a very divil among 'em! How did you like the baste?" I managed to get hold of a piece of adobe near me, and only for the hasty exit he made there would have been a vacancy among the corporals of that company. It missed his head only by an inch or two.

After a couple of hours' rest we mounted again and rode back to camp, over the same course. I counted about forty Mexicans horse du combat, killed, disabled and stunned. I sincerely believe that most of the latter were indebted to me for their misfortunes. We reached camp tired and exhausted, and as I threw myself on my blanket I passed a resolution in my mind that the next time I "went for a soger" I would go in the Light Infantry, and never again attempt to play "Heavy Dragoon." PODGERS.

SCIENTIFIC SKETCHES.

THE TRANSMUTATION OF THINGS.

"ALL flesh is grass," is not only metaphysically but literally true, and the change effected by some mysterious process in our system is surely more astonishing than the wildest dreams of the old alchemists, who believed and labored in the hope of converting one metal into another. They have not wanted high authority and eminent support even in modern times, for Boyle advocated the "multiplication of gold" by some secret mode which he communicated to Newton and Locke, basing his belief on the same kind of evidence that upholds many of our theories and doctrines at this day. For Newton, the most profound, in science pure and abstract, of all modern philosophers, and to whom, most reverently and heautifully, the expression has been applied, "and Newton said, let there be light and there was light," the practical fact had its charms, and on the testimony of Sir David Brewster, he pursued to a late period of life his experiments, in the confident expectation of transmuting one species into another, nothing checking, whatever the results, the ardor of his chemical researches or extinguishing the hope he so fondly cherished.

Ah! the poetic age of science, the days of visions and a dark superstition, exclaim some, others the work of ambition or avarice. But see, the attempt, however unworthy or contemptible in the eyes of the mere theorist, has had its devotees—less ardent maybe—but still devotees, even to-day in the light of a luminous sun-lit science. How? Alchemy in our time! We know not, Alchemy or what, but we do know that Dr. Draper, in 1857, communicated to the London Philosophical Magazine a most suggestive paper, ingenuously confessing his attempts at the transmutation of metals and describing his alchemical experiments, in one of which, by the action of light upon a salt of silver in the presence of certain acids, the metallic silver is set free, but so changed in character that nitric acid no longer affects it. Indeed a change, if not "in the sense of an actual transmutation into another metal, at all events into something which is not silver."

If so, why not one step further? Nil inventum et perfectum—nothing is invented perfect; all argument favors the approach to perfection more or less rapid, a sound faith inspires the hope of it, and reason, on the analogy of nature drawn from every line of life, teaches it as "certainly as that the sparks fly upward" or that the law of gravitation acts inevitably downward.

This is no vague visionary attempt to create something out of nothing, to make a blade of grass to grow or to know why it grows. The materials already exist to hand in ample abundance, and the synthetical and analytical processes, modes of composition and decomposition, furnish the power whereby new forms and combinations, if not existences, of endless variety and pattern spring into determinate shape at the magic touch of the scientific wand.

Long and loudly did the world, in incredulous fit and sneering tone, laugh over the announcement of the discovery of artificial Ultramarine, or Lapis Lazuli, as has been truly said, the most brilliant and conclusive of all the achievements of inorganic chemistry. It seemed impossible that this beautiful mineral of azure blue could be formed from materials entirely colorless in themselves. A new creation, and hence an absurd piece of sacrilege! No, not a new creation, but a new combination of existing elements, that's all; and synthesis, the power of putting things together, taught the simple and direct way to it.

But where will you stop in this daring attempt? Your Andrew Crosse, by the peculiar mysterious force of electricity, has formed new crystals of rock and of metal. This is apprehensive enough to the placid, well-settled mind. Might he not, impiously intent, pass into the realm of organic life, and seek by creative act to disturb the firm foundations of faith, and the religion that rests so complacently upon it? Truly apprehensive, justly suspicious; for right quickly did he reach this realm and give to science and these panic-dealers, under conditions of experiment thoroughly cautious and faithful, and on proof beyond question, a living thing, an insect—the acarus horridus—well named, from the terror it excited, especially in the metaphysico-religious German world.

But why the alarm? For may not life be a quality, the result—not a new creation from nothing—but the result of the combination of certain elements under certain conditions; and why any greater apprehension, in this view, than from the numberless works of art and science daily produced under circumstances, many of them, quite as strange and problematical?

To give a few instances to this effect; it is almost inconceivable, the change from coal tar, black, dull viscous fluid, into the splendidly brilliant purple and scarlet colors of the solid aniline dyes! again, reverse the artful process, and coal in lumps of dull black solid mass passes into light, ethereal sparkling gas, and by a slight change in the proportions of the same elements, into the transparently clear coal oils of extreme fluidity. From clay, among the most common of bodies and of little worth, comes Aluminium possessing almost all the valuable qualities of Gold and Platinum.

Is it strange, therefore, or beyond reason that man strives, seeing how great changes are wrought by small differences, and how easy the transition among things utterly unlike, to produce from the "basest materials the precious metals and the noblest gems," or is it startling that he, still more under the impulse of a rational ambition, claims some share, how great not yet developed, in creative power? Intelligent progress answers no, the alarm has subsided, light overspreads the scene, faith and religion are found to rest as securely as ever, if not on more solid ground: persecution, to the honor of the age, no longer tortures or seeks to torture bold conception, and no more is heard the cry "I am not mad" from some Galileo's dungeon. TRISMEGISTUS.

DRAMATIC.

THE first night of the drama at the Academy of Music drew together, perhaps, the largest audience ever packed within its walls. A good-natured audience, too, who laughed over a broad, farcical, and not over-clever play, called Extremes. Its sentiment was ambiguous—its satire heavy. The moral ethics it teaches seem to be that all reformers are immoral, and that all things come right without the aid of Luthers, Howards and Whittiers. Inter alia—the only gentleman in the piece is a Southerner, or to use "Mrs. Crosby's" somewhat equivocal statement, "a Southerner, but a gentleman," and even he is perfectly exasperating from his insane propensity to wander about the stage and utter sentiments of a round text copy-book quality on all occasions. The views of New York society given here, if not strictly true, are pardonable if the author had no better means of judging than that obtained by looking out of areas and up kitchen stairs.

Satire, however, is good, and we must not always expect plays to be didactic. If the element of wit had mingled in this piece, there was a chance that it might have leavened the mass. But, unfortunately, the dialogue did not soar above commonplaces; its catch-words were but two—"O Moses!" and "It's a great country!" On these intensely subtle and highly original conceits the changes were rung through five mortal acts. People might yawn—fans rustle like the leaves of Vallambrosa—but "O Moses!" was sure to bring them to a sense of their duty. A lisp was the sole stock in trade which that capital actor, Charles Wheatleigh, had to draw upon, and he made the most of it. In one sense the piece was a success, as it proved the excellence of the company who could entertain for four or five hours so large an audience and keep them in excellent humor. The principal characters by Messrs. Richings, Wheatleigh and Mayo, and Mesdames Richings, Saunders and Martin were models of clever acting, and at once settled the status of the combination.

Fashion was played on Thursday night, and excellently rendered. It was a much better play than the preceding one, but by no means equal to some of the English comedies, ancient and modern that have been played here. We are patriotic and don't like to confess that, with the exception of John Brougham's extravaganzas and burlesques, there have been very few local American comedies worth going to see; but such is the fact, and as there is no restrictive tariff upon good English plays, shall look forward to this evening's School for Scandal, and Richings' "Sir Peter Teazle," with pleasurable anticipation.

MY CARTE DE VISITE.

"Between the acting of a dreadful thing
And the first motion, all the interim is Like a phantasma"—Julius Cæsar.

I DID not sleep as soundly as I am accustomed to, last night, from the time when I close my old and well-worn copy of Shakspeare, as habitually I lie reading it in bed at retiring, until the ringing of the breakfast bell in the morning. My slumbers were made up of brief naps, each of which encompassed a dream, pleasing, serious or fantastical as it may have been, curiously and almost methodically arranged throughout the hours, and so distinctly delineated as to make my rest resemble, as it were, a picture gallery, the representations in which, like some in Hampton Court or the Pitti Palace, are, perhaps, never to be forgotten. Some of these representations were master-pieces, partly in the originality with which their subjects were conceived, partly in the natural grouping and action of the characters, and partly in the graceful disposition and happy coloring of the general paraphernalia of the scene—mainly however, in some indescribable charm that invested them, if I may so speak, with a sympathy that mysteriously entered into my meditations when morning scattered the indifferent dreams to forgetfulness, and that as long as those vividly penciled—toning down with time into a more delicate harmony—shall remain in memory will form a pleasant portion of the ideality of my existance.

Why my slumbers were thus broken into patches of light and shade I have no idea, unless it was because the night was an interval between the forming and the carrying into effect of a singular resolution that I had, unawares, been betrayed into making. I never had until now (and now with a bewildering apprehension) been induced by whatever blandishments to have my carte de visite taken. Too many times had I laughed at the vanity of my dear friends (including the female) that had led them away into bearing about with them ample packages of their own fanciful likenesses. Now through the ingenious machinations of one of them, was it possible that all my laughter, having been hoarded up, was, in one accumulated blast, to be hurled back at me! Where is the wonder that I saw faces in every variety of amusing contortion in my dreams! Where is the wonder that my dreams, in their varied succession, resembled a picture-gallery!

Notwithstanding, I like to look at pictures of whatever character they be. Sometimes, when they are worth the time, I love to study them. Once, some thirty years ago, when Peter Parley furnished me with my art galleries, I took pleasure in poring over them all. But in those days pictures were pictures, indeed. No unskilfully drawn outlines, no lack of a natural perspective, no mere blotches of gamboge and Prussian blue, then; even the theory of pre-Raphaelitism it was unnecessary to become acquainted with in order to enjoy thoroughly. All designs were examined with the express view of detecting in them the minutest details of Nature, without regard to the school in which they had been drawn. Peter Parley knew how to write the context to them, too. John Ruskin, who has since perplexed me with his extravagant appreciation of Turner, cannot to-day write as delightfully concerning Page's copy of the Venus of Titian, as Parley could concerning the poor boy whose toe was caught by the crab.

Wordsworth, in all of his voluminous publications, never wrote but two lines that particularly attracted me because of their poetical strength; and one of them (which is so hackneyed that I confess myself ashamed to repeat it) is

"The child is father to the man."

My manhood has run wofully astray from the artless teachings of my childhood, especially in this matter of pictures. Then, in those days, when Parley flourished, I could find nothing in pictures except beauties; now, in these days of Ruskin, I can find little in them except faults, with, however, such exceptions as this: an old burgomaster, in his queer dress, that when I was a child hung in an art-gallery near my father's house, was then an abomination; now that same Vandyke would be to me a treasure worth all the cartes de visite that will be manufactured until Doomsday.

Not that I do not like sometimes to look at a carte de visite. I do, indeed, when the individual represented is a friend whose true expression of countenance I can summon up in my imagination as I gaze upon the contour of his face on the card. But when the individual is personally unknown to me—no matter what interest I may take in him—of what assistance is his "likeness" on one of these cards in establishing the identity of his appearance, when, in all likelihood, this "likeness" resembles him no more than Hamlet's uncle did Hamlet's father?

Who, let me ask, ever saw a smile on the lips of one in a carte de visite? Lucy, the merry tantrum, is always laughing. Lucy hands me her carte de visite. Well, in spite of that funereal look, I know the "likeness" is hers, but know it only because she tells me that it is. Ellen's eyes droop in their modesty. Ellen hands me her carte de visite. What, Ellen! are these great eyes, that stare so unmeaningly, yours? Alice prides herself on her graceful motions. Alice hands me her carte de visite. Ah, Alice! you must have had a very stiff neck when this was taken.

All cartes de visite are alike in these three respects: in funereal and long-drawn-out solemnity; in eyes that look like those behind grates at Stockton; and in stiff necks that Dr. Abercrombie would not have attempted to limber.

Parties going to masquerades can disguise themselves no more effectually, perhaps, than by imitating themselves as they appear in their own cartes de visite.

One day last week, a lady was puzzled enough to take me seriously to task for commenting dubiously on two paintings that hang in her parlor. One was an exceedingly gorgeous landscape, as she was pleased to call it. She asked me to give her my true opinion concerning it.

"Madam," said I, "the work is well done. The artist evidently took a choice bit of natural scenery for his subject, with the intention of wrapping it up in an artificial coat of many colors. How well he has accomplished his design he can best judge for you and the rest of us, himself. Let him place his picture alongside of the bit of scenery, and even he, I give my word for it, will be unable to recognize his own subject in the disguise with which he has so successfully concealed it."

"My nephew painted it," said she calmly; "and there's his portrait, taken by himself. What is your opinion of that?"

I would not tell her a falsehood; so I told her—and let her take my remark as she would—that the individual represented in that handsome frame was well executed on the canvas.

And indeed he was well executed: not as some of my fine old line engravings, India proofs, are—but as I myself am, in my ridiculous carte de visite; as all men are; as women and children are; as even innocent babes are, as may be seen in any my-lady's album.

Alas! for my invulnerability. The lady whose ingenious nephew had successfully disguised nature and neatly executed himself on canvas, had the mysterious skill to draw from me, in a weak moment, a solemn pledge that I would bring to her within three days my own carte de visite. Said she:

"I will place it between the President's and Gen. Grant's."

I thoughtlessly accepted the apple, which, however, she intended to be merely a sugar-plum.

Entering, this morning, the photograph gallery, as it is sonorously called, I huskily told the attending "artist" my business. Conducting me into a back room, he led me towards a chair surmounted with what looked to me like the garotting implement of the Cubans. He seated me, arranged my head, a little towards one side, in a semi-circular bow of iron, and directed me to look steadily at a small piece of white paper that he had pinned upon a screen in one corner.

"You are not to wink," said he gravely, as he left the room.

And there I was.

How, in some farce on Maguire's boards, in that predicament, I would have brought down the house with roars!

The "artist" returned presently, and, commencing to handle the camera, once more requested me to look steadily at the piece of paper, and on no account either to wink or move a muscle of my face.

"All over," said he in a moment or two.

But, in the meantime, in order not to look so woe-begone as others do in their cartes de visite, I had in a vein of pleasantry thrown my countenance into a beaming smile.

My "likeness" was soon afterwards brought to me, and, on looking at it, I broke out into an uncontrollable fit of laughter, with the exclamation, "Malvolio!"

I looked at it again, and roared until I became hoarse.

A third time I ventured to glance at it, and had, this time, to fall back into the chair in sheer exhaustion with my risible manifestation.

Malvolio!

There he was, a perfect picture of him, as Shakspeare designed him to be:

"He does smile his face into more lines than are in a map. You have never seen such a thing as 'tis."

The "artist" was evidently chagrined.

"I will take you again," said he; "but you must keep your face in better countenance."

"In better countenance!" said I; "what face can be put in better countenance than that?"

He smiled grimly.

"I'll wager you ton to one," said I, "that you never threw so much expression into a face, not even your own, before."

"Let me try it again," he plead.

"Not if I know myself," said I. "Let me have a gross—that is, twelve dozen of these. When can you have them ready?"

"This afternoon," said he, looking at me suspiciously.

I paid him for them, and shall call for them as I take this article to the office.

What, my Californian, do you think I shall do with so many? So many? I have not half enough. One I shall insert between the leaves of the first scene of the 4th act of Twelfth Night. One I shall request my good friend the "Artist," to place conspicuously in a frame at the entrance to his gallery, in company with his other celebrities. The remaining 142 I shall distribute among such of my friends, male and female, as I may conveniently meet, (provided they have albums for the purpose,) in order that I, with my smiling countenance, may serve to cheer up somewhat the general solemnity of their drawing-room galleries.

Nor would this Malvonian hybrid between a smile and a grin on my countenance, in my carte de visite, be out of place in a lady's album. Some relief, however slight, from a common monotony would cause her portrait-gallery to be admired to the charming envy of her dear companions. Would not my countenance in the carte, too, be as naturally depicted as the countenances of others who affect the melancholy or severe? Sometimes by way of variety, we see an individual "taken" with a hat, cocked on one side, on his head; but he wears that inevitable seriousness, that makes his "picture" but the same old counterpart of the rest of them. Who can say that my "picture" is a counterpart of the generality of cartes de visite, except in the surroundings of it, as in that marble pillar and those vases of beautiful flowers? The book, I am glad to notice, has gone out of fashion with daguerreotypes. And how far preferable is that vase, with its unfading treasures! Let it remain! Is it not invariable the distinctive feature, in its clearness, of the carte? Only it will not smile. The gravity of the portrait infects it, as it does the pillar, which looks as though it were a monumental sermon.

How appropriate, also! Bridget the cook, John the coachman, General Sherman, myself as Malvolio, and John Conness, all standing together in the warm atmospbere of a delicious Italian landscape.

Fly-Leaf.

SAN FRANCISCO, BY THE POETS.

NUMBER THREE.

THE WILLOWS.—After Edgar A. Poe.

THE skies they were ashen and sober,
The streets they were dirty and drear;
It was night in the month of October,
Of my most immemorial year;
Like the skies I was perfectly sober,
As I stopped at the mansion of Shear—
At the Nightingale—perfectly sober,
And the willowy woodland, down here.

Here once in an alley Titanic
Of Ten-pins—I roamed with my soul—
Of Ten-pins—with Mary, my soul;
They were days when my heart was volcanic,
And impelled me to frequently roll,
And made me resistlessly roll,
Till my ten-strikes created a panic
In the realms of the Boreal pole,
Till my ten-strikes created a panic,
With the monkey a-top of his pole.

I repeat, I was perfectly sober,
But my thoughts they were palsied and sere—
My thoughts were decidedly queer;
For I knew not the month was October,
And marked not the night of the year;
I forgot that sweet morceau of Auber,
That the hand oft performed down here,
And I mixed the sweet music of Auber
With the Nightingale's music by Shear.

And now as the night was senescent,
And star-dials pointed to morn,
And car-drivers hinted of morn,
At the end of the path a liquescent
And bibulous lustre was born;
'T was made by the bar-keeper present,
Who mixed a duplicate horn—
His two hands describing a crescent
Distinct with a duplicate horn.

And I said: "This looks perfectly regal,
For it's warm, and I know I feel dry—
I am confident that I feel dry:
We have come past the emeu and eagle,
And watched the gay monkey on high:
Let us drink to the emeu and eagle—
To the swan and the monkey on high—
To the eagle and monkey on high;
For this bar-keeper will not inveigle—
Bully boy with the vitreous eye;
He surely would never inveigle—
Sweet youth with the crystalline eye."

But Mary, uplifting her finger,
Said: "Sadly this bar I mistrust—
I fear that this bar does not trust.
Oh, hasten, oh, let us not linger!
Oh, fly—let us fly—ere we must!"
In terror she cried, letting sink her
Parasol till it trailed in the dust—
In agony sobbed, letting sink her
Parasol till it trailed in the dust—
Till it sorrowfully trailed in the dust.

Then I pacified Mary and kissed her,
And tempted her into the room,
And conquered her scruples and gloom;
And we passed to the end of the vista,
But were stopped by the warning of doom—
By some words that were warning of doom.
And I said: "What is written, sweet sister,
At the opposite end of the room?"
She sobbed, as she answered, "'All liquors
Must be paid for ere leaving the room.'"

Then my heart it grew ashen and sober,
As the streets were deserted and drear—
For my pockets were empty and drear;
And I cried, "It was surely October,
On this very night of last year,
That I journeyed—I journeyed down here—
That I brought a fair maiden down here,
On this night of all nights in the year.
Ah! to me that inscription is clear;
Well I know, now I'm perfectly sober,
Why no longer they credit me here—
Well I know now that music of Auber
And this Nightingale, kept by one Shear

THE SWALLOW.

O SWALLOW, Swallow, flying, flying South,
Fly to her, and fall upon her gilded eaves,
And tell her, tell her what I tell to thee.

O tell her, Swallow, thou that knowest each,
That bright and fierce and fickle is the South,
And dark and true and tender is the North.

O Swallow, Swallow, if I could follow, and light
Upon her lattice, I would pipe and trill,
And cheep and twitter twenty million loves.

O were I thou, that she might take me in
And lay me on her bosom, and her heart
Would rock the snowy cradle till I died.

Why lingereth she to clothe her heart with love,
Delaying as the tender ash delays
To clothe herself, when all the woods are green?

O tell her, Swallow, that thy brood is flown:
Say to her, I do but wanton in the South,
But in the North long since my nest is made.

O tell her, brief is life but love is long,
And brief the sun of summer in the North,
And brief the moon of beauty in the South.

O Swallow, fling from the golden woods,
Fly to her, and pipe and woo her, and make her mine,
And tell her, tell her, that I follow thee.

[Tennyson's Princess.

THE JUBILEE LOZENGE.

MR. LISTON was at one period of his life a most determined joker. He and my husband were one day together in a shop in Bond street, kept by a Mr. Amick, which was full of perfumery, beautiful toys, and nicknacks of every kind. They had been looking at some amulets, a black composition, just new, and intended for brooches, upon which the head of George III. was stamped, to commemorate the jubilee. Mr. Incledon passing at the moment observed his brother comedians, and entered the shop. He admired in turn all the pretty objects placed in every direction; and, attracted by the amulets, he inquired what they were. Before Mr. Amick could reply to his question, Mr. Liston (who was aware of Incledon's overweening love of any novelty in the shape of medicine or voice-improver) told him they were lozenges of a most wonderful property, just discovered. As he anticipated, Mr. Incledon caught at the bait, seized up one, and examining it with much interest, observed that it was "very large," (it was about the size of a small locket.) He was told that, as only one was necessary to the cure of the person whose voice was out of order, it was made of the size requisite for the purpose—"But," observed Mr. Liston, artfully, "you cannot require such a thing, Incledon! There's nothing the matter with your voice!"

"Isn't there, my dear boy! that's all you know of the matter! I've been as hoarse as a raven this fortnight; in fact, I've not a note left in my voice;" a constant assertion by him when his voice was at his very best.

"Well," said the wag, "if that's the case, the Jubilee Lozenge is the very thing."

He then adduced several "cases" of its miraculous results within his own knowledge. Upon this Incledon addressed the master of the shop, who was exceedingly embarrassed at the trick thus played upon a customer:

"What, sir, is the price of this invaluable lozenge?"

"Ten and sixpence," was the reply.

"It's a large sum for one lozenge, sir; but, as my friend Mr. Liston assures me that it is efficacious, and as at this time I have not the ghost of a note left in my voice, from a severe cold, I'll take one."

He then threw down the money, and put the amulet into his mouth, observing that "it was made of a very inconvenient shape, but he supposed there was some good reason for it." Mr. Liston instructed him to keep it all day in his mouth, that being the intent. Away went the singer, quite pleased with the toy for which he had paid so dearly, and the two jokers roared aloud with laughter when he was out of hearing, at the easy credulity of their unsuspecting friend.

At night everybody in the green-room was apprised of the jest, and agreed to assist in prolonging it. Mr. Incledon, who did not play until the afterpiece, entered the room with the lozenge in his mouth. Being prepared for his appearance, Mr. Liston had all his confederates assembled. They inquired, in turn, every particular about the wonderful remedy "of which they had all heard so much!" Incledon was very communicative as to its effects. "His voice was certainly clearer since he had had the lozenge in his mouth, but at the same time he could not withhold from them his conviction that the sucking of it had made him feel exceedingly sick;" and well it might, for it was in fact a mass of perfume, like a highly-scented pastile, nauseating to the palate, as might be expected.

In the midst of the interest occasioned by this invaluable recipe, Mr. John Kemble, who had been performing in the play, and had listened to the conspiracy against the simplicity of poor Mr. Incledon, now entered, and, to the surprise of all present, joined in the hoax. He told Incledon that he was well acquainted with the amazing efficacy of the article: but added: "It will not be wholly effective, my dear Incledon, unless you keep it in your mouth all night!"

Incledon's eyes twinkled with gratification at the interest manifested by the great tragedian in his well-being, and at his confirmation of the treasure he had obtained.

"But, my dear Mr. Kemble," he replied, "may it not choke me in my sleep?"

"Oh, no!" said the somewhat solemn jester: "Oh, no! it is scarcely large enough for that. Besides, Mrs. Incledon will be aware of your struggles, and attend to you if it should get into your throat."

Incledon gave him a look which had a dawn of suspicion in it, but the unmoved gravity of the speaker dispersed it when he added: "It will do you no good unless you keep it on your tongue all night, be assured, my dear Incledon; so don't think of removing it."

Poor Mr. Incledon obeyed this injunction strictly; and the next morning gave sad evidence of his obedience, appearing in the green-room with his natural ruddiness exchanged for a sickly complexion, from want of rest, and from the increasing disgust of the scented mass in his mouth.

It was now time to heighten the plot, previously to breaking it up. One of the conspirators was intimate with a gentleman connected with the Morning Chronicle, who relished a joke, and always happy to assist in one. On hearing the particulars, he was induced to place a paragraph in the next day's paper, in accordance with the intended sequel to the imposture.

The time came for rehearsal. The plotters congregated in a manner that when Mr. Incledon arrived, he must of necessity see them and overhear their observations. Mr. Fawcett was much perturbed, and apparently, as he held the morning's newspaper open in his hand, indignant; all, indeed, seemed shocked. "Was it possible!" "What a monster!" "Who could divine such an instance of hatred to the English nation!" "Poor Incledon!" "What will be the consequence?" "What a loss to the public!" "Dreadful! Shocking! Afflicting!" etc. At this moment the group affected to perceive Incledon for the first time. They were all affection and sympathy. Mr. Liston wept to think he had been the innocent instrument of his friend's ruin. Mr. Matthews besought his forgiveness for his share in his destruction; and at last Incledon's suspense and agitation were so affecting to them all, that the fatal paragraph was submitted to his perusal. It was as follows:

"JUBILEE LOZENGE.—The public are cautioned against a specious but most injurious artifice, which has of late been practiced by some unprincipled quacks. A trinket, in the form of a shirt-brooch, adorned with the miniature likeness of the King, is said to be impregnated with a certain mineral property that can expel all disorders from the stomach of the wearer, who, to stimulate and call forth the essential virtue of the ornament, is desired to keep it in his mouth and suck it. The truth indeed is, that an adventitious property has been infused into the metal of which the trinket is formed; but, so far from its being of a salutary nature, its deleterious qualities are invariably experienced in subtle and slow, but infallible operation, by all the unhappy dupes to the imposture. The poison peculiarly attaches itself to the lungs, producing insensibly a decay of the vocal powers, and usually terminating in incurable hoarseness.

"It is reported that the French Emperor, jealous of the superior powers of melody which our stage can boast, has lately employed some of his emissaries in persuading one of our most eminent native female singers to make use of this destructive bane to vocal excellence. It is apprehended that the same artifice will be employed to rob our most celebrated male performers of their voices, and, in consequence, both of their fame and their bread."

The agony of the reader at the close of the paragraph was such as to make all present desirous of explaining the jest. Incledon dropped the fatal amulet from his mouth, and clasping his hands together, exclaimed, "I am a murdered man!" and dropped on a seat.

The whole was then confessed; and the well-known good-nature of Mr. Incledon was never more apparent than in his forgiveness of this hoax against his prevailing foible.—Memoirs of Charles Mathews, by his Wife.

A MASTERLY INACTIVITY.—It is no small privilege to you "gentlemen of England who live at home at ease," or otherwise, that you cannot hear how the whole Continent is talking of you at this moment. We have, as a nation, no small share of self-sufficiency and self-esteem. If we do not thank God for it, we are right well pleased to know that we are not like that publican there, "who eats garlic or carries a stiletto, or knouts his servants, or indulges in any other taste or pastime of the 'confounded foreigner.'" The Times proclaims how infinitely superior we are every morning, and each traveller—John Murray in hand—expounds, in his bad French, that an Englishman is the only European native brought up in the knowledge of truth and the wash-tub. By dint of time, iteration, and a considerable amount of that same French I speak of, an article expressly manufactured for exportation, we really did at last persuade patient and suffering Europe to take us at our own valuation. We got them to believe that—with certain little peculiarities, certain lesser vices, rather amiable than otherwise—no nation, ancient or modern, could approach us. That we were at one and the same time the richest, the strongest, the most honorable, the most courageous people recorded in history; and not alone this, but the politest and the most conciliatory, with the largest coal-fields and the best cookery in Europe. Now, there is nothing more damaging than the witness who proves too much. Miss Edgeworth tells us somewhere, I think, of an Irish peer who, travelling in France with a negro servant, directed him, if questioned on the subject, always to say his master was a Frenchman. He was punctilious, faithful to his orders, but whenever he said, "My massa a Frenchman," he always added, "So am I." In the same spirit has Bull gone and damaged himself abroad. He might have enjoyed an unlimited credit for his stories of English wealth and greatness—how big was our fleet, and how bitter our beer; he might have rung the changes over our just pride in our insular position and our income tax, and none dared to dispute him; but when, in the warm expansiveness of his enthusiasm, he proceeded to say, not merely that we dressed better and dined better than the foreigner, but that our manners were more polished, our address more insinuating, and the amiability of our whole social tone more conspicuous, "Mossoo," taking him to represent all from Stockholm to Sicily, began to examine for himself, and after some hesitation to ask, "What if the wealth be only like the politeness? What if the national character be as rude as the cookery? What if English morality turn out to be a jumble and confusion, very like English-French? Who is to tell us that the coal-fields may not be as easily exhausted as the civility?" These were very ugly doubts, and for some years back foreigners, after that slow fashion in which public opinion moves amongst them, have been turning them over and over, but in a manner that showed a great revulsion had taken place on the Continent with regard to the estimate of England.—Blackwood's Magazine.

MORAL INFLUENCES OF FURNITURE.

WHILE Furniture, as representing the pleasures and duties of property, has always met high appreciation, there certainly has been, in all times, a jealousy of every new luxury which contributed to mere personal ease. Even Shakspeare has a sneer at easy chairs, as where he represents pursy Insolence in terrified fright, while

Breathless wrong
Shall sit and pant in your great chairs of ease.

He delights to describe objects of splendor and virtu, and, we cannot doubt, knew how to make himself comfortable; but his was an age of housewives, and was full of the respects we attribute to certain classes among ourselves. Even now, when we have learned to regard such feelings as prejudices, our sentiment is regulated rather by the old standard than the modern one. Associations of mere ease cannot attach us if that ease has been inglorious. We like those things which have aided our work, or rested us after it. We do not willingly separate ourselves from tables, secretaries, pigeon-holes, drawers, well-arranged shelves amongst which we have worked and thought. They have a positive control and influence over us. It is well, we think, for everybody to establish personal relations with the combination of wood and horse-hair, wool and silk, without which, in our day and climate, home cannot be. Those who leave all to the upholsterer miss an opportunity of stamping themselves, as it were, upon dead matter, and imparting a kind of life to it. The man who, from no necessity, sells off his "effects" by auction, has cast away an anchor, and advertises his own tendency to disband and break loose along with the dispersion of his movables. But furniture, to win the heart of its owner, must represent the age as well as the man. We have no faith in the attaching qualities of things chosen on consciously æsthetic principles as suiting our favorite architecture or our hobbies. Nobody can give his heart to what is cumbersome or fantastic except through the ties of long association. Nobody, for example, can be on more than the coldest visiting terms with a laboriously collected museum of lumbering carved oak. The subtle influences of these things must reach the mind through the body, not contrariwise. The notion of being at ease and at home with our furniture is not the first nor the most natural one; and while this is the one field for the cultivation of taste, it cannot be treated with absolute familiarity. However, the tendency to be comfortable, and facilities for looking about us, are wrenching all ranks, and before long even the cottage housewife will have discovered other uses for her one armchair than to rub it into a more flattering reflector than her looking-glass. The manufacturers of cheap ornaments are already repining at the influence of excursion-trains, which, as they allege, make women care nothing for the adornment of their homes; and, of course, it is nothing to these hucksters that the decay of their trade is due to the opening of a wider field of beauty to their customers, or that nature, even as seen from an excursion train, teaches a refinement even beyond the art of their most staring owls and their gaudiest Highlanders. Altogether we might begin to despond of our age, as given up to mere personal indulgence, but for a consideration or two. One is, that a fussy, striving generation like ours must have periods of more deliberate, not to say abandoned, repose than where the business of life is taken more easily. Another is, that after all we may plead a mere change in our times of ease and habits of luxury. When men sat upon hard stools they slept upon feather-beds, as the poor do still when they have them. Even Ariosto's untiring heroes tossed upon le plume at night. Now-a-days, if we lounge in public, if we recline our lengths on down cushions in the drawing-room, we at least sleep severely on mattrasses, and so may face the reproofs of our forefathers with the hope of still holding our own.

AN ECLIPSE OF THE SUN IN THE BAY OF BISCAY.—One day, while in the Bay of Biscay, the sea smooth, the air clear and cool, I was on deck enjoying the balmy breeze, and almost expecting to sight the shores of Spain, when suddenly the air grew dark. I looked to see what was obscuring the sun—not a cloud was in the sky. Darker it grew—every face was raised to search for the threatening squall, but no squall came. Alarm was painted on many cheeks that turned ghastly in the strange and fading light. The captain came up from below. The mate's voice rang out to the men already there: "Stand by the halliards!" In great perplexity the barometers were consulted, but they gave no explanation, and it was not till an idea flashed on the captain that he turned from the instruments to an almanac, and found the surmise correct. It was a total eclipse of the sun, and many savants from England were assembled near the spot expressly to see this sight. The sea-gulls fluttered aloft in terror and amazement; the fowls, accustomed in their coops to artificial changes, steadied themselves on one leg and nestled to sleep. Though dark, it was not like night—the horizon was tinged all round with a strange light. In one direction this grew more intense, and came on towards us brighter and brighter. I could trace the rays of the sun as they shot over the barrier—a water-fall of beams. I watched for the first returning glimpse of his own majesty, and caught the brilliant ray, little larger than a pin's head, like lightning flashing all at once upon my eye. The dark shadow retreated like a legion of ghosts over the sea, followed by what took the shape, to my excited fancy, of the angel of light. The cocks began to crow, and there was a joyousness on the faces around, as if we had escaped from some impending danger.—Mrs. Muter's Travels and Adventures.

"I never saw such an indelicate gentleman as that at the opposite house," exclaimed a young woman. "He must have seen that I did not choose to pull down the blind, and yet he has been watching me the whole time I have been changing my dress."

"I cannot imagine," said Alderman H., "why my whiskers should have turned gray so much sooner than my hair." "Because you have worked so much more with your jaws than with your brains."

THE BEGGAR WOMAN OF LOCARNO.

AT the foot of the Alps, near Locarno, was an old castle belonging to the Marquis of Como, the ruins of which are still visible to the traveller, as he comes from St. Gothard—a castle with lofty and roomy apartments, high towers and narrow windows. In one of these rooms an old sick woman was deposited upon some straw, which had been shaken down for her by the housekeeper of the Marquis, who had found her begging before the gate. The Marquis, who was accustomed to go into this room on his return from hunting, to lay aside his gun, ordered the poor wretch to get up immediately out of her corner and be gone.

The creature arose, but slipping with her crutch upon the smooth floor, she fell, and injured her back so much that it was with great difficulty she got up; and, moving across the room as she had been desired, groaning and crying sadly, sank down behind the chimney. After a while she rose again, dragged herself painfully out of the castle, and died neglected in the adjacent village.

Several years afterwards, when the circumstances of the Marquis had been much reduced by war and the failure of his crops, a Florentine gentleman visited the castle, with the intention of purchasing it, in consequence of the beauty of the situation. The Marquis, who was very anxious to have the bargain concluded, gave his wife directions to lodge the stranger in the same upper room in which the old woman had died, it having, in the meantime, been very handsomely fitted up; but, to their consternation, in the middle of the night, the stranger entered their own room, pale and agitated, protesting loudly that the chamber was haunted by some invisible being, for he had heard something rise in the corner as if it had been lying among straw, move over the chamber with slow and tottering steps, and sink down, groaning and crying, near the chimney.

The Marquis, terrified, though he scarcely knew why, endeavored to put a fair face on the matter, and to laugh off the fears of his visitor, telling him he would rise himself and spend the rest of the night with him in his room; but the stranger begged that he would rather allow him to occupy a couch in the adjoining room; and as soon as morning broke, he saddled his horse, took his leave and departed. This occurrence, which occasioned much notice, made so unpleasant an impression upon intending purchasers that not another inquiry was made; and at last even the servants in the house becoming possessed with the notion that there was something dreadful in the affair, the Marquis, with the view of setting the report to rest, determined to investigate the matter himself next night. Accordingly, in the twilight, he caused his bed to be brought into the apartment, and waited, without sleeping, the approach of midnight. But what was his consternation, when, on the stroke of midnight, he actually heard some inconceivable noise in the apartment, as if some person had risen up from among the straw, which rustled beneath them, walked slowly over the floor, and sank, sighing and groaning, behind the chimney!

When he came down the next morning, the Marchioness asked him how the investigation had gone on; and he, after gazing about him with wondering glances, and bolting the door, told her that the story of the chamber's being haunted was true. She was terrified out of her senses, but begged him, before making any public disclosure, once more to make the experiment coolly in her company. Accompanied by a trusty servant, they accordingly repeated their visit next night, and again heard, as the Marquis had done before, the same ghostly and inconceivable noise; and nothing but the anxious wish to get rid of the castle, cost what it would, enabled them to suppress their terrors in presence of the servant, and to ascribe the sound to some accidental cause.

On the evening of the third day, when both, determined to probe the matter to the bottom, were ascending with beating hearts the stairs leading to the stranger's apartment, it chanced that the house dog, who had been let loose from his chain, was lying directly before the door of the room; and, willing perhaps, to have the company of any other living thing in the mysterious apartment, they took the dog into the room along with them. The husband and wife seated themselves on the couch—the Marquis with his sword and pistols beside him; and while they endeavored, the best way they could, to amuse themselves with conversation, the dog, cowering down at their feet, fell asleep. Again, with the stroke of midnight, the noise was renewed. Something—though what they could not discover, raised itself, as with crutches, in the corner; the straw rustled as before. At the sound of the first foot-fall, the dog awoke, roused itself, pricked up its ears, and, growling and barking as if some person was advancing towards him, retreated in the direction of the chimney. At this sight, the Marchioness rushed out of the room, her hair standing on end; and while the Marquis seized his sword, exclaimed, "Who is there?" and, receiving no answer, thrust like a madman in all directions, she hastily packed up a few articles of dress, and made the best of her way towards the town. Scarcely, however, had she proceeded a few steps, when she discovered that the castle was on fire. The Marquis had, in his distraction, overturned the tapers, and the room was instantly in flames. Every effort was made to save the unhappy nobleman, but in vain; he perished in the utmost tortures; and his bones, as the traveller may be aware, still lie where they were collected by the neighboring peasants—in the corner of the apartment from which he had expelled the beggar woman of Locarno.

RECENTLY, at the residence of the Marchioness of Downshire, Miss Lousia Pyne was made the recipient of a testimonial, designed to mark the esteem and regard in which she is held by the public in general, and the patrons of the English opera in particular.

LARGE-TEXT COPIES FOR YOUNG LADIES.—A Ball is Bliss. A Small Waist is Elegant. Adore Young Officers. Paleness is interesting. Preserve your Complexion. Seek Approbation. Live Wholly for Dress. Encourage the Bashful. Refuse Not Hastily.

FRIENDSHIP BETWEEN THE SEXES.

IN an article on "Woman's Friendships," the Saturday Review takes the ground that the want of diversity of character is a fatal barrier to friendship between woman and woman. "In other respects they are of the stuff that friends are made of, and many of the qualifications for friendship they possess in a far higher degree than men. They have more self-sacrifice and less small selfishness, greater tenderness and greater tact, a quicker sympathy and a keener apprehension. But they are too much alike ever to be great friends. Somehow, women do not differ from women as men differ from men. Amidst all their innumerable diversities there is an underlying resemblance, something which resists analysis and sets calculation at defiance, something which you can neither explain nor account for, and which you must be content to call "a woman's way of looking at things." And how instinctively women recognize and proclaim the truth of this! No man ever professed to understand another man without either knowing him, or caring for him, or sympathizing with him; but this is just what women insist on doing for women every day of their lives. With them, community of sex supplies the place of all those qualifications. A woman claims to understand simply because she is a woman."

There is, however, the refuge of forming a friendship with the other sex:

The objection most commonly urged against friendships between the sexes is, in effect, that they are not what they profess to be. "Young men and women never stop at friendship," it is said; "they always end by falling in love." A very obvious way of meeting this objection is to be found in the formula, "Well, what then?" Supposing that the friends do end by falling in love, where is the harm of it? After all, friendship is not a bad stepping-stone to a warmer feeling. There are people, indeed, who seem to think that any long intimacy between lovers is a positive evil—that the less they know of each other before they are engaged, and the less time they have to get to know each other after they are engaged, the better for all parties. But it is at least an open question whether friendship, and all that friendship implies—intimacy, esteem, affection, knowledge of each other's characters, sympathy with each other's tastes, a share in each other's pursuits—is not a better preparation for marriage than an acquaintanceship in which the introduction is effected at a dinner-party, and the proposal made at a picnic, while the intervening intercourse consists of three balls, a kettle-drum and a flower-show. Nor is there any conclusive evidence that friendships of this kind tend, necessarily and inevitably, to falling in love. Occasionally, it must be admitted, they do end in this way. The frontier line between sentiment and passion is sometimes so faintly traced that it is hardly recognized until it has been fairly crossed. And at present the rarity of the relationship, the difficulties which are often thrown in the way of its continuance, the discouragement it usually meets with, the very excuses which are put forward to explain it, all tend to increase the probability of such a termination. Still, in spite of all these opposing influences, instances to the contrary are not very infrequent; and that they should be met with at all, when so little favored by external circumstances, is no slight proof of their inherent vitality. They occur oftenest, perhaps, in the case of cousins, between whom there is often the warmest and most affectionate intercourse, without a thought of any further connexion. And yet, so far as the chances of marriage are concerned, friendships between cousins stand on exactly the same footing as friendships between strangers in blood. Both may lead to marriage, both sometimes do lead to marriage, and in this respect, at least, an objection which is valid against the one is equally valid against the other.

Some persons, however, may be disposed to question the benefit of such relations, even if the danger of their transmutation into a stronger feeling is admitted to be exaggerated or imaginary. Will not the tendency of increased intimacy between the sexes be to make women masculine? The best antidote to this fear will be to keep in mind the foundation on which such a relationship is based: We have seen that women cannot find their friends among themselves, because they can not supply one necessary requisite of all real friendship; and any attempt on their part to divest themselves of their distinctive feminine characteristics would consequently involve the sacrifice of that very diversity of character which difference of sex was expected to secure. Men who seek in their friends the complement of themselves are not likely to look for them among "strong-minded" women, who have forgotten that it is on their sex that every-day life depends for almost all it has of grace or beauty; or among fast young ladies, whose highest aim is to reproduce, as exactly as fashion (and a little more exactly than propriety) will allow, the most ephemeral and superficial characteristics of their male acquaintance. But, on the other hand, there is no greater mistake than to assume that to be womanly and to be frivolous are simply exchangeable ideas. A girl will be none the less feminine because she has some serious interests in life, none the less graceful because her tastes have a wider range than mere school-room accomplishments, none the less attractive because she sympathizes, and to some extent shares, in pursuits of a graver kind. To make her a pleasant partner at a ball or a pleasant companion at a dinner table, it is not necessary that either of these duties should have occupied all her thoughts since the moment the invitation was accepted. Men are not considered unsuited for society, or unable to bear their part in conversation, because their education has a wider aim than merely to prepare them for the drawing-room. Small-talkers have no monopoly of small-talk. And, in like manner, the hours a young lady spends over history or science will give purpose and interest to her mornings without in the least degree unfitting her for the ornamental functions of the evening.

A possible exposure to misrepresentation and unjust criticism is a more formidable obstacle than any we have mentioned. Women cannot disregard social opinion, even when it is irrational; and if friendships between the sexes were likely to be "talked about," it would be useless to say anything in their favor. The persons who are best fitted for them would be just those who would most certainly hold themselves aloof from them. But in this respect the world gets rather hard measure. It is often charged with being censorious, when, in reality, it is only impatient of absurdity. People who are talked about commonly deserve what they get. They may not be chargeable with any serious error, they may be wholly innocent of any bad intention, but they have been foolish, and their folly has met with its reward. In nine cases out of ten, where appearances are much against a woman, it is her own fault that they have become so. The occasion of scandal is usually furnished, in the first instance, by the victims of it; and a little common sense on their part would have proved an effectual barrier against mischief-makers. But people who respect themselves generally find that they have set the fashion of being respected, and a certain amount of decision in dealing with public opinion is often the surest way to conciliate it. The world is so far like heaven that it admits of being taken by storm; it has so much of the nettle in it that it is safest to grasp it firmly. A friendship which is avowed without being obtrusive, and independent without being affected, which neither courts secresy nor cares to thrust itself into notice, will never be likely to provoke any injurious comments. At the worst, it is very doubtful whether a score of such intimacies will give half the opportunities for scandal and misunderstanding which are often afforded by one "innocent" flirtation. At all events, we recommend this question to our readers as likely to furnish them with inexhaustible material for a whole season of croquet-ground discussions.

LADY-DOCTORS.—But, then, are the lady-doctors to marry? and, if they marry, are they to go on with their calling? We presume that they, and all their admirers, and all the believers in the mission of women, would reply that the best thing they can to do is to marry, if they only marry tolerably well. But, after they are married, are they to go on visiting and receiving patients? We can easily answer this question if we look at occupations in which women have been accustomed to gain their bread with more or less success. An actress, an artist, a school-mistress, goes on with her trade if she is obliged to do so, or if the circumstances of her household give her abundant leisure; but if she has a family to attend to, and if she has a husband who provides for her, she will attend to her family, spend her husband's money, and abandon her business. We may be sure that lady-doctors would do just the same. They would marry if they could marry with satisfaction, and then, if they could afford it, they would leave off doctoring and stick to ordering dinners and watching the babies The object, therefore, of a lady-doctor is to be able to leave her profession at an early age; and this constitutes a profound difference between her and her male rivals. She can have very little professional ardor if she views her profession as an arrangement which, if things go well, she may hope soon to get rid of, while the male doctor hopes to go on increasing in knowledge, and with a deeper hold upon science, in every year of active life. But then she may not marry, or, if she marries, she may have a husband who cannot support her. If the husband simply lives on her, as is often the case when women go on working after marriage, she can scarcely be said to have done much good or gained much by neglecting her family in order to maintain her husband in idleness. If her husband wishes and tries to do all he can, but is unable to provide for his family, she can contribute towards their maintenance. If she had not learned doctoring, she would have given more of her time and attention to her family, but then she would have had a greater poverty to struggle against. Does the family gain by this? In most cases we should imagine it might, for the care and attention of a mother bowed down by utter poverty is generally not worth so much as half the care with a good deal more money. This, then, is one of the gains which a woman may fairly be said to get by learning doctoring. In case she marries a poor, hard-working man, unable to support his family, she may give them such an addition of money as will counterbalance the diminution of her personal superintendence. Or again, she may not marry at all, and she will not be obliged to marry from want. She can wait till she gets the right man better than a woman who is simply hanging on at home. If she does not marry at all, she gains indisputably by being a doctor, for she has not only the means of gaining a livelihood, but also a perpetual source of interest and occupation.—Saturday Review.

A LUDICROUS BLUNDER.—An officer of the Garibaldian army, writing to an exchange, gives circulation to the following incident, in which he himself figures prominently: As for the blunders of my Irish servant Peter, they never ceased. It was only a few weeks since that I was myself the victim of an absurd one. On the march from Melazzo I got a severe strain in the chest by my horse falling and rolling over me. No bone was broken, but I was much bruised, and a considerable extravasation of blood took place under the skin. Of course I could not move, and I was provided with a sort of litter, slung between two mules. The doctor prescribed a strong dose of laudanum, which sent me to sleep, and despatched Peter back to Melazzo for a certain ointment, which he was to bring without delay, as the case was imminent. Fully impressed that I was in danger, away went Peter, very sad about me, but even more distressed lest he should forget what he was sent for. He kept repeating the words over and over as he went, till they became, by mere repetition, something perfectly incomprehensible, so that when he reached Melazzo nobody could make head or tail of his message. Group after group gathered about and interrogated him, and at last, by means of pantomime, discovered that his master was very ill. Signs were made to inquire if bleeding were required, or if it was for amputation, but he still shook his head in negative. "Is he dying?" asked one, making a gesture to indicate lying down. Peter assented. "Oh, then, it is the unzione and estrema he wants!"—"That's it," cried Peter, joyfully, "unzione it is." Two priests were speedily found despatched to administer "extreme unction," and I awoke out of a sound sleep under a tree to see three lighted candles on each side of me, and two priests in full vestments standing at my feet and gabbling away in a droning sort of voice, while Peter blubbered and wrung his hands unceasingly. A jolly burst of laughter from me soon dispelled the whole illusion, and Peter had to hide himself for shame for a week after.

NOTICE

The publication of "The Californian" takes place on Saturday mornings, and copies may be obtained in the City at all News-stands, and of our News-agents through the country. It will also be served by carriers on the morning of publication.

* Correspondents will address all communications, business and otherwise, to "The Californian," office, No. 328 Montgomery street, San Francisco.*

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 1, 1864.

MINOR MATTERS.

THE major portion of this community are miners, or so closely identified in interest with the success of the mines, that we might justly call them so; and by our mines are we judged abroad, and we gauge our well-doing at home. It is a great misfortune to California that people ever got into the way of thinking that there were but two objects of interest in the financial world—the Gould and Curry and the Ophir mines. They were the standard by which everything was measured, and by which all mines were bought and sold. When a man came to town with his specimens in his pocket, he never told you its value or spoke of its merits except by comparison, and the highest recommendation, in his estimation, was that it was a fac simile of Gould and Curry. Ophir, in palmy (Palmer) days, was the great gun, and all other mines in the vicinity were the offshoots, and the owners claimed that every claim in the vicinity was quite equal to it. People swore by Gould and Curry when the Ophir declined, and pinned their faith in all mines upon that. The stock was eagerly sought for as an investment from which there would be a perpetual dividend; it was purchased by Eastern capitalists and men of small means with avidity, and ran up to a fabulous price. There was no end to the rich deposit that day after day, and month after month, were extracted, giving business to twenty or more mills, running night and day, and turning out good results. But the expenses were enormous, and absorbed nearly 75 per cent. of the earning; and on the common principle that everything must have an end, the great body of pay ore suddenly diminished. Then came a panic in the stock market, and the price fell, involved in its fall the ruin of men of small means and gave a terrible set-back to larger owners. Falling, it carried all other mines with it; and in the brief period of thirty days, mining stocks became a drug in the market, and almost valueless. They were no longer considered safe collaterals upon which to advance money, and were "forced off" to realize, to meet obligations falling due, until scarce twenty cents on the dollar netted the unfortunate owners. This crash in Gould and Curry and Ophir has impaired confidence in our mines to an extent that is hardly yet realized, and checked the flow of capital from abroad that was adding so much to our prosperity. It will take us a long time to recover from the unfortunate effect upon our mining interests; but the lesson we have learned may prove ultimately a benefit. It is true that we never again shall see any mining stock go to the high price of Gould and Curry a few months since. It never should have reached such figures—never was worth the money. We see it now; and we also have learned something of the rock upon which we split. We have learned, too, that almost any good mine may be ruined by extravagant and reckless management; and hereafter let us look closely to the expenses, and be more prudent in the working of the ores. We must begin again, and, with the experience of the past before us, there is no reason why we may not regain the confidence of foreign capitalists, and see again the tide of capital setting to our shores, where—when judiciously and prudently invested—it may be made to pay a better return than in any other part of the globe. Gould and Curry may turn up trumps yet; but should it not, there are plenty of good mines left, and hundreds undeveloped that, with the aid of capital, will yield their golden harvest for the prudent to reap. We are recovering from the shock, and there is a happy day coming for all.

Naturalized Citizens.—As the time of election approaches, the Courts are busy in naturalizing citizens. A good deal of this raw material of which intelligent voters are made, and which is woven into the fabric of our body-politic, is Celtic. Germans come next in number, but stand first in loyalty. This time-honored bulwark of our National liberties affords a pleasant thesis for the reflective mind. If we calculate that in creating a greater part of these citizens, we simply change so much alien prejudice into active alien element. It is not pleasant to reflect that our Government is about the only one that indulges in the luxury of creating its own enemies. There can be no doubt but that a number of these newly-formed citizens will go against the Government they swear to support and uphold. Some may do it conscientiously, but we may be certain that a greater part of those who do oppose, can give no better reason than the Irishman who, when asked why he voted the Copperhead ticket, replied, that he had always been opposed to the Government in his own country, and was not "a goin' to back down on his principles now!"

Crowded Out.—"Ten Minutes," a sketch by E. H. L. P., although in type, is crowded out this week.

AN HOUR WITH THE PAST.

ON our table, in suggestive proximity to the freshly-cut pages of the last Californian, lies a well-worn volume. It is styled The Royal American Magazine, or Universal Repository of Instruction and Amusement, and its pages, which are stained to the color of a venerable meerschaum by the collected juices of a century, were printed at "Greenleaf's Printing Office, Boston," in the year of our Lord 1775.

How the pages of an old newspaper carry us back to the mysterious past, and make history thoroughly vital! How much magic lies in its present and imperfect tenses! How much more vivid than any page of Bancroft is the following statement of colonial affairs, which we take from the pages of this Royal Magazine that even in 1775, a full year before the Declaration of Independence, talked thus boldly for a "Royal" periodical:

Charlestown, January 14.—While servile placeman, pensioners and expectants are employing their venal pens in support of a system of tyranny, the honest yeomanry of this province are joining our compassionate brethren of the other colonies in giving fundamental proofs of their attachment to the common cause of America. The week past has afforded several instances of their readiness to relieve their distressed friends at this severe season. We shall mention only two: On Tuesday last the inhabitants of Lexington sent sixty-one loads of wood and some money as a present to the poor sufferers by the Boston Port Bill; and on Thursday last the first and third parishes in Reading sent twenty-seven loads of wood, some money and some grain for the same purpose. The second parish, being more remote, was prevented by the badness of the weather and travelling from sending anything that day, but we hear that they do not intend to be behindhand with their brethren.

On one of the sleds was hoisted the Union flag, with the following inscription in its center:

To the worthy Inhabitants of Boston and Charlestown:

Ye noble patriots! constant, firm and true,
Your country's safety much depends on you;
In patient suffering greatly persevere.
From cold, from famine, you have nought to fear;
With tender eye the country views your woe,
With your distress will her assistance grow;
Or if (which heaven avert!) some fatal hour
Should force you from your homes by tyrant pow'r,
To her retire—with open, gen'rous heart,
All needful aid and comfort she'll impart;
Gladly she'll share the wealth by heaven bestown,
With those, FOR HER, who've sacrificed their own.

Apropos of these offerings, we read that among the donations for the suffering inhabitants of the town of Boston, received in January, 1775, Virginia sent "776 bushels corn, 10 bbls. flour, 40 bbls. bread, and, in cash, 16s. 6d."—a pleasant reminiscence in these days of civil strife—and that later in February of the same year, Henrico and Cumberland counties, (now occupied by Grant,) sent, with their love, 2,898 bushels wheat and 22 bbls. flour to the suffering Yankees.

A few pages further on we come upon the following:

Thursday, March 9.—Last Sunday being the anniversary of the horrid massacre, in King street, Boston, 1770, perpetrated by a party of soldiers, an elegant and spirited oration was pronounced, at the old South Meeting House, the day following, by Joseph Warren, Esq., in commemoration of the bloody tragedy.

The General Assembly of the Island of Barbadoes have drawn up a spirited petition to be transmitted to Great Britain and to be presented to his Majesty, in favor of America.

Who of that little party would have ventured to predict when a still more "eloquent and spirited oration" should be pronounced on that eminence where the gifted orator and devoted patriot was destined to fall?

On Friday, March 17th, says the chronicle:

Yesterday the Provincial Congress met at Concord, according to adjournment.

At a meeting of the fee-holders and other inhabitants of this town, at Faneuil Hall, on Monday last, the Hon. John Hancock, Esq., was chosen Moderator. Town officers for the year ensuing were chosen as usual.

Under date of Thursday, March 20th, the chronicle says:

Last evening one Thomas Ditson, of Billerica, was seized by a party of the 47th regiment, and confined all night in the barracks. In the morning these new conservators of the peace, under the direction of their Colonel and some officers, tarred and feathered Ditson, and carried him in triumph through the streets on a truck drawn by a horse, attended by a number of armed soldiers, and under the nose of the General, in direct violation of the law. Not one of these high-handed offenders have been punished (that we hear of) either by the civil magistrate or a Court-martial.———Stand this recorded in the historic page of my country, for——for——

It stands recorded also for the benefit of this honest journalist whose indignation made him forget the formal plural in this recital of his country's wrongs, that this same Colonel of the gallant 47th, lived to see his regiment returning somewhat disorderly before the bullets of undisciplined farmers, and those same citizens they had so flippantly abused.

But in spite of these rebellious times and the suffering of the good people of Boston, and even of the following appeal to the subscribers of the magazine:

To the Subscribers of the "Royal American Magazine."

Gentlemen—The peculiar difficulty of the times is the excuse which the Editor has to plead for the request he now presents to his subscribers for the balance of the first year's Magazine, which ended in December last. Nothing is expected for the second year, until it is half expired.

—its pages were often graced with stately essays on abstract topics, nor did the Muse disdain to lend certain serious and didactic strains to its columns. Most of these poems were in the heroic measure, severely modelled after Pope and Cowper, and disguising their personal tributes under the names of Phillis and Chloe. Several stanzas "To a lady on the birth of a son," and others "To a young lady on her recovery from the small-pox," are "inserted to oblige A Youth." We are tempted to give space to the following as a specimen of Colonial poetry, partly from the singular effect which the change from the second to the third person in the first two lines produces, and partly for the sake of the lady's reputation. It is entitled:

ACROSTIC.

Mild, gentle maid! sweet winning beauties thine,
In her bright form, which speak her all divine;
Soft melting charms adorn her lovely face,
Smile in each look, and every action grace,
Discreetly gay by all approved, admired,
Endued with virtues innate and acquired;
Not keen-eyed envy could a blemish find,
Nor in her person, nor her well-fraught mind:
Inherent worth and goodness stand confest,
Engaging inmates of her generous breast.

And who was Miss Dennie? Was she a spinster of such an uncertain age that even the language of sincere and respectful passion dare not address her less formally than this title? Was she some prime New England damsel,

"Straight-laced, but all too full in bud
For Puritanic stays," whom the impassioned poet had met but once, and whose Christian name was undiscovered? Was she a fair Tory—some "She-slip of loyal blood," who danced at Colonial balls with red-coated Ensigns—who talked of Sheridan's new play of The Rivals, and retailed George Selwyn's last mot and the stale chat of London society, and bewailed Provincial barracks? Or was she one of those who, but a month later, listened to catch the hurrying hoofs of Paul Revere, and threw the powder-flask over her sweetheart's shoulder as she bade him hasten to Concord bridge. Did the fair girl, who blushed when the pages of the Royal American Magazine first proclaimed her charms, ever dream that her name would survive that of the Royal American, and that her virtues would again be published on the further confines of the continent, beyond the uttermost search of Jonathan Carver? Perhaps we shall never know. Mysterious Miss Dennie!—"Cecilia Metella" of Colonial History—only thy name is left to us as we turn away from this monument erected to thy unknown virtues!

"INIGO" REDIVIVUS.

WHEN Inigo gracefully dropped the reins and retired from the box seat of the Californian, a few days thereafter he disappeared from public gaze. Anxious inquiry on the part of his personal friends failed to elicit any definite information of his whereabouts. Some clue was offered by a tourist who informed us that a hat was picked up on the waters of Lake Tahoe, with the inscription "In-I-go" pinned on the lining, but whether this were really the signature of our friend, or a mere testamentary statement of fact by some suicidal diver, we were unable to determine. Matters thus remained enveloped in mystery until an unexpected incident suddenly cleared them up.

On returning to our office one day last week, after an absence of a few hours, we found "Bob" the office boy, away, but Bob's dog, a coal-black terrier, coiled up in Bob's chair, his inky hide spotted with small circles of white chalk, to artfully simulate a child's popular toy. Empty glasses on the table diffused a mild but not unpleasant flavor of lemon-peel throughout the apartment. In the centre of the floor stood a gunny-sack containing specimens of Arizona ore. On our desk lay contributions ransacked from their respective pigeon-holes, with verbal alterations, changing their sense entirely, and one or two sentimental and serious verses, with the addition of choruses.

Close beside them was a sheet of paper, beginning with a spirited though rudely executed sketch of ourself in the character of "Mazeppa," and, underneath, these lines:

JUST FOR THE FUN OF IT.

Imagine a landscape and a woodshed. It is noon, and that stout old reaper, the Sun, has half cut his broad swathe through the billowy meadow above, piling the clouds on either side of him in winrows of white, and tossing his golden sheaves to the earth until the bleakest and barrenest spot smiles in a harvest of sunbeams. The sweet but pensive countenance of Inigo looks out from the window; and this fills up the picture.

I do not visit the Californian office now-a-days so frequently as I once did. It was here that my life was nearly worried out of me by having to pay bills and furnish copy, and I have a nervous apprehension that the same scenes may be re-enacted if I venture in even as a visitor. But business brings me here this morning, and accident detains me. No one is visible about the premises but "Bob," and he sits in a high-backed chair reading Barrabas the Bandit, or the Bloody Bugle.

A strange taste in literature that boy has! It was impossible to persuade him to read The Countess, and I do not think that

"PHILOSOPHIC PARAGRAPHS—The selected Sayings of Wise Men,"

(vide table of contents,) ever won from him more than a passing glance. But that department of the newspaper known as The Column of Crime has attractions for him. And in the book at present before him he is so deeply buried that a request for him to do an errand round the corner falls upon unheeding ears. I am the more at a loss to account for this strange perversity of taste, when I reflect upon the opportunities he has for reading back numbers of the Californian.

It has already been hinted that this article has been written "just for the fun of the thing." The old saying of the frogs in the fable comes pat to mind, but those who are not satisfied with the entertainment in this instance, can have their money returned at the door. This is better than the Christian Commission did with its customers.

Another thing that urges me to write in this accidental and surreptitious way is the desire to write my wrongs. I'm tired of being asked about my return from Lake Tahoe and how I liked the country. I've not returned from Lake Tahoe, because I've never been there; but this does not prevent me from hating and despising the country heartily. More fish can be caught in Washington market in five minutes than one could get by going hobbing round Lake Tahoe for a week. Was there ever a Tom Cod seen up in the mountains?

To tell the truth, I've been to a mine of mine in the Alpine District, and at the present moment we are wealthy. A rich vein of unfermented bread has been struck in two of the lower tunnels, and a shaft that was commenced a year or two since is already deep in an excellent quality of shoe-blacking.

Unfortunately enough, the morning after this latter deposit was found the shaft filled with water. But this, as the Superintendent very sagaciously remarks, "is nothing." He will have a "whim" going in a very few days, and then he expects to polish off the stockholders with remarkable despatch. Superintenden's on whims in the main are not conducive to the success of any metallurgical enterprise, but this one promises to be. It is to be worked with women-power, I believe.

Pardon me for stupidity, but I sat up late last night to see a five-act comedy through. Think of it!—in this progressive age, when everything goes and everybody owes! Methuselah sat such things through in his youth, but not after he had reached the turning point of life. Of course it is a treat to see Richings, père et fille, in anything, and Wheatleigh's inimitable acting would go far to reconcile one even to Pollock's Course of Time, but five acts to grind is a little too much for modern comedy, suggesting tragedy at once. It pleased me to see the spirited tenor of the opera troupe charging through his role; but where was my charming friend, Jennie Kempton? Surely her rose-petaled little mouth has not convolved forever. Her friends, and they are many, will not allow her to give them the slip in this way, for her pleasant face lent a light to the stage, and the ripples of her voice are dear to our memories.

At this point behold me, stupid and sleepy. Extremes are not meet for this day and generation. I think I'll go somewhere and take something—ether, perhaps:

How happy I could be with ether.

If any one inquires for me, if there be reason to suspect that they are creditors, tell them I've gone to Lake Tahoe; if they look like people who owe me money, tell them I've returned from there—and in the meanwhile . . .

ON AN EXTINCT PUBLIC INSTITUTION.

NEAR the terminus of what is now a great public thoroughfare I sometimes pass a certain square whose freshly painted dwellings show it to have lately undergone that change which practical people call "improvement." Yet so impractical am I, and withal so vagrant and reprehensible in natural impulse, that I cannot resist a vague yearning as I recall the olden time when it was simply a beer-garden—called, I think, a Social Hall—and devoted mainly to pure-strained libation and the Waltz. I recall, too, the memorable Sunday when my youthful feet were arrested on my way to church by strains of secular music, and, how, after a moment's irresolution, I basely thrust my prayer-book into my pocket and entered the fatal enclosure. Here, as a conservator of public morals, I might stop. But I grieve to state that I enjoyed myself thoroughly on that occasion, and that many Sundays after, my thoughts would fondly revert from the sermon to the blissful delights of that beer-garden. No one familiar with the dignified and aristocratic service which always distinguished the dispensation at another public institution will for a moment imagine that there was anything in the sermon to suggest those vulgar memories. It was my own wayward fancy which invested the Rev. Mr. Cream Cheese with a lager-beery atmosphere, transformed the delicate white cambric of his pocket-handkerchief to the folds of a napkin, and made him otherwise appear as a festive and gorgeous head-waiter.

I remember—and offer it somewhat in mitigation of my offence—that a majority of those who attended the Extinct Public Institution were women and children, and that on entering that unhallowed enclosure my eyes fell first upon a baby. It is true that these people were principally foreigners, of a class educated to believe the Sabbath a day of enjoyment, and to whom—being Germans—all music was sacred. But the spectacle of so much happy childhood was a "touch of nature" that seemed to make us "kin," and the appearance of one or two infants at the breast made me overlook the bibulous propensities of their parents. Indeed, those babies were everywhere—toddling on the grass, being extricated from the whirling crinoline of waltzers, impending from their mothers' arms, dabbling their impotent fingers in small lakes of beer on the tables, or choking over their first glass and being violently rapped back again into consciousness and ear-piercing lamentation. There were older children, who ran races on the green and indulged in gymnastic exercise, on the poles and bars, or, repairing to the swing, swung themselves so high that the bright dresses of the little girls, seen through the swaying branches, made them look like gaily-plumed birds. I remember also an extravagance of sash, and a faint flavor of freshly-ironed frocks about those innocents, that were quite remarkable. There were older children, too, of both sexes, who sat in Arcadian simplicity with their arms about each other's waists. There were the laughing Gretchen, and the pensive Marguerite—a trifle rosier and stouter than her typical namesake—with blonde hair and blue eyes, and a gentle and persuasive sweetness of voice that belonged to an older civilization than ours, and often afforded an odd contrast to the tones of my fair countrywomen, which are apt to be somewhat stridulous and self-asserting—perhaps because the ancestors of Gretchen and Marguerite were sometimes yoked to a plough, and their descendants were accustomed to servitude, while my fair compatriots were always independent. However it might be, I remember that Gretchen and Marguerite were very happy in the company of two young fellows with smmach-colored monstaches, and I did not begrudge them that seventh-day's recreation which followed their week of domestic drudgery. There was Young America, also, mingling with the crowd—pliant, adaptive, and good-humored. There likewise the inevitable and gorgeous Snob presented himself—all the more pretentious, uneasy and insincere for being in the presence of ease, sincerity and unpretentiousness. But why should I recall him? The Public Institution is extinct, but has he not survived it? Does he not still pervade society, flitting before us like Mr. Pepper's Ghost—a cheap illusion, a theatrical shadow of the real thing—at church, at the opera, and in the salon?

At the further end of the hall, seen dimly through a halo of tobacco smoke, I remember to have observed a portrait, executed in the highest style of German art, representing Schiller—I think—with a few lines underneath, that in their complete unintelligibility and redundancy of Z's and S's, seemed to me to be the natural language of intoxication. I remember, too, that as I gazed at it, the band struck up an irresistible waltz, and the circling couples flew by me. I remember, too, how well they danced—those Germans—how the mazes of their cotillion seemed to be modelled upon the terribly-involved sentences of their own metaphysical writers. I remember, too, that, being influenced by the prevailing beverage and the fascinations of Strauss, I found myself shortly after waltzing with somebody in a white waist and blue skirt, but when or how I was introduced I cannot now recall. As she spoke no English and I no German there was nothing to divert our attention from the serious business of the waltz, and our acquaintance ceased with that set. Blonde-haired and slightly adipose maiden! should thy mild blue eyes ever rest on these pages, accept this assurance that thy slim, serious and sallow-visaged partner is still thy debtor.

Such are my loving and tender reminiscences of this Extinct Public Institution. If I may believe popular report, a weird influence still extends over the locality. On warm, starlit summer-nights, strains of Von Weber are said to float lightly and mysteriously upon the air, and mingle with the grateful perfume of adjacent gardens. The shrill notes of the piccolo have been heard at such times, even above the whistle of the San José cars. The soil is still damp, as with unabsorbed heel-taps and overflowing libations; a murky fog like that of tobacco smoke sometimes encompasses that region, and a brewery has risen over the locality of hops.

BRET.

A NOTABLE CONUNDRUM.

THE Fair continues, just the same. It is a nice place to hunt for people in. I have hunted for a friend there for as much as two hours of an evening, and at the end of that time found the hunting just as good as it was when I commenced.

If the projectors of this noble Fair never receive a dollar or even a kindly word of thanks for the labor of their hands, the sweat of their brows and the wear and tear of brain it has cost them to plan their work and perfect it, a consciousness of the incalculable good they have conferred upon the community must still give them a placid satisfaction more precious than money or sounding compliments. They have been the means of bringing many a pair of loving hearts together that could not get together anywhere else on account of parents and other obstructions. When you see a young lady standing by the sanitary scarecrow which mutely appeals to the public for quarters and swallows them, you may know by the expectant look upon her face that a young man is going to happen along there presently; and, if you have my luck, you will notice by that look still remaining upon her face that you are not the young man she is expecting. They court a good deal at the Fair, and the young fellows are always exchanging notes with the girls. For this purpose the business cards scattered about the place are found very convenient. I picked up one last night which was printed on both sides, but had been interlined in pencil, by somebody's Arabella, until one could not read it without feeling dizzy. It ran about in this wise—though the interlineations were not in parentheses in the original:

"John Smith, (My Dearest and Sweetest:) Soap Boiler and Candle Factor; (If you love me, if you love) Bar Soap, Castile Soap and Soft Soap, peculiarly suitable for (your Arabella, fly to the) Pacific coast, because of its non-liability to be affected by the climate. Those who may have kitchen refuse to sell, can leave orders, and our soap-fat carts will visit the (Art Gallery. I will be in front of the big mirror in an hour from now, and will go with you to the) corner designated. For the very best Soap and Candles the market affords, apply at the (Academy of Music. And from there, O joy! how my heart thrills with rapture at the prospect! with souls surcharged with bliss, we will wander forth to the) Soap Factory, or to the office, which is located on the (moon-lit beach,) corner of Jackson street, near the milk ranch. (From Arabella, who sends kisses to her darling) JOHN SMITH, Pioneer Soap Boiler and Candle Factor."

Sweethearts usually treasure up these little affectionate billets, and that this one was lost in the Pavilion, seemed proof to me that its contents were rather distracting to the mind of the young man who received it. He never would have lost it if he had not felt unsettled about something. I think it is likely he got mixed, so to speak, as to whether he was the lucky party, or whether it was the soap-boiler. However, I have possession of her extraordinary document now, and this is to inform Arabella that, in the hope that I may answer for the other young man, and do to fill a void or so in her aching heart, I am drifting about, in an unsettled way, on the look-out for her—sometimes on the Pacific Coast, sometimes at the Art Gallery, sometimes at the soap factory, and occasionally at the moonlit beach and the milk ranch. If she happen to visit either of those places shortly, and will have the goodness to wait a little while, she can calculate on my drifting around in the course of an hour or so.

I cannot say that all visitors to the Fair go there to make love, though I have my suspicions that a good many of them do. Numbers go there to look at the machinery and misunderstand it, and still greater numbers, perhaps, go to criticise the pictures. There is a handsome portrait in the Art Gallery of a pensive young girl. Last night it fell under the critical eye of a connoisseur from Arkansas. She examined it in silence for many minutes, and then she blew her nose calmly, and, says she, "I like it—it is so sad and thinkful."

Somebody knocked Weller's bust down from its shelf at the Fair, the other night, and destroyed it. It was wrong to do it, but it gave rise to a very able pun by a young person who has had much experience in such things, and was only indifferently proud of it. He said it was Weller enough when it was a bust, but just the reverse when it was busted. Explanation: He meant that it looked like Weller in the first place, but it did not after it was smashed to pieces. He also meant that it was well enough to leave it alone and not destroy it. The Author of this fine joke is among us yet, and I can bring him around if you would like to look at him. One would expect him to be haughty and ostentatious, but you would be surprised to see how simple and unpretending he is and how willing to take a drink.

But I have been playing the noble game of "Muggins." In that game, if you make a mistake of any kind, however trivial it may be, you are pronounced a muggins by the whole company, with great unanimity and enthusiasm. If you play the right card in the wrong place, you are a muggins; no matter how you play, in nine cases out of ten you are a muggins. They inform you of it with a shout which has no expression in it of regret. I have played this fine game all the evening, and although I knew little about it at first, I got to be quite a muggins at last. I played it very successfully on a policeman as I went home. I had forgotten my night-key and was climbing in at the window. When he clapped his hand on my shoulder, I smiled upon him and, says I, "Muggins!" with much vivacity. Says he, "How so?" and I said, "Because I live here, and you play the wrong card when you arrest me for entering my own house." I thought it was rather neat. But then there was nobody at home to identify me, and I had to go all the way to the station-house with him and give bail to appear and answer to a charge of burglary. As I turned to depart says he "Muggins!" I thought that was rather neat also.

But the conundrum I have alluded to in the heading of this article, was the best thing of the kind that has ever fallen under my notice. It was projected by a young man who has hardly any education at all, and whose opportunities have been very meagre, even from his childhood up. It was this: "Why was Napoleon when he crossed the Alps, like the Sanitary cheese at the Mechanics' Fair?"

It was very good for a young man just starting in life; don't you think so? He has gone away now to Sacramento. Probably we shall never see him more. He did not state what the answer was.

MARK TWAIN.

THE CAMPAIGN POET.—Since the opening of the Presidential campaign, the columns of the San Francisco Call have been kept sparkling with epigrammatic hits, quite characteristic of that sprightly journal, and often as effective as political leaders of a column's length. Some of these effusions of only half a dozen lines are as clever and indigenous as the Lowell-Biglow political epigrams, minus the Yankee dialect. The Call has evidently thrown its whole Soule into the campaign:

THE GRAVE-DIGGER OF THE SWAMPS.

If "Little Mac" was a hero when
He dug the graves of those lumbermen,
And slighting all the rules of Jomini,
Left nine hundred at Chickahominy—
Men who never felt a shiver
In the ice and snow of Penobscot river,
All destroyed by those dreadful blades,
In trenching swamps—poor worn-out braves—
Till death still digging their own graves—
If such campaigning made, alack!
A Bonaparte of "Little Mac,"
Sure now a hero ten times more,
Is he than e'er he was before,
Who digs a grave with a will so hearty
To bury the Democratic party.

AN APPROPRIATE SYMBOL.

SINCE Art built houses for the human,
A broom's the sceptre of a woman,
The symbol still its meaning keeps—
For instance, note McClellan's "sweeps,"
Who bear their brooms while seeking quarrels,
Significant of George B.'s laurels.
In warfare an old woman, he,
The broom should still his banner be.

THE SOLDIER'S WIFE.

Thy voice is heard through rolling drums
That beat to battle where he stands;
Thy face across his fancy comes,
And gives the battle to his hands:
A moment, while the trumpets blow,
He sees his brood about thy knee;
The next, like fire he meets the foe,
And strikes him dead for thine and thee.

[Tennyson.

THE FAMILY PORTRAITS.

IN the autumn of the year 1847, Col. Dunn went to visit his friend, Mr. Murray, at his country-seat, in the North of England. As this country seat was the scene of a very singular adventure, it may be proper to mention its antiquity and solemnity, which were fitted to keep in countenance the most sombre events. The following circumstances were well known in the family, and were related by one of its members to the deceased Lady Blessington:

Upon arriving at the house of his friend, Col. Dunn found there many guests, who had already got possession of almost all the apartments. The chilliness of an October evening, and the somewhat mournful aspect of nature in that season, collected them, at an early hour, round the blazing hearth, where they thought no better amusement could be found than the ancient and well-approved one of story telling, for which all mankind seem to have a relish. We do not mean the practice of circulating abominable slanders against one's friends; but the harmless, drowsy, and good-natured recreation of retailing wonderful narratives, in which, if any ill is spoken, it is generally against such as are well able to bear it—namely, the enemy of mankind, and persons who, having committed atrocious crimes, are supposed after death to haunt the same spots to which their deeds have attached dismal recollections.

While these tales went round the evening darkened apace, and the windows ceased any longer to contrast the small glimmerings of eternal twilight with the bright blaze of the hearth. The rustling of withered leaves, casually stirred by the wind, is always a melancholy sound, and on this occasion lent its aid to the superstitious impressions which were gaining force by each successive recital of prodigies. One member of the family began to relate a certain tradition; but he was suddenly put a stop to by their host, who exhibited signs of displeasure and whispered something to him, at the same time turning his eyes upon Col. Dunn. The story was accordingly broken off, and the company went to supper with their hair standing on end. But so transitory are human impressions, that in a few minutes they had recovered their gaiety, except the Colonel, who was unable to comprehend why any tradition should be concealed from him in particular. When they separated to go to sleep, he was led by Mr. Murray, as the reader will probably anticipate, to a chamber at a great distance from the other bed-rooms, and which bore evident marks of having been newly opened, after remaining long unoccupied. In order to dissipate the confined air of the place, a large wooden fire was lighted, and the gloomy bed-curtains were tucked stiffly up in festoons. We have not heard whether there was tapestry in the room or not; but one thing is certain, that the room looked as dreary as any tapestry could have made it, even had it been worked on purpose, by Mrs. Ann Radcliffe herself. Mr. Murray made apologies to Col. Dunn for putting him into an apartment which was somewhat uncomfortable, and which was now opened only because the rest were already filled. With these excuses, and other suitable compliments, he bade his guest good night, and went away with a good deal of seriousness in his countenance, leaving the door ajar behind him.

Col. Dunn, observing that the apartment was large and cold, and that but a small part of the room was covered with carpet, endeavored to shut the door, but found he could only close it half-way. Some obstacle in the hinges or the weight of the door on the floor, opposed his efforts. Nevertheless, being seized with absurd fancies, he took the candle and looked out; when he saw nothing, except the long passage, and the vacant apartment beyond. He went to bed, leaving the remains of the fire still flickering upon the broad hearth, and gleaming now and then upon the door as it stood half open. After the Colonel had lain for a long time ruminating, half asleep, and when the ashes were now nearly extinguished, he saw the figure of a woman glide in. No noise accompanied her step. She advanced to the fire-place, and stood between him and the light, with her back towards him, so that he could not see her features. Upon observing her dress, he found that it exactly corresponded, in appearance, with the ancient silk robes represented in the pictures of English ladies of rank, printed three centuries ago. This circumstance filled him with a degree of terror, which he had never experienced before. The stately garniture of times long past had a frightful meaning, when appearing as it now did, not upon canvas, but upon a moving shape, at midnight. Still endeavoring to shake off those impressions which benumbed him, he raised himself upon his arm, and faintly asked, "Who is there?" The phantom turned round, approached the bed, and fixed her eyes upon him, so that he now beheld a countenance where some of the worst passions of the living were blended with the cadaverous appearance of the dead. In the midst of traits which indicated noble birth and station, was seen a look of cruelty and perfidy, accompanied with a certain smile which betrayed even baser feelings. The approach of such a face near his own was more than Col. Dunn could support; and when he rose next morning from a feverish and troubled sleep, he could not recollect how or when the accursed spectre had departed.

When summoned to breakfast, he was asked how he had spent the night, and he endeavored to conceal his agitation by a general answer, but took the first opportunity to inform his friend Mr. Murray that, having recollected a certain piece of business that awaited him in London, he found it impossible to protract his visit a single night. Mr. Murray seemed surprised, and anxiously sought to discover whether anything occurred to render him displeased with his reception; but finding that his guest was impenetrable, and that his remonstrances against his departure were in vain, he insisted upon showing Col. Dunn the beauties of his country residence, after which he would reluctantly bid him farewell.

In walking round the mansion, Col. Dunn was shown the outside of the tower where he had slept, and vowed, mentally, never to enter it again. He was next led to a gallery of pictures, where Mr. Murray took much delight in displaying to him a complete series of family portraits, reaching back to a very remote era. Among the oldest there was one of a lady. Col. Dunn had no sooner got a glimpse of it, than he cried out, "May I never leave this spot if that is not she!"

Mr. Murray asked what he meant.

"The detestable phantom that started me out of my senses last night," and proceeded to relate every particular that had occurred.

Mr. Murray, overwhelmed with astonishment, confessed that to the room where his guest had slept there was attached a certain tradition, pointing it out as having been, at a remote period, the scene of incest and murder. It had long obtained the repute of being haunted by the spirit of the lady whose picture was before him: but there were some circumstances in her history so atrocious, that her name was seldom mentioned in his family, and his ancestors had always endeavored as much as possible to draw a veil over her memory.

THE RADIANT BOY.

AN APPARITION SEEN BY THE LATE MARQUIS OF LONDONDERRY.

IT is now nearly forty years since the late Lord Londonderry was, for the first time, on a visit to a gentleman in the north of Ireland. The mansion was such an one as spectres are fabled to inhabit. The apartment, also, which was appropriated to Lord Londonderry, was calculated to foster such a tone of feeling, from its antique decorations; from the dark and richly-carved panels of its wainscot; from its yawning width and height of chimney, looking like the open entrance to a tomb, of which the surrounding ornaments appeared to form the sepultures and entablature; from the portraits of grim men and severe-eyed women, arrayed in orderly procession along the walls, and scowling a contemptuous enmity against the degenerate invader of their gloomy bowers and venerable halls; and from the vast, dusky, ponderous and complicated draperies that concealed the windows and hung with the gloomy grandeur of funeral trappings about the hearse-like piece of furniture that was destined for his bed.

Lord Londonderry examined his chamber; he made himself acquainted with the forms and faces of the ancient possessors of the mansion, as they sat upright in their ebony frames to receive his salutations; and then, after dismissing his valet, he retired to bed. His candles had not long been extinguished when he perceived a light gleaming on the draperies of the lofty canopy over his head. Conscious that there was no fire in the grate—that the curtains were closed—that the chamber had been in perfect darkness but a few minutes before, he supposed that some intruder must have accidentally entered his apartment; and, turning hastily round to the side from which the light proceeded, saw, to his infinite astonishment, not the form of any human visitor, but the figure of a fair boy, who seemed to be garmented in rays of mild and tempered glory, which beamed palely from his slender form, like the faint light of the declining moon, and rendered the objects which were nearest to him dimly and indistinctly visible. The spirit stood at some short distance from the side of the bed. Certain that his own faculties were not deceiving him, but suspecting that he might be imposed upon by the ingenuity of some of the numerous guests who were then visiting in the same house, Lord Londonderry proceeded towards the figure; it retreated before him; as he slowly advanced, the form, with equal paces, slowly retired; it entered the gloomy arch of the capacious chimney, and then sank into the earth. Lord Londonderry returned to his bed, but not to rest; his mind was harassed by the consideration of the extraordinary event which had occurred to him. Was it real? Was it the work of the imagination? Was it the result of imposture? It was all incomprehensible.

He resolved in the morning not to mention the appearance till he should have well observed the manners and countenances of the family. He was conscious that, if any deception had been practiced, its authors would be too delighted with their success to conceal the vanity of their triumph. When the guests assembled at the breakfast-table, the eye of Lord Londonderry searched in vain for those latent smiles—those conscious looks—that silent communication between the parties, by which the authors and abettors of such domestic conspiracies are generally betrayed. Everything, apparently, proceeded in its ordinary course. The conversation flowed rapidly along from the subjects afforded at the moment, without any of the constraint which marks a party intent upon some secret and more interesting argument, and endeavoring to afford an opportunity for its introduction. At last the hero of the tale found himself compelled to mention the occurrence of the night. It was most extraordinary; he feared that he should not be credited; and then, after all due preparation, the story was related. Those among his auditors who, like himself, were strangers and visitors in the house, were certain that some delusion must have been practiced: the family alone seemed perfectly composed and calm.

At last, the gentleman whom Lord Londonderry was visiting interrupted their various surmises on the subject by saying: "The circumstances which you have just recounted must naturally appear very extraordinary to those who have not long been inmates of my dwelling, and not conversant with the legends of my family; and to those who are, the event which has happened will only serve as the corroboration of an old tradition that has long been related of the apartment in which you slept. You have seen the Radiant Boy. Be content—it is an omen of prosperous fortunes. I would rather that this subject should no more be mentioned."

And here the affair ended.

TEXT-HAND COPIES FOR FAST BOYS.—Jolly is a Lark. To Be Respectable is To Be Slow. The Casino is Charming. Go it Like Bricks. Do the Governor. Philosophy is Dummy. Sherry-Cobbler is Stunning. Cut Slow Company. High Art is Dreary. A Good Young Man is a Pump. Virtue is Walker. The End of Life is a Spree.

TO-MORROW has no overflow to atone for the lost yesterday.

EVIL RESULTS OF GOOD COMPOSITION.

IT is probably true that bad style—or, rather, imperfect style—must always exist, because it necessarily attends, in various shapes, on the different forms which good style takes. It is not as if there was one simple, undeniable, perfect style, from which all others are abberrations. Men of genius or of great power of mind write their own style, for, as Buffon said, the style is the man. In English literature, the style of Burke is good, and the style of Southey is good. The excellence of De Quincy is equalled by the excellence of Dr. Newman, and yet all four styles are perfectly different and distinct from each other. In every case the style is intimately connected with the general cast of the writer's thought, and the language gains and grows because Englishmen of bright thought and practiced power write, generation after generation, in English. Sometimes the language which a man of genius has taught himself to use can scarcely be called a good style, but is yet vigorous, suggestive and characteristic, and we can neither wish that the style should be separated from the man nor conceive how the separation could take place. It is, for example, a gain to English literature that Mr. Carlyle should have written in Carlylese. In no other way could he have produced so accurate expression of his thoughts, or have done so much justice to himself. Mr. Ruskin, again, sometimes, as Mr. Arnold points out, writes a style perfectly marvellous for its sustained subtlety and a certain involved and tropical richness of imaginative expression; while sometimes he maunders on, saying the most foolish things in a prolix, affected way, though with an air of authority, as if he were an Old Testament prophet taking his ease. And yet the bad things and the good things are part of the same man, and it belongs to the character of the man and his thoughts that there should be this flux of an originality impotent to restrain or measure itself. But when such men as Mr. Ruskin and Mr. Carlyle have secured their position, and caught the attention of their generation, and infused a certain portion of their thoughts into the mind of every educated person, it is inevitable that many of those writers who are most affected and captivated by them should use the language of their masters to express what in their thought comes from their masters. Particular phrases are then caught up and repeated, not because they have much meaning in the connection in which they are used, but because it has come to be received as an accepted and traditionary truth, on the authority of certain eminent writers, that they have a virtue as in themselves, and are full of a secret meaning, such as was once assigned to opals and amulets. For example, Mr. Carlyle, in his great anxiety to put portraiture into language, and to make short phrases express a whole character, used to employ frequently the term "humor," and to apply to it, as instruments of variation, certain emphatic words, such as grim, inner, veracious, and so forth. These words were originally parts of a description which was meant not only to be exact, but to be more exact, because more suggestive, than plain words setting forth moral qualities at length could possibly be. The effect was to a certain extent produced; and then admirers of Mr. Carlyle, although aware that they could not paint verbal pictures as he could, thought they might at least use the same paints, and so applied pretty freely to any one of whom they were speaking such expressions as that he had a grim or veracious humor. In a later stage, expressions like these came to be used, by persons not very choice or accurate in their language, as mere pieces of emphasis, and without any reference to Mr. Carlyle. Certain writers seem to acquire thus, without effort, and almost without their knowledge, a simple fund of strength, and their language is, as it were, made emphatic for them just as it is by slang. If, for instance, they like a man, and wish to praise him, they would say, if called upon to write in a solemn and formal way of him, that he was full of veracious humor; just as, if they were writing in a quiet and easy way among friends, they would say that he was a "thundering brick." Any one who reads either expression sees in a moment that nothing more is really meant than that the writer likes and admires the person of whom he is speaking.

PRESENCE OF MIND.—There is nothing like having one's wits about one in the hour of peril, to which end it is above all things necessary that people should cultivate a habit of keeping themselves cool and facing small evils steadily. Some years ago a lady, bathing on the coast of Cornwall, got out of her depth and was carried out by the tide. The people on the shore were in a flutter, and did nothing to save her; but she herself knew that she could float, and so she threw herself on her back, determined to utilize her sole power to its utmost. A young shipwright hearing what happened, and being a strong swimmer, came down to the beach, stripped and began to swim after her. After swimming upwards of a mile he came near her, but before touching her he asked if she had presence of mind to do exactly as he told her to do, and promised that on that condition, he would do his best to save her. She gave her promise, and the carpenter came close to her, told her to place both hands upon his hips, which she did, and then swam back with her towards the shore. Both these people had their wits about them and both were saved. The Birmingham Daily Post also records an instance of coolness equally happy, though different in circumstance. A canal-boat at Wolverhampton was capsized on Monday, having in the cabin the captain's wife and three children. To all appearance their death was certain, when a boat-builder, seeing what had occurred, ran into the water, and leaped on to the bottom of the boat, at the same time sending a friend for his axe. As soon as he got it he placed his ear close to the side of the boat, and, ascertaining where the woman and children were, set to work to cut through the timbers of three-inch oak, and in ten minutes made an opening through which a tiny hand immediately grasped the broken timbers. As the hole increased in size more hands were held up, till at last the hole was wide enough to admit the egress of the baby ten months old. In twenty minutes from the occurrence of the accident, children and mother were all rescued. The process of delivery was simple, but no one thought of it except the man who had his wits about him.—English paper.

ALPINE INSPIRATION.

BETWEEN two and three we set off, my guide affecting to show the way with a lantern dangling at his knees. Our path lay for some time up towards the summit of the pass, across rough slopes of stony pasture, in which we occasionally stumbled on a cow, munching in the starlight, and shedding out the smell of her sweet breath. Leaving a large lake on our right; we soon reached the notch in the ridge over which the path leads down toward Engelberg. This is the top of the Joch. Here we turned off on the right, some time apparently losing ground by descending, but always making our way towards the Titlis. Presently, the grey light of the morning made that of the lantern a little, hot, greasy dab of flame; so the guido blew the candle out, hid it under some stones, of which he took the bearings, and pushed briskly on. After a succession of rock, slopes of debris, grass and small glacier, we came to a saddle, which led away from our right towards the great rounded snow summit of the mountain. Here my man swung off his knapsack, and sat down with a look about his mouth which said, "Lunch." It was really between five and six in the morning. Sleepy housemaids of the world beneath had not yet begun to light the kitchen fire; muddy boots stood in empty attitudes of expectation at hotel bed-room doors; Belgravia was still snoring politely—when my man unstrapped his knapsack and dragged forth our lunch. This done, we passed up the edge of the ridge on our right, tied ourselves together, got down upon the nevé from some rocks, and made straightway for the summit, which we reached at ten minutes to seven. The view was magnificent. Towards the Bernese Oberland the air was clear: beneath us, over the Lake of Lucerne, lay a sea of cloud, out of which Pilatus and the Righi rose like islands. Beyond, the more level land lay towards Strasburg, from which it is said the summit on which we were standing is sometimes visible. It consists of a grand swell of nevé or frozen snow, approached on one side by snow slopes, and on the other flanked by a series of precipices down which avalanches continually fall during the day, starting from the great cake of ice then beneath our feet. There is a little bit of rock on the summit; here I sat down and looked around. I had not done so long before I was disturbed by a poet, of all people in the world. "The poet of Engelberg" had chosen that very morning to ascend with a sheet of paper, a pencil and six friends. One of these informed me, directly he had been cast loose from the rope which had bound his party together, that the poet had come, and pointed out the man. Poor fellow! he had a character for inspiration to keep up, and so, though he was very hot and blown, he whipped out his pencil and justified it at once, soon gathering his admirers about him, and reading aloud, with rounded mouth, a stanza of the new-born thought. Then they said, "Bravo!" He pocketed the scrap, and all sat down to lunch. It was a touch-and-go act of poetry—genius with a hair-trigger. The sense of the sublime was summoned and dismissed at will. In the space of ten minutes the view was taken in, the brain was fired, the flash was fixed in a pocket-book, and the poet had his mouth full of cold sausage.

BURNS' "TAM O' SHANTER."—The London correspondent of the Scottish American Journal discourses about Burns' handwriting as follows: "I had the great literary treat yesterday of turning over the original manuscript of that matchless epic, Tam o' Shanter. It is written in dear Robbie's noble hand, distinct and legible in the highest degree; and herein the calligraphy testifies to the honest, warm-hearted bard. Tam is written on indifferent paper, a sort of whitey-brown, browner doubtless by the reek of the poet's cottage and its age, now about seventy years. It is written on twelve pages of this paper, such as he might have had from the gude wife Mauchline. The sheets are uniform, and of the size of the London Gazette page. The MS. is a study. You will sometimes find a whole page without erasure or interlineation—fluent as 'Logan Water.' The ploughman knew the value, however, of the Latin adage, Limæ labor et mora—the labor—the polish and delay of the file. What a mistake Lord Oxford must have made in literature; for he said that most authors wrote in his time—Robbie's time or circa—as they expected their works would live no longer than a month. Burns, and many other authors dear to memory, ever-during, knew the labor of the file, and filed away till they formed 'one entire and perfect chrysolite;' and we humble students who live now thank them for their file work. Here is a point worthy of note. Every alteration that is made in Robbie's MS. is made for the better. A word introduced gives greater breadth, depth, and meaning to show the passage, but never changing the latter, showing the firm mental purpose of Burns. Honest and frank in his corrections, he strikes out a word here and another there, but leaves it legible. Here's another point about Tam o' Shanter's first writing. It appeared to me in perusing it that Burns made more alterations in the 'Doric' parts of the tale—those parts, entirely of a rustic, plebeian—shall I say—character. From beginning to end there is prima facia evidence that he wrote by gushes, 'routh o'rhyme,' and that his more refined and sparkling thoughts and images came with entire spontaneity. Let me be understood. The well-remembered lines in Tam o' Shanter, beginning

> 'Our pleasures are like poppies spread,'

and ending with the exquisitely beautiful simile—

> 'Or, like the rainbow's lovely form,
> Evanishing amid the storm,' seemed to be like the willing firstlings of his brain. Altogether, the MS. is a curiosity. It came direct through the executors of Burns' biographer, Dr. Currie. At the same time I examined Tom Campbell's first bit o' writing of Lord Ullin's Daughter, and Hohenlinden. Thomas Campbell was a great polisher, as we all know."

IT is said that a lady is best dressed when one cannot remember what she wore, and according to that interpretation, Waifer thinks that Menken must be the best dressed woman that ever lived, for he cannot remember that she wore anything in particular.

RELIGIOUS CEREMONIES AT JERUSALEM.

I HAVE now been a week at Jerusalem, going the round of the sights—some of interest, others of absurdity. The first was, of course, the Holy Sepulchre, then King David's tomb, the Mount of Olives and the Chapel of the Ascension, Gethsemane, the village of Emmaus, and finally Bethlehem. They are all too well known from books for me to attempt description. It was far from my purpose, in writing about this country, to tread feebly in the footsteps of the many learned authors on it, but merely to give my impression of its present state as a part of the Turkish empire. I cannot, however, pass over Jerusalem, without saying how painful it was to me to listen to the desecrating tales of guides at the sacred shrines. The Church of the Holy Sepulchre is necessarily of surpassing interest; but the doubt of the identity of the tomb—the flight of steps leading from it to Cavalry, which is also in the church, and the moukish triviality with which every detail is pointed out—the sockets of the three crosses—the rock riven by the earthquake during the Crucifixion—the stone on which the Lord's body was prepared for burial—that on which the Empress Helen sat when she found the true cross—finishing off with the sword of Godfrey of Bouillion—and all this under a guard of Turkish policemen—drive reverence from the mind most bent on simply believing that Christ died there. On Easter-eve it is still worse, I am told. The Greeks and Armenians assert that fire descends miraculously from heaven to light the lustres and tapers round the Holy Sepulchre, as the altar was burnt at the prayer of Elijah in the First Book of Kings. Strange antics are then performed—ludicrous were they not profane. People rush wildly shouting round the tomb; and so mad is the frenzy excited that persons have even recently been trampled to death in these superstitious orgies when the struggle to light tapers at the holy flame is raging. Formerly a white pigeon was thrown from the cupola into the sanctuary, to represent the descent of the Holy Ghost; but this gross aggravation is, happily, now discontinued. And we expect Christianity to be respected by Mussulmans who witness such degrading mummeries, for there are always some Turks in the church to guard it, and, on great festivals there are large bodies of soldiers and police to tell the tale of Christian inferiority to the purity of their own form of worship and that of the Jews. The noble Mosque of Omar is very different in its general effect. Impressed by its grave repose, one rejoices to recognize the undoubted features of the threshing-floor of Araunah, a bare rock unadorned with priestly gewgaws, and precisely in the same state in which it was when Abraham bound Isaac on the altar he had erected on it—when Melchizedek or Shem (if they were really the same person) offered bread and wine to Abraham on it, receiving a tithe of his spoil—when the angel stood there to threaten Jerusalem with pestilence, and when David built his altar on it. Then this was the court of the Temple of Solomon, whose vaulted foundations I visited, while pilgrim Jews from Germany and Poland wept outside, in all simple grief for its fall, at the Place of Wailing. It is truly a grand monument, eclipsing, both as a Jewish temple and as a mosque of Islam, the tawdry finery of the Christian Church of the Holy Sepulchre. One can well comprehend the enthusiasm of Saladin when he said, as recorded by the historian Emad ed Din, that it was the abode of a prophet, the resting place of saints, the goal of pilgrimage of angels, the future scene of the general resurrection and judgment, the spotless and beautiful pavement whence Mahomet ascended to heaven, and whence the lightning flashed on that night of mystery, illuminating every point of the universe.—Rambles in Syrian Deserts.

MISPLACED KINDNESS.

THERE is nothing like an obliging disposition, I thought to myself one day, when traveling in a railway car from Boston to Worcester, seeing a gentleman put himself to considerable trouble to land another gentleman, who had fallen asleep, at his destination.

"Passengers for West Needham!" cried out the conductor; "the car stops but one minute."

"Hallo!" exclaimed a young man in spectacles, at the same time seizing an old gentleman by the shoulders, who was sleeping very soundly, "here's Captain Holmes fast asleep and this is West Needham, where he lives. Come, get up, Captain Holmes, here you are."

The gentleman got upon his feet and began to rub his eyes, but the young man forced him along to the door of the car, and gently landed him on the road-side. Whiz went the steam, and we began to fly again. The obliging young man took his seat again, and said with a good deal of satisfaction to somebody near him: "Well, if it hadn't been for me, Captain Holmes would have missed his home finely. But here he has left his bundles," and the young man picked up a paper parcel and threw it out. "Well," he said "if it hadn't been for me, Captain Holmes would have missed his bundles finely;"

When we stopped at the next station, a lady began to rummage under the seat where Captain Holmes had been sitting, and exclaimed in great alarm:

"I cant find my bundle."

"Was it done up in a piece of brown paper?" I asked.

"Yes it was, to be sure," said the lady.

"Then," said I, "that young man yonder threw it out of the window at the last stopping-place."

This led to a scene between the obliging young man and the old lady, which ended by the former taking the address of the latter, and promising to return the package in a few days, provided he should ever find it.

"Well," said the obliging young man, "catch me doing a good-natured thing again. What can I do for that old woman, if I cannot find her bundle?"

Whiz went the steam, ding, ding, ding, went the bell, the dust flew, the sparks flew, and the cars flew, as they say, like lightning, till we stopped again at the next station; I forget the name of it now, but it would be of no consequence if I could remember it. An old gentleman started up and began to poke under the seat where Captain Holmes had sat.

"What are you looking for?" I inquired.

"Looking for?" said the old gentleman, "why, I am looking for my bundle of clothes."

"Was it tied up in a yellow handkerchief?" I asked.

"Yes, and nothing else," said the old man.

"Good heavens?" exclaimed the obliging young man, "I threw it out of the car at Needham; I thought it belonged to Captain Holmes."

"Captain Holmes!" exclaimed the old fellow, with a look of despair, "who is Captain Holmes? That bundle contained all my clean clothes, that I was to wear at my son's wedding to-morrow morning. Dear me, what can I do?"

Nothing could be done but to give his address to the obliging young man as before, and console himself with the promise that the bundle should be returned to him, provided it was ever found. The obliging young man was now in despair, and made another vow that he would never attempt to be obliging again. The next station was his landing-place, and as he went toward the door of the car, he saw a silver-headed cane, which he took hold of and read the inscription on it, "Moses Holmes, East Needham."

"Well!" again exclaimed the obliging young man, "if here isn't Captain Holmes's cane!"

"Yes," said a gentleman, who got in at the last station, "and the old fellow is lame too. He will miss his stick."

"Do you know him?" inquired the obliging young gentleman.

"Know him? I should think so," replied the gentleman; "he is my uncle."

"And does he live at East Needham?" asked the obliging young man.

"Of course he does. He never lived anywhere else."

"Well, if it don't beat everything," said the obliging young gentleman, "and I put him out at West Needham, a mile and a half the other side of his home."

JERROLDIANA.

JERROLD said: "Eve ate the apple that she might dress."

In the outside world of brazen brows there is no impudence like the impudence of what men will call religion.

A wild republican said, profanely, that Louis Blanc was next to our Saviour. "On which side?" Jerrold asked.

They say a parson first invented gunpowder, but it is hard to believe it till one is married.

"Well, Talfourd," said Jerrold, on meeting the late eminent Judge and author one day near Temple Bar, "have you any more Ions in the fire?"

Married happiness is a glass ball; folks play with it during the honeymoon, till, falling, it is shivered to pieces; and the rest of life is a wraugle about who broke it.

Every impostor rewarded is a worthy poor man wronged. We do not respect the philanthropy that has its especial pets yet those pets abound.

An eccentric party, of which Jerrold was one, agreed to have a supper of sheep's heads. One gentleman present was particularly enthusiastic on the excellence of the dish; and, as he threw down his knife and fork exclaimed, "Well, sheep's heads for ever, say I!" Jerrold—"There's egotism!"

At a club of which Jerrold was a member, a fierce Jacobite and a friend, as fierce, of the cause of William III., were arguing noisily, and disturbing less excitable conversationalists. At length the Jacobite, a brawny Scot, brought his fist down heavily upon the table and roared at his adversary. "I tell you what it is, sir; I spit upon your King William!" The friend of the Prince of Orange was not to be out-mastered by mere lungs. He rose and roared back to the Jacobite: "And I, sir, spit upon your James II." Jerrold, who had been listening to the uproar in silence, hereupon rang the bell and shouted, "Waiter, spittoons for two!"

When Jerrold was living at Boulogne, he caught rheumatism in the eyes. He was attended by a coarse, brutal French doctor, who blistered him severely, to no purpose. Jerrold was in a dark room for several weeks, under the ineffectual treatment of this unpleasant practitioner. One day the doctor was dressing the blister roughly, when his patient winced: "Ce n'est rien—ce n'est rien!" said the doctor. Presently, some hot water was brought in for the doctor's hands. The doctor dipped his fingers into the basin, but withdrew them rapidly, with a loud exclamation. The water was nearly boiling. Jerrold could not resist the opportunity, ill as he was, for a retort, and soothingly addressed the scalded man with "Ce n'est rien—ce n'est rien!"

A gentleman of a somewhat ardent temperament paid great attention to his pretty servant in the absence of his wife. The good wife, before leaving London, had made a store of pickles and preserves, that were to adorn her table till the following year. But the husband, taking Time vigorously by the forelock, shared the sweets of the year with the temporary object of his affections. When the wife returned, the pickle-jars were empty. "Conceive his baseness, my dear," said the injured wife to a female friend, "he not only destroyed my peace of mind, but, with a depravity that makes one shudder, he actually ate all my pickles." In the following spring Jerrold met the husband and wife in Covent Garden market, walking together. Pointing to a tray of young walnuts, Jerrold quietly asked, "Going to do anything this year?"

The law of war between nations—a law illustrated in every page of history—appears to be this: that wars are few or frequent in proportion to the destructive powers of the arms in use. When the club was the only weapon of attack and defence, there was no peace; every knave had his club, and club-law was universal. When the sword and buckler took its place, war came and went with the season. As soon as the harvest was over, the Roman went out against his neighbor or his neighbor advanced against him. Gunpowder was a great peace-maker. If with that invention war became more destructive, it ceased to be the normal condition of mankind. It grew more and more terrible, more and more brief. Nations felt how great the loss must be of a collision, and statesmen began to ask themselves if the possible gain would equal the inevitable loss. No doubt, passion, ignorance, personal cupidity, often overleaped the bounds of reason, and plunged all Europe into horror; but the violence, never failed to obtain the reproach of public opinion—the brand of history. And no ruler, however powerful, can dispense with the moral support of public opinion; and hence, however warlike, the most passionate lover of war will hesitate long and resort to a thousand tricks, as Bonaparte always did, rather than appear to Europe as the open agressor, the wilful shedder of blood.

HAPPENINGS OF THE WEEK.

Monday, 26th.—The Pioneer and San Francisco Cricket Clubs have had a trial of skill at the old Pioneer race-ground near the Willows, resulting in victory to the Pioneers.....A gentleman offers to bet $100 that Lincoln and Johnson's majority in this State will reach 25,000. Who takes it?.... The Oaklanders, getting spunky, offer to carry passengers by rail from Oakland to Alameda, thence by stage to San Jose, for the sum of one dollar.....The Lancha (launch out) Plana Copper Company advertises a dividend! Wonders never will cease.....George W. Pollock commences suit against the owners of the steamboat Washoe for $10,000 damages, for being blown up on that craft; she now lies at Hathaway's wharf, a sight to behold.....Isaac Hinzman indulges in the luxury of threshing his wife, which Russian idea of illustrating affection Judge Shepheard objects to, and "can't see it in that light;" so comes down heavy on Isaac.....Eighteen years ago to-day, the California Regiment sailed from New York in the ships Thomas H. Perkins, Susan Drew and Loo Choo, under command of Col. J. D. Stevenson. They were all deeply laden, although the Susan Drew the most water..... Telegraphic News: Gold at 202; report of Gen. Stevenson fully confirming the magnitude and brilliancy of Sheridan's victory over Early. Sheridan woke up Early in the morning, and gave him a good dressing before night. Reports that Mobile surrendered unconditionally. Athens (Ala.) attacked and forced to surrender. Shelby's cavalry 5,000 strong, occupy Fredericktown (Mo.) Price advances from Arkansas with 10,000 men intended to join Selby. The French again defeated on the Rio Grande by Cortinas; they went up the river to attack Brownsville, but were themselves attacked, and took French leave. Quite an excitement in Legal Tenders. $150,000 sold at 53 cents cash and 30 days.....Gardner, who was injured at the time Mr. Rice was killed, recovering and out of danger.....Dr. Wadsworth's "Lecture to young men" at Calvary church, last evening, was well attended. It is needless to state that they were all single men. The married men have no occasion to go out for their lectures.....Steamer John L. Stephens from Mexican ports, arrived yesterday, (Sunday,) with a large number of passengers, and $207,700 in specie.....A Federal salute was fired from Alcatraz this afternoon, by order of Gen. McDowell, in honor of Sheridan's success..... Io Triumphe! The first installment!—The John L. Stephens brought thirteen silver bars from the Triuufo Gold and Silver Mine, San Antonio district, Lower California. There will undoubtedly be a bar-gain in stock. May their bars never be less!....One hundred sacks 50 per cent. copper ore or fifty sacks one hundred per cent., (we forget which.) were landed from schooner Sovereign, from the Colorado—the first evidences of good from Nazareth!

Tuesday, 27th.—A whale: A gentleman riding on the beach strikes a lead, and calls it the Jonah. It is a whale 70 feet long that had become disgusted with a life in the ocean wave and came ashore to offer his services to some political club. Can spout anything. The discoverer proposes to spout his whaleship—a scent-sible investment! Who wants fish for dinner?....A gentleman named Santo Gnido was fined $70 for imagining every man he meets to be the great Sanitary cheese, and thereupon proceeds to slice him and cut his acquaintance generally—carving his way to distinction with a large knife, at groat expense.....A runaway, too common to be worth mentioning: a nice buggy converted into stove-wood in just two minutes, and stove all up; time not taken. A hitch in time would have saved the distance made, and some dollars.....A man named Martin, a waterman, fell in a fit and died in a few moments near Sixth street.....Discovered that there is no good reason why raisins should not be produced in California if we had the right kind of grapes, and knew how to cure them. Referred to the medical faculty, who wouldn't admit that they couldn't cure anything. ....The Crescent Mine at Indian Valley, Plumas county, declares a dividend of $50 per share..... A Droll Mayor: Henry Drollmayer and his wife, who were made one, have been divided and made two, by order of Judge Dwinelle.... Steamer Moses Taylor arrives from San Juan via Panama, with passengers by the Nicaragua route..... The Postmaster-General telegraphs Postmaster Perkins that the Overland Mail route is again open, and that the mails will be despatched by that route as usual. Good!....The California Guards, Capt. Bluxome, fire a salute in honor of the recent victories.....Walter N. Palmer, late Superintendent of the Ophir Mine, files his answer to complaint of the company, charging that he had overdrawn his salary, and says he only got what belonged to him, and that he doesn't owe the company any thanks, or money either. The stockholders have not been so lucky..... On the Square: An appropriation of $2,500 made by the Board of Supervisors for ornamenting the Plaza. It does not provide for a few buckets of water to wash off the accumulated dust on the fountain.....The Courts busy coining sovereigns (voters) for the coming election. A large number of foreigners made "native and to the manner born."....Gold quoted 180 in Wall street; greenbacks lively at 53¼. The Gaps of Shenandoah Valley to be fortified—these gaps have proved yawning gulfs to the rebels.....Postmaster-General Blair resigns; the people bear the infliction with a great deal of resignation.....Pilot Knob evacuated. Lee instructs Early to hold Shenandoah Valley at all hazards. Rather late for Early to do it; will prove a hazardous operation.

Wednesday, 28th.—The editorial corps of The Californian went "inter se" the whale, and, "O, Moses!" it was a sudden but sic transit they made in passing the object..... Jarndyce and Jarndyce: The Pan controversy still continues in the U. S. Circuit Court, grinding away; the lawyers reducing the testimony to a pulp; some grit still perceptible, however, but nothing panned out yet. There probably will be some quicksilver lost in the trial. Judge Hoffman will be sound on Amalgamation hereafter.....An interesting dog-fight on Montgomery street, gathering a crowd of a hundred or more Bummers. Stub-tail wins the fight.....Gold 190 in Wall street; greenbacks lower, 51½ cents. John Perry and Frank Woods considerably excited.....Race at the Bay View Park, between Humboldt and Latham, was won by Latham in three straight heats—time, 2:48½, 2:45½, 2:43½.....Miss Hardinge lectures on The Coming Man, at Platt's Hall, to a large audience. Miss Hardinge speaks with that fervor that usually distinguishes ladies, on that subject.

Thursday, 29th.—Telegraph Omaha'd again, consequently no news; but as no news is good news, we quote the news to-day "cheerful and encouraging." Private despatches quote gold last evening fluctuating from 200 to 210, and closing at 204—a lively time among the brokers, we should imagine.... Patrick Smith brings suit against the Omnibus Railroad Company for over charge of fare; complains that it was not fair to charge him six-and-a-quarter cents when the rate is but five, and he can't see any sense in it. The company probably do, and will continue to do Patrick, thereby accumulating the cents that he can't see. For Patrick's consolation we would mention that it is a "free country," and it is one of the glorious principles of this style of government that if a man don't like to ride he can walk.....A New Coat: The Plaza fence gets a new coat—a suit of black—going into mourning for the dead trees and grass within it. A suitable reward will be paid, on application at this office, for the suggestion of a little water in the Bensley Squirt....The Ladies' Fair of the Christian Commission results in a clean profit, over and above all expenses, of $26,492 63. Very flattering to the ladies, certainly!....Steamer Golden Age arrives, bringing a large mail, lots of females and other precious freight. Our old friend, Col. Hewston arrives.....Modern Thebes: The English ship Thebes founders off Cape Horn; total loss of cargo; crew saved. Cape Horn foundered the Thebes. Who found Cape Horn?

Friday, 30th.—By Telegraph: Sheridan still hurries up Early's cakes, which seem to be all dough. Secretary Seward, the peace-maker, seems to have had a taste of rebel compliments; also Assistant Secretary of War Dana. Where was Mr. Stanton? If there are any heads of Departments to be taken off, it is his duty to head the list. Secretary Seward don't seem to relish the style of rebel diplomatics, and thinks the pen mightier than the sword. We think old cheese is, too; but cannon balls are worse than either; and even as good a Christian as the Hon. Secretary don't care to be canonized in that way. Grant makes a move to some effect. That's a way he has; the defects in his moves are the faults of his subordinates. Birney carries the Newmarket entrenchments; don't say where he is carrying them, but as he is marching "On to Richmond," it is probable he will set down the one and carry several more. Let him refer to his Daboll and make a note. Sheridan enters Staunton for a race after Early. Gen. Hooker appointed to an important command. We knew it; we knew Fighting Hooker's very handsome sword, presented by his old friends here, would never be suffered to rest in idleness. Three cheers for Hooker! and may his command never be less—than a corps.

October 1st.—Ephe Leonard and Charley Smith go off on a shoot.

CALIFORNIA, AS SEEN BY A STRANGER.

THE following graphic and humorous picture of California, as it strikes a stranger's comprehension, we extract from Dr. Bellows' recently published Oration before the Pioneers:

If I wished to give a stranger in the most rapid way an idea of California, I would blindfold him the other side the Golden Gate, and take off his bandage in the middle of some mining town, or camp, like Murphy's, or if a larger scale were desired, Placerville or Folsom. Between the scarred and hydraulicked sides of a gulch in the foot-hills, torn and disfigured as with the wicked sports of a band of tipsy Titans pelting each other with earth and stones, he should open his eye on a narrow street lined with one-story small wooden houses, with here and there a brick or stone building of two or three stories breaking the sky line into gappy irregularity, and with green iron shutters panelling the fronts. A few stores bursting with stocks of goods of a prodigious size and variety, compared with the apparent demand, should attest the difficulty of replenishing a business stock, the distance of the country from its base of supplies at New York, and the large capital involved in trade, accounting for the enormous prices demanded at retail.

Passing along, the fresh eye would note almost at once certain characteristic things, five or six saloons standing wide open, with enormous bars of liquors and still more extraordinary supplies of billiard tables, which no where else in the rudest hamlets are regarded as a first necessity of life. Next, four or five restaurants with small tables attended by a speckled population of English, French, Italian, German, Spanish, Mexican, Chilian, Chinese, Indian and American servants—but in which great mufly Diggers, natural perukes, or else shaved pig-tailed Johns, form the most picturesque features. Three barbers' shops, each big enough to shave a city in, with every possible extravagance of luxury in them, and some new wrinkle, on which to found an extra quarter's charge introduced once a week; next, a pair of solemn looking institutions, in which the dignity of a bench of Judges is ingeniously blended with the indignity of the Stocks, which gradually develop themselves on the mystified stranger, as "the peculiar institution" of the country—in short a boot-blacking establishment. Dont let me forget to point out two extensive and excellent bathing establishments connected with the barbers' shops, and six laundries, where John is seen spirting the water from his mouth upon a snow-white shirt, and then smoothing it down with a brazier of live-coals; three or four fruit-stores that make a stranger's mouth water; six tobacco and cigar cubby holes; two stands of yellow novels, periodicals and newspapers, illustrated and otherwise; Wells, Fargo & Co.'s express office, of course; an apothecary shop, or drug store, whose stock would indicate that the people lived at least half on medicines, and especially quack medicines, politely known as Patent; four or five small taverns, one or two unexpectedly comfortable; the placard of the circus, for which you are to "wait" and the equescurriculum, which you are "not to forget;" and the concert which Messrs. Dodge & Hayward have come to charm you with; not to speak of sundry most brilliant pictures of ladies in very short petticoats, and gentlemen in very tight breeches, sometimes unhappily in next to none at all, stuck on street corners, and hanging in the barbers' shops—for I never dared to enter the saloons; in the distance, a wooden ditch of muddy water, elevated on a staging a hundred feet high, and in the road beneath it, the Pioneer Company's Stages, with nine inside, and fifteen a-top, the legs dangling round the entire roof, and forming a charming fringe of boots, shoes and Chinese slippers for the delectation of the inside passengers, all dashing along, generally three or four of them, with six horses each, up to the tavern, where stand the noble horses that are to relieve their sweating mates. If I add that about half the houses and stores have the words "to let" upon them, it will serve to indicate the certain effect, and "seen-better-days" character, which marks all mining towns that are not founded on a quartz basis.

If the stranger were not satisfied with this characteristic picture, I would bandage him up again and give him over as a dull fellow for the interpretation of human and social physiognomy, offer him one more chance to redeem himself by a glance at your scenery. First I would set him down at the charming door of the Big Tree Hotel, and after he had recovered on excellent fare from the exhausting admiration awakened by the rare greenness, the smoothness and vastness of the hills among which his winding way led up to the elevation he had reached, had lain, an admiration forced out of him by those sugar pines, straight as arrows and from two to three hundred feet high, and six, eight and ten feet in diameter; their bark mottled like an adder's skin, and suggesting the idea that some new Moses, after having restored their erectness, had changed back the serpents into rods fit for the wands of demi-gods—I would carry him out into the grove, a grove such as no Druid ever worshipped in, where that great council of monarchs of the forest stands, surrounded by a court of Dryads, each of which would alone dignify any other scene. I would call his attention to the vigorous youth of these vast growths which a thousand years has not carried beyond their prime, and which a thousand years more will not humble to old age. Was ever the majesty of organized form, the mingled beauty and grandeur of vegetable growth, the solemn mystery of vital processes and the awing associations of lapsing ages, which these silent witnesses have seen come and depart, more impressively united! How their grand boles flame up, columns of ruddy energy and beauty, fingers of light and power, in the dark forest that embosoms them; how like vast Indian chiefs, in their old war paint, their tall plumes still nodding, they stand guardians of the hunting grounds of a thousand years ago!

If this vast vistory of vegetative vitality did not bring our visitor to his knees, I would hurry him straight to Yosemite and imprison him before he was aware, in that most wondrous fortress of rock; its green, meadowy floor, swept with the pellucid waters of the raging, playful, changing, mighty, meek Merced; a floor, a mile down from the cornice of granite walls, that, steep as the sides of your city streets, hang in precipitous curtains of rock, now white, now brown, now black, fringed above with a vegetation, fine as box to look up at, coarse as timber land, to visit; and below, edged with firs and pines, too large for the masts of frigates, but dwarfed from above into bushes and tufts. Here garlanded with cataracts, that hang in bridal veils and flutter on the breeze, he should look up two thousand feet to see rivers darting over the brink, to flow and flow and flow, in terror into splinters of watery wrath, exploding in pyrotechnics of fluid rockets, as if diamonds and pearls had suddenly taken on the qualities of shells and gunpowder. If these sublime combinations of rocks and waters, of chasms and precipices, over which beauty had poured her oil, and "smoothed the raven down of darkness till it smiled," did not suffice to awaken that pleasing terror, that ecstatic pain, that purifies and exalts the sensitive soul, I would remand the insensate wretch, whose heart was dead, to the California Gehenna, and after treating him with a course of sulphur, alum, magnesia, and epsom salts fresh from your great subterranean apothecary-shop at the Geysers—after riding him bare-back on the Hog's Back, not in the safe-keeping of Mr. Foss, fling him at last into the Witches' Cauldron, to be converted, not from the hopeless errors of his ways, but into the acids and alkalies that compose a cynical and unadmiring biped of the genus homo.

The Human Figure.—The proportions of the human figure are strictly mathematical. The whole figure is six times the length of the foot. Whether the form be slender or plump, this rule holds good. Any deviation from it is a departure from the highest beauty of proportion. The Greeks made all their statues according to this rule. The face, from the highest point on the forehead, where the hair begins, to the chin is one-tenth of the statue. The hand, from the wrist to the middle finger, is the same. The chest is one-fourth; and from the nipple to the top of the head is the same. From the bottom of the chest to the highest point of the forehead is the seventh. If the length of the face, from the roots of the hair to the chin, be divided into three equal parts, the first division determines the place where the eyebrows meet and second the place where the nostrils. The navel is the centre part of the human body, and if a man should lie on his back with his arms extended, the periphery of the centre would touch the extremities of his hands and feet. The height from the feet to the top of the head is the same as the distance from the extremity of the fingers when the arms are extended.

In the French towns much frequented by the English, it is not unusual to find, at cafes and hotels, translations into English of the bills of fare. At a restaurant in Boulogne-sur-Mer, the following very usual notice to the carte had rather an unusual translation. The note is: "Les vins sont d'une qualite qui ne lasse rien a dtsirer," which being freely translated is: "The wines are of quality to suit the most fastidious;" but was thus rendered: "The wines are of that quality they leave you nothing to hope for."

Proverb.—A thousand probabilities will not make one truth.

DOMESTIC RECEIPTS.

Apple Snow Balls.—Obtain half a dozen large apples, pare them and cut them into quarters, taking care to remove the whole of the cores. When reconstructing the position of the apples, introduce into the cavities caused by ubstracting the cores. 1 clove and a thin slice of lemon-peel. Have 6 small pudding-cloths at hand, and ¼ lb. clean picked China rice, and cover the apples severally, one after the other, in an upright position, with rice, tying them up tight. Then pluce them in a large saucepan of scalding water, and let them hoil for 1 whole hour. On taking them up open the tops, and intermix with the fruit a little grated nutmeg, with butter and sugar to your taste. The above constitutes a wholesomo and nutritious course of food for childreu, and proves, witbal, an economical featuro iu the nursery bill of fare.

Imitation Oyster Soup.—If this be carefully made, it will very nearly equal the real oyster soup in flavor, and I should advise any lady who does not already know it, and wishes for an excellent soup, to try it. In the first place, a full quart of good white stock must be prepared, after which blanch 2 oz. of sweet almonds, and pound them to a paste, with a little water. Rub this paste through a cloth or sieve, with ¼ pint of rich milk. Then mix up together 2 table-spoonsful of anchovy sauce, 1 of vinegar, 1 of mushroom catsup, 3 of white wiue, a ¼ of nutmeg, grated, und the yelks of 2 eggs well beaten, and 1 table spoonful of arrow-root or fine flour. This mixture must be added to the stock, and also the almonds and cream, and the whole hoiled up together. The only seasoning should be pepper and mace.

A Pretty Supper Dish.—Have some semicircular tiu moulds, about the size and shape of the half of a small orange; prepare some corn starch in the plan usually udopted for the corn starch blanc-mauge, and fill these little moulds therewith when it is still warm, taking eare to dip the moulds in cold water beforehand, to prevent the mixture from sticking to them. When cold turn out, and with a little gum-water, or sugar and gum-water, stick the halves together, forming shiny opaque balls; then with a brush and some extract of cochineal, carefully tiuge one side, shading the color according to taste; arrange these on a dish, in a little pyramid, as you would do with apples, placing leaves or flowers in the interstices. If nicely managed, and any careful cook could do it, this will prove a charming dish, the oswego balls looking like the loveliest of love-apples.

DOMESTIC HINTS.

Hints on a Wedding Breakfast.—The bride is of course banded in first by the bridegroom, but it is not usual for the bridesmaids to follow them immediately. The older members of the company take the precedence, commencing usually with the parents of the newly-married couple. The most attractive cavaliers are generally set apart for the bridesmaids, who are handed by them to the breakfast, after the principal married guests, and before others of the younger portion of the company. It is usual, for the bride's mother to sit next to the bridegroom, and his father by the side of the bride; the lady's mother having been taken to breakfast by the gentleman's father and vice versa.

A correspondent says: "Let me describe some very pretty curtains which I have lately seen. The curtains were of plain book muslin, long and full. At the top and bottom and down both sides was placed, close to the edge, a plaiting "à la vielle" of book muslin, about four inches wide. This was sewn to the curtains, leaving a frill, about half-an-inch wide, on either side. Above the two lines of sewing was placed a narrow plaiting of deep rose-colored ribbon, and a broader ribbon of the same color was run underneath the plaiting. The usual fringe depending from the curtain cornice was omitted, the full plaiting just appearing below the gilt cornice. The curtains were tied up with broad ribbon in a large bow, which is a much prettier plan for muslin curtains than the old-fashioned cord. In the same room with these charming curtains was a pretty device for hiding that very ugly object—the fire place. A large sheet of looking-glass filled up the space, and some flowers, in pots, were grouped at the base. The glass might be expensive, to begin with, but, with care, would last a lifetime, and, if expense is not an object, I can vouch for the excellent effect of the mirror and flowers."

To Wash Lace.—Dissolve in warm water a piece of spermaceti about the size of a small walnut, and also a bit of white wax not quite so large. Let the saucepan stand on the stove, and, having put in the lace, let it stew until the color becomes good. When it is taken out of the water, it must be pulled out until it is dry, but never ironed. The same plan may be pursued with crochet work. Use luke-warm water and plenty of soap. Do not rub or wring, only dab your lace about, and gently squeeze it out. Soap again and squeeze again till clean. Do not let it be longer in the water than you can help to clean it. Then rinse perfectly. Your last rinsing water must be unsullied by the immersion of your laces. Fill a teacup with blue water (the bright powder-blue is best), und add half a teaspoonful of liquid drawing gum. Let the lace remain a few moments, squeeze it out gently, pick out each piece nicely, lay them separately on a clean cloth, and fold it up. Have a hot iron, lay your lace on a handkerchief placed over the ironing blanket doubled four times, pick it out very exactly and then iron, taking care to pick out and iron out every piece like new, and raise it well by a moderate pressure.

To whiten lace—After washing, before rinsing, soap well; put it in a jug, pour on boiling water, cover the jug and let it stand awhile.

To whiten fine articles much discolored.—After well washing, soak all day in the deepest possible blue water. At dark lay it out on the grass, and leave all night; then rinse well. If still yellow repeat the process, and leave it out another night or two in the dew.

EVERY FAMILY SHOULD HAVE A SEWING-MACHINE and of the many styles now before the public, none combine so many excellent features as the "Grover & Baker." We find this machine alone adapted to the elegant embroidery which has become so popular this season—which advantage, aside from all others, is sufficient to commend it to all ladies contemplating the purchase of a sewing-machine.

MR. CHRISTIAN PFISTER has the honor of calling public attention to his great assortment of Perfumery, Brushes, fine Hair-pins, Hair of all lengths and colors, Peruques, Toupes, Combs—tortoise-shell, buffalo and Irish horn, ivory and rubber; Cravats of all kinds; Jouvin's Gloves, ladies' and gentlemens'; silk Suspenders and commen ones; Shirts and Collars; new styles of Head Dresses, etc. Having made new arrangements with Paris houses, it is within his power to offer to his numerous customers superior advantages over any others in the trade. Six artist coiffeurs will always be found ready for business in the gentlemen's room. A special apartment is provided for the coiffure of ladies.

RICHES HAVE WINGS.—Nothing illustrates this more forcibly than the recent fall in mining Stocks. Therefore, provide a certainty for your family in the future by insuring your life in the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company—cash assets, $6,500,000.

BIGELOW & BRO., Agents,
Over Parrott's Bank.
'y30-1m

Canton Tea Store, Established 1858.

GEO. S. HASKELL & CO.

IMPORTERS,
WHOLESALE AND RETAIL DEALERS
— IN —
JAPAN AND CHINA TEAS,
AND
GROCERIES.

Store fronting on
514 Market & 15 Sutter St.
THREE DOORS
BELOW THE MARKET HOUSE,
San Francisco.

Our Motto, "Large Sales at Small Profits for Cash.

FAMILY NOTICE.

Bowen Brothers,

COR. MONTGOMERY AND CALIFORNIA STREETS,
SAN FRANCISCO.

Offer for sale:

Barton & Guesten's Salad Oil, the best in the world.
Boneless Sardines; a great luxury.
English Potted Meats.
Anchovy and Shrimp Paste.
Condensed Milk, preserved with refined Sugar hermetically sealed in cans for Army and Travelers' use. Its purity is guaranteed.
Bent's Water, Butter, Milk, Wine and Graham Crackers.
English, Stilton, Cheshire and Holland Cheese.
English Soups, assorted.
Pate de Foie Gras.
French Truffles and Mushrooms.
Spanish and French Olives, in kegs.
Spiced Oysters.
Dutch Herrings and Sardells.
English and American Bloaters.
Stuffed Olives and Mangoes.
Mess Mackerel.
Cider Vinegar.
Teas of every variety, imported expressly for our Family Trade.
Sugars of every kind direct from the Manufactory.

WINES AND LIQUORS,
Direct from Bond, Wholesale or Retail.
au6-tf

SELLING OFF,
TO CLOSE BUSINESS,
ON ACCOUNT OF LEAVING FOR THE EAST.

ROSENBLATT'S
Palace of Fashion,
Number 125 Montgomery street.
OPPOSITE THE OCCIDENTAL HOTEL.

Branch, 125 J street, between Fourth and Fifth streets, Sacramento.

WILL SELL THE ENTIRE RICH STOCK OF REAL LACE Collars, Sleeves, Pocket Handkerchiefs, Hoop Skirts, Russia Leather Bags, Hosiery, Fancy Boxes, Fans, Portemonnaies, and Silk, Velvet, Cloth and Opera Cloaks,
AT HALF THE USUAL PRICES.

Real Point Lace Collars at - - - - $2 50
French Corsets - - - - - - - - - 1 00

STORE TO LET, and FIXTURES FOR SALE.
se24-1m

H. LUCKE,
BOOTMAKER, AND IMPORTER
—OF—
FRENCH BOOTS, SHOES AND GAITERS OF THE LATEST PARISIAN MAKE AND MODE.

Lady customers can have their measures forwarded and their shoes made in Paris in the latest style and by the most celebrated manufacturers, at moderate rates.

No. 648 Washington street, below Kearny,
SIGN OF THE GOLDEN BOOT. jy30-3m

SAN FRANCISCO AND SAN JOSE RAILROAD.
CHANGE OF TIME.

On and after OCTOBER 1st, 1864, Passenger Trains of the San Francisco and San Jose Railroad Company will run as follows:

Leave San Francisco at 8:30 A. M., 10:30 A. M., and 4 P. M.
Leave San Jose at 8:10 A. M. and 3:40 P. M.
SUNDAY TRAINS
Leave San Francisco at 8.30 and 10:30 A. M. and 4 P. M.
Leave San Jose at 8:10 A. M. and 3.40 and 6:30 P. M.
FREIGHT TRAINS
Leave daily (Sundays excepted) as follows: San Francisco at 4:45 P. M.; San Jose at 6 A. M.

A. H. HOUSTON,
se General Superintendent.

MARKET STREET RAILROAD.
CHANGE OF TIME TABLE.

ON AND AFTER APRIL 1, 1864, Trains will start from the City and the Mission as follows:
Between the hours of 8:20 A. M. and 6 P. M., every 40 minutes, instead of, as heretofore, every 30 minutes, thus

FROM THE MISSION.

9:40	10:20	11:00	11:40

FROM THE CITY.

10:00	10:40	11:20	12:00

And so on till 6 o'clock.

Before 9 A. M. and after 6 P. M., the running will be the same as before.
my28 F. McCOPPIN, Superintendent.

QUINCY HALL
Clothing Emporium!

THE Largest and Finest Store in the State is QUINCY HALL, 545, 547, and 549 Washington street, where can be found clothing of every description, of the finest quality and latest style. Hats, Caps and Furnishing Goods.
sc3-tf

TYLER BROTHERS,
Importers, Wholesale and Retail Dealers in
School Books, Stationery,
PHOTOGRAPH ALBUMS,
PORTFOLIOS JUVENILE BOOKS, CHILDREN'S PICTURE BOOKS, FANCY ARTICLES, etc.,
NO. 632 WASHINGTON STREET,
SAN FRANCISCO.
au27-tf

CARPETS.

WE have just received and are now opening
NEW AND MAGNIFICENT STYLES OF WILTON
—AND—
Royal Velvet Carpets,

The finest Goods ever Imported into this State, to which we invite particular attention. Also a New Stock of
BRUSSELS CARPETS,
THREE-PLY AND INGRAIN CARPETS,
OIL CLOTHS, ALL WIDTHS AND STYLES,
PAPER HANGINGS, BROCATELLE CURTAIN REPS, SILK DAMASK,
WINDOW SHADES, MATS, ETC., ETC.

House-keepers and others in want of the above goods, will find our stock the most complete, and our
PRICES THE LOWEST IN THE CITY!

KENNEDY & BELL,
Southwest cor. Montgomery and California streets.
se24

NELSON'S EXTRACT OF
Roses And Rosemary.

THE FOLLOWING IS A BRIEF NOTICE of some of its principal virtues, as a mild stimulative, corrective and preservative agent for the hair:

Infancy.—It insinuates its balsamic properties into the pores of the head, nourishes the hair in its embryo state, accelerates its growth, sustains it in maturity, and continues the possession of healthy vigor, silky softness, and luxuriant redundancy, to the latest period of human life. Genial and purifying, it dispels all scurf and impurity, and renders the use of the fine comb unnecessary.

The Beard, Whiskers, and Mustachios.—Its extraordinary power in promoting the growth of the hair is singularly displayed in creating these ornaments of manhood.

Curl and Embellishment.—In dressing the hair nothing can equal its effect, rendering the hair so admirably soft that it will lie in any direction, producing beautifully flowing curls, and, by the transcendant lustre it imparts, rendering the coiffure inexpressibly attractive.

Grey Hair.—Its nourishing properties are eminently successful in the prevention of Grey Hair, and in numerous instances, in the restoration to its original color.

Baldness.—Its productive powers are constantly and surprisingly shown in cases of Baldness, so that in numerous instances where other specifics have been tried in vain, this celebrated Oil has effected a complete restoration of Beautiful Hair.

Sea-Bathing and Violent Exercise.—After indulging in either of these, so apt to exhaust the nourishing matter secreted at the roots or bulbs of the hair, the Roses and Rosemary will be found most efficacious, both in preserving and in immediately restoring the hair to its usual appearance of health with renovated brightness.

Its invaluable properties have obtained the patronage of every Court of the civilized world; and the high esteem in which it is universally held, together with numerous testimonials constantly received of its efficacy, affords the best and surest proofs of its merits.

Sold by all Druggists, and by H. P. WAKELEE, corner of Montgomery and Sutter streets, and corner of Bush and Montgomery streets. se24

LAWRENCE & COMPANY'S
PATENT IMPROVED
Flesh Gloves and Straps!

For Producing a Healthy State of the System by Friction, Without the Risk of Tearing the Skin, as all the Ordinary Horse-Hair Gloves are liable to do.

THE GREAT VALUE OF THE HORSE-HAIR Renovator as a therapeutic agent, when applied to the human body, is now too well known to every one who has paid the least attention to the importance of a healthy action of the Skin, to require further comment.

The superior advantages of the Patent Flesh Gloves and Straps, manufactured under this Patent, are that, by a peculiar process in the machinery employed in their manufacture, the points of the Hair are brought perpendicularly to the surface, thereby removing the liability to tear the Skin (a very general complaint against the ordinary kind,) rendering them more pleasant to use, at the same time enabling the process of friction to be much more effectually performed; they are, indeed, a positive luxury to use, apart from their sanitary effects.

The peculiar fabric manufactured expressly for the use of Ladies deserves their special attention; it has been highly recommended by the most eminent of the medical profession, and given universal satisfaction to those who have used it.

For sale by
H. P. WAKELEE,
sc24 Cor. Montgomery and Sutter streets.

THE OXFORD WASHING PAD.

This article, suggested by an Oxford man, for removing Stains from the Hands, being found to thoroughly answer the purpose, has established fair pretensions to become of universal use, which it is rapidly doing.

Manufactured by LAWRENCE & CO., and sold by
H. P. WAKELEE,
se24 Cor. Montgomery and Sutter streets.

PHINEAS BANNING,
FORWARDING AND COMMISSION AGENT,
WILMINGTON & LOS ANGELES,
DEALER IN
LUMBER, COAL, IRON, FLOUR, GRAIN, etc., etc.,
And Proprietor of the United States Mail Stage Line between Los Angeles and Wilmington. sc24

SELLING OFF,

TO CLOSE BUSINESS,

ON ACCOUNT OF LEAVING FOR THE EAST.

ROSENBLATT'S

Palace of Fashion,

Number 125 Montgomery street.

OPPOSITE THE OCCIDENTAL HOTEL.

Branch, 125 J street, between Fourth and Fifth streets, Sacramento.

WILL SELL THE ENTIRE RICH STOCK OF REAL LACE Collars, Sleeves, Pocket Handkerchiefs, Hoop Skirts, Russia Leather Bags, Hosiery, Fancy Boxes, Fans, Portemonnaies, and Silk, Velvet, Cloth and Opera Cloaks,

AT HALF THE USUAL PRICES.

Real Point Lace Collars at - - - - $2 50
Freuch Corsets . - - - - - - - 1 00

☞ STORE TO LET, and FIXTURES FOR SALE.

se24-1m

BOYS! BOYS! BOYS!

NOW IS THE TIME!

H. M. LOCKWOOD & CO.,

New No. 624) ‖ CLAY STREET, ‖ (Old No 176

Have received a Large Stock of

GENTS' AND BOYS' CLOTHING

—AND—

FURNISHING GOODS,

Which they are selling

AT VERY LOW PRICES.

Every Garment warranted. All are invited to call and examine our goods.

H. M. LOCKWOOD & CO.,

my28 624 Clay street, San Francisco.

H. LUCKE,

BOOTMAKER, AND IMPORTER

—OF—

FRENCH BOOTS, SHOES AND GAITERS OF THE LATEST PARISIAN MAKE AND MODE.

Lady customers can have their measures forwarded and their shoes made in Paris in the latest style and by the most celebrated manufacturers, at moderate rates.

No. 648 Washington street, below Kearny,

SIGN OF THE GOLDEN BOOT. jy30-3m

DR. GEORGE F. WOODWARD,

SURGEON U. S. PENSION BUREAU.

OFFICE, 127 MONTGOMERY STREET,

Opposite the Occidental Hotel, San Francisco.

jy30-tf

THE MOST EXTENSIVE,

BEST SELECTED, CHEAPEST,

—AND—

LATEST STYLES

—OF—

Furniture.

GOODWIN & CO.,

No. 528 Washington street,

Are constantly receiving, and have on hand a large assortment of FINE ROSEWOOD, MAHOGANY, and BLACK WALNUT PARLOR, LIBRARY and CHAMBER SUITS, with DINING ROOM SUITS TO ORDER.

☞ We guarantee both Price and Quality satisfactory to our Patrons.

GOODWIN & CO.,

ju18 No. 528 Washington street.

NOTICE TO SHIPPERS

—TO—

Red Bluff.

ON AND AFTER TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 20th, the steamers of the California Steam Navigation Company

WILL LEAVE SACRAMENTO

FOR RED BLUFF,

EVERY TUESDAY AND FRIDAY,

At 7 o'clock, A. M.

se24-tf J. WHITNEY, Jr., President.

OCCIDENTAL HOTEL—Corner Montgomery and Bush streets, San Francisco.

This House possesses all the requirements of a FIRST CLASS HOTEL, its spacious READING ROOM, with large MINERAL CABINET and extensive COLLECTION OF SPECIMENS from the different Mining Regions of the Pacific Coast—BRANCH TELEGRAPH OFFICE connecting with Lines throughout the country—and NEWS STAND—all contributing to make it the Headquarters and Home for the Californian business man and tourist.

The TABLE of this House shall not be excelled by any.

BOARD, THREE DOLLARS PER DAY.

LEWIS LELAND & CO.,

my28 Proprietors.

SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES!

Motto—The Singer Sewing Machines are the only machines that can sew all kinds of cloth, and with all kinds of thread.

THE SINGER LETTER A TRANSVERSE SHUTTLE FAMILY MACHINES,

With recent improvements for

HEMMING, FELLING,
TUCKING, GATHERING,
BINDING, CORDING,
QUILTING, BRAIDING, etc.,

Are unrivalled for Family and light Manufacturing purposes. We invite the special attention of ladies to the Folding Top Cabinets, our latest improvement. They are the most useful, convenient and novel Cabinets yet introduced, and are worthy of examination.

SINGER'S STANDARD

MANUFACTURING MACHINES,

For Tailoring, Boot and Shoe Making, Harness and Carriage Trimming, are the cheapest, best and only Machine worthy of patronage for general purposes.

☞ Call and examine, or send for a pamphlet.

THE SINGER MANUF. COMPANY,

No. 129 Montgomery street.

WM. BRODERICK, Agent. se3-3m

FORTY-FOUR FIRST PREMIUMS

IN 1863!

THERE IS BUT ONE

FIRST

PREMIUM SEWING MACHINE.

The GROVER & BAKER SEWING MACHINE has been awarded Twenty-three First Premiums at State Fairs, and Twenty-one at City and County Fairs, in 1863, making Forty-four in all.

R. G. BROWN, Agent.

my28 329 Montgomery Street.

$2,000 REWARD!

A REWARD OF TWO THOUSAND DOLLARS IS OFfered by the subscriber to any person who will discover or produce a better article for dressing and preserving the HAIR than the

TRICOMALICUM!!

known in California for many years for its wonderful properties.

The TRICOMALICUM, composed of substances tonic and strengthening, possesses the priceless quality of renewing the Hair, of destroying dandruff, and of dressing and keeping it in a perfectly healthy state.

PRINCIPAL DEPOT at the store of the Inventor,

CHRISTIAN PFISTER,

se3-tf No. 227 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

TELEGRAPHIC EXCHANGE

—ON—

NEW YORK,

PAYABLE IN GOLD,

For sale in sums to suit by

au20-tf WM. T. COLEMAN & CO.

EXCHANGE

ON NEW YORK,

In sums to suit, at the lowest rates, for sale by

au20-tf WM. T. COLEMAN & CO.

GREAT TRIUMPH!!

STEINWAY & SONS

Were awarded the FIRST PRIZE MEDAL at the late great INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION AT LONDON, over the two hundred and sixty-nine Pianos entered for competition from all parts of the world.

The Special Correspondent of the New York Times says: "Messrs. Steinway & Sons' indorsement by the Jurors is emphatic, and stronger and more to the point than that of any European maker."

A constant supply of the above superior instruments can be found at the Agent's,

M. GRAY, 613 Clay street.

PIANO TUNING done by a first-class Workman, from Steinway & Son's Factory, New York. my28

COMMERCIAL STEAM PRINTING

HOUSE.

FRANCIS, VALENTINE & CO.,

517 CLAY and 514 COMMERCIAL STREETS.

Every description of BOOK, JOB and POSTER PRINTING done in the best style and at the lowest rates.

BOOK-BINDING and RULING done to order.

GREGORY YALE,

ATTORNEY AT LAW,

OFFICE—On second floor of Sather & Co.'s Bank, corner Montgomery and Commercial streets, Nos. 2, 3 and 4, San Francisco. jy2

A LADY WISHES TO EXCHANGE LESsons in French, Music or Painting, for a room and board. Address "E. D. W.," care of W. H. BANCROFT, 609 Montgomery street. au13

REDINGTON & CO.'S ESSENCE OF Jamaica Ginger!

This valuable compound, which is now regarded as one of the most popular remedies in the domestic practice for various complaints of the digestive organs, such as Dyspepsia, Nausea, etc., is prepared solely from the WHITE JAMAICA GINGER, which is the best of all the varieties in use. In the preparation of

REDINGTON & CO.'S

ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER,

Great care is taken to have none but select Root, and to manufacture it in air-tight vessels, thus preventing the evaporation of its delicate essential oil, and preserving the true aroma of the Ginger. It thereby contains in its concentrated form all the valuable properties of the Jamaica Ginger, and is guaranteed to be free from any impurities whatever

It is a grateful stimulant and carminative, giving warmth and tone to the stomach equal to Brandy, without any of its injurious effects.

It will cure Nausea, caused by riding in railroad cars, or from sea-sickness, or other causes.

Miners and others who are exposed to the heat of the Sun often whilst working in cold water, should never be without

REDINGTON & CO.'S

ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER.

As by taking it as a tonic two or three times a day, it is almost a sure preventive to Chills and Fever; and to those who are farming the rich bottom lands of California it is likewise invaluable as a tonic, and should invariably be taken in the early morning before going to the fields, at the mid-day lunch, and before leaving off work at night.

Ask for REDINGTON & CO.'S ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER, and take no other, if you would always have a Pure and Reliable article.

An excellent external application for Gout, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, &c.

REDINGTON & CO., Proprietors,
416 and 418 Front street,
my28 San Francisco.

RAREY'S CONDITION POWDERS.

THE MOST POWERFUL AND BENEFICIAL AGENT known on the Stomach, Blood, Lungs and Bowels of HORSES, MULES, CATTLE, AND STOCK of all descriptions.

GREAT BENEFIT TO HARD-WORKING HORSES.

All diseased Stock SPEEDILY and CERTAINLY CURED; healthy Stock will be brought into the very HIGHEST STATE of PERFECTION by giving them a SPOONFUL, wee

NO LIVERY STABLE SHOULD BE WITHOUT

RAREY'S

CELEBRATED CONDITION POWDERS!

All FARMERS and RANCHMEN should use constantly

RAREY'S

CELEBRATED CONDITION POWDERS

TEAMSTERS and STAGE COMPANIES everywhere should keep constantly on hand and freely use

RAREY'S

CELEBRATED CONDITION POWDERS!

They are equal to a Life Insurance on all Stock, as will be fully appreciated on trial by all True Economists.

REDINGTON & CO., Sole Agents,

my28 416 and 418 Front Street, San Francisco.

DEATH'S DOINGS!

THE DEAD TELL NO TALES, 'TIS SAID. WHAT A pity 'tis 'tis true; for if they could, what a "skodaddling" there would be among the numerous quacks and impostors of the present time.

THE MEDICAL FACULTY

May differ in relation to the treatment of disease, but there is very little diversity of opinion among them as to its origin. The philanthropist does not contend that any man becomes at once a

DRUNKARD OR A THIEF.

Nor does the well informed physician maintain that any one becomes at once an invalid. He knows that almost all diseases are of slow growth; that the seeds of disease are often sown at a remote period, and only await some change of climate or condition of the individual to manifest themselves.

A COMMON COLD!

Is the forerunner of many a fatal disease; a leading symptom of Consumption; a general disturber of the human system, and

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP

Is the greatest barrier that can be thrown in the way of its progress. Its timely use will ward off Consumption, cure the Asthma, Bronchitis, Sore Throat, and the thousand and one other ills so sure to follow in its wake when too long neglected or improperly treated.

REDINGTON & CO., Agents,
San Francisco.

And for sale everywhere. se10-tf

ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM!

THE REMEDY FOR CURING

CONSUMPTION, COUGHS, COLDS,

ASTHMA, CROUP,

DISEASES OF THE THROAT, BRONCHITIS,

Pains and Oppression of the Chest or Lungs,

DIFFICULT BREATHING,

AND ALL THE

DISEASES OF THE PULMONARY ORGANS.

ITS ACTION IS EXPECTORANT, ALTERATIVE, SUDORIFIC, SEDATIVE, DIAPHORETIC and DIURETIC, which renders it one of the most valuable remedies known for curing diseases of the lungs. It excites expectoration, and causes the lungs to throw off the phlegm or mucus, changes the secretions and PURIFIES THE BLOOD; heals the irritated parts; gives strength to the digestive system, brings the liver to its proper action, and imparts, beyond the possibility of doubt, strength to the whole system. Such is the immediate and satisfactory effect, that it is warranted to break up the most distressing cough in a few hours' time, if not of too long standing. It is warranted to give entire satisfaction even in the most confirmed cases of Consumption. It is warranted not to produce costiveness, which is the case with most remedies, or affect the head, as it contains no Opium in any form. It is warranted to be perfectly harmless to the most delicate child, although it is an active and powerful remedy for restoring the system. There is no real necessity for so many deaths by Consumption, when ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM will prevent it, if only taken in time.

Sold by all Druggists. Price $1 per bottle.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,
Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,
an27 Corner of Clay, San Francisco.

DR. STEPHENS'

CELEBRATED

Eye Salve!

AN INFALLIBLE REMEDY FOR

DISEASES OF THE EYE,

Acute or chronic, ulceration of the lachrymal glands, film and weakness of the vision from any cause; it is the most effectual remedy ever discovered.

Sold by all Druggists.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,
Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,
nu27 Corner of Clay, San Francisco.

CATARRH!

DR. H. GOODALE'S

Catarrh Remedy!

FOR CENTURIES CATARRH HAS DEFIED THE skill of physicians and surgeons. No medical work contains a prescription that will eradicate it. Nothing save DR. GOODALE'S REMEDY will break it up, radically destroying the principle of the disease, and precluding the possibility of a relapse. Medical men have attempted to explain what it is, but admit that they have not discovered its antidote. Dr. Goodale offers this simple definition of its character: It is a disorder which he DOES CURE and they DO NOT. This is the great fact which it imports the sufferer to know, and a single trial will establish it beyond a question. Price, $1. Sold by all Druggists.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,
Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,
au27 Corner of Clay, San Francisco.

KENDALL'S AMBOLINE!

THE GREAT

UNEQUALLED

PREPARATION

FOR

RESTORING, INVIGORATING, BEAUTIFYING

AND

DRESSING

THE

Hair!

IT IS A STIMULATING, OILY EXTRACT OF BARKS and Herbs. It will cure all diseases of the scalp and itching of the head, entirely eradicates dandruff, prevents the Hair from falling out, or from turning prematurely gray, causing it to grow thick and long. It is entirely different from all hair preparations, and may be relied on.

Put up in boxes containing two bottles—Price $1.

☞ Sold by all Druggists.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,
Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,
Corner of Clay, San Francisco.

REMOVAL.

INSURANCE AGINST FIRE.

THE NORTH BRITISH AND MERCANTILE
INSURANCE COMPANY
OF LONDON AND EDINBUROH.

ESTABLISHED, 1809.

Capital, $10,000,000. Accumulated Funds, January 1, 1864, $11,169,140. Deposit in California under State law, $75,000. Limit on single Risks, $100,000. Bankers, Messrs Talbant & Co. Fire Policies on buildings and contents, throughout the Pacific States and Territories, granted on the most liberal terms. Losses promptly adjusted and paid here in U. S. Gold coin.

Office removed to 414 California street, opposite Alsop & Co. WM. H. TILLINGHAST, Agent.
au19-3m

MANHATTAN FIRE INSURANCE
COMPANY OF NEW YORK.

Cash Capital and Surplus.....$750,000
Deposit in San Francisco.....$75,000

COLUMBIA FIRE INSURANCE CO.,
OF NEW YORK.

Cash Capital and Surplus.....$600,000
Deposit in San Francisco.....$75,000

THE ABOVE MENTIONED WELL-KNOWN and responsible Companies, having complied with the law enacted at the last session of the Legislature, and deposited with Messrs. Donohoe, Ralston & Co.

$75,000 EACH,

As additional security to Policy-holders, will continue to insure
BUILDINGS,
MERCHANDISE,
FURNITURE,
And other property in California, Oregon and Nevada Territory, against Loss or Damage by Fire, upon the most favorable terms.

All Losses promptly paid in United States Gold Coin.

R. B. SWAIN & CO., Agents,
jn25-tf 206 Front street, corner of California.

R. G. SNEATH,
408 FRONT STREET, SAN FRANCISCO,
Importer and Wholesale Dealer in
GROCERIES, PROVISIONS, FLOUR, RICE
TOBACCOS, LIQUORS, ETC.

Branch House, - - SNEATH & BOARMAN, - - Rod Bluff.

Forwarding Agent, D. W. EARL, Sacramento, who will receive and fill orders for all kinds of Goods on my account, and keep a large stock of Flour, Barley, Potatoes, Ground Feed, etc., etc. No charge for forwarding.

ALMADEN QUICKSILVER!

Orders for Goods not in my line furnished customers without extra charge. Orders for Goods in the Eastern markets attended to promptly. Daily Prices Current furnished when desired.
Orders respectfully solicited. jul1-1m

CONTINENTAL HOTEL,
SAN JOSE.

GEORGE T. BROMLEY.....Proprietor.

As a desirable place of resort for health or recreation, the above Hotel is not surpassed in the State.
Excellent accommodations for families, by the day, week, or month, on reasonable terms.
jn25

REMOVAL.
A. EDDY'S
Dancing Academy,
Platt's (Middle) Hall.

PUPILS TAUGHT IN ONE-HALF THE TIME OF elsewhere.
CLASSES—MONDAYS and FRIDAYS. Ladies at half-past 2 P. M.; Gents at half-past 7 P. M.
CHILDREN'S CLASSES—On SATURDAYS, at 2 P. M.; also, on WEDNESDAYS, at half-past 3 P. M.
Private instructions given separately or to classes, to suit the convenience of applicants.
SELECT SOIREES on alternate weeks. au6-tf

CARRINGTON & CO'S
GENERAL PURCHASING AGENCY,
No. 40 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Personal Orders, small or large, and for articles of every descriptions, PROMPTLY and carefully attended to.

Who wants anything from New York?
THIS AGENCY
Enables Country Residents to make purchases in the City without troubling busy friends, or mere acquaintances.

IF YOU WANT
Books, Prints, Clothing, Instruments, Music, Tools, Weapons, Sporting Implements, Fancy Stock, Jewelry, Silver or Plated Ware, Wines, Cigars, Fine Groceries, Furniture; in short, any Article, large or small, singly or in quantity, for Ladies' or Gentlemen's use or wear,
or for Dealers' Supplies, from a seal-ring to a steam-engine—a Cameo or a Cashmere; lace or leather,

SEND ON YOUR ORDERS.

We can fill them on better terms than you could obtain if here; while our commission, even on large orders, is much less than the expense of visiting the city in person.
Orders under $10, from places within reach of our daily Expresses, (except for perishable articles,) can be paid for on delivery by Express; others should be remitted for, either direct, or through some city friend to be paid when filled. Every order should be as clearly worded as possible.

Orders may be given in French, Spanish or German.

COMMISSION CHARGE, - - - FIVE PER CENT.
Address:
CARRINGTON & CO.,
au6 40 Broadway, N. Y.

REOPENED FOR THE SEASON.

THE CRYSTAL SPRINGS HOTEL,
Situated four miles from the San Mateo Railroad depot, in a most splendid valley, surrounded with large, beautiful, natural trees, is now open for the public. The road from San Mateo to the house has been recently macadamized, making it the finest drive in California. The House and Cottages have been refitted and thoroughly renovated. New spring beds and every modern improvement have been added to the sleeping department. The larder, as usual, contains all the delicacies of the season. Stages leave San Mateo depot on the arrival of the trains for Crystal Springs.
A fine stable is now opened at San Mateo by Messrs. Byrnes & Ames, who will furnish horses and carriages, or saddle horses, at low rates, to the public. Parties wishing rooms or meals, on arrival, can engage them by telegraph, via San Mateo.
jn11-tf TONY OAKES, Proprietor.

McRUER & MERRILL,
WHOLESALE AUCTION HOUSE,
204 and 206 California street.

Regular Sale Days - - - WEDNESDAYS and SATURDAYS.
(Advances on Consignments.)

NOTICE!
From this date Mr. A. P. EVERETT has an interest in our business. McRUER & MERRILL.
San Francisco, October 20, 1862.

A. P. EVERETT, - - - - - - - - - Auctioneer.
jul1-3m

SQUARZA'S PUNCH.
First Premium, Sacramento, 1862.
First Premium at San Francisco District Fair, 1863.
First and Special Premium, Sacramento, 1863.
Wholesale and Retail.
my28 44 Leidesdorff street, San Francisco.

EDWARD BOSQUI & CO.,
517
CLAY STREET, SAN FRANCISCO.
BOOKBINDERS, PAPER-RULERS, AND
ACCOUNT-BOOK MANUFACTURERS.
Blanks of all kinds printed and ruled to any desired pattern. my28

MRS. HENDRICKS,
No. 629 MISSION STREET,
Devotes herself exclusively to
EMBROIDERY, STAMPING AND PINKING,
And she does more work than any other person in her line. She has by far the best collection and the largest assortment of stamps in the city. Her patterns are the most carefully drawn, and her marking is the evenest and the easiest to work, especially for those who are not very skilful. The coloring of all others rubs out, and the figures, if not traced round with thread, are effaced before the work is done; but Mrs. Hendricks' coloring, on all kinds of stuff, is warranted to defy rubbing, though it can be easily washed out. She is an engraver and engraves her own stamps, and thus is enabled to supply herself with all the latest patterns fashionable in Eastern and European cities.
Any customer can get a new pattern cut without charge, if Mrs. Hendricks can use it afterwards. Although there are many others in the same business in San Francisco, all acknowledge the superiority of Mrs. Hendricks, and send the most difficult work to her. Ladies are invited to call and examine her patterns.
☞ Remember the number, 629 Mission street, San Francisco. jy30tf*

DR. J. H. HATCH,

DENTIST,
Graduate of the Pennsylvania College of Dental Surgery.
All operations portaining to the profession thoroughly and skillfully performed. Entire satisfaction in all cases guaranteed.
Office, 645 Clay street, between Montgomery and Kearny street, San Francisco. au27

SAVE YOUR

E. F. BUNNELL, D. D. S.,
ROOMS, NO. 51 SECOND STREET.

DR. BUNNELL WILL SAVE EVERY TOOTH THAT ACHES from exposure of the nerve, or refund the charge for the operation, and extract each tooth without pay in EVERY case of failure. Teeth filled with gold, artificial bone, and golden lithodeon. Plate teeth on vulcanite and gold enameled base, of surpassing beauty and comfort.
☞ All work warranted. Price low.☜
N. B.—More than 1,000 aching teeth have been saved in succession, without the loss of one. nu27-3m

REMOVAL.
DR. JOHN HEALD,

DENTIST,
OFFICE AND RESIDENCE: STEVENSON HOUSE,
Montgomery street, corner of California. Entrance on both streets. Rooms 12 and 13. jy30-3m

WONDERFUL TRIUMPH
IN AMERICAN DENTISTRY.
DR. BEERS & CO.,
617 Clay street,
ARE NOW MANUFACTURING THE NEW style of ARTIFICIAL TEETH so highly approved at the East, and which to be appreciated only requires to be seen. The Teeth, Gums and Plate are made of one entire piece of Porcelain without seam or joint, combining great strength and beauty with absolute purity and freedom from any metallic taste, while the coloring of the gums and the interior of the mouth are so perfect as to almost defy detection. All interested in the progress of the Arts are invited to examine samples of this work.
Superior Gold and Vulcanite Work also manufactured as usual, but at greatly reduced prices. jul8

THE CALIFORNIAN.

A PAPER FOR THE TIMES.

Devoted to Live Topics,

AND THE

BEST INTERESTS OF CALIFORNIA.

Is published

EVERY SATURDAY MORNING,

328 MONTGOMERY STREET.

Nothing will be spared that will enable THE CALIFORNIAN to appeal to the Public for support, not only as the

BEST JOURNAL ON THE PACIFIC COAST,

But also as being

THE EQUAL OF ANY ON THIS CONTINENT!

Paper of a superior quality and weight is being made

EXPRESSLY FOR THE CALIFORNIAN,

THE BEST TALENT OF THE STATE

Is employed upon THE CALIFORNIAN, and arrangements have been made with contributors abroad for

EASTERN AND FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE.

The voluntary notices bestowed by the press of the Eastern cities have been no less warm and congratulatory than those which we have received at the hands of our cotemporaries of the Pacific. Their verdict is unanimously in favor of

THE CALIFORNIAN,

and all join in pronouncing their unqualified approval of its unequalled merits.

Its reputation is now fully established. It is not

EXCELLED BY ANY LITERARY JOURNAL
on the Continent.

Let the people of the mountains and the valleys

BUY THE CALIFORNIAN!

Let every lover of choice literature throughout the States and Territories of the Pacific coast

READ THE CALIFORNIAN!

Let no family be without this paper, which, as an Eastern cotemporary remarks, is creditable to the people who sustain it. Therefore,

SUBSCRIBE
FOR THE
CALIFORNIAN!

THE TERMS OF THE CALIFORNIAN are $5 per year by mail to subscribers, invariably in advance; 50 cents per month served by carriers.

All communications and correspondence must be addressed to "THE CALIFORNIAN,"
Office, No. 328 Montgomery street,
SAN FRANCISCO.

FARRAND'S OSCILLATING
Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALLED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REduction and amalgamation of Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY.

As a guarantee of what this machine will do, I propose, with any gentleman who will produce an Amalgamator that will work the same amount of ore in the same number of hours, with the same outlay of power, and produce the equal result, to deposit the sum of FIVE HUNDRED DOLLARS each, the money so deposited to be drawn by the person who shall be declared to have produced the best result. The money (the $500) by whichever party won to be paid over to some one of the benevolent institutions in this State, to be named by the party losing. This proposition is not made with the view of detracting from the merits of any Amalgamator now before the public, but for the purpose of placing this valuable improvement before such persons as may be interested in quartz milling, and to whom the matter properly belongs.

I CHALLENGE COMPETITION.
CALL AND SEE THE MACHINES WORK!
W. D. FARRAND.
R. L. OGDEN, Agent, Southeast corner of Montgomery and California streets, San Francisco. jy30tf

JOSEPH A. DONOHOE, San Francisco. | EUGENE KELLY, New York.

DONOHOE, KELLY & CO.,
SAN FRANCISCO.
EUGENE KELLY & CO.,
NEW YORK.
Bankers.
EXCHANGE ON
NEW YORK,
BANK OF LONDON, - - - - London.
BANK OF IRELAND. jy2

LOCKE & MONTAGUE,
IMPORTERS OF
STOVES AND METALS,
Nos. 112 and 114 Battery street,
jy2 SAN FRANCISCO.

GEORGE B. MERRILL,
ATTORNEY AT LAW,
Office, 520 Montgomery street, (over Messrs. Sather & Co.'s Bank,)
SAN FRANCISCO.
Gives special attention to the Probate of Wills and the Administration of Estates.
nu20

JOHN GORMAN,
NOTARY PUBLIC AND CONVEYANCER,
No. 705 MONTGOMERY STREET,
(Near Washington,)
Metropolitan Block, SAN FRANCISCO.
jy9.

LEGAL.

ADMINISTRATOR'S SALE of Real ESTATE.

NOTICE IS HEREBY GIVEN, THAT IN PURSUANCE of an order of the Probate Court of the city and county of San Francisco, State of California, made on the 16th day of August, 1864, in the matter of the Estate of ANDREW ROBESON, deceased, the undersigned Administrator, with the will annexed, of said deceased, will sell to the highest bidder for cash, payable in United States gold coin, and subject to confirmation by said Probate Court, on MONDAY, the 10th day of OCTOBER, 1864, at 12 o'clock, noon, of that day, at No. 108 Front street, in said city and county, all the right, title and interest of the said Andrew Robeson at the time of his death, and all the right, title and interest that the said estate has, by law or otherwise, since acquired, other than or in addition to that of said deceased at the time of his death, in and to all that certain lot of land situated in said city and county, and described as follows:

Commencing at a point on the north line of Ellis street 77 1/2 feet west from the northwest corner of Mason and Ellis streets; thence running westerly along said line of Ellis street 20 feet, thence at a right angle northerly 60 feet, thence at a right angle easterly 20 feet, and thence at a right angle southerly 60 feet to the point of beginning.

And the said Administrator will receive offers or bids therefor at said place, No. 108 Front street, from this date till said 10th day of October, 1864.

EDWARD F. STONE,
Administrator, with the will annexed, of Andrew Robeson, deceased.
D. P. Barstow, Attorney for Administrator, 24 Montgomery Block. se10-5t

IN THE DISTRICT COURT of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco.—FANNY L. GREEN, Plaintiff, vs. ROBERT E. GREEN, Defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said city and county of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to ROBERT E. GREEN, Defendant: You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff, in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days, (exclusive of the day of service,) after the service on you of this Summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this District, within twenty days; otherwise, within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree dissolving the bonds of matrimony existing between the plaintiff and defendant, and permitting plaintiff to resume her maiden name of Fanny L. Brown, and for costs of suit and general relief. And you are hereby notified, that if you fail to appear and answer the said Complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and Seal of the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 25th day of August, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-four.

Seal and Int. Rev. Stamp. WM. LOEWY, Clerk.
By WM. R. SATTERLEE, Deputy Clerk.
J. D. Stevenson, Plaintiff's Attorney se3

REMOVAL.

LAWRENCE & HOUSEWORTH,
OPTICIANS,

IMPORTERS OF OPTICAL, MATHEMATICAL AND PHILOSOPHICAL INSTRUMENTS,

STEREOSCOPIC GOODS,

PHOTOGRAPHIC ALBUMS,

CARTES DE VISITE,

AND

JOSEPH RODGERS & SON'S

SUPERIOR CUTLERY,

HAVE REMOVED TO

No. 315 Montgomery street, bet. California and Pine.

(ESTABLISHED IN 1851,)

HAVE FOR SALE THE LARGEST STOCK ON THE PACIFIC COAST, consisting in part as follows:

720 dozen SPECTACLES, in Gold, Silver, Steel and Plated Frames.
305 dozen EYE GLASSES, in Gold, Silver, Steel, Horn, Shell and Rubber Frames.
150 dozen WIRE GAUZE GOGGLES.
300 dozen SPECTACLE GLASSES and BRAZILIAN PEBBLES.
350 dozen SPECTACLE and EYE GLASS CASES.

395	Opera and Marine Glasses,	20,500	Card Photographs,
75	Telescope and Spy Glasses,		Photographic Albums,
178	dozen Magnifying Glasses,	600	Album Pictures—in oil colors,
80	doz. Pocket Compasses,	50	doz. Union Card Frames,
325	Hand Stereoscopes,		Joseph Rodgers & Sou's CUTLERY,
74	Revolving Stereoscopes	100	doz. Table Knives,
1025	doz. Stereoscopic Views	260	doz. Pocket Knives,
	Drawing Instruments in German Silver and Brass,	120	doz. Razors,
		50	doz. Razor Strops,
	Boxwood and Ivory Scales,	130	doz. Scissors,
	Microscopes in every Style,		SCISSORS, in Cases,
25	Magnetic Machines for Medical purposes,	100	doz. Gyroscope Tops,
		169	doz. Thermometers,
	Aneroid Barometers,	25	doz. Hydrometers,
			Galvanic Batteries.

☞COUNTRY TRADERS will consult their own interest by examining our Stock and Prices before purchasing elsewhere.

 ORDERS FROM THE COUNTRY promptly executed.

☞CATALOGUES sent to any address FREE.

Address

LAWRENCE & HOUSEWORTH,
OPTICIANS,
315 MONTGOMERY STREET,
oc1 SAN FRANCISCO.

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

The following steamships will be despatched in the month of OCTOBER, 1864:

OCTOBER 3d - - - - - - - GOLDEN AGE
OCTOBER 13th, - - - - - - CONSTITUTION
OCTOBER 22d, - - - - - - - SACRAMENPO

From Folsom-street Wharf, at nine o'clock, A. M., punctually,

FOR PANAMA.

Passengers will be conveyed from Panama to Aspinwall by the PANAMA RAILROAD COMPANY, and from Aspinwall to New York by the ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

A. B. FORBES, Agent P. M. S. Co.,
oc1 Cor. Sacramento and Leidesdorff sts.

H. P. WAKELEE,

CORNER OF MONTGOMERY AND SUTTER STREETS,

IMPORTER OF

F. M. Farina's Cologne,
Lubin's Perfumes and Soaps,
Prout's Tooth and Hair Brushes,
Low's Old Windsor and Honey Soap,
Eau Lustrale, Pomades, Tooth Powders,

DRESSING CASES,

And other elegant articles for the the Toilet.

Agent for Nelson's Extract of ROSE AND ROSEMARY, for the Hair. se24

BURDELL'S Oriental Tooth Wash.

SOUND AND WHITE TEETH

Are Indispensable to Personal Attraction, and to Health and Longevity, by proper mastication of the food.

THIS UNIQUE PREPARATION IS OF INESTIMABLE value in preserving and beautifying the Teeth, strengthening the Gums and in imparting a delicate fragrance to the breath. It eradicates tartar from the Teeth, removes spots of incipient decay, and polishes and preserves the enamel, to which it imparts a PEARL-LIKE WHITENESS.

Its anti-sceptic and anti-scorbutic properties exercises a highly beneficial and salutary influence; they arrest the further progress of the decay of Teeth, induce a healthy action of the Gums, and cause them to assume the brightness and color indicative of perfect soundness; while, by confirming their adhesion to the Teeth, they give unlimited enjoyment and fresh zest to appetite, by perpetuating effective and complete mastication. It speedily removes those ravages which children sustain in the teeth, owing to the improper use of sweet and acid substances.

Sold by all Druggists, and by

H. P. WAKELEE,
Corner Montgomery and Sutter streets, and corner Bush and Montgomery streets. se24

FOURTH GRAND MASS MEETING

OF THE

Washington Union League!

—AT—

UNION HALL

On Saturday Evening, October 1st, 1864,

At half past seven o'clock.

All the Union Clubs of the city are invited. Seats reserved in the gallery for Ladies. The Union Band and Glee Club will be in attendance. The following gentlemen will address the meeting:

Rev. Mr. STEBBINS,
Dr. HENRY GIBBONS,
W. H. L. BARNES.

COMMITTEE OF FINANCE:

S. BRANNAN, | Dr. S. R HARRIS,
Dr. H. GIBBONS, | L. LELAND,
C. T. FAY.

COMMITTEE OF ARRANGEMENTS.

S. BRANNAN, | E. T. BATTURS,
RICH'D CHENERY, | ROBERT MERRILL,
oc1 W. P. C. STEBBINS.

A GRAND Promenade Concert AND BALL,

WILL BE GIVEN BY THE

MECHANICS' INSTITUTE,

—AT THEIR—

INDUSTRIAL PAVILION,

On Friday Evening, October 7th, 1864,

Commencing at 9 o'clock.

☞ The Programme will be issued in a few days.

TICKETS, admitting one person, - - - ONE DOLLAR.
Can be procured at the principal hotels. oc1

NOVELTY! NOVELTY! NOVELTY

WILSON, ZOYARA & CARLO'S

Great Circus!

THIS MAMMOTH COMBINATION OF CIRCUS TALENT

Is now PERFORMING EVERY EVENING until further notice, in the

LARGE AND ELEGANT PAVILION,

Adjoining International Hotel,

Whom there will be presented to the San Francisco public a host of novelties.

The CARLO GROUPE are now and make their first appearance in this city.

The Manager, Mr. JOHN WILSON, is determined that the entertainment shall excel in every particular, and be worthy of patronage; he having concentrated in this company not only the largest and most complete Circus in the World, but the elite of the Equestrian. Gymnastic, Acrobatic, Juggling, Vaulting and Posturing performers of the country.

PRICES OF ADMISSION.

Dress Circle - - - - - - - - - - $1 00
Second Circle - - - - - - - - - - 0 50
Reserved Chairs - - - - - - - - 50c extra

☞ Grand Afternoon Performance for families every Saturday.

Doors open at 7 o'clock; performances commence at 8.

se3 JOHN WILSON, Proprietor.

EUREKA MINSTREL HALL,

Montgomery street, near Pine.

T. MAGUIRE - - - - - - - - Proprietor
GEO. H. COES - - - - - - Stage Manager

GRAND OPENING NIGHT!

MONDAY EVENING - - - SEPT. 5TH.

THE EVER POPULAR

SAN FRANCISCO MINSTRELS!

Consisting of the following well known Artists:

Billy Birch,	Charles Backus,
D. S. Wambold,	Sig. R. Abecco,
George H. Coes,	Martin Simonsen,
Frank Medina,	S. Washburg,
C. F. Shattuck,	Signor Pinto,
F. Harris,	E. Grob, and

MRS. FANNY SIMONSEN.

A grand CHANGE OF PERFORMANCE EACH EVENING.

NEW SONGS, ACTS, BURLESQUES, DANCES, etc., will be performed in rapid succession.

Dress Circle and Orchestra Seats, 50 cents; Parquet, 25 cents; Private Boxes, $5; Reserved Seats, 25 cents extra.

Doors open at 7 o'clock. Curtain will rise at 8 o'clock, precisely.

CALIFORNIA BRANCH

—OF THE—

U. S. SANITARY COMMISSION.

ALL COMMUNICATIONS AND REMITTANCES SHOULD be addressed to the

OFFICE, No. 240 MONTGOMERY STREET,

Southeast corner of Pine.

O. C. WHEELER, Secretary.

FREDERICK F. LOW, President.
R. G. SNEATH, Treasurer.
D. C. McRUER, Chairman Executive Committee.

Office Hours: 9 A. M. to 4 P. M.

MAGUIRE'S ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

THOMAS MAGUIRE - - - Proprietor and Manager
C. L. GRAVES - - - - - - - Stage Manager
W. STEVENSON, - - - - - - Treasurer

THIS (SATURDAY) AFTERNOON,

GRAND FASHIONABLE MATINEE,

When the Comedy of Fashion,

Will be presented.

THIS (SATURDAY) EVENING,

LAST NIGHT BUT THREE OF THE

COMEDY COMBINATION!

AND THE

BENEFIT OF

MR. PETER RICHINGS,

Upon which occasion

MISS CAROLINE RICHINGS,
Mr. CHARLES WHEATLEIGH,

AND THE

FAVORITE LEGITIMATE COMPANY,

Will appear in Sheridan's brilliant Comedy of the School for Scandal!

Sir Peter Teazle - - - - Mr. PETER RICHINGS,
Lady Teazle - - - - Miss CAROLINE RICHINGS
Charles Surface - - - - - Mr. Wheatleigh
Joseph Surface - - - - - Frank Mayo
Sir Oliver Surface - - - - - D. C. Anderson
Careless (with song) - - - - - W. J. Hill
Sir Benjamin Backbite - - - Pierpont Thayer
Crabtree - - - - - - - Louis Aldrich
Moses - - - - - - - - Edward Seguin
Maria - - - - - - - - Miss Lulu Sweet
Mrs. Candor - - - - - - Mrs C R Saunders
Lady Sneerwell - - - - - Mrs. Waters

PRICES OF ADMISSION.—Dress Circle and Orchestra Seats $1; Parquet 50c.; Gallery 25c.

Doors open at 7 o'clock. Performances will commence at 8 precisely. se17

GILBERT'S MUSEUM,

Market street, opposite Second street, over the Occidental Market.

F. GILBERT - - - - - - - - Proprietor
J. A. ROWE, - - - - - - - - Manager

OPEN EVERY DAY AND EVENING.

HOME AGAIN!

JAMES MURPHY, THE IRISH GIANT BOY,

Who has just returned from the interior.

This wonderful young man has grown some three inches in height, and is some sixty pounds heavier; he therefore now weighs over three hundred pounds, and stands nearly eight feet and a half high, making him really the most Colossal Giant—old or young, man or boy—the world ever saw. Don't fail to see him.

Also, just engaged, the celebrated

ALBINO FAMILY,

Consisting of brother and sister, with beautiful snowy, wavy hair, perfectly white skin, and pink eyes—the most novel, wonderful and instructive exhibition ever presented to the public. Every student of nature should witness this extraordinary phenomena.

Still astounding and startling the world, the

GREAT SNAKE-CHARMER, M. DE BAR.

Also, the great Mathematical Wonder,

THE LIGHTNING CALCULATOR,
From Barnum's Museum.

THE WONDERFUL TYROLEAN WARBLER

Will give his interesting Musical Exhibitions throughout the day and evening.

Notwithstanding the great expense attending this unprecedented array of novelties, the management announces the prices as before.

THE GREAT CEROPLASTIC GROUP OF LIFE-LIKE FIGURES, AND

UPWARDS OF 2,000 CURIOSITIES!

Also, a beautiful set of COSMORAMIC VIEWS, illustrating the PRINCIPAL CITIES OF AMERICA. There is also an AQUARIA GARDEN attached to the Museum.

The admission to the entire Exhibition is only 25 cents. Children, 15 cents. se3-1m

The Willows.

W. H. BARNARD, - - - - Proprietor.

THE HOTEL of this popular and fashionable place of public resort has been so far completed as to enable the lessee to open its Saloon and beautifully shaded grounds permanently for reception of visitors. The Grove has been culled and trimmed; the flower beds replanted and cultivated into fragrant bloom; the aquarium replaced, with the addition to its former feathered collection of four elegant black Australian Swans. The proprietor has also added a large collection of birds, embracing two Golden Pheasants and a brace of Silver Pheasants.

The Theatre has been entirely remodelled; the stage newly decorated, new galleries erected, the seats rendered more comfortable, and the floors replaced.

The Shooting Gallery, the Ten Pin Alleys, and the Shuffle Boards have been replaced.

The Flying Horses for children, are in readiness to perform daily duty.

Ample stabling is attached to the premises, attended by polite and watchful grooms.

MURPHY & BRAY'S

CELEBRATED MINSTRELS,

Will give a performance in the Theatre every SUNDAY Afternoon.

Mr. E. WOODWARD, formerly known to the San Francisco public, will give his personal attention to the Bar.

On the first of August, the Lodging apartments Restaurant and Ladies' Refreshment Saloon of the WILLOWS were thrown open to the public. Ladies, gentlemen and children visiting the grounds will find ample entertainment and amusement. se10-tf

FOLSOM STREET PROPERTY

FOR SALE!

COMPRISING TWO 50-VARA LOTS ON THE NORTH side of Folsom street, fronting also on Clementina street. Will be sold as a whole, or in subdivisions of 25 by 80 feet.

WM. LEFFINGWELL,
se24-tf 610 Montgomery street

HEALTH AND AMUSEMENT, COMBINED

C. J. ROBINSON'S SELECT CLASSES,

In Dr. Dio Lewis's System of

LIGHT GYMNASTICS!

At Miss ALDRICH'S ACADEMY, Stevenson street,

Near corner of Market and Second streets, San Francisco,

For Scientific Physical Training and Recreative Exercise, in classes, by persons of all ages and conditions of health, and by both sexes, with light and movable apparatus, and an invariable and appropriate musical accompaniment. While the Exercises of the Light Gymnastics impart strength, grace, activity and symmetry to the person, they at the same time furnish an exhaustless fund of social enjoyment and mental recreation.

Mr. ROBINSON has recently been employed to teach this system in all the public schools of this city.

CLASSES meet on Tuesdays and Fridays at 8 P. M. For admission or further information, apply at the Academy.

Mr. ROBINSON will give instruction, on application to classes and private pupils, in VOCAL CULTURE and ELOCUTION, as taught by the best masters in the East.

jy26-1m

NEW BOOKS.

JUST RECEIVED,

—AT—

A. Roman & Co.'s.

TENNYSON'S NEW POEMS. Enoch Arden, and Other Poems. 12mo.

Imogene; or, the Marble Heart. By Pierce Egan, Esq.

The Finger Post to Public Business; containing the mode of forming and conducting Societies, Clubs and other organized associations, etc. 12mo.

Biographical Sketches of the Loyalists of the American Revolution. With an Historical Essay by Lorenzo Sabine. 2 vols.

Azarian; an Episode. By Harriet E. Prescott, author of the "Amber Gods," etc. 12mo.

Talks on Women's Topics. By Jennie June. 12mo.

The Coward; a Novel of Society and the Field in 1863. By Henry Morford, author of "The Days of Shoddy," etc. 12mo.

The Monomaniac; or, Shirley Hall Asylum. By William Gilbert. 12mo.

The Water Babies; a Fairy Tale for a Land Baby. Illustrated. By the Rev. Charles Kingsley. Square 16mo.

The Cradle of Rebellions; a History of the Secret Societies of France. By Lucien de la Hodde. 8vo.

Capt. Brando of the Centipede; a Pirate of eminence in the West Indies. 8vo. Illustrated. By Harry Grugo.

The Early Dawn; or, Sketches of Christian Life in England in the Olden Time. By the author of "Chronicles of the Schonberg Cotta Family." 12mo.

Margaret and her Bridesmaids. By the author of "The Queens of the Country," etc. 12mo.

Jomini's Life of Napoleon. Translated by Gen. H. W. Halleck. 4 vols. 8vo. With an Atlas of 60 maps.

Battle Fields of our Fathers. By Virginia F. Townsend. 12mo.

Poems by David Gray. With Memoirs of his Life and an Introductory Notice by R. M. Milnes. 12mo.

Out in the World. A Novel, by T. S. Arthur. 12mo.

Naomi Torrent; or, the History of a Woman. By Gertrude F. Vingut. 8vo.

Libby Life, or Experiences of a Prisoner of War in Richmond, Va. 1863-4. By Lieut.-Col. Cavada. 12mo;

The Potomac and the Rapidan; Army Notes from the failure at Winchester to the reinforcement of Rosecrans: 1861-3. By A H Quint, Chaplain 2d Massachusetts Regiment. 12mo.

The Gold Hunter's Adventure; or, Life in Australia. By a returned Australian. Illustrated 12mo.

Savage Africa; being the Narrative of a Tour in Equatorial and Western Africa. With notes on the Habits of the Gorilla, etc, etc. By W W Reade. With Map and Illustrations. 8vo;

A Woman's Philosophy of Woman; or, Woman Affranchised. An answer to Proudhon, Michelet, Legouve, and other modern innovators. By Mme. d'Hericourt, Translated from the last Paris edition.

Together with an extensive and complete stock of

Choice and Standard Books,

In all the departments of

LITERATURE, ART AND SCIENCE.

A fine collection of Standard authors in fine bindings, suitable for private Libraries.

☞ A full assortment of CHILDREN'S BOOKS, SCHOOL BOOKS, PHOTOGRAPHIC ALBUMS, etc, etc.

All for sale at the lowest Prices, wholesale and retail.

A. ROMAN & CO.,

BOOKSELLERS, PUBLISHERS AND IMPORTERS,

and 419 MONTGOMERY STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO.

se17-1m

QUINTESSENCE OF ENGLISH GARDEN LAVENDER FLOWERS,

Prepared from ingredients imported expressly for the purpose by

H. P. WAKELEE, Druggist,

Montgomery street, cor. Sutter, San Francisco.

Lavender has always maintained the highest rank as a perfume in England, but owing to the inferior qualities usually imported, has almost fallen into disuse in the United States. When pure and distilled from the flowers, it is the most delicate and refreshing perfumes in use. This preparation is recommended as the pure essence of Garden Lavender Flowers. se24

The Californian.

"SURELY THERE IS A VEIN FOR THE SILVER AND A PLACE FOR GOLD WHERE THEY FINE IT."

VOL. I.--NO. 20. SAN FRANCISCO, OCTOBER 8, 1864. TERMS { $5 a Year, by Mail, in Advance. 50 Cents a Month, by Carrier.

CONTENTS:

ORIGINAL ARTICLES:

Chile Colorados—By "Podgers."
Concerning the Answer to that Conundrum—By "Mark Twain."
Scientific Sketches—By "Trismegistus."

POETRY—

San Francisco by the Poets—No. 4.
Trial.
On Furlough.

NEW BOOKS:

A Review of New Publications.

EDITORIALS:

The Rhetoric of Riots.
Defects of a Fine Climate.
Carlyle's "Frederick the Great."

HAPPENINGS OF THE WEEK:

A Digest of Passing Events.

SELECTED SKETCHES, STORIES, etc.

Yusef el Caslan.
A Fight in the Caucasus.
Three Oriental Pictures.
The Corps de Ballet.
Under the Knife.
Saint Napoleon.
Mrs Farnham and her Era.
Flunkeyism.
Etiquette.
Young Lady Confidantes.
Perils of Railway Travelling.

POETRY—

The Poet's Lot.
The Poet's Friends.
The Flower.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL:

A review of the Drama and Lyric Stage, etc.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

CONCERNING THE ANSWER TO THAT CONUNDRUM.

I WENT out, several days ago, to see the whale—I speak in the singular number, because there was only one whale on the beach at that time. The day was excessively warm, and my comrade was an invalid: consequently we travelled slowly, and conversed about distressing diseases and such other matters as I thought would be likely to interest a sick man and make him feel cheerful. Instead of commenting on the mild scenery we found on the route, we spoke of the ravages of the cholera in the happy days of our boyhood; instead of talking about the warm weather, we revelled in bilious fever reminiscences; instead of boasting of the extraordinary swiftness of our horse, as most persons similarly situated would have done, we chatted gaily of consumption; and when we caught a glimpse of long white lines of waves rolling in silently upon the distant shore, our hearts were gladdened and our stomachs turned by fond memories of sea-sickness. It was a nice comfortable journey, and I could not have enjoyed it more if I had been sick myself.

When we got to the Cliff House we were disappointed. I had always heard there was such a grand view to be seen there of the majestic ocean, with its white billows stretching far away until it met and mingled with the bending sky; with here and there a stately ship upon its surface, ploughing through plains of sunshine and deserts of shadow cast from the clouds above; and, near at hand, piles of picturesque rocks, splashed with angry surf and garrisoned by drunken, sprawling sea-lions and elegant, long-legged pelicans.

It was a bitter disappointment. There was nothing in sight but an ordinary counter, and behind it a long row of bottles with Old Bourbon, and Old Rye, and Old Tom, and the old, old story of man's falter and woman's fall, in them. Nothing in the world to be seen but these things. We staid there an hour and a half, and took observations from different points of view, but the general result was the same—nothing but bottles and a bar. They keep a field-glass there, for the accommodation of those who wish to see the sights, and we looked at the bottles through that, but it did not help the matter any to speak of; we turned it end for end, but instead of increasing the view it dimiuished it. If it had not been fashionable, I would not have engaged in this trivial amusement; I say trivial, because, notwithstanding they said everybody used the glass, I still consider it trivial amusement, and very undignified, to sit staring at a row of gin-bottles through an opera-glass. Finally, we tried a common glass tumbler, and found that it answered just as well, on account of the close proximity of the scenery, and did not seem quite so stupid. We continued to use it, and the more we got accustomed to it, the better we liked it. Although tame enough at first, the effects eventually became really extraordinary. The single row of bottles doubled, and then trebled itself, and finally became a sort of dissolving view of inconceivable beauty and confusion. When Johnny first looked through the tumbler, he said: "It is rather a spleudid display, isn't it?" and an hour afterwards he said: "Thas so—'s a sp-(ic!)-splennid 'splay!" and set his glass down with sufficient decision to break it.

We went out, then, and saw a sign marked "Chicken Shooting," and we sat down and waited a long time, but finally we got weary and discouraged, and my comrade said that perhaps it was no use—may be the chicken was not going to shoot that day. We did not mind the disappointment so much, but the hiccups were so distressing. I am subject to them when I go abroad.

We left the hotel, then, and drove along the level beach, drowsily admiring the terraced surf, and listening to the tidings it was bringing from other lands in the mysterious language of its ceaseless roar, until we hove in sight of the stranded whale. We thought it was a cliff, an isolated hill, an island—anything but a fish, capable of being cut up and stowed away in a ship. Its proportions were magnified a thousand-fold beyond any conception we had previously formed of them. We felt that we could not complain of a disappointment in regard to the whale, at any rate. But we were not prepared to see a magnified mastodon, also; yet there seemed to be one towering high above the beach not far from the whale. We drove a hundred yards further—it was nothing but a horse.

Then the light of inspiration dawned upon me, and I knew what I would do if I kept the hotel, and the whale belonged to me. I would not permit any one to approach nearer than six or eight hundred yards to the show, because at that distance the light mists, or the peculiar atmosphere, or something, exaggerates it into a monster of colossal size. It grows smaller as you go towards it. When we got pretty close to it, the island shrunk into a fish—a very large one for a sardine, it is true, but a very small one for a whale—and the mastodon dwindled down to a Cayuse pony. Distance had been lending immensity to the view. We were disappointed again somewhat; but see how things are regulated! The very source of our disappointment was a blessing to us: As it was, there was just as much smell as two of us could stand; and if the fish had been larger there would have been more, wouldn't there? and where could we have got assistance on that lonely beach to help us smell it? Ah! it was the great law of compensation—the great law that regulates Nature's heedless agents, and sees that when they make a mistake, they shall at the self-same moment prevent that mistake from working evil consequences. Behold, the same gust of wind that blows a lady's dress aside, and exposes her ancle, fills your eyes so full of sand that you can't see it. Marvellous are the works of Nature!

The whale was not a long one, physically speaking—say thirty-five feet—but he smelt much longer; he smelt as much as a mile and a half longer, I should say, for we travelled about that distance beyond him before we ceased to detect his fragrance in the atmosphere. My comrade said he did not admire to smell a whale; and I adopt his sentiments while I scorn his language. A whale does not smell like magnolia, nor yet like heliotrope or "Balm of a Thousand Flowers;" I do not know, but I should judge that it smells more like a thousand pole-cats.

With these few remarks I will now proceed to unfold a conundrum which I consider one of the finest that has ever emanated from the human mind. My invalid comrade produced it while we were driving along slowly in the open country this side of the Ocean House. I think it was just where we crossed the aqueduct of the Spring Valley Water Company, though I will not be certain; it might have been a little to the east of it, or maybe a little to the west, but at any rate it was in the immediate vicinity of it. I remember the time, though, very distinctly, for I was looking at my watch at the moment he commenced speaking, and it was a quarter of a minute after 3 o'clock—I made a memorandum of it afterward in my note-book which I will show you if you will remind me of it when I visit the Californian office. The sun was shining very brightly, but a light breeze was blowing from the sea, which rendered the weather pleasanter than it had been for several hours previously, and as it blew the dust in the same direction in which we were travelling, we experienced no inconvenience from it, although, as a general thing, I do not enjoy dust. It was under these circumstances that my invalid comrade, young John William Skae, who is in the quartz-milling business in Virginia City, now, but was born in the State of Pennsylvania, where his parents, and in fact most of his relatives, still reside, except one of his brothers, who is in the army, and his aunt, who married a minister of the gospel and is living out West, sometimes having an improving season in the vineyard and sometimes chased around considerable by the bushwhackers, who cannot abide preachers, and who stir them up impartially, just the same as they do those who have not yet got religion; and also except his first cousin, James Peterson, who is a skirmisher and is with the parson—he goes through the camp-meetings and skirmishes for raw converts, whom he brings to the front and puts them in the corral, or the mourner's bench, as they call it in that section, so that the parson can exhort them more handy—it was under these circumstances, as I was saying, that young Skae, who had been ruminating in dead silence for a long time, turned toward me with an unwholesome glare in his eye, at a quarter of a minute after 3 o'clock, while we were in the vicinity of the aqueduct of the Spring Valley Water Company, and notwithstanding the light breeze that was blowing and the filmy dust that was drifting about us, says he: "Why is a whale like a certain bird which has blue feathers and is mostly found in the West, where he is considered a good bird though not remarkable? It is, because he is the Kingfisher—(the king fish, sir.")

There was no house near by, except an old shed that had been used by some workmen, but I took him to that and did what I could for him; his whole nervous system seemed prostrated; he only raised his head once, and asked in a feeble voice, but with an expression of ineffable satisfaction in it—"How's that?" I knew he did not want medicine—if anything could save him, it would be rest and quiet. Therefore, I removed the horses to a distance, and then went down the road, and by representing the case fairly and openly to all passengers, I got them to drive by him slowly so that they would make no noise to excite him. My efforts were successful; his pulse was at two hundred and ninety when I put him in the shed, and only forty-two when I took him out.

Now I thought that conundrum would have done honor to the finest mind among us, and I think it especially good for an invalid from Pennsylvania. How does it strike you? It is circumscribed in its action, though, and is applicable only to men; you could not say "Because it is the king fish, madam," without marring the effect of the joke by rendering the point in a manner obscure.

Some friends of mine of great powers and high intellectual culture, and who naturally take an interest in conundrums, besought me to procure the answer to that one about Napoleon and the Sanitary cheese, and publish it. I have written to the Author of it, and he informs me that he and his mother, who is a woman of extraordinary sagacity and a profound thinker, are cyphering at it night and day, and they confidently expect to have the answer ready in time for your next week's issue. From what I can understand, they are making very encouraging progress; they have already found out why Napoleon was like the cheese, but thus far they have not been able to ascertain in what respect the cheese resembles Napoleon.

MARK TWAIN.

Affectation in Clergy.—Gail Hamilton thus satirizes the "cloth": "Was an orthodox minister ever known to use the word 'wife' in the pulpit? From the manner in which he steers round it, one would suppose that its utterance was a ban. Your 'consort,' 'companion,' 'the partner of your joys,' or 'sorrows,' or 'bosom,' is recognised; but nobody ever prays for your 'wife.' Why is it not just as well to say that Mr. A will preach in the afternoon, as in the 'after part of the day?' Why not say that the man whose life you are sketching was married at a certain age, rather than that he 'entered into the marriage relation?' Why in the pulpit shall we not hear our own tongue in which we were born? If diguity cannot stand Anglo-Saxon, so much the worse for dignity. Good, common, honest, racy, idiomatic words and phrases are not only the strongest, but often the most eloquent. The cumbrous euphonisms of a pulpit patois are neither pleasant to the taste, nor good for food."

Cold in the head isn't half so common as cold in the heart, but it is a great deal oftener complained of.

THE FLOWER.

ONCE in a golden hour
I cast to earth a seed.
Up there came a flower,
The people said, a weed.

To and fro they went
Through my garden-bower,
And muttering discontent
Cursed me and my flower.

Then it grew so tall
It wore a crown of light,
But thieves from o'er the wall
Stole the seed by night.

Sowed it far and wide
By every town and tower,
Till all the people cried
"Splendid is the flower."

Read my little fable:
He that runs may read.
Most can raise the flowers now,
For all have got the need.

And some are pretty enough,
And some are poor indeed;
And now again the people
Call it but a weed.—[Tennyson.

YUSEF EL CASLAN.

AN EGYPTIAN TALE.

IN the city founded by Moaz, an Arabian caliph, and called by him El Kahireh or Cairo, you may find in the Frank quarter, in the street Muskih, nearly opposite the sharab hanoot, or wine-shop, of Herr Datelbaum, a true Cairene coffee-house. The water-pipes, made of a cocoanut and two pieces of fishing-cane, the little finjans, or crockery coffee-cups with brass holders, the square seats made of cane, the furnace with charcoal fire, and the large mortar in which roasted coffee is pounded, comprise the entire outfit, and may be bought for a few dollars. If you understand Arabic, and sport the tarboosh, or red-purple felt cap of the country, can sit cross-legged and smoke in turn the shishah, or water-pipe, as it is passed around, and can drink Arabic coffee neat, why, then you may hear a story like the following, told by a black-eyed, hook-nosed, half-starved Egyptian, who thus earns his coffee, a few paras, and a pull at the water-pipe by amusing the frequenters of this and other of the thousand coffee-shops in El Musr. He tells this with the greater glee since it has for its hero a man resembling himself, and contains an apology for his own aimless and almost shiftless existence:

There once lived in this beautiful city, in the days of Saad Pasha, two brothers of the tribe of A'hma'k, the elder of whom was named Yusef el Caslan, or Yusef the Idle, while the younger one was called Ali el Mashgool, or Ali the Busy. On the death of their parents they divided their property, the eldest brother, Yusef, so investing his share that he could just live on a small income it yielded, while the young brother, Ali, true to his name of mashgool or busy, at once placed his property, in a fruit-shop, and made money diligently.

Now, it happened that Yusef, surnamed the Idle, had a friend who acted as dragoman to the ever-wandering Franks, and who was called Abu ben Bilah rahah, or Abu the Son of the Restless; and this Abu, over many pipes and finjans of coffee, taught Yusef the language of the Franks, and the two wasted days in idle talk (for it is well known that words bake no bread.) But in course of time Yusef could converse with the Franks, and, behold, they understood every word in six he spoke to them. He also passed his time, like a very idler, gathering flowers and making curious perfumes, in company with an old Hakim, by boiling them in a queer glass vessel looking like a gourd with a very long thin neek; and one of these perfumes was so delicious that it was called "The Dream of the Harem," and a trader in the Tuuis bazaar once offered Yusef a thousand piastres for the recipe. But Yusef refused it, saying "I am not in the fancy-soap and perfumery business, and don't want to be. I will give it to the Pasha and perhaps he will invite me to visit the Garden of Shoulbrah next time he goes there with his families."

Then Yusef, who was always idle, discovered a certain dye-stuff that gave a tint like the rosy red of morning to the white cloth made of cotton, and the dyers, with arms all blue, with indigo, saw the beautiful color, and said, "Be one of us, and give us thy secret; and thou shalt go into our business, and have plenty of piastres, so that there shall be Latakiah in thy pipe, and bouza in thy cup, and several maidens to keep thee in music." But Yusef turned a deaf ear to the dyeing-men, and told them he preferred to be clean. So they left him in wrath, and he and his dye were troubled by them no more.

One day, when Yusef was sitting near that tumble-down rock-grotto in the island of Rhoda, idly looking at the dhoum palm, and thinking what a good cook nature was to cause gingerbread fruit all ready-made to grow on that tree, he drew from his girdle some dried dates, and, while eating them, he remembered the delicious taste of a date-sausage made of fresh dates and almonds stuffed in antelope casing, and determined to propose their manufacture to a newly-arrived Frank, an Italian confectioner, who lived near the Esbekieh gardens and was a man of money and enterprise. Thus musing, he rose from repose, and, crossing over in the ferry-boat, wandered around the city until he came to the Turkish bazaar where his brother, Ali the Busy, sat on his seat in his small shop, smoking a tchibouk and waiting patiently for customers. But his brow was wrinkled when he saw his brother Yusef so calmly walking along, neither buying nor selling, nor bartering, nor huckstering, nor trading, and he lifted up his voice and said to him:

"Son of my father, are you still busy loafing?"

Then Yusef meekly replied, "Ali, my brother, I have tarried under the palm-trees in the pleasant shade, and with the soft breeze perfumed with flowers I have reposed for a long time dreaming of—perpetual motion."

"Perpetual melons!" answered Ali the Busy, ironically. "While you have been idle, I have been busy. How many figs do you think I have sold this morning?"

"Nay, I know not," replied Yusef.

"But guess," said the busybody. "Do guess—for the love of Allah!"

"Well," said Yusef the Idle, "about seventeen millions eight hundred and fifty-four thousand nine hundred and twenty-six."

"You go to ——!" shouted Ali. Where he desired him to go, probably to—work, was unuttered; for at this moment up rode an Englishman, with a cork hat and blue veil around it, and mounted on a small donkey, pursued by a small Egyptian with a large stick, who from time to time shouted, "Riglak! Schmalak! Effendi!" and only ceased when the Englishman, anchoring his donkey by sticking his heels in the ground, pointed to the fruit exposed in Ali's stand, and, beckoning the donkey-boy, said to him, in a compound of Canton-English-lingua-franca:

"I do some pigeon here this uomo. I buy-ee two-ee piastres," (holding up two fingers) "oranges. Capisce?"

"Tahib!" shouted the donkey-boy, almost jumping out of his blue calico shirt, the only garment he had, on seeing the silver piece. "Aio! oll rite, beeg olangis, I versteh Engeesh." Then, giving Ali the Busy a fearful wink, the boy commenced in Arabic a severe blackguarding of the Inglese on the donkey, ending by buying about ten oranges for ten parás, and with great dexterity pocketing the change for the two piastres. The Englishman, delighted at receiving so much fruit for his money, reflected to himself:

"There is nothing like knowing the language of the country you travel in, you know!"

Jerking the reins, the howaga, or traveller, was about resuming his ride, when Yusef the Idle, who had been leaning meditatively near his brother, started up, and said:

"Sare, you want go in sassage-bizness?"

"How's that?" replied the Englishman. "Is it safe? Will it pay? Where can you find hogs enough to make it an object, where people don't keep 'em? But stop! Call this evening at seven o'clock at Shepherd's hotel; you will find me smoking a cheroot in the portico. Business before pleasure."

"Oh, brother," said Ali the Busy, "what are you saying to the red-headed man?"

"I am asking him to go into the sausage-business with me."

"Halloo, howaga. Don't have anything to do with Yusef the Idle; he is an enthusiast, a dreamer, a poet. He make sausages! The fruit of rashness is repentance: therefore let him alone." But the Englishman understood not, and was already afar off before Ali had finished his harangue.

That evening, Yusef the Idle, with a large sausage resembling a veritable bologna in weight, size and dark color, accosted the Englishman, who was dreamily smoking a cheroot, and exhaling the bottle of crusty old port he had lately finished at dinner. Then Yusef, taking out a large knife, sliced off two or three cuts from the sausage and presented them to the Frank.

"Can't do it," said he; have just finished ten dishes and a heavy desert. But it looks like a good bologna; firm, not too tough, the exact shade of healthy young-donkey-meat." But Yusef insisted on the traveller's eating a small piece, telling him it was sweet and very good, setting the example by finishing several slices himself. Thus guaranteed from sudden death, the Englishman took a piece, nibbled at it, ate it all, and asked for another slice, and finished by discovering that date-sausage was a very dainty delicacy. He then entered into business-matters, asking Yusef what capital he required, etc., etc., to start their manufacture. But Yusef told him he only had the knowledge of making them for sale, and was too idle for business, but that if he would give his brother an order he would supply all he wanted. The Englishman at once wrote an order for two tons, (about fourteen camel loads,) to be sent by the bool bool (Fellaharen for locomotive) to Alexandria, thence to England per steamer, money to be paid for them on delivery at Alexandria. He afterwards said that on the occasion of a great dinner in London he had so exquisitely sold [in Arabic, gashsh ed] all the club, by having these "bologna sausages" brought on with the dessert, that he considered his tour of the East amply repaid by the discovery of date-sausages.

Yusef, before taking his leave, modestly presented a beautiful crystal gilt flask to the Englishman, and desired him to see if the perfume pleased him. The traveler, who was a man for every thing, carefully uncorked, or rather unstoppered, the flask, and, placing it to his nostrils, a gentle sigh escaped him, and, as his eyes rolled towards the skies, he exclaimed:

"It is wonderful. Lubin and Rimmel have nothing like it. What do you want for the receipe?"

"Reward me as you see fit," said Yusef the Idle; "to, I am not a business-man, and trust to your honor." The Englishman, learning that it was Yusef's own invention, gave him a handsome sum for it, and was about closing the session, when Yusef displayed a flamingo-colored piece of remarkably fine muslin. Even by lamplight the color struck the Englishman's eye; and when he was told that the dye was the invention of the idle Cairene, he requested him to call next morning, and if the color looked as well by daylight as at night, he would buy the secret.

The next morning Yusef the Idle waited on the traveller; and, the color appearing even finer by daylight than at night, the Englishman bought the recipe for the dye—and paid the money.

Then Yusef the Idle went into the clothiers' quarter and bought for himself, and put on, a splendid suit of maroon-colored clothes, with a handsome red sash, and a gold-embroidered kerchief for head and throat, and a purple fez cap, and yellow leather slippers, a pair of pistols for show, and a jasmine-stemmed pipe for use, and, with a purse full of guineas and the order for fourteen camel-loads of date-sausages in his girdle, he held his way to the Turkish bazaar. When he arrived at his brother's stand, behold, there was the desolation of the desert. Ten cents, or two piastres, would have bought everything he had for sale, and Ali the Busy, with his hands, was very busy—crying. He had not "made a fail of it," as the Franks remark; but he was, nevertheless, "bursted up so high that the hawks couldn't fly to him," as the men of Yengisland tersely say.

"My brother," said Yusef the Idle, "how comes it that I find you in affliction, and you do not come to me for help and comfort?"

At the tones of this voice, Ali the Busy would have broken out in a torrent of abuse about lazy, idle loafers: but, lifting his head, the splendid clothes and pipe and pistols met his eye, and, believing they were worn by some rich old Turk, or one of the head officers of the police, he kissed his hand, laid it on his breast and head, invoking a shower of complimentary blessings on the head and beard of the Effendi before him; and not until several seconds did he allow his eyes to mount up, until, to his surprise, he met the kindly regards of his elder brother fixed tenderly, lovingly on him.

Ali the Busy then told his brother of all his troubles, and of his having to sell that very morning his whole stock of goods to pay a debt due that day, a debt that had he refused to pay he would have been dishonored for life. Then Yusef the Idle bade his brother be of good heart, and, placing in his hand the purse of gold and the order for the fourteen camel-loads of date-sausages, told him to cheer up, and go at business again with all his might, and conquer.

"Thus ends," said the story-teller, "all I know of the lives of Yusef the Idle and Ali the Busy—so called by men; but whether they were rightly named in the sight of Allah, perhaps the priest now crying the hour for prayer from the mosque of El Azhar can best tell you. All I know is: "The nest of the blind bird is made by Allah!"

SMILES.

WE are not going to set the poor conventional hack Smile against the affluence and benediction of that which expresses a full, deeply-moved, loving heart; and unquestionably that smile, whatever its source, is brightest which comes from being pleased, and need not justify itself by an hypothesis; but where is the merit of most smiles? Mrs. Browning has personified a whole tribe of beaming, satisfied, youthful radiances in her little "Ellie," who > "Sits alone,

> And the smile she softly useth
> Fills the silence like a speech,
> While she thinks what shall be done,
> And the sweetest pleasure chooseth
> For her future within reach.
>
> Little Ellie in her smile
> Chooseth—'I will have a lover
> Riding on a steed of steeds,'" etc.

The so-called "worldling"—the man who smiles when he is not glad at heart, and has no fair anticipations to retire into at pleasure—may have more humanity in his feigning than there is in the other's nature and truth, and is honester than he knows himself to be. He smiles in support of large general principles—in acknowledgment that man is a social being, and would be wretched if alienated from his kind. It is no cause of joy, perhaps, that visitors come interrupting or disturbing us; but we smile from a sense of duty to them, as men in fellowship with our kind—in recognition of the truth that, if our solitude were never to be broken in upon, if we were indeed alone, isolated, neglected, we should be miserable, and life a burden. And the effort is not unrewarded. Cause and effect change places. We do not smile because we are glad, but, by dint of assuming cheerfulness as a duty, we taste a certain satisfaction. The smile of patience, forbearance, good manners, forced and unreal though it be, is worn many times in the day by every person who accepts the responsibilities of life, and acknowledges other obligations than his own comfort and inclination.

We are apt to class smiles grammatically as masculine and feminine. Thus the lightning smile is seen with most effect on men, while the bewitching smile is essentially a woman's weapon. The critical smile, the "slow, gradual smile"—a certain subtle, delicate, polite smile of carrying a point in argument—is a man's mode of triumph; while the artless, appealing, "mocking," winning, cajoling smile is best pointed with girlish dimples. The best smile of all—that of sympathy, where the eyes do more than the lips—is to be seen wherever the feelings have the luck to meet with features pliant and graceful enough to let them show themselves to advantage.

We have kept clear of the whole race of melodramatic and tragic smiles, whose very last design is to express or convey pleasure—as, for example, the smile of scorn, anger, hate, despair. Nor do we touch on that milder and mere domestic provocation, the smile of incredulity, which many besides Thackeray have found "a most naughty and odious expression in a young lady's face." Of course the smiles we treat of have no relationship, or only the most distant, to laughter, or to those broad smiles, degenerating into giggling explosiveness, which are the reproach of undisciplined youth. There have been times when laughter was wholly forbidden to the well-bred gentlewoman—when it was pronounced vulgar, inadmissable at tournament or court of love. Ladies might never go beyond a smile; but then that mediæval smile! What was not said and sung, what was not borne and suffered, for the divine emanation? The lampeggiar del angelico riso of Laura received its apotheosis; the santo riso of Beatrice has become a constellation since it first shone on Dante, as "that admirable person in a dress of purest white" transfixed him with a smile "of such ineffable courtesy that on the instant he attained the extreme of human happiness." If all this means nothing else, it means that the smile has always been an affair of cultivation, a carefully-trained flower, an influence and power, not unknown to the possessor. These historical smiles would have been quite out of place, and in fact impossible, in the merely domestic circle. And so it is still. Smiles of the ineffable sort are the expression of thought and feeling happily stimulated and exerted in a new field, or wherever opportunities and influence are occasional, and to be made much of. However pleasant the wife's smile to her husband, it was a different smile which first charmed him. The smile of purest benevolence is not lavished on those whose well-being is the first duty and daily care. In fact, with all these, smiles have done their part. When you know men or women thoroughly, you have got past their smiles: these will tell you nothing of the disposition or character which you did not know more perfectly in other ways, and you will cease to study them.—Saturday Review.

A VERY great porportion of the unfavorable opinions, which men entertain of their fellow-men, found on some misconception.

THE POET'S FRIENDS.

THE Robin sings in the elm,
The cattle stand beneath,
Sedate and grave, with great brown eyes
And fragrant meadow breath.

They listen to the flattered bird,
The wise-looking, stupid things;
But they never understand a word
Of all the Robin sings.

THREE ORIENTAL PICTURES.

ON THE DESERT.

AS long as you are journeying in the interior of the Desert you have no particular point to make for as your resting-place. The endless sands yield nothing but small stunted shrubs—even these fail after the first two or three days, and from that time you pass over broad plains—you pass over newly-reared hills—you pass through valleys that the storm of the last week has dug, and the hills and the valleys are sand, sand, sand, still sand, and only sand, and sand, and sand again. The earth is so samely that your eyes turn towards heaven—towards heaven, I mean, in the sense of sky. You look to the Sun, for he is your task-master, and by him you know the measure of the work that remains for you to do. He comes when you strike your tent in the early morning, and then, for the first hour of the day, as you move forward on your camel, he stands at your near side, and makes you know that the whole day's toil is before you—then for a while and a long while you see him no more, for you are veiled and shrouded, and dare not look upon the greatness of his glory, but you know where he strides over-head by the touch of his flaming sword. No words are spoken, but your Arabs moan, your camels sigh, your skin glows, your shoulders ache, and for sights you see the pattern and the web of the silk that veils your eyes, and the glare of the outer light. Time labors on—your skin glows and your shoulders ache, your Arabs moan, your camels sigh, and you see the same pattern in the silk, and the same glare of light beyond, but conquering Time marches on, and by and by the descending sun has compassed the Heaven, and now softly touches your right arm, and throws your lank shadow over the sand, right along on the way for Persia; then again you look upon his face, for his power is all veiled in his beauty, and the redness of flames has become the redness of roses—the fair, wavy cloud that fled in the morning now comes to his sight once more—comes blushing, yet still comes on—comes burning with blushes, yet hastens, and clings to his side.

Then arrives your time for resting. The world about you is all you own, and there, where you will, you pitch your solitary tent; there is no living thing to dispute your choice. When at last the spot had been fixed upon, and we came to a halt, one of the Arabs would touch the chest of my camel, and utter at the same time a peculiar gurgling sound; the beast instantly understood, and obeyed the sign, and slowly sunk under me till she brought her body to a level with the ground; then gladly enough I alighted; the rest of the camels were unloaded, and turned loose to browse upon the shrubs of the Desert, where shrubs there were, or, where these failed, to wait for the small quantity of food which was allowed them out of our stores.

* * * * * * *

After the fifth day of my journey, I no longer travelled over shifting hills, but came upon a dead level—a dead level bed of sand, quite hard, and studded with small, shining pebbles.

The heat grew fierce; there was no valley nor hollow, no hill, no mound, no shadow of hill nor of mound by which I could mark the way I was making. Hour by hour I advanced, and saw no change—I was still the very centre of a round horizon; hour by hour I advanced, and still there was the same, and the same, and the same—the same circle of flaming sky—the same circle of sand still glaring with light and fire. Over all the heaven above, over all the earth beneath, there was no visible power that could balk the fierce will of the sun; "he rejoiced as a strong man to run a race; his going forth was from the end of the heaven, and his circuit unto the ends of it; and there was nothing hid from the heat thereof." From pole to pole, and from the east to the west, he brandished his fiery sceptre as though he had usurped all heaven and earth. As he hid the soft Persian in ancient times, so now, and fiercely, too, he bid me bow down and worship him; so now in his pride he seemed to command me and say: "Thou shalt have none other gods but me." I was all alone before him. There were these two pitted together, and face to face—the mighty sun for one, and for the other—this poor, pale, solitary self of mine, that I always carry about with me.

But on the eighth day, and before I had yet turned away from Jehovah for the glittering god of the Persians, there appeared a dark line upon the edge of the forward horizon, and soon the line deepened into a delicate fringe that sparkled here and there as though it were sown with diamonds. There, then, before me were the gardens and the minarets of Egypt, and the mighty works of the Nile, and I, (the eternal Ego that I am!) I had lived to see, and I saw them.

When evening came I was still within the confines of the desert, and my tent was pitched as usual, but one of my Arabs stalked away rapidly toward the West without telling me of the errand on which he was bent. After a while he returned; he had toiled on a grateful service; he had travelled all the way on to the border of the living world, and brought me back, for token, an ear of rice, full, fresh and green.

The next day I entered upon Egypt, and floated along (for the delight was as the delight of bathing) through green, wavy fields of rice, and pastures fresh and plentiful, and dived into the cold verdure of groves and gardens, and quenched my hot eyes in shade, as though in deep rushing waters.

THE GIRLS OF BETHLEHEM.

To a Christian, and thorough-bred Englishman, not even the licentiousness which generally accompanies it can compensate for the oppressiveness of that horrible outward decorum which turns the cities and the palaces of Asia into deserts and jails. So I say, when you see and hear them, those romping girls of Bethlehem will gladden your very soul. Distant at first, and then nearer and nearer, the timid flock will gather around you with their large, burning eyes gravely fixed against yours, so that they see into your brain, and if you imagine evil against them they will know of your ill thought before it is yet born, and will fly, and be gone in the moment. But presently, if you will only look virtuous enough to prevent alarm, and vicious enough to avoid looking silly, the blithe maidens will draw nearer and nearer to you, and soon there will be one, the bravest of the sisters, who will venture right up to your side, and touch the hem of your coat, in playful defiance of the danger, and then the rest will follow the daring of their youthful leader, and gather close round you, and hold a shrill controversy on the wondrous formation that you call a hat, and the cunning of the hands that clothed you with cloth so fine; and then, growing more profound in their researches, they will pass from the study of your mere dress to a serious contemplation of your stately height and your nut-brown hair, and the ruddy glow of your English cheeks. And if they catch a glimpse of your ungloved fingers, then again will they make the air ring with their sweet screams of wonder and amazement, as they compare the fairness of your hand with their warmer tints, and even with the hues of your own sunburnt face. Instantly the ring-leader of the gentle rioters imagines a new sin; with tremulous boldness she touches—then grasps your hand, and smoothes it gently betwixt her own, and pries curiously into its make and color, as though it were silk of Damascus or shawl of Cashmere. And when they see you, even then, still sage and gentle, the joyous girls will suddenly and screamingly, and all at once, explain to each other that you are surely quite harmless and innocent—a lion that makes no spring, a bear that never hugs—and upon this faith, one after the other, they will take your passive hand and strive to explain it, and make a theme and a controversy. But the one—the fairest and sweetest of all, is yet the most timid; she shrinks from the daring deeds of her playmates, and seeks shelter behind their sleeves, and strives to screen her glowing consciousness from the eyes that look upon her; but her laughing sisters will have none of this cowardice—they vow that the fair one shall be their accomplice—shall share their dangers—shall touch the hand of the stranger; they seize her small wrist and drag her forward by force, and at last, whilst she strives to turn away, and to cover up her whole soul under the folds of downcast eyelids, they vanquish her utmost strength—they vanquish your utmost modesty, and marry her hand to yours. The quick pulse springs from her fingers, and throbs like a whisper upon your listening palm. For an instant her large, timid eyes are upon you—in an instant they are shrouded again, and there comes a blush so burning that the frightened girls stay their shrill laughter, as though they had played too perilously and harmed their gentle sister. A moment, and all, with a sudden intelligence, turn away, and fly like deer, yet soon again, like deer, they wheel round and return, and stand and gaze upon the danger until they grow brave once more.

THE MONOLITHS OF THE DESERT.

I went to see, and to explore the Pyramids.

Familiar to one from the days of early childhood are the forms of the Egyptian Pyramids, and now, as I approached them from the banks of the Nile, I had no print, no picture before me, and yet the old shapes were there; there was no change; they were just as I had always known them. I straightened myself in my stirrups, and tried to persuade my understanding that this was real Egypt, and that those angles which stood up between me and the West were of harder stuff, and more ancient than the paper pyramids of the green portfolio. Yet it was not till I came to the base of the great Pyramid, that reality began to weigh upon my mind. Strange to say, the bigness of the distinct blocks of stone was the first sign by which I attained to feel the immensity of the whole pile. When I came, and trod, and touched with my hands, in order that by climbing I might come to the top of one single stone, then, and almost suddenly, a cold sense and understanding of the Pyramid's enormity came down overcasting my brain.

Now try to endure this homely, sick-nursish illustration of the effect produced upon one's mind by the mere vastness of the great Pyramid: when I was very young, (between the ages, I believe, of three and five years old,) being then of delicate health, I was often in time of night the victim of a strange kind of mental oppression; I lay in my bed perfectly conscious, and with open eyes, but without power to speak, or to move, and all the while my brain was oppressed to distraction by the presence of a single and abstract idea—the idea of solid Immensity. It seemed to me in my agonies, that the horror of this visitation arose from its coming upon me without form or shape—that the close presence of the direst monster ever bred in hell would have been a thousand times more tolerable than that simple idea of solid size; my aching mind was fixed, and riveted down upon the mere quality of vastness, vastness, vastness; and was not permitted to invest with it any particular object. If I could have done so, the torment would have ceased. When at last I was roused from this state of suffering, I could not of course in those days, (knowing no verbal metaphysics, and no metaphysics at all, except by the dreadful experience of an abstract idea,) I could not of course find words to describe the nature of my sensations, and even now I cannot explain why it is that the forced contemplation of a mere quality, distinct from matter, should be so terrible. Well, now my eyes saw and knew, and my hands and my feet informed my understanding, that there was nothing at all abstract about the great Pyramid—it was a big triangle, sufficiently concrete, easy to see, and rough to the touch; it could not, of course, affect me with the peculiar sensation which I have been talking of, but yet there was something akin to that old night-mare agony in the terrible completeness with which a mere mass of masonry could fill and load my mind.

And near the Pyramids more wonderful and more awful than all else in the land of Egypt, there sits the lonely Sphynx. Comely the creature is, but the comeliness is not of this world; the once worshipped beast is a deformity and a monster to this generation, and yet you can see that those lips, so thick and heavy, were fashioned according to some ancient mould of beauty—some mould of beauty now forgotten—forgotten because that Greece drew forth Cytherea from the flashing foam of the Ægean, and in her image created new forms of beauty, and made it a law among men that the short and proudly-wreathed lip should stand for the sign and the main condition of loveliness, through all generations to come. Yet still there lives on the race of those who were beautiful in the fashion of the elder world, and Christian girls of Coptic blood will look on you with the sad, serious gaze, and kiss you your charitable hand with the big, ponting lips of the very Sphynx.

Laugh, and mock if you will at the worship of stone idols, but mark ye this, ye breakers of images, that in one regard, the stone idol bears awful semblance of Deity—unchangefulness in the midst of change—the same seeming will and intent forever and ever inexorable! Upon ancient dynasties of Ethiopian and Egyptian Kings—upon Greek and Roman, upon Arab and Ottoman conquerors—upon Napoleon dreaming of an Eastern Empire—upon battle and pestilence—upon the ceaseless misery of the Egyptian race—upon keen-eyed travellers—Herodotus yesterday, and Warburton to-day—upon all, and more this unworldly Sphynx has watched, and watched like a Providence with the same earnest eyes, and the same sad, tranquil mien. And we, we shall die, and Islam will wither away, and the Englishman, leaning far over to hold his loved India, will plant a firm foot on the banks of the Nile, and sit in the seats of the Faithful, and still that sleepless rock will lie watching and watching the works of the new, busy race, with those same sad, earnest eyes, and the same tranquil mien everlasting. You dare not mock at the Sphynx. —Kinglake's "Eothen."

HEALTH OF WATERING-PLACES.—Some of the watering-places are very much displeased, and not without reason, at the figure they make in the Registrar-General's tables of mortality. And necessarily there is fallacy in these accounts, for it is impossible to distinguish the deaths of visitors from the deaths of residents; and the former swell the death-rate, in some instances, very considerably, and at the same time unduly, as regards the question of salubrity. We will take two extreme examples, Brighton and Bath, which have the high death-rate of twenty to the thousand. To compare that death-rate with the death-rate of a rural district would be like comparing the death-rate of a hospital with that of a proportional number of private houses. Brighton is the great seaside hospital of London. The ailing and convalescent go to Brighton to get health and strength, and the incurable go there for their last chance, and to die. It is probable because the place is so healthy that its death-rate is raised so high by the mortality of its invalid visitors. It is impossible to traverse the cliffs without seeing both the health the air will give, and the stages of disease and decay which are past cure. Brighton is, indeed, the incurable patient's forlorn hope. The death-rate, which is swelled by this class, must not be taken as a criterion of the general sanitary condition; and the same remark applies to three other places which have the same high rate, probably from the same cause—Tonbridge Wells, Buxton and Malvern, all haunts of invalids.

Bath is another example, but not quite of the same class. It is the refuge of the aged, and balks death of many who have long passed the appointed three score and ten. Dryden says of his good parson:

> "Of sixty years he seemed, and well might last
> To fifty more, but that he lived too fast."

A description which must not be understood in the present sense of the last phrase, as the model pastor "made almost a sin of abstinence," and lived too fast in speeding to heaven. Neither this sort of excess, nor any other, is to be seen in the folks who well might last to a hundred in Bath; but we believe that temperate good living contributes much to the extraordinary longevity of the place, and nowhere is marketing better and cheaper. But the inevitable hour must strike sooner or later, and the city of the aged has a corresponding death-rate. And here let us suggest that a column of average age would throw light on the death-rates, and serve to distinguish from unhealthy places, places sought for health and prolonging life. The Isle of Wight has the lowest death-rate, in compensation for all its other rates of the very highest. If any live too fast there it is in the way of Dryden's good parson, but the abstinence is not, indeed, almost a sin, but very much of a necessity, and to this, perhaps, the standard of health is referrable. No one sits too long at table, and the tough meats and stringy fowls make a case of repletion an utter impossibility. We can imagine nothing more advisable for the high-liver than a course of the Isle of Wight. It will fine him down better than any training, and lighten in person not less than in pocket, which is saying much indeed. London Examiner.

IT was pretty generally known that Mr. Solicitor-Gen. Bushe was to succeed to the Justiceship of the King's Bench, or of Common Pleas, in Ireland, as soon as either became vacant. Some in his presence was highly and most deservedly praising Chief Justice Downes, who, he asserted, possessed every virtue under heaven. "No," said Mr. Bushe, "I am sorry to say he does not possess the virtue of resignation."

M. LALANDE dined one day at the house of Recamier the banker: he was seated between the celebrated beauty, Mme. Recamier, and Mme. de Stael, equally distinguished for her wit. Wishing to say something agreeable to the ladies, the astronomer exclaimed, "How happy I am to be thus placed between wit and beauty!" "Yes, M. Lalande," sarcastically replied Mme. de Stael, "and without possessing either."

LORD Brougham's son, when a minor, and consequently dependent on his father for support, was noted somewhat for his attention to a young actress of the French theatre. His father wrote the following laconic epistle: "If you do not quit her, I will stop your allowance." To which the son replied, "If you do not double it I'll marry her."

TRIAL.

"WHAT! pouting and cross? What is it, love?
Only a frown, and not a word?"
Pray, had I angered her, or perchance
The depths of her little being stirred?

Cross, so cross—and a great, dark frown
There, where the sunshine always lingers;
Spitefully sewing, she doesn't heed
The needle that pricks her restless fingers.

Pray, can I smooth out the frowns, or bring
The sunshine back to her face to stay?
Ah! thunder will come to the clearest sky,
And love can't escape the earthquake day.

Kisses I'll give her—I know they serve
To smooth out the ruffles in roughest lives;
Kisses will cure all the infant's ills,
And kisses, the little griefs of wives.

So I said: "Come, love, kiss and make up!"
She stirred, and her passion I thought I'd routed;
"Kiss me!"—she frowned still—"Kiss me, love!"
Ah! she put up her lips—but only pouted!

THE WHITE WOLF.

(TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH OF PAUL FEVAL.)

Chapter I.—The Song.

THE Forest of Rennes is utterly despoiled of its antique glory. The improvements of cultivation, during fifty years, have caused a terrible massacre of its fine trees. In former days, Messrs. De Rohan, De Montbourcher and De Chateaubriand, hunted the deer in this very forest, in company with the lords of Laval, (whom they expressly invited,) and of the Intendant Royal, whom they would willingly have passed by. At present, it is rarely and with difficulty that the red-faced clerks of the masters of the forges can kill a sickly rabbit or an emaciated roe.

Some rub their hands with satisfaction at the aspect of such a result. They say that the castles serve no purpose, and that the workshops make nails. We have ourselves arrived at a very positive conclusion on this subject, but will reserve the expression of our opinion for a more favorable opportunity.

However this may be, in the place of some square kilometers, covered with heavy timber, of which three-quarters were underwood, the Forest of Rennes had, a hundred and fifty years ago, eight good leagues of circumference, with adjacent forests so vast and thickly covered that the rangers themselves would sometimes lose their way.

In the place of manufactories, you would find wooden-shoe shops, and also huts where they made hoops for barrels. There was a large number of charcoal-burners, and, in fact, the population of the forest did not number less than from four to five thousand inhabitants.

They were a half-savage people, born enemies of any innovation, and detesting by instinct any other régime than the old-fashioned customs which tacitly accorded to them the right to an unlimited use of all the products of the forest, save the game. From time immemorial, the wooden-shoe makers, coopers, charcoal-burners and basket-makers had been able not only to ignore the name of tax, but also to help themselves to all the wood they needed for their employments without any security. The forest was, according to their belief, their legitimate patrimony—they were born there, and had the undeniable right to live and die there. Whoever contested this right became for them an iniquitous oppressor, and they were not the people to suffer without resisting the oppression.

Louis XIV. was dead, and Philip of Orleans, in defiance of the will of the late monarch, possessed himself of the regency. Although this prince (whom history judges severely and justly) chose to forget the grand policy of his master, this policy still existed by its own strength wherever unskilful and perfidious hands did not undertake to undermine it secretly. In Brittany, the long and valiant resistance of the States was at an end. A collector of taxes had been installed at Rennes, and the compact of union, greatly amended, no longer regarded its proud stipulations in favor of the liberties of the province. The Breton party was defeated—Brittany became France decidedly—there was no longer a frontier.

But it was one thing to agree upon a measure in Parliament and quite another to have this measure passed with a people with whom obstinacy has become proverbial. M. de Ponchartrain, the new Collector Royal of taxes, was legally invested with his functions—it remained for him to execute his mandate, which was no easy matter. Everywhere they accused the States of forfeiture—everywhere they resisted. The association of freres-bretons, organized for the defence of the liberties of the province, and having in reality no political object, continued to exist and to act in the dark. It is the characteristic of these assemblies to survive, as it were, in themselves. Free-masonry, which is dead, will live longer than we ourselves. The Breton-brothers at first refused the tax, sword in hand—then yielded, but even in yielding they protested. We will find their traces twenty years after the events that we are about to relate. The mystery lies in man's nature. Secret societies never are known to die but of old age, and God knows how long that endures.

In 1719, almost every nobleman retired from the association, but it still subsisted, energetic and indestructible, among the lower classes of the cities and villages. Those nobles who still belonged to it were the object of a peculiar worship. The castles to which these obstinate partisans of independence retired became the centre around which assembled the discontented. They were, as yet, powerless to act upon a grand scale, but their opposition (if we may be excused the anachronism), was made in all security. It became necessary, in order to destroy them, to devastate the country with fire and sword. After what we have said of the Forest of Rennes, its inhabitants would seem to be the most determined in resistance. Its population, composed entirely of poor people, ignorant and inured to the rudest labors, was in a condition singularly favorable to this opposition. Numerous and united enough to fight, if no other resource should be left them, the people of the forest waited, confident in the inaccessible retreats that the country offered at each step—above all, confident in the perfect knowledge they had of their forest, that immense and sombre labyrinth where the under-wood touched at the same time the country of Rennes and the faubourgs of Fougeres and Le Vitré. In these three cities they had numerous adherents.

There was living at this time a man whom they respected so highly that if he had said to them, "Pay the tax to the King of France," they would, very likely, have obeyed him. But this man did not care to do so. He was, in fact, one of the most obstinate of the remainder of the Breton association, and his voice was heard from time to time in the halls of State, loudly protesting against the encroachments of the House of Bourbon. His name was Nicolas Tremi de la Tremlays, Lord of Bouexis-en-Foret, and he was the owner of a domain about half a league from the bourg of Liffré, which made him lord of almost all the country. His castle of Tremlays was one of the most beautiful in Upper Brittany, and his manor of Bouexis was scarcely less magnificent. It was a journey of two hours from one to the other, and the whole route lay in the estate of Nicolas Tremi. He was an old man, of tall stature and austere countenance; his long white hair fell in scanty locks over the coarse cloth of his old-fashioned doublet; age had not dimmed the fire in his eye, and when he rode through the forest, firm and erect in the saddle, the people would say to each other as he passed: "As long as Monsieur lives, there will be one Breton in the country; and woe to the blood-suckers of France!"

They spoke truly: the patriotism of Nicolas Tremi was as ungovernable as exclusive. The gradual decay of the Independent party, far from acting as a warning, only served to increase his obstinacy. From year to year his colleagues in the States listened with less and less favor to his vehement protestations. But still he protested, and, sword in hand, thundered forth his denunciations against the representative of the Crown.

One day, while he was speaking, some of the nobility commenced to laugh, and several voices murmured: "Well, M. de la Tremlays has certainly lost his reason."

He was silent in an instant. A deathly pallor overspread his countenance. Taking his hat, he slowly gained the door of the hall, and, stopping at the threshold, he crossed his arms, and casting a long look of defiance at the assembled nobility, said, in a voice which penetrated to the extreme end of the hall, "I thank my God to have lost only my reason, while these gentlemen, my peers, have lost their courage."

At this insult, these proud noblemen bounded from their seats, and twenty swords were instantly drawn. Nicolas Tremi did not stir.

"Put up your swords!" said he. "I, too, have been insulted, and I choose to retire. It is not Breton blood which provokes my anger. Farewell, gentlemen. I pray God that your children may forget their fathers and remember their grandfathers! I separate myself from you and renounce you. You have entombed Brittany. When there is no longer a time for fight there is sometimes a time for revenge."

M. de la Tremlays mounted his horse and proceeded homewards. No one who met him would have surmised the vindictive thoughts which possessed his mind. Strong in heart as well as in body, he well knew how to keep his anger to himself.

The sun had nearly set as he entered the forest. He contemplated with satisfaction the natural and impregnable intrenchments offered at every step by that virgin soil; he involuntarily counted the vigorous and brave men who saluted him from a distance with such respectful affection. "War," said he to himself, "might be a very terrible thing, with these soldiers and these retreats."

He checked his horse and dreamed on. Suddenly a wild idea crossed his mind, and he knit his heavy brows. He drew himself up, and his eye seemed to burn with a strange and savage glare.

"No war!" said he, at last; "no war! a duel! one single blow! one single death!"

And M. de la Tremlays, putting spurs to his horse, completed the plan of a scheme whose extravagant boldness would bring a smile to the lips of a man of sense, and which could hardly be sanctioned, even if crowned with success. He was not blind to the madness of the undertaking, but he was a man of inflexible purpose, and though seeing the precipice open before him, would not stop for the narrowness of the road.

One single circumstance caused him to hesitate. The house of La Tremlays had but one direct heir, and that was Georges Tremi, his grandson. What would become of this child of five years of age, if deprived of his natural protector? Nicolas Tremi impatiently considered this objection.

"If I succeed," thought he, "Georges will have an inheritance of glory. If I fail, my cousin de Vaunoy will keep his patrimony for him. Vaunoy is a loyal gentleman."

As he thus spoke to himself, a shrill voice in the distance was heard singing the refrain of a song of the country—it was a slow, monotonous and melancholy air, and accompanied the gloomy story of the death of Arthur of Brittany, wickedly killed by his uncle, Jean Sans Terre.

M. de la Tremlays shuddered, and felt at his heart a fearful presentiment.

"Impossible!" murmured he; "Vaunoy is a faithful parent." . . .

The voice came nearer, and the song seemed to take a shade of irony.

"However," pursued the old gentleman, "George is a Breton; his welfare, as his blood, belongs to Brittany."

The voice was silent for a few moments—then rose higher than ever, just above him. He looked up quickly, and perceived at the top of a gigantic chestnut tree a being of extraordinary and diabolical appearance. His body, lighted up by the rays of the setting sun, seemed to emit a dim glimmer. If a traveller had met him in the forests of the New World he would not have accorded to him the name of man, and the natural history of M. de Buffon would contain one article more. This strange creature jumped from one branch to another with marvellous agility, and at each leap a number of small branches fell to the ground. His song was continued.

It was evidently not the first time that M. de la Tremlays had met this personage, for he checked his horse without manifesting any surprise, and whistled, as if calling to a dog.

The song suddenly ceased, and the creature fell at the feet of the old nobleman, giving utterance to an amicable and respectful growl.

It was certainly a man, and was still more extraordinary than when seen at a distance. His naked legs, covered with colorless hair, supported a body very deformed and much too short. His neck, bony and planted, like a bird's, upon his hollow chest, was surmounted by an angular face, whose bones were covered with a tightly-drawn skin, white, downy. His hair, eyebrows and beard were white, and his red eyes glittered in the midst of this milky surrounding. There was nothing about him to indicate his precise age—he might have been a child or an old man—his extreme activity, however, could belong to neither, and youth alone could have concealed so much vigorous suppleness under this wretched, miserable exterior.

He sprung from the ground and planted himself in the middle of the road, directly in front of the horse.

"How is your father, Jean Blanc?" asked M. de la Tremlays.

"How is your son, Nicolas Tremi?" replied the albino.

A cloud overspread the old man's face. This sudden question corresponded mysteriously with the subject of his recent troubled reverie. "You are becoming insolent, my boy," grumbled he; "I am too good towards all you villains, and that makes you bold. Get out of my way, and don't let me see you again!"

Instead of obeying this command, delivered with much severity of manner, Jean Blanc seized the horse's bridle, and quietly smiled.

"You are mistaken, my lord," said he, in a sweet and melancholy voice. "It is not towards us, poor people, that you are too good, but toward others, whom you love, and who detest you in return."

"Peace, fool!" interrupted Nicolas Tremi. The albino still held the bridle and continued: "The father of Jean Blanc is well. Jean Blanc watched over him yesterday; to-morrow he will watch over him again. Yesterday, you watched over George Tremi; will you watch over him to-morrow, my lord?"

"What do you mean to say?" demanded Nicolas Tremi.

"That is a beautiful song about Arthur of Britanny. . . . Listen, I know how to wander about under cover as well as how to leap among the branches of the chestnut trees. I have followed you a long time in the forest; you were conversing with your conscience. I understood it, and I sang the song about Arthur.

"What!" exclaimed M. de la Tremlays; "you heard me. . . . You know all?" . . .

"No, not all; you said too many foolish things for me to understand all. But take my advice: Do not leave our little M. Georges at the mercy of a cousin. If you go far, take him with you—if you cannot take him, kill him; but don't abandon him. And now, I am going to cut branches for cask-hoops. God bless you, Nicolas Tremi!

The albino let go the bridle, and sprung into the tree. Night was fast coming on. The costume of this fantastic creature, composed of rabbit skins and white like his body, was easily distinguished among the branches, through which he jumped with indescribable swiftness.

M. de la Tremlays resumed his journey in a very pensive mood.

"He is a poor crazy creature," said he to himself, but his heart felt more and more anguish; and when the voice of Jean Blanc came again to him wafted over the heads of the great forest trees, the old nobleman felt his very soul freezing within him and pronounced, in shuddering the name of his little grandson.

"CHILE COLORADOS."

DURING the Mexican war, when troops were gathering at Brazos Santiago and the mouth of the Rio Grande, the steamer came in one day and landed at the former place the regiment known as the Mounted Rifles, commanded by General (then Colonel) Sumner. How well I remember the splendid appearance they made as they marched along the beach the nine miles from the Brazos to the mouth of the Rio Grande, Col. Sumner at their head; and when they halted, while he rode forward to consult the Post Quartermaster as to the best location for the camp, I walked among them, and could not but confess that I never had seen such a splendid body of men, and so many Americans, in one regiment. They were all Northwestern men, and nearly every one a crack shot with the rifle. The regiment was serving as Infantry, their horses having been left behind. The Colonel soon returned, and, as his eye glanced over the plain, he pointed out a spot that, from its green and grassy appearance, caught his eye, and it looked so refreshingly clean that he at once said, "I'll camp there."

Major E. A. Ogden, then Quartermaster at the post, replied: "Colonel, I think you had better try the sand-plain a little beyond, for, during 'Northers,' that ground is sometimes overflowed, and our first one of the season is due."

The Colonel, who never liked suggestions, pooh-poohed it, and gave the order. The spot bordered the lagoon and was covered with salt-grass, and, at that time, was perfectly dry. In an hour the aspect of things had materially changed: a little canvas city had sprung into existence as if by magic. By this time it was nearly sundown, and the evening breeze wafted towards our rude wooden shanty the fragrant odor of fried bacon; and, as I had not dined, it was very suggestive. Putting my head out of the back door, I hailed the kitchen near at hand with the inquiry as to "that dinner," and whether it ever would be ready. I was answered by my Mexican boy, Sancho, with the usual "Poco, poco, señor." However, we soon sat down to a very passable dinner, the principal dish being one of the country, which we were all trying to learn to eat, and which involved the shedding of more tears than any of us had ever shed in our lives. It was a dish of meat and other ingredients all chopped up, but the principal one seemed to be peppers—little peppers, big peppers, and vicious peppers called "Chile colorados," which were about as large as peas, (red,) and the most outrageously sharp little things that I ever attempted to swallow. We had sworn to learn to eat this dish, and no one would admit that he could not. We would take a mouthful and then seize a glass of water frantically. As we sat around that rude table, with the tears streaming down our cheeks, a stranger would have imagined we were all in the deepest affliction. While in the act of discussing this dish, there was a tap at the door, and Col. Sumner thrust his head inside. "Boys," said he, "I have invited myself to dine with you. My cook has not got the run of the commissariat yet and there is a deuced poor show over at my tent."

Of course, we were only too glad to have the Colonel join us; after a basin of soup, he espied our grand dish in the middle of the table, and said: .

"Ah, that looks nice! I'm mighty sharp-set; give me a try at it."

We helped him, remarking that it was a hot dish for a new comer, and that we were all trying to learn to like it, as it was a Mexican national affair; and it was that or nothing in the interior.

I said, "Colonel, look out; it's very hot."

He was just taking in a large mouthful; but, not heeding my caution, swallowed it, and had the second installment in his mouth when it began to take hold, good and strong. I saw him gasp, and the astonished expression of his countenance I never shall forget. He laid down his fork, grasped the table with both hands, and made a superhuman effort to maintain an unconcerned look; but it was useless. He sprang to his feet, dashed out of our tent, and commenced at the top of his voice to shout, "Orderly!" None of us followed, for we dare not; but there were three men nearly choked with the bread they had crammed into their mouths to prevent roaring. Outside of the tent was a barrel of water and a tin dipper, and we heard the unmistakable plunge of the cup into the barrel and a gurgling sound between the shouts of "Orderly!" Presently the Colonel entered. There were traces of tears upon his face; his eyes were red and his mouth was open partially, as if to inhale the cool air.

"Beg pardon, gentlemen," said he; "I forgot to order 'tattoo' early, as the men are tired, and that rascal of an orderly is out of the way when I want him."

We offered to send for him, but he wouldn't hear of it. The dinner went on; but I noticed the Colonel avoided the "Chile colorados" as if they were certain death. We had a good stiff toddy to wind up, and the Colonel took his leave with what seemed to be a perpetual thirst, for he drank water constantly and in great quantities. As soon as he had left we gave vent to the pent-up laughter that now broke forth. I was lying near the mouth of the tent, rolling on the ground, with both hands on my sides to ease the pain of such a rush of laugh that I thought I should suffocate, when the curtain of the tent was suddenly drawn back and the Colonel thrust his head in, with a "Beg pardon, but I forgot my cape." There was a sudden hush, and I rolled under the table to escape observation. The others rose and handed him his cloak; and for a moment, as we listened to his retreating footsteps, the silence prevailed. But it couldn't last, and the roar went on. We all hoped the Colonel had not imagined we were laughing at him; for in those days we stood more in awe of a colonel in command of a regiment than we do now of a General of Division. However, next day we heard nothing of it; but the story leaked out. We had to tell it to the "subs," of course.

In the evening I dropped over at the Rifle camp, to pass an hour or two with the fellows and smoke a pipe. It was a calm, star-light evening, and we sat rather late. All at once a low, muttering, roaring sound was heard. The new-comers started up and said, "What's that?" I knew it mighty well; it was a "Norther"—one of those typhoons of the sand-plains of Texas that bursts upon you with no note of warning other than the low roaring of the coming cloud, blacker than midnight, bounding the horizon, and settling like the pall of death, while every breath of air is hushed, and the frightened animals and birds seek cover in haste. The black cloud extending from the sky to the ground presses onward with a deep, dull roar that grows louder as it approaches, bearing upon its onward and resistless march every lighter object strewing the ground, and bearing before it a furrow, as it were, of sand and dust. Suddenly it breaks upon you with the chill of the icy regions of perpetual snow; and from a genial and balmy atmosphere, you are suddenly shivering in your linen habiliments, and hastily seeking heavy woollens and great-coats.

These "Northers" occur in Texas and on the Gulf coast about twice a month, during the winter, and last from three to nine days, and constitute the "winter" of that latitude. The intervals are lovely, and the climate charming.

I bade the boys a hasty "Good-night," and cautioning them to look out for their tents, I trotted towards the guard-tent, to be passed out of the lines by the officer of the guard, anxious to get home and make things all snug for the approaching storm; but somehow, in my haste, I turned in the wrong direction, and missed the tent. I began to retrace my steps when the whirlwind burst upon the devoted camp, whirling sand and the sharp rain-drops in my face, almost blinding me. Amid the scene of confusion that followed, tents flying through the air, the flapping of the "tent-flies," and the shouts of the soldiers trying to secure them, I struck out boldly in the direction of my abode, believing that in the darkness and blinding rain I could easily pass the sentinel and save time, I had got fairly past the line as I fancied, and was congratulating myself upon soon being snug in my bunk, rolled up in warm blankets, when I was startled by a voice: "Who goes there?" almost hissed in my ear, and, at the same time, a flash of lightning revealed a musket with the point of the bayonet in very uncomfortable proximity to my breast, upon which, if I had not stopped, I apparently would have been "spitted" in another step. I tried to tell the sentinel who I was by shouting at musket-and-bayonet distance, which was as near as he would let me come, but it was useless; he could not understand, and would not let me pass. I said, "Then I'll go back." He replied, "Guess not." "Well, then," said I, "call the sergeant of the guard." He did try it, but it was a waste of breath, and we might as well have tried to whisper under the Falls of Niagara. The sergeant couldn't hear, and did not, of course, come to rescue me. The sentinel wouldn't let me go on, nor go back. There was a fix! I screamed out. "What am I to do?" To which he replied, "Walk up and down in front of me." There was no alternative. I did ask him if his gun was loaded; he said it was. "Well," said I, "do you think you can hit me if you give me two or three jumps the start?" Said he thought he could "plump" me with his bayonet before I got much of a start, and if he saw any attempt he would try me. I saw it was dangerous to fool with that fellow. I had to succumb, and for nearly two mortal hours did I march up and down on that fellow's "beat," within convenient "prodding" distance of the bayonet, which gleamed maliciously in the cold lightning flashes.

Wet to the skin, and chilled to the bone—my teeth chattering, my hat blown away—I was generally wretched. But all things must end; even those two hours, that were ages of misery, terminated, and the "relief" came. I was marched off a prisoner to the guard tent, and there identified, and the sergeant ordered to pass me out. As I turned to go, I heard a voice say, "Who have you there, Sergeant?" It was the Colonel, who, wrapped in his big cloak, had been in person superintending the securing of the tents, and looking after the comfort of his men. The sergeant held his lantern up to my face, and the Colonel said, "Ah! what the devil does this mean?" I in a few words explained, and above the howling of the storm rose the shout of laughter, as he comprehended my plight. Grabbing me by the shoulder, and putting his lips close to my ear, he said: "Cold out there, eh? Why didn't you bring your 'Chile colorados' with you? 'Gad, sir, you wasn't smart! My turn now, eh?"

As he turned away, I could hear above the whistling of the wind his hearty laugh. I saw it: The Colonel was avenged, and the next day every officer and soldier in the camp enjoyed the "rig" on the "sutler."

The storm lulled a little, and there were signs of clearing up, but I observed the ominous leaden hue of the horizon, and knew that it would come on again that night, and be worse than ever. Building up a good fire in our old-fashioned stove, which had a hole in the top for a tea-kettle, we gathered around it with our pipes and toddy, and prepared to have a jolly night of it, inasmuch as there was little chance to sleep. The night waned, the pipes were replenished, the toddy passed around, and the storm howled; but we were all as gay as larks, as our rude shanty defied the elements, and one of our number was singing, in a good, strong, and well-cultivated voice, the drinking song from Lucrezia Borgia, "'Tis better to laugh than be sighing," when there was a loud knock at the door, and a cry of "Open!" The object that presented itself was one of damp wretchedness. With a sword under one arm, a bundle of clothes under the other, a pair of long boots in one hand, in the other a pair of holsters—bare-headed, bare-footed—stood the gallant commander of the Rifle regiment. I understood it at once: The wind had driven the tide over the camping-ground, and it was at that moment two feet under water, and everybody afloat. I knew there must be a grabbing time of it up there, and sympathized with the poor devils. We soon had the Colonel alongside of the stove drying, and I mixed a good stiff toddy, while his teeth played like castanetts. I handed it to him, as I did so remarking "Colonel, wouldn't you prefer a little 'Chile colorado?' It's very warming."

He turned upon me fiercely and said, "What's that, sir?—what's that you say?" He swallowed the toddy, and, shaking the cup at me in a menacing manner, said: "Even, sir! even, sir! but if you ever dare to 'peach,' I'll shoot you."

I had quite forgotten the circumstance, and was very busy writing at my desk one morning, when two gentlemen entered. One was Col. Drum, whom I had never before seen, and the other I recognized at once as Gen. Sumner, who made his appearance here so suddenly and assumed command of the Department of the Pacific before Gen. Johnson was fairly aware of his arrival. The General came along up by my desk, and with a very comical expression remarked, "I think we have met before."

"Yes," said I, "at the mouth of the Rio Grande.

"I dined with you, I believe. 'Chile colorados,' eh?" continued the General, giving me a punch with his thumb in the ribs. "'Chile colorados!'—hot, hot—devilish hot!"

PODGERS.

ON FURLOUGH.

O MOTHER, dear, pray draw the dimity curtain,
And pile the blazing logs of hickory higher;
Nay—take away the lamp, I better like the uncertain,
The fitful lights and shadows of the fire.

Do you know, when lying in the swampy thicket,
I have heard you Pussy purring on the hearth,
And the faint chirping of that very cricket,
Whose shy notes from that shaking stone come forth?

I have thought of your lone hours, and how much dearer
Than all the weary world you were to me;
Come! bring your chair—the lullaby-rocker—nearer;
Is its creak crazier than it used to be?

Somehow, to-night, in ghastly panorama,
Rises the past of your poor thoughtless boy;
A toddling baby—crying "Mamma! mamma!"—
A romping urchin shouting for his toy;

Snowballs, and skates, and sleds, the very jingling
Of the old sleigh-bells echo in my ear;
And the sharp winds that set my blood a-tingling,
Shiver me now. Mother, is that a tear?

My boyhood love—the winsome, dashing Mary—
Dimples and curls, and kisses and delight;
O bonnie, bonnie, lightsome-hearted fairy!
The dead grass whistles o'er your grave to-night.

And all day long I seem to see the golden,
The shining hair—the eyes so grave and sweet;
But when her smile my yearning arms embolden,
She vanisheth, on swift but noiseless feet.

Pray, stir the fire!—the room grows dark and chilly—
And lift the curtain to let in the moon,
I wish to-night that I could stop the shrilly,
The crazy cry of that disconsolate loon.

Do you say the fire is bright? Then, I am dying;
For I feel no warmth, and see so faint a light;
O, mother, mother! do not fall a-crying!
'Twas you that taught me all His ways are right.

The boys all think they have the best of mothers,
The mothers think they have the bravest sons;
And I, who played as captain to the others,
With paper soldier-caps and cornstalk guns,

And made the village noisy with our bluster,
Our sham-fights, and our camp-fires' crackling flame—
When they went nobly at their country's muster,
Could their boy-captain stay at home in shame?

I led them through a storm of cannon-thunder,
And lead hail showering from the clouds of smoke,
With powder lightning tearing the air asunder,
And great shells raining death in every stroke.

Many of them are dead, and many missing,
But the rude graves and the wild swamps only know
Where they now lie—without a mother's kissing.
Ah! I am blest I did not perish so!

Oh, lift me up! I seem as one half-fainting
In the broad space of some vast vestibule,
Through whose great doors flow floods of molten painting,
And far away streams ripple, fresh and cool.

A gorgeous cloud floats in the upper regions,
Crimson and White—Stars on an Azure sea,
Its precious folds upheld by martyred legions—
There my lost comrades wait and watch for me.

EMILIE LAWSON.

THE POET'S LOT.

WHAT is a poet's love?—
To write a girl a sonnet,
To get a ring, or some such thing,
And fustianize upon it.

What is a poet's fame?—
Sad hints about his reason,
And sadder praise from garreteers,
To be returned in season.

Where go the poet's lines?—
Answer, ye evening tapers!
Ye auburn locks, ye golden curls,
Speak from your folded papers!

Child of the ploughshare, smile;
Boy of the counter, grieve not,
Though muses round thy trundle-bed
Their broidered tissue weave not.

The poet's future holds
No civic wreath above him;
Nor slated roof, nor varnished chaise,
Nor wife nor child to love him.

Maid of the village inn,
Who workest woe on satin,
(The grass in black, the graves in green,
The epitaph in Latin.)

Trust not to them who say,
In stanzas, they adore thee;
O rather sleep in churchyard clay,
With urns and cherubs o'er thee!

[O. W. Holmes.

A FRIGHT IN THE CAUCASUS.

WE were in Asiatic Turkey—the Ottoman Empire. The remains of grand old ruins arose in broken spire and jutting pinnacle on every side, and places connected with important events were pointed out, on every hand, by our officious but indispensable guides, Avic and Berue.

We had traversed Syria, the provinces including Palestine; had surveyed, with mixed and varied feelings, the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. We had visited Smyrna, and, becoming tired of the fruit and rag vendors, we held a solemn conclave to know which route to travel.

Berne said our journals would be stale affairs unless we ran down and spent a night in the Caucasus mountains. So we pushed on for Asiatic Russia, and agreed to put ourselves for one night at least under the guidance of the reckless but experienced Berue.

The least agreeable item connected with this undertaking was the fact that, lying as they did between the Black and Caspian Seas, we might be beset by a species of pirate that annually descended from the high altitude of their mountain-home to make little excursions about the coast in pursuit of plunder—such gentry always finding some of the natives willing to supply them with the rude shore-boats, whereby they could overtake and capture the little four-oared traders that carried their small hut valuable cargoes down the Caspian to Tabreez, or across the Black Sea to Constantinople.

We lumbered along, our steeds making little headway over the rough road, if road it might be called, and at last entered upon a long, low defile, rocky and barren on its walled sides, but affording, in the valley below, some coarse slight browse for our horses. Avic advised us to tie our steeds two and two, a native horse and a foreign one together, so in case of trouble with marauding travellers—the piratical ruffians just spoken of—that we might the more readily save them. The horses of the gnides, being of the mountain breed, would readily allow themselves to be caught; while ours, unused to the wild costume and wilder gibberish of the prowlers, would naturally enough dislike being captured, and being by far the strongest steeds, could whirl the others around to suit themselves.

Readily conceiving his object and embracing it as a cunning suggestion, we sent our trusty steeds down the slope and prepared to ascend the height and look for a fit situation for repose. I was somewhat exhausted when we arrived upon a rocky projection, before named by Berne as "Safety Lodge."

The air was rare and rather chilly, coming as it did from the untropical country of Siberia, which country, although rich in gold and silver, is not thought to be a desirable country for emigration.

The night proved clear and moonlit; and after conversing on real, probable and improbable things, the male portion retreating into a natural cavern, prepared to sleep away the hours of the night.

I said the male portion; but I forgot to say that Avic, whom I shall always think was a sort of man-monkey, kept watch from the top of a gray rock, that, being so much higher up, looked about large enough for the foothold of a bird. Wrapped in my husband's shaggy coat, I prepared to stay outside and poetize, having a substratum of sentiment underlying my broad, rough, matter-of-fact exterior.

I remember I was walking off with the beloved Moore into the adjoining country of Iran, "beloved of our hero," when the funniest, sharpest whistle came cutting out from the rocks above. I at first supposed it was our guide up there preparing to run off a stave of song in that manner; yet a moment after I detected him leaning over the rock in such a singular attitude that I divined him to be listening for its repetition. I stepped into the cavern and awoke our male portion, who, with hazardous carelessness, had been asleep an hour or more. I said to my husband:

"I have heard a singular whistle-call higher up the mountain, which sounded to me very much like the signal of some night prowler to another."

"Nonsense," was the gallant response. "Probably, it was some animal in search of its mate. There is no need of fear. Avic—"

"But step out and see Avic. I think, to judge of his attitude, he hardly takes it for bird or beast."

Just as we came to the door or entrance, from the lofty peak again came, cutting through the night, that same sharp sound. In a moment it was answered from below—from the sharp latitude of our horses.

"Oh, ha! yes, yes! that does sound suspicious; but—"

Here Avic made a rapid, heteregeneous descent, striking in his usual catlike manner on his feet.

"Your horses are in danger down there, I judge. You noticed the answered whistle came from the ravine."

The next order was similar to the military parlance, "Boots and saddle."

With rapid, agile movements we descended the mountain, each one holding his weapons securely and in readiness for an attack. Cautiously approaching our horses we found them busily feeding, apparently quite unconcerned about marauders. We came to a standstill, not knowing what to do. Our position was a solid square, three each way; and were standing in one of those chasms that show a perpendicular wall of dark gray, limestone-like rock and which open by a gradual descent into the adjacent valleys.

As we stood there, there came one, two, three, four—clap—clap—clap, indescribable sounds, as if the rocks were splitting over our heads in harsh echoes. Clap, clap, clap! dust, particles of brush and softer materials rained upon us, mingled with the wildest cries and those infernal claps.

One loud, simultaneous howl broke from our congregated party, and each one seemed only intent upon giving the loudest yell. Avic gave the first of the second series of howls, quickly followed by the rest, however, as soon as our eyes were sufficiently clear of dust to discover our assailants. A small flock of remarkably large birds, looking like a mixed breed of buzzards and pelicans, had been disturbed in their roosting-place, and the clap, clap of the wings of the first one to take flight was followed quickly by the clatter of the whole flock reverberating in thunder tones from the sides of the rocky defile.

We laughed heartily, although Avic cautioned us we had not yet discovered the origin of the sharp whistle that had startled us from our repose; but we were inclined to account for it in a light manner. However, we resolved to keep in the shadow of the rocks and watch our horses for the remainder of the night. Nothing disturbed us, although I often think that our uproar and unearthly yells, echoing among the rocks, in all probability saved us the trouble by alarming the ruffians, who might be meditating an attack.

At dawn we saddled and started on our way, smiling to ourselves as we thought of our fright in the Caucasus.

ETIQUETTE.

IN an amusing critique of a new work on this subject, the Saturday Review says: In the Etiquette of Courtship, introductions again play an important part. Flirtation, indeed, may be carried on without them, as "churches and chapels, lectures, Sunday-school teachings, music meetings, singing classes, omnibus and railway journeyings, picnics, fancy-fairs and bazaars, and a thousand other ways open to society a wide field for indulgence in that dangerous pastime." Of all these, a strict regard for truth compels the writer to give the first place to "mutual attendance at church or chapel." As a rule, he considers these "church courtships" destructive of propriety, but he allows that even here, "when the eye falls" upon a young lady who is behaving herself properly, "the person so distinguished may be graven in the memory," and an introduction legitimately, though patiently, sought for. After this privilege has been secured, the gentleman is recommended to obtain the consent of the lady's parents to visit at their house upon such a footing as will not "compromise himself or the lady he seeks to win, should he find upon more intimate acquaintance that she is not calculated to make him happy." During this probationary period both the persons concerned are naturally on their best behavior. The lady puts forth all her accomplishments, the gentleman is lavish of his attentions. Still, he must keep his tendency to make presents under restraint until he becomes an accepted lover, though flowers offered to the young lady, and still more to her sisters, may be accepted without compromise to the neutral position of the parties, while a little "choice fruit, or game, or small dainty of which the family can partake," will be a still more appropriate offering. We know nothing in literature prettier than the picture which these last words present to us, of the blushing maiden shyly glancing at her adorer as he bashfully unpapers a sweetbread, or draws an early cucumber from his pocket. These thrilling moments may also be utilized in ascertaining whether the young lady has any notion how such tokens of affection are to be cooked. But this is too important a point to be cared for only on exceptional occasions. The ordinary course of the family meals will supply "little scraps of information" which no wise observer will disregard. "'Oh, you must taste Lucy's cake!'—'A morsel of Ally's pudding,' or 'My Julia's partridge pie,' are the pleasant injunctions from one to the other which a man may turn to good account, and by a few adroit remarks, elicit enough for his purpose." It must not be supposed, however, that our author is always thus practical and prosaic. On the contrary, he numbers among the "indications of mutual liking and admiration,"

> The pressing of the thrilling hand,
> The kiss so guiltless and refined.

But even here his wonted caution does not quite desert him, and he is careful to add, "Poetry, charming as it is, must not override etiquette; and our rules will admit of no kiss being given or received until the proposal has sanctioned such an endearment." Indeed, on the slightest approach to flirtation the Handbook is markedly severe, and its language rises to almost tragic eloquence as it depicts the coquette "artfully causing her victim to indulge in a sort of St. Vitus's dance, and then, with a low laugh of scorn, leaving him to conclude his gyrations. Such women help to fill our lunatic asylums, and to augment bachelordom." Alas! why did he not tell them they might help to augment spinsterdom? Then indeed there might have been some chance of his scathing denunciations being attended to.

PLATO was one day entertaining some friends of Dionysius, when the tyrant Diogenes entered with an unusually firm step, saying, "I tread on Plato's pride!" "Yes," said the latter, "and with greater pride!"

ARMY IMPROVEMENTS.

THE cat-o'-nine-tails must be given up. It is little used—it is the principle rather than the practice to which disciplinarians cling; but it scares many a lad who would take the shilling with a good heart were it abolished. The present paltry pensions to invalided men injured bona fide in and by the service should be increased and prolonged. The sight of a poor wretch begging on the highway, stone blind from the black sand of Aldershott, and starving on a miserable sixpence a day, or of a maimed object crippled by a kick from a comrade's charger, and who has been refused a renewal of the pittance of eightpence a day granted to him for three years, is a disheartening spectacle to the would-be recruit, and gives the service a bad name throughout a whole district. Where permanent disability is the result of a mishap in the service, a permanent pension is due to the sufferer, and where the disability is total, the pension should bear some approximation to the means of living. Were it possible to introduce any system whereby an increased number of soldiers might be enabled to enter into, and have fair facilities for being happy in, the married state, such a scheme would assist us much in getting a much better class of men to enter the service, and would also help us in our efforts to retain time-expired men; many of whom leave the service for no other reason than that they are anxious to marry, which they are not permitted to do, and who would die sooner than condemn a woman to the wretchedness and poverty, which is the all but inevitable lot of one who marries a soldier without leave from his commanding officer. This is a subject on which many pages might be written, but from its very comprehensiveness it cannot be more than alluded to here. It has been proposed that the term of actual service should be curtailed in time of peace to, say, one or two years; at the end of which period the soldier should be free either to return into civil life, the army retaining a lien on his services in case of need, or to remain in his regiment permanently; and that thus "a stream of men would be continually flowing through the army." We fear this scheme is impracticable. We want a standing army; not a fluctuating body, the component parts of which are altering every day. We want soldiers, not men who have once dabbled a little in soldiering, and then gone back to the plough-tail or the factory. This scheme would only keep men in actual service during that first year of licking into shape upon which all soldiers look back with unmitigated disgust, and its victims would go back into civil life with a settled dislike to a career, the worst side only of which they had seen. But a modification of the present system might be attended with good results. Let the soldier be enlisted, at first, for seven years, and after the expiration of that period let us ask him to take on again for fourteen years more, thus bringing his total term of service up to our present maximum. More young men would be thus attracted, knowing that when seven years had elapsed they would still be young, and the service might come to be looked upon as no inapt training to fit men who could leave it at the age of twenty-five for the hard struggle of after life. Seven years, too, is long enough to familiarize a man with the solid advantages which the army presents, and not long enough to induce that ennui which often leads the ten years' man to drift away when his time is up, merely because "he would like to change." If he has striven to merit promotion and not received it, all hope is not dead while as yet but seven years have elapsed; if he has been wild, in the succeeding fourteen years there is yet time to retrieve himself, and to earn a creditable pension. It is believed that if this change were introduced, we should both have more recruits come forward, and more time-expired men renew their engagements.—Cornhill Magazine.

ESTABLISHING PRECEDENTS.—A lawyer with a taste for casuistical speculations was one day walking over a common. He heard a noise by the roadside, which appeared on examination to proceed from a battle between a rabbit and a weasel. The weasel had the rabbit by the throat, and the rabbit was drumming furiously on the weasel's back with his forepaws. The lawyer began to doubt whether he should interfere or not. By interfering, he would save the rabbit's life! but he would also deprive the weasel of his dinner, which he was earning in the natural way of his business. By not interfering, he would neglect to save the life of the rabbit, which, as compared with depriving the weasel of his dinner, would produce a balance of pain. It appeared to the lawyer, who was a practical man as well as a casuist, that under these circumstances the rabbit ought to have the benefit of the doubt; and instead of following the advice of one of his own profession who, when a notorious rogue was defended by an ingenious quibble, proposed to "hang the man and save the point," he saved the rabbit's life from his antagonist, and also saved the point whether he had done right for further consideration. Upon reflection, he arrived at the satisfactory conclusion that he had done right, on the ground that the individual act produced more pleasure than pain, and that it did not, and from the nature of the case could not, tend to establish an injurious precedent. If, in order to save the life of the individual rabbit, it had been necessary to lay down the general principle that all rabbits ought to have their lives protected against all weasels, he would have been wrong; for to affirm such a principle would have been to interfere with the established order of nature whereby it is ordained that rabbits should be the prey of weasels. But the particular act had no such meaning. The lawyer had not the remotest intention of becoming a knight-errant on the part of rabbits in general against weasels, nor did he even intend to set up a company for that purpose. His connection with the subject began and ended with that particular interference, the plain result of which was life to the rabbit and a countermand of dinner to the weasel; and it was hundreds, perhaps thousands, to one that he would never see such a sight again as long as he lived.

AN author who had given a comedy into the hands of Foote for his perusal, called on him for his opinion of the piece. Foote returned the play, with a grave face, saying: "Sir, depend upon it—this is not a thing to be laughed at."

THE CORPS DE BALLET.

A BALLET is a wonderful conglomeration of grace and nonsense, and, it is to be presumed, is concocted for the purpose of puzzling as well as of delighting the outer world. Much has been said and written of the dancers who form what is called the corps de ballet. The stories told of them are more or less true, and very much less than more.

Some say the members of the corps de ballet are in the habit of dining with dukes daily; of living at the rate of £1,000 per diem; of having sets of diamonds for every week of the year; two broughams, four footmen, three ladies' maids, and a boudoir of white velvet and lilac satin, with mother-of-pearl furniture, and solid silver fire-place, with gold fender and fire-irons en suite. Others protest that she is the possessor of more good qualities than all the famed heroines of ancient or modern times; prefers linsey-woolsey to satin; thinks porter a nicer drink than champagne; is never irritable with her father, mother, or the nine brothers and sisters whom she supports by her earnings; has not in her composition one particle of envy, hatred, malice, or uncharitableness, and is exactly like those most impossible and disagreeable persons, the heroines of small novels and the "ideals" of lads of sixteen.

There are ladies of the ballet who have broughams, though they do not dine with dukes daily. There are ladies of the ballet who have fine clothes, equipage, and luxury for reasons connected with anything but merit.

But these gorgeous creatures are but few. The majority live by the industry of their feet and fingers. Dancing and the needle is their sole support, and their virtues are as many and their faults as many, their goodness and their foibles as oddly mixed as in others of their sex of the same age and station, and as worthy as much honor, pity, consideration and reproof.

Ye gentlewomen of England, who live at home at ease, ah! little do ye think upon the terrible labors of the ballet-girl. Milliners, dress-makers, and all the tribes of the needle, work at home or in the houses of others, seated by the fire. How do the "ballet" pass their day? A new piece is to be produced at the Theatre Royal, Swellgravia. The "call" posted in the hall runs: "Theatre Royal, Swellgravia. Ballet at 10.—Mr. Skreype, properties. New Play at 11.30.—Everybody. Full Band."

At 10 o'clock, A. M.—hail, rain, wind, snow or sunshine—from distant parts of this large metropolis, the ballet, no matter at how late an hour they may have been engaged in the theatre the night before, drop in at the stage door. Very few of them have saved their legs by the hire of an omnibus. The dwellers in the wilds of Camberwell, Kennington, Islington or Hackney, started from their homes by nine, to effect which they have had to rise by eight. An hour's walk, especially if the streets be dirty, or the weather severe, is not an agreeable preparative for dancing. No matter! The corps adjourns to its dressing-room, takes off those prides of girlhood, bonnet, cloak, gown and boots, and arrays itself in "practising dress"—a garb of doubtful white with short skirts, cold in the winter and inconvenient in summer. The girls tie up their poor heads in handkerchiefs, like the mill-hands in Lancashire—for theatres are always full of draughts, the architect takes care of that—and descend to a cold, dank, dark stage, where the ballet-master, a little, old Frenchman with a graceful figure and a hideous face, is walking up and down, the breath from his nostrils steaming into the damp air like the breath of a wicked dragon in a fairy tale, and Mr. Skreype, the repetiteur, alone in the orchestra, conveys an idea of musical desolation and discomfort by taking his violin out of its case, where it is protected from the inclemencies of the season by green baize and flannel, and dividing his time anointing his bow with rosin, and wishing mentally that he had not taken quite so much whiskey over night.

"You are all raddy?" says Monsieur now. "Mistair Skreype if you please, go!"

And the rehearsal of the ballet begins. The girls dance, and are compelled to repeat the same figures over, and over, and over again, until Monsieur Legrand, a conscientious little artist, and agreeable man enough when not rehearsing his "imbeciles," as he calls them, is partially content, for to be entirely satisfied falls not to the lot of any ballet-master, French or English.

This lasts for more than an hour and a half, when the general rehearsal commences. The refractories of the ballet—those who cannot or will not learn—adjourn to the back of the stage, and Monsieur Legrand, with considerable perseverance but no patience whatever, by tearing the hair of his wig, terrifies them into submission and grace; the others run up-stairs to their dressing-room and pluck out of their half-damp pockets their lunch—not paté and champagne, we can assure our readers—and club together for beer or coffee. The corps particularly affects coffee.

The ballet has to be danced again in its proper place in the general rehearsal of the piece, and thus the girls are delayed till half-past two, when they dance again. They quit the theatre at about three, and the dwellers in Camberwell, Kennington, Islington, and Hackney, after the small exertion of rehearsal, recruit their exhausted limbs by walking back to their homes to dinner or to tea. Many, however, are too languid and delicate for this exertion, and these stay up in the dreary dressing-room, and club again, for a compound comfortless meal, which they take, gipsy-party fashion, sans chairs, knives, forks, or cellarets.

They are at the theatre again by six or seven, for they appear in the first piece as well as the last. When the curtain descends at midnight they are on the stage. They then resume the habiliments of every day life, and trudge, for the fourth time on the weary way between the theatre and their homes. Dwellers in Camberwell, Kennington, Islington, and Hackney, get to bed about 1.40; they rise again at eight, with the same routine before them.

This is not a luxurious life; it is not sensual. It is laborious, unpleasant, comfortless, wet, sloppy, and sore-footed. Its monotony is seldom broken, except by the happy intervals when a piece has a long "run," and there are no rehearsals. But this is but a poor compensation for the fatigue and danger incurred at Christmas for the gratification of ardent-minded scene-painters, money-loving managers, and a sensation and splendor-loving public.

* * * * * * *

The members of the ballet feel enormous pleasure in the exercise of their calling. While dancing they are happy. And the wages for this wear and tear of body, this expense of muscle, the reward for the fleeting possessions of grace, youth, beauty, and agility? The highest salary—and the girl must be indeed clever and lucky who obtains it—is one guinea weekly, and this only in the best theatres. Eighteen and fifteen shillings are also sums given for the regular ballet. Extras, that is girls engaged for the run of one piece, and not regularly on the staff of the theatre, twelve and ten shillings. Will the reader believe that in some places the remuneration of these girls is one shilling per night? To be sure they are theatres seldom visited by folks from the West-end, but they are theatres where the corps de ballet undergoes greater labor than at any other, and, strange to say, these facts do not prevent obsequious writers in the press from extolling that enterprise and spirit, large humanity, and honorable fair dealing with which, if all that is written be true, managers of theatres are gifted by divine right of lesseeship.

"The Queen's English."—The article on Dean Alford's book, The Queen's English, in the new number of the Edinburgh Review, is one of the most effective attacks upon the heresies of grammar and style prevailing, not only among the crowd of letter-writers, but among the popular authors of the day. We give an amusing specimen of what the reviewer calls "Nos-ism," or the absurd use of the newspaper editor's "we" by persons who are frequently not writing throughout in the first person plural. One of these grammatical sinners, whom the writer quotes, describes, we are told, something in this style an exciting adventure in which he was the principal actor: "We felt that a few moments would decide our fate. We were totally alone: we shouted, but no one answered. The projecting ledge on which we had contrived to support one of our feet was slowly giving way. We look down: a sheer precipice of one thousand yards yawned beneath us; our hat fell off: our head grew dizzy: our right hand was rapidly becoming benumbed," etc. "Who," asks the reviewer, "can care for a Mr. We in such a situation?" The passage is perused with frigid indifference, as not appealing to any human sympathy with a fellow-creature; or if any feeling is evoked, it is one, perhaps, rather resembling satisfaction; a vague notion that somehow or other there will shortly be one newspaper editor the less in the world. Equally just is the reviewer's indignation with the humorous writers of the day, who are in the habit of beginning an article in this style:—"We are in the Strand. See a haberdasher's shop. Let us enter. On the right a counter. In front of it a chair. Behind it a smiling shopman, moustached, of course. I sit down. A pair of gloves, if you please. Light yellow. Will I try these? Too large. Will I try a second pair? Too small. A third? A wriggle, a thrust, a struggle: they are on! That will do. Three-and-tenpence, did you say? Thank you, sir. Any other article? I rise and resume my umbrella. Once more we are in the Strand." A sad falling-off, indeed, from the grammatical ways of our simple-minded forefathers, who, holding that no sentence can stand without a verb, were wont to write up on corners of houses, as some old mural tablets still testify, "This is High street." "What can be more dreadful," asks the reviewer, "than the forced levity, the jaunty insolence, of this kind of composition, or rather decomposition? One longs to exclaim with Hamlet, 'Leave thy damnable faces and begin. Tell us what thou hast to say, if anything thou hast, and if not, hold thy peace!'" To all which most educated readers will, we think, subscribe; though somebody may, perhaps, suggest, in answer to the reviewer's question, "What can be more dreadful?" that the reviewer himself here slips into the common but serious offence against the Queen's English of using stronger language than the case requires, for it cannot be denied that some recent murders, or, say, railway accidents, have been more "dreadful" even than this verbless paragraph of the small humorous writer, who, with all the other offenders now held up to scorn and derision, will, we hope, shut his eyes to these small motes in the eye of his censor, and henceforth walk meekly by the light of the true principles which govern the Queen's English.—Publishers' Circular.

Jenny Lind's Debut.—The Queen received her with marked attention. The Dowager Queen invited her to visit her Majesty in private. Invitations, which she was as unwilling as unable to accept, were showered on her by the English nobility. The late Duke of Wellington on one occasion invited her to his country seat, promising that "music should form no topic of the conversation." But, amid all the honors they lavished upon her, the shy prima donna invariably preferred the intimacy of her choice private circle, and was glad to flee the flattering incense sought to be bestowed upon her, by escaping to the country house of the kind friend who had first welcomed her in London. There she would heartily enjoy a ride, a rural ramble; and anon seated among wild ferns and shaded by ancient beech trees, she would study her new parts, the score laid open upon her lap. Every anecdote which transpired abroad, every detail which could be caught up, eagerly seized as it was by the "outside" public, contributed to throw a romantic halo about the name of the favorite prima donna.—Lumley's Reminiscences of the Opera.

Sterne's Father.—Sterne's father was a shiftless, roving Irish officer in the early part of the last century. He served in Marlborough's wars, and was cast adrift, like many other people, by the caprice of Queen Anne, and the sudden peace of Utrecht. Of him only one anecdote remains. He was, his son tells us, "a little smart man, somewhat rapid and hasty" in his temper; and during some fighting at Gibraltar he got into a squabble with another young officer, a Captain Philips. The subject it seems, was a goose. It ended in a duel, which was fought with swords in a room. Captain Philips pinned Ensign Sterne to a wall behind; upon which he quietly asked, or is said to have asked, "Do wipe the plaster off your sword before you pull it out of me;" which, if true, showed at least presence of mind.

THE MORALITY OF PLAYING FOR MONEY.

GRANTING it right to play for money at all, which most people will grant, and that there must be a limit to the amount it is justifiable to stake, which all—even gamesters—assert, what is the principle on which the moral limit should be decided? Most people respond at once that no man ought to play for more than he can afford, but the sentence when analyzed will be found to amount to nothing. A really good player could "afford" guinea whist very well indeed if he had only five hundred a year, and the dogma involves the absurdity of making capacity for winning a test of the moral right. What is the meaning, either, of the sum a man can afford? Does it imply that he may play up to the amount of his income, or half his income, or what Mr. Mill calls his surplus income, i. e., his income after necessaries are purchased, or his income after he has done all his duty in spending, and lending, or giving? That last definition with men who hold, as we do that property, like strength or capacity, is a trust never to be misused without sin, would simply prohibit playing for money altogether. Or, to put another point, is a Marquis of Westminster or of Bute justified in playing for hundred-pound points? Their loss is less in proportion to their means than shilling points to average professional men, yet—though a fixed line is impossible—such stakes by comparison with the stakes necessary to give rich men interest in the game necessarily suggest the notion of waste. Now all waste qua waste is evil, and requires a justification just as much as the cutting off of a finger-joint or an ear would require one. No man has a moral right, as Mr. Kingsley somewhere puts it, to shy at sea-gulls with half-crowns, even if his half-crowns be ever so many or exhaustless. He can use them to purpose, and having them he is bound to use them to purpose, just as he is bound to use his brains, or his strength, or any other gift which is his.

The true law, so far as it can be defined, which is not very closely, seems to be a composite one. No man can, for instance, have a right, a moral right, to play for a sum which he feels rouses in him avarice, or greed, or any distinctly-evil sentiment. He might as well toy with a disposition to murder, caress a tendency to theft, or deliberately encourage a fancy towards his neighbor's wife. Not having the right for himself he cannot have it for his fellow-players—is just as evil if he tempts them to evil as if he commits it himself. Then when he has discovered the sum which leaves his pulses cool—which will differ with every player—he is bound also to calculate not how much he can afford—for that is regulated by his chance of winning—but how much he has a right to waste, to lose, to throw away for the sake of the amusement gained. No man in the world out of a Trappist monastery ever disputed the right to some recreation, and no man except a miser ever questioned that it was lawful to buy it. The only point is the price to be paid, which must be decided like everything else by a very complex calculation balancing between one's desires, one's needs, and one's duties. To give more than the net result of that equation is wrong, and just as much evil as the throwing away of any other resource with which God has endowed us—time, or health, or special powers—no more, no less. There are many men, especially among the sedentary, so unhappily constituted that the only recreation which is recreation, which takes them out of themselves, gives them excitement without fatigue, and rest without the sense of ennui, is playing cards. They have a right to play, as we understand it, without the perpetual conflict of conscience with which some men are afflicted, but only at a price—the price they would think themselves justified in paying for any other amusement which produced nothing except the momentary relief. Means have very little to do with the matter, and the chance of winning nothing at all; the money lost or won is pure waste by somebody; but then one has a right to waste when waste purchases fresh powers, for then it ceases to be what nevertheless in itself it is.—London Spectator.

Rebel Reinforcements.—The Milwaukee Sentinel's correspondent with Sherman is responsible for the following: A tacit understanding among our pickets and the Rebs, who are on opposite sides of the river, has existed for the last three or four days. Some of our boys swam over day before yesterday, and were very amicably received by the Rebs, who climbed the apple-trees and shook down the fruit for the Yanks; and when one of them expressed a wish to take some back for a stew to eke out his evening meal of hard tack, a friendly Johnny immediately tore off the leg of his pants to make a bag of—that the leg was too badly worn to hold green apples, did not detract from the benevolence of the act. But the armistice terminated this morning; notice was given by a reb yelling out: "Hello, Yank!"

"What do you want, Johnny?"

"Can't talk with you uns any more!"

"How's that?"

"Orders to dry up!"

"What for, Johnny?"

"Oh, Jim Brownlow, with his d—d Tennessee Yanks, swam over upon the left last night and stormed our rifle-pits naked, captured sixty of our boys, and made 'em swim back with him. We uns have got to keep you uns on your side of the river now."

Yesterday a conversation took place between a couple of outlying pickets, which shows that the movements of our troops are most closely watched. In less than two hours after the crossing of our troops a Reb yelled out: "We uns are going to give you 'uns h—l now, Yank!"

"How are you going to do it, Johnny?"

"We uns have got reinforcements!"

"The d—l you say! What troops are they?"

"That one-armed cuss, old Howard, with the 4th, and Schofield with the 23d corps, are on our side now."

Conversation ended in a smile you could have heard farther than a Parrott can shoot, participated in by the skirmishers on both sides of the river.

In some tranquil and apparently amiable natures there are often unsuspected and unfathomable depths of resentment.

NOTICE

The publication of "THE CALIFORNIAN" takes place on Saturday mornings, and copies may be obtained in the City at all News-stands, and of our News-agents through the country. It will also be served by carriers on the morning of publication.

 Correspondents will address all communications, business and otherwise, to "THE CALIFORNIAN," office, No. 328 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 8, 1864.

THE RHETORIC OF RIOTS.

IT is very difficult in times of anxiety for men to await the sober suggestions of their second thoughts. We are so much the creatures of impulse. We like so much to have our will executed immediately and our apparently reasonable desires unchecked. It is so much easier to lift our own hands to the work than abide the humane method of a courteous remonstrance, or the slow certainty of legalized justice, if any one has erred against the statutes. So we come to personal discourtesies, insults, the pulling of noses that do not belong to us, and riots, where we crowd together and think we carry justice and the law in our hands, but when we are only acting very much like idiots and have hold of contraband weapons. Horses sometimes take the bits in their mouths, and, forgetting these very things were meant to guide them along safe roads and restrain their intemperance, run headlong among the sharp rocks or into the perilous water. We are never more unphilosophical than when we try to take the laws in our teeth, and, unmindful that they are only for our safe conduct and protection, attempt to gather in justice where they do not seem to reach, and in spite of them. It is favorable to our inherited ideas of freedom, that the laws will not snap suddenly and so subject us at once to a penalty, but, cobweb-like, are finely spun, and will bear very reasonable tension. It is only, then, when we get to be fools, that we let our tempers carry us so far outside of the proprieties and moralities of life, that we hear the cords snap and feel ourselves let down into the abyss of men's condemnation and retributive justice. When we get there, we ourselves begin to see the improprieties we have committed, and wonder where was the soberness of our second thoughts that would have guided us better and saved the tarnish upon our reputations.

Whenever any class in the community are placed in jeopardy by the unreasonable pressure of a class above them, they claim and rightly have the unstinted sympathies of all other classes—it being only asked of them, that they, who suffer, forbear attempting unlawfully to rectify a wrong. As soon as they attempt to make a right, vi-et-armis, there gets to be such a jumbling of wrongs, one piled upon the other, that the rights of everybody get out of sight, and the whole thing gets to be a maze that only the law's delays can unravel. People feeling very much outraged get so far blinded as to be unable to distinguish the parties who are making them suffer, and, in their anxiety that nothing but justice be done, immediately do a great many unjust acts against just the most innocent people. A few hours of intemperate heat alter somewhat the original intentions of the parties, and there gets to be prevalent a feeling that it is only a holiday for the shillelah, and there is a great deal of ripe strength that is spoiling for a combat.

One of the most immoral sights in the world is a crowd, with offensive arms, calling out for justice. That article can only be efficiently dealt out to soberness and temperance of conduct. A dash of reason may be mixed up with an injured man's demands without damage to his cause, but reason comes before clubs and the use of muscle. It comes altogether without them, and if men come to forget it and take to the arguments of blows, the calaboose must bring them finally back to the standing point of reason, when they can courteously ask or remonstrate, and as courteously listen.

IN THE FIELD.—The transition from the calm of peace and a quiet life on this coast, to the scenes of strife where the battle rages, is so brief a matter, that we were astonished to hear so soon of our friend Capt. John Kellogg, for the last three years Chief Commissary of the Pacific Department, who was ordered East, and seems hardly to have had time to reach Panama, so rapidly does Tempus fugit. He writes in excellent spirits, and with great satisfaction, that he had been ordered to Gen. Sheridan's command as Chief Commissary; and as the letter was written prior to the late fights in the Shenandoah, Capt. Kellogg has, of course, passed through all the desperate struggles that succeeded Sheridan's onward movement—quite a change, we should say, from life in San Francisco. Capt. K. has chafed under the inactivity of duty here, and his dearest wish has been gratified. He is now in the field. Success and promotion attend him, and may his rations never be "short!"

SANITARY FUND.—The Executive Committee report the following further receipts since our last issue: From Sanitary Cheese, $73 70; Camanche, $430; Sales of various articles at the Industrial Fair, $43 40; "Old Sanitary," $65; Suisun and Fairfield, $3,486, in Legal Tender notes; Nevada City, $97 50; Rough and Ready, $90; Washington, $32 50; Red Dog, $25 50; Healdsburg, $5; San Francisco collections, $2,465 45, in coin, and $35 in Legal Tender notes. Total—$3,328 05, in coin, and $3,521 in Legal Tender notes.

DEFECTS OF A FINE CLIMATE.

THE past week was uncomfortably hot. People drooped about listless and perspiring in those substantial garments which the Californian wears throughout the year. Business men felt the duties of shop and counting-house growing irksome, and began to indulge in visions of rural recreation. Professional men dozed in their close offices, and, like Falstaff, babbled in their sleep of green fields. All kinds of vehicles were in demand, and the roads leading to the suburbs were crowded with panting pleasure-seekers. Intra muros, pedestrians cursed the short-sighted parsimony of the city that begrudged them a park or any decent public resort in such an emergency. Involuntarily the alien's mind reverted to eastern summers, and bewailed the lack of those little comforts and advantages by which he evaded the extremes of temperature and extracted even a certain kind of pleasure from the dog-day heats. The weather was altogether unusual and exceptional for California; but its rarity afforded some other suggestions than iced punches, thin clothing, country air and rural dissipation.

An explanation of the universal feeling of lassitude is the first suggestion offered. In all other parts of the Union, the very conditions of the climate render some relaxation from labor during the summer months an imperative necessity. Business as well as social circles recognize the fact. The hard-worked clerk or apprentice is allowed his vacation of a few weeks or month; fashionable society seeks the watering-places; humble folk visit their country cousins, and business languishes. California, however, neither recognizes the necessity nor the custom; her climate gives her twelve months of working days, with the Sunday, alas! not always excepted. Twelve months of equable, bracing temperature, that keeps the strings of the human instrument constantly keyed up. It is only when a day or two of midsummer, like that of last week, comes straying this way that our people collapse and suddenly find out how much work they have been doing, and how tired they are. The strings that every now and then snap here and there and tell us too plainly the result of this unnatural strain, awaken no apprehension. People can't understand how it is that they may work strenuously, eat freely, sleep soundly, and fulfil so splendidly all the requirements of a practical existence, and yet be wasting away. The school-boy's experiment of the candle burnt up in a jar of oxygen is perhaps an exaggerated illustration, but it is the first and the one that most naturally suggests itself.

Another suggestion of last week's weather was, that we lose most of the poetical and æsthetic associations of summer in our moderate climate. We don't mean that inspiration rises with the mercury, or that poetry flourishes best in the tropics; but the poetic faculty is very apt to find indulgence in that lassitude which follows high temperatures—in the dolce far niente that ensues from bodily ease—in the disposition to idle reverie that comes with midsummer weather. Even our warmest season is not mild enough to bring us in close, sympathetic contact with Nature; lying under a tree or rolling in the grass is provocative of rheumatism and sciatica, in the vicinity of San Francisco, and of dust and uncleanliness in the interior. In fact, the California poet is seldom able to get near enough to Nature to appreciate her. The pleasure arising from a fine sunset suffers deterioration from the necessity of putting on an overcoat to enjoy it thoroughly, to guard against the cold that springs up as the sun goes down. The clear, cold, star-light summer nights of California, so much extolled for their soporific qualities, are not apt to tempt people from their comfortable beds to open windows and celestial contemplation; and in this way a good deal of a certain kind of experience which Eastern people acquire is unknown to the dwellers in this practical climate. The interior Californian draws the blankets of his couch around him and lies down to pleasant dreams. It is nothing to him if his brother by the Atlantic seaboard, tossing upon his feverish bed, rises at last to find consolation by the open window and the streaming moonlight—the scents of the garden heavy in the air, and the night vocal with the song of katydids. No sane man in California would try an experiment of this kind, nor is there any necessity for it. He is content to view Nature at a distance; he does not care to learn her secrets, nor how to evade her wintry forms or summer heats. The goddesses of Mount Ida do not expose their naked charms against the clear outlines of the California hills; to us our climate is a reality, with nothing suggestive or mystic in its conditions. Last of all, there is a social incentive in the extremes of Eastern weather which we all miss here. But lately, a cotemporary, taking a text from Dr. Bellows, enlarged upon "firesides," and the necessity for "fireside influence" in California for social welfare and the proper education of youth. There is a similar influence in the "open air" communionism of the Eastern midsummer. There was sociability and sympathy in the conversational comments on the weather last week, inasmuch as six months of fine moderate weather is apt to use up that stale topic, and though we have returned to it once more, its influence still lingers in society.

OUR NEW STORY.—In the present issue is commenced an interesting story entitled "The White Wolf," translated from the French of Paul Feval, expressly for the CALIFORNIAN.

MANY persons seem to feel a great solicitude for your soul's welfare, who are entirely indifferent to your body's

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

THE School for Scandal, performed for the benefit of Mr. Peter Richings at the Academy of Music, on Saturday evening, was very largely attended. As the dramatic action of this piece is of a very quiet and subtle character, and the interest more often dependent on the bandying of wit and repartee and the flow of brilliant dialogue than any individual effort or excellence on the part of the performer, we never could understand why the best actors and most ambitious novices have always chosen this play to exhibit their talents. As "Sir Peter Teazle," the beneficiary looked handsome and commanding, but he has often made more of less pretentious characters. There was nothing to highly praise or blame in the quality of his personation. Of Wheatleigh's "Charles Surface," the same may be said, except that he would have appeared to better advantage as "Joseph," whose character contains more depth and fairer opportunities for that subtle analysis and quiet dramatic action in which Mr. Wheatleigh excels. Mr. Mayo, the "Joseph Surface" of the cast, would have profited also by an exchange to the rattling role of "Charles," and would have naturally lent to the character a personnel and recklessness much more suitable and in keeping. Miss Richings' "Lady Teazle" was an excellent personation; the reconciliation and quarrel scene between Sir Peter and herself bringing out all the vivacity, naturalness and earnestness which render her acting always entertaining. Mrs. Saunders deserves great praise for the ease with which, (like Charles Wheatleigh,) she identifies herself with any character, and yet never loses her own originality. Seguin's "Mr. Premium" was cleverly played. The company, as a whole, did very well, and, beyond one or two hitches, in the dialogue—which in Sheridan's sparkling composition instantly becomes observable—there were fewer mistakes than usually attend the reproduction of a standard play. The bill was repeated the next evening.

On Monday evening, Charles Wheatleigh's benefit was very well attended, and the attractions offered were varied and diversified. Five-act comedies—even by Sheridan—are rather long for the uneasy, restless audiences of San Francisco. The Blind Man's Daughter, a domestic play in one act, developed in Miss Richings a capability for quiet and intense dramatic pathos, in a manner more striking than shown in any previous performance. The Bull in a China Shop, with Wheatleigh for the central figure, was, of course, inimitable. The Musical Olio comprised the best selections, and was one of the best performances of the Opera troupe. With the repetition of this bill on the following evening, the Dramatic season closed.

On Monday next the Academy re-opens with the Richings troupe, for a second season of opera. The orchestra has been reconstructed, and the troupe open with Auber's Crown Diamonds. Luisa Miller and Dinorah are in active preparation.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Kean make their debut in California to-night, at the Opera House, in Henry VIII., in which tragedy they sustain the characters of "Cardinal Wolsey" and "Queen Catherine." The Jealous Wife is also given, with these distinguished artistes as "Mr. Oakley" and "Mrs. Oakley." Old play-goers will recognize in Mrs. Kean the famous Ellen Tree of old time, and in Charles Kean the celebrated actor whose last visit to the United States, many years ago, created such enthusiasm. The house will probably be crowded.

Paul Julien will give his farewell concert at the Metropolitan Theatre on Tuesday afternoon next, and will be assisted by the Bianchis, a good orchestra under the direction of Mr. Herold, and an array of talent announced elsewhere in our columns. A fine programme will be given on the occasion, embracing many choice morceaux, among which are the three following masterpieces of Verdi: the great quintette in Nabuco, "S'appressan gl' istanti; the quartette in Rigoletto, "Bella figlia dell amore," in which Verdi has so ably represented four diverse sentiments: the grand trio in I Lombardi, with the original violin solo obligato, which Julien will play in person, in the orchestra. The stage is to be fitted up as an elegant drawing-room, and every effort will be made to make Julien's farewell a crowning triumph. The Metropolitan has recently been painted and re-decorated throughout with new designs for the proscenium by Messrs. Rogers and Stackhouse, and the auditorium portion of the theatre newly furnished.

The Eureka has been in a high tide of prosperity all the week, the other principal houses being closed, and, consequently, Birch, Backus & Co. have been overflowing with wit and humor. A laughable farce, entitled Here She Goes and There She Goes, has been the new escape-valve for the exuberant spirits of the company. The introduction of lively after-pieces is a decided improvement, and relieves the sameness of the old programme.

THE Circus, after a good season of five weeks, will close and fold its tent like the metaphorical Arabs, and silently steal away to some adjacent locality for the next day's operations. For a while we shall miss the clown's sharp jokes and sharp retort of the ring-master's whip; the wonderful feats of the agile Carlos and the graceful and daring equestrianism of the flying Zoyara, equipoised between tent and steed. This afternoon's performance will be rendered doubly attractive by the appearance of Ella Zoyara in male attire and the allotment of twenty presents to be given away to the assembled audience.

SAN FRANCISCO, BY THE POETS.

NUMBER FOUR.

THE PLAZA.—After Sir Walter Scott.

IF thou wouldst view the Plaza aright,
Go visit it by the pale moonlight;
For the gay beams of lightsome day
Show that the fountain does not play.
When the broken benches are hid in shade,
With many a vagrant recumbent laid;
When the clock on the Monumental tower
Tolls to the night the passing hour;
When cabman and hackman alternately
Entreat and threaten—indulging free
In course yet forcible imagery;
When the scrolls that show thee the play-house nigh,
In monstrous letters do feign and lie,
Of "Fun divest of Vulgarity;"
When Bella Union is heard to rave
O'er the last conundrum the minstrel gave;
When the street-boy pauses—intent upon
The band at Gilbert's Melodeon—
Then go—but go alone the while,
And view John Bensley's ruined pile,
And, home returning—do not swear
If thou hast seen some things more fair.

NEW BOOKS.

ROMAN & CO., whose full shelves and long tables, running over with the latest books, make one despair of keeping up with the current of cotemporaneous literature, have laid upon our table a few specimens of their freshest acquisitions. Of the others we can say but little except to admire the growing good taste and inventive genius displayed in bindings—the old severity and simplicity of style having given way to warm colors, illuminated letters and ingenious cyphers. Gold is used sparingly—a sure indication of good style—but the body of the modern volume is often clothed with some positive color, so that a collection of new boks may fairly vie with the autumnal foliage of a northern forest. The delicately tinted leaves are sometimes illuminated with initial letters, with the old-fashioned "rivulet of text" running down a "meadow of margin."

Overland Explorations in Siberia, Northern Asia and the great Amoor River Country, etc., etc. By Perry McD. Collins. 8vo. pp. 467. New York: Appleton & Co. 1864.

This is a book peculiarly interesting to the people of the Pacific coast. Major Collins, who, it appears, had long since fixed upon the Amoor River as the channel by which American enterprise was destined to penetrate Northern Asia, at the time the Russians took possession of the Amoor country in 1855, went to Washington to acquire further information on the subject. After conferring with the Cabinet and Russian Ambassador, he was appointed to represent the interests of this country as Commercial Agent on the Amoor River; started for St. Petersburg, and, arriving there traversed the Empire from west to east, crossed Siberia, entered Tartary and descended the Amoor from its source to its mouth. Major Collins gives us the practical results of this exploration in the interior of a country hitherto almost unknown to us—results that are most important to the future of this coast. He carefully investigated the natural features of the country, its resources, agricultural and mineral, and every thing that might affect our future commercial relations with it. It would seem, by the author's experience, that the Russian policy in regard to the development of Siberia is liberal, and that Mouravieff, Governor-General of Eastern Siberia, far from looking with suspicion on the acute, Yankee, commercial traveller, afforded him every facility, and became his ardent friend. The story of the telegraphic union of Europe with America overland, now such an exciting and interesting topic, is told here and illustrated with a map.

Apart from this practical information, Major Collins gives us a very readable volume. Most of the incidents are related in a simple matter-of-fact way, without any attempt at fine writing or sensational effect. One of these episodes we are tempted to extract. After a pleasant dinner with the "Golovah" of Kyachta, our traveller was shown the Russian custom of "tossing up for drinks":

"As soon as we entered the apartment, servants bearing trays loaded with glasses, foaming with champagne, approached us, and the Golovah pressed us to take the parting glass. This it was idle to refuse, so we drank, as we supposed, for really the last time. Presently I noticed a pretty dense circle encompassing Peyton, and in an instant he was seized by half-a-dozen stout, jolly merchants, and tossed up in the direction of the ceiling. Fortunately it was not a very low one, or else he must have gone through to the roof. Down he came, however, into the hands of his tormentors, who sent him up again, if any thing, higher than ever, the most uproarious mirth and laughter prevailing. My companion was not a small man, or a light one, but he was no more than a feather in the hands of these portly Siberians.

"This sport is called in Russian podkeedovate, or tossing-up, and is considered a mark of great respect. General Mouravieff told me, after our return, that he had had podkeedovate performed upon him in the same room.

"During the performance, I stood half-aghast, looking at the figure Peyton was cutting, a man six feet high and well proportioned, going up and down like a trap-ball, his coat-tail flying sky-high, and his face as red as a brick. I was all the time consoling myself that they had administered this extra touch of hospitality to Peyton because they considered him the most worthy, and the best able to stand it, and I said to Beetsov, 'I hope one tossing for the American nation will be considered honor enough.' He replied, 'Your turn will very likely come too.'

"After a while Peyton came down, and staid down. Servants again came around, and again we had to drink champagne. I had just emptied my glass, and placed it on the waiter, when, without a moment's warning, I was seized, and up I went. Being much lighter than Peyton, and handled after him by these stout, and now very jovial and mellow fellows, I have a distinct recollection of touching the ceiling. My coat-tail certainly did, and what I thought at first a piece of good fortune, now proved to be otherwise, for, having taken Peyton's guage with regard to weight, they did not take into consideration my lightness, and I came near going through the top of the house. Up I went and down I came, only to go up again, until my friends were satisfied that if I was not drunk before, my head would certainly swim now. However, I was able to stand when I came to my feet, which was more than I calculated upon when tossing between the floor and ceiling."

Poems by David Gray, with Memoirs of his Life. Boston: Roberts Brothers. 1864. 8vo. pp. 239.

David Gray, who made amends for his claim to recognition as a new poet, by dying early, and thus disarming the reviewers, was a Scotch lad whose affecting story is told by R. M. Milnes in the preface. It is alone sufficient to interest the reader in his poems, if they had no other merit. It is almost a repetition of Keats and Chatterton—the old story of a self-torturing, sensitive, and delicate organization—the struggle with cold realities—the morbid fancies, heetic flushes, and feverish exaltation of the consumptive. His poetry possesses genius and rare promise of fruition—which was, alas! never to be realized. He seems to have been an etherial Burns—purer and more sensitive than the ploughboy bard, but lacking the vital force which was a part of Burns's animal nature.

Congdon's Cavalry Compendium.—This interesting little book is invaluable to the soldier, and particularly to cavalry, although it treats of things that every soldier and officer ought to be familiar with. Everything relative to the duty of a soldier is here laid down, in a concise form and under separate heads. The treatment of the horse—care of arms—extracts from the best authors on cavalry tactics—the manual of arms—use of the sabre—extracts from the army regulations—the Articles of War—and interesting remarks on the question of valor and skill over numbers. The book is for the pocket, and extremely desirable to every branch of the military service—comprising, as it does, a greater amount of information in less space than any work on military matters we have yet seen.

Mercantile Dictionary: By J. De Veitelle.—This compact little work, contains a mine of information for the business man. All terms and names of articles in general use in commercial life are here laid down in English, Spanish and French, without a master. We quote from the preface: "The able correspondent and accomplished linguist are often brought to a stand-still by a trivial technicality, for an explanation of which they vainly search in the most comprehensive general dictionaries: an idiomatic expression, a single word incorrectly rendered, often gives rise to most lamentable delays in, if not the complete interruption of, the simplest business transaction." With a view to remove this and other difficulties, the author publishes the Mercantile Dictionary—a very useful work to every business-man.

Quest: A Novel. Author unknown.—A pleasant story, somewhat original in style, well written, and quite an interesting book.

SCIENTIFIC SKETCHES.

THE SIMPLICITY OF NATURE'S WAYS.

ALL things seek to grow into straight lines or easy curves, or into form blended of the two, composite yet simple; and every departure from this general rule can be easily traced to the influence of adventitious causes. Nature deals not in sharp turns, and still less in right angles, and rigidly eschews uncouth figure of every kind. Her acts, the resulting whole, may sometimes be grotesque: but examine the several parts in detail, for instance, of some most hideous animal. Are they not all in themselves gracefully formed, and simple in their very grace? The square has no place; the circle and the sphere prevail in her æsthetic system.

Nothing strikes the eye more quickly or painfully than a gnarled or twisted tree in a forest of straight, symmetrical columns, or than the disturbance of the smoothly-swelling slope by the up-throw of some contorted volcanic wall of rock roughly stretching across its bosom. How strange in our sight, how defective in principle, how different from all other modes of structure in nature, would the tree appear, if, instead of the trunk, limbs and branches rising by easy, gentlest of lines, they should spring from each other at angles of stiff degree. Once, while passing a grove, of stately stems and dense foliage, the whitened forms of a certain tree, numerous but dead, rose before us in the obscure twilight of a summer evening, and made us doubt our sight to perceive that the boughs of those trees, from their roots to their tops, all pointed downward, in utter reversal of the law which tells that all living things tend upward—the skeleton-witnesses of a deformity in nature—and, though dead, still beautiful in the graceful fall and elegant downward curve of their branches. It was right that they all were dead, and yet bore evidence of Nature's universal wish and tendency. Drawn to earth by some mystery of their growth, not without a struggle did they yield to the adverse influence; for, starting from the trunk in decided upward bent, but gradually is the course changed, and only after some period of uncertain advance, marked as a time of contest, along the line of each limb, by ridges and wriukles on the otherwise smooth bark, is their fall fixed and their course established. In the most distorted and fantastic shapes observable in the vegetable and mineral kingdoms can be seen this strong desire to conform to rule, and, when possible, to return by direct, simple course to the law of their being.

The convulsions of nature are themselves indications of this desire, and furnish the philosopher the means of reconciling many questions, and have led to some of the grandest discoveries. Jenner, by close observation of disease—unnatural, morbid state of the body—was brought to the discovery of Vaccination, an improvement without parallel in the physical sciences. By calculatiou of the perturbations in the solar system, Le Verrier gave the planet Neptune to the knowledge and eye of man, by an immense mental effort, deducing the law, found to be simple when made known, for its necessary existence and place in the system. Not that the weak or ignorant could have achieved the result, though they may somewhat appreciate its value and merit, not simple in this sense, but simple because direct and free from intricate complication.

When in the disturbed mountain districts we see "confusion worse confounded" in the overlying strata, the uptiltings, overlappings, the upheaval of rock through solid rock, the dislocation and twisting out of all natural and regular shape and course, and, ultimately, the disappearance of all system, it seems rash to assert that these disturbances, and their effects, often roughened into an incomparable chaos, can be reasonably referred to any law of simple character and direct action. Even in the moments of labor and contortion, the geologist, Nature's anatomist, can find no violation of her own laws. He strips the ground of the earthy mantle that covers up and conceals the rocky framework beneath, and, dealing only with parts and relations essential to the problem, works out with "assurance doubly sure," the simple nature of the structure and the causes of the existing disturbance.

Is the triumph a barren one? No! a thing of glory and honor—a charm to the theorist it may be, but more, for it becomes to the man of practical turn of great commercial use, opening new fields to his energy, some the richest yet known, and incites hope to attempt, almost beyond hope, the boldest strokes of enterprise. Men no longer magnify doubt and difficulty: the force of Tacitus' apt expression, "omne ignotum pro magnifico"—the ignorant always exaggerate—has been greatly weakened by the discovery, in the light of modern science, that simplicity is the immutable quality of Nature's style. The vein has been broken, turned from its course in violent commotion: ascertain how, whence, and, if possible, when the disturbance came; compare the relative powers of the forces in action, and, drawing your conclusion, how surprised are you to find that the most simple explanation is the truest and most direct.

Catching the spirit of this truth, of Nature's teaching, it was but reasonable to expect its influence upon the literary style of the scientific writers of the day; for he who deals in simple facts, receiving his impressions from simple combinations and understands the strength and grace of Nature's unaffected ways, must sympathize more or less deeply—may be unconsciously—with the style, and from sympathy comes imitation, more or less pure, impressing upon the mind somewhat of its own type and character. What? philosophy in simple form, in figure of speech? Yes; what more didactic, more eloquently simple than the Sermon on the Mount?—probably the most eloquent and simple discourse in the literature of any language.

In the treatment of scientific matters in our own day observe, to mention a few illustrations, the force and felicitous tone of the new style. Hugh Miller, Prof. Tyndall and Prof. Mitchell, throwing respectively a charm around the profoundest problems of Geology, Heat and Astronomy by the splendor of their simple descriptions; the usually dull, labored details of History made bright by the graphic pen of Macaulay, and, still more recently, Dr. Ferrier, in the repulsively dry department of Metaphysics, enlivening his page with an imagery that seems to aid the reason, while it strongly attracts the reader by the beauty of its garb.

On the other hand, who can think of the dreadfully complex style of the old philosophical writers, without a shudder? "Horror piled on horror," books glorious with the stuffed learning of twenty centuries, swelling with an endless undigested array of facts or opinions, in language studiedly stiff, thrown into sentences of the most elaborate and artificial construction, unrelieved by ornament or illustration, and often broken midway for the forcible insertion, utterly out of place, and without translation of some ponderous foreign quotation. These works never fail to call to mind the expressive phrase "obscurum per obscurius"—the obscure made still more obscure.

TRISMEGISTUS.

THE Knickerbocker No. 5's Grand Promenado Concert and Ball, on the occasion of their fourteenth anniversary, will be given at Platt's Hall on Monday evening, October 17th, and will be an event worth looking forward to. The Knickerbockers pride themselves upon their full ranks, their active duties as firemen, and their gallantry as gentlemen. Though by allotment of company formation they are rated as No. 5, yet upon the occasion of their anniversaries, their festivals always rank as No. 1.

A FAIR AWARD.—R. Liddle & Co., gunsmiths and gun manufacturers, on Washington street, near the Post Office, were awarded the First Premium for double-barrelled shot guns, at the Mechanics' Institute Fair of this city. Bob has long been famous for the excellence and accuracy of the workmanship and repairing done in his shop, and for his extensive assortment of guns, Rifles, Pistols, Fishing Tackle, and sporting accessories, of every kind; and now he enters the field with some "double-barrelers" of his own make that excel in beauty and completeness, in fineness of finish and material, anything in the market. Those guns will go off, sure, in a double sense of the word.

MUSICIANS, Ho!—Pianos are selling here at fifty per cent. lower than at the East. Walter S. Peirce & Co. are selling superior seven octave instruments for $300, at their Piano rooms, 26 Montgomery street.

SAINT NAPOLEON.

AS in ancient Rome the slaves were once a year permitted to indulge in the harmless fancy that they were freemen, so one day is annually set apart for the Parisians to remember that they are loyal. During the rest of the year they rejoice in a serene contemplation of their political liberalism and intellectual spiritualité, but when the Ides of August approach, they begin to reflect that two days afterwards it will be their duty to go mad in glorificatiou of the only Saint whose worship in the least troubles the devotional instincts of a Frenchman. Lest they should forget or miscalculate the date of his festival, hundreds of men and women, such as in London permeate the streets with illuminated hats announcing less obtrusive exhibitions, arrest the attention of the flâneur on the Boulevards, by thrusting into his hand a broadside bearing the flaming inscription of La Saint-Napoléon, Chanson Nationale. This, in a certain sense, undoubtedly inspired anthem commences in the following strain:

Quels chants d'amour! quel concert d'allégresse!
Ciel! qu'ai-je lu sur le calendrier?
C'est le Quinze Août, chacun alors s'empresse
De déserter le bureau l'atelier,
A nos plaisirs mariant sa clémence,
Un beau soliel plane sur l'horizon;
Du haut des cieux Dieu protége la France,
C'est aujourd'hui la Saint-Napoléon.

But when once the blessed morning has broken, and the fair sun commenced to shine distressingly, as per advertisement, there is little need of the invocations of the bard to remind the unhappy visitor that the Emperor's fete has broken loose. At 6 A. M. he is startled from his couch by a salvo of guns, which announces the day of Panis et Circenses. The panis is distributed in its natural form to the poor, and in that of wine to the legions whom their master not unnaturally delights to honor. At noon Te Deums are chanted in all the churches in honor of the maker of the new Boulevards, and then the Fete de Jour commences. The theatres vie with each other in receiving the Emperor's "orders," everything but his free-list being on this occasion entirely suspended. "The freedom of the theatres"—which is in everybody's mouth at Paris, and has furnished the Variétés with a subject for as diverting a farrago of nonsense as has ever graced its boards—to-day becomes a reality on one side of the curtain at least. Strange to say, the most popular of the gratis representations, all of which are given at one o'clock in the day, is that of Esther, at the Theatre-Français. Did Racine, when he composed his most unobjectionable morality for the benefit of the prim young ladies of St. Cyr, dream of its being represented on a hot August morning before a couple of thousand of Paris workmen? Not all of these and their ladies, however, can sit at the feet of the strictly legitimate Muse. Melpomene is hard run by the frowsiest of Terpsichores. The glories of the Empire are celebrated by hundreds of devotees in tights, and all the funambulists of the world seem to be standing on their heads before the Hotel of the Invalides. Military spectacles recall the glories of the Mexican war, which has brought so much profit to France, and the horrors of the Polish rebellion with which she so effectively sympathized. A large proportion of the dusty crowd betakes itself to the enjoyment of those swings and roundabouts without which no Frenchman or Frenchwoman appears, even on soberer days, to be able to realize perfect enjoyment. Hardy adventurers climb to the top of greased poles in order to descend covered with glory, and a spoon of Britannia metal in their mouth. The million is nearly drunk with delight and lemonade when it remembers that the best exhibitiou of the day is yet to come, and hurries off to behold its own Elect, with the hope of his dynasty on his august knees, and the arbitress of fashion by his august side, condescendingly drive through the crowd. It is then that the omnipresent reporter of the Moniteur observes those cheers which seem never to end, and takes note of the intelligence with which the heir of the safest of thrones appropriates to himself his share in the popular enthusiasm.

In the eveniug commences a part of the fete the glories of which are indeed far from new to the frequenters of Cremorne or the Chateau des Fleurs, but which is certainly one of those things which are managed superlatively well in France. Five hundred thousand lamps (more or less) recall, as Mr. E. T. Smith would say, the nights of Haroun-Alraschid; yet there is not the least fear that the Sultan himself may be lurking amidst the crowd, with his bow-string in his pocket, in the disguise of a Turkish or Cochin China merchant. For there he stands himself, on a balcony of the Tuileries, with the same sweet smile and the same cold lack-lustre eyes, gazing down upon the people whose enthusiasm once more surpasses anything within the recollection of the oldest reporter on the Moniteur's staff. Nothing could tear his subjects away from the contemplation of their chosen one, were it not that the fireworks, a species of exhibition most perfectly adapted to the satisfaction of the French idiosyncrasy, are about to commence on the Champ de Mars. Long may the Emperor live who can afford such pyrotechnic displays, which end, of course, in a magnificent Mexican temple, just as the central glory of the illuminations consists in an architectural blaze rouud the obelisk which, as the attendant warriors inform the spectator, also represeuts a Mexican reminiscence. Who can doubt that was worth fighting for Jecker's bonds when so many motifs for an Imperial fete could be obtained in the liberated land in question? It is with such a feeling that the crowds continue to walk up and down the flaming streets till any hour in the morning, casually exclaiming, "Vive l'Empereur!" as who should say "Is it not jolly?" nnd not going to bed till loyalty is upon its very last legs. Whether it is loyalty which induces large bodies of youths and maidens to repair once more to the Invalides, and under its shadow dance the national dance of France without the accustomed supervision of an officially chaste sergent de ville, is scarcely within the province of the most intelligent of foreign visitors to determine.

And thus the St. Napoleon is once more over, and the British traveller—to whom a comparison naturally suggests itself with his own national holiday, the St. Derby—asks himself whether he has really been assisting at a great festival of a people and a city which love to call themselves the most spirituel in the world. He feels sure that the correspondents of the London journals who condescend to notice the annual return of the day will point out that not a single case of drunkenness was noticed during its course. He confirms the fact from the limited range of his personal experience, and draws the inference that a French mob can be rendered utterly inane without the stimulants which many of their British brethren on such occasions imperatively demand. It is idle to attempt to draw inferences as to the sentiments of a people from the fact of its being so very easily amused on one day in the year. But three hundred and sixty-four days remain; nnd it is during these that some sections at least of the population reflect on the question whether bread, shows, and Mexican glories suffice for the wants of a nation daily growing in intelligence, and to which the taste of liberty is not a wholly unaccustomed one. It is on some of these that it may occur to such inopportune thinkers that, while it may be very well for a couple of millions or so to hold an "authorized" assemblage in the streets on the 15th of August, it seems hard that a heavy fine should have been inflicted only a day or two before on certain persons who had ventured to hold an "unauthorized" meetiug of rather more than twenty in a private house. Meanwhile, the game goes on merrily enough, and is certninly worth the candles and lamps that were lit for it on the Emperor's fete day. On this occasion three new boulevards were incidentally "inaugurated." Soon Paris will be all boulevards, and of course infinitely better adapted than even now for illuminations—and infiuitely worse for barricades. It will no longer be necessary, as it was this year, to issue instructions to the authorities that the splendor of the fete shall everywhere be in accordance with the enthusiastic feelings of the population. The only question is, whether the day may not sooner or later come when it will be found requisite to send forth a general proclamation, somewhat the converse of the former, and to order the civil and military authorities throughout France, and in Paris especially, to take every precautiou to ensure the sentiments of the population being in accordance with the aims and existence of the Imperial Government.—Saturday Review.

UNDER THE KNIFE.

AND now the critical moment has arrived, so, having undressed myself, I take a last look around and mount the table; I am at once seized and arranged for the convenience of carving by the two aides-de-camp. Mr. C., who, with his sleeves tucked up, had been standing in such a position as to screen the little what-not and its glittering load from my sight, takes a last look at the wound, evidently determining in his own mind the precise spot where he will make the first gash, and then, retiring a pace or two, nods to Dr. S., who has placed himself behind me. That gentleman at onco steps forward and commences to apply the chloroform. The instrument he uses for this purpose appears to me to partake very much of the form of a meerschaum pipe, in the bowl of which is placed a sponge containing the fluid, n cover fitting tightly over the top of the bowl. The long pipe-stem terminates in a cup intended to cover the nose and mouth of the patient. At the upper end of the stem is a small valve or stop-cock, which regulates the amount of vapor to be inhaled. I am told to draw long deep inspirations as steadily and slowly as possible, and for two or three seconds the only effect I perceive is a slight choking sensation which makes me gasp for breath. Then, however, I see him turn on the stop-cock a little fuller, and immediately I feel myself becoming giddy, the sensation of choking increases, and I find more and more difficulty in drawing my breath. The objects in the room become blurred and dance before my eyes; my brain begins to throb and whirl in my head, and I feel a weight like lead on my heart. And now my blood begins to surge violently through my veins, and beats like a sledge-hammer on my temples; every nerve in my body tingles, it grows faster and faster, wilder and wilder—the room rushes round and round—I cannot bear it—I cannot breathe—I try to strnggle, and feel I can just raise my arm, which, even in my state of semi-consciousness, I perceive is at once held down by one of those abominable students, who is doubtless enjoying the spectacle nmazingly, and gloating over my distress. A roaring sound fills my ear—I strive to raise myself to struggle, but I cannot move. I try to scream—I try to breathe—I gasp wildly—I am suffocating—I shall die—I—I . . . A pause, a long, sensible pause, at the end of which I feel that I have been asleep; and then I am gradually awoke by hearing the gentle plash of water dropping on my pillow. I hear it quite distinctly, and I know at once what it is; but for a king's ransom I could not open my eyes, or stir hand or foot. I am conscious, but motionless. I hear the murmur of voices, but cannot distinguish what is said. Presently there is another plash, and I somehow know they are sprinkling my face; but though I hear it fall upon the pillow, I cannot feel it; nnd now I hear the voices once more. This time I can distinguish what is said. It is Dr. S—— speaking, and he says, "He is coming round fast." Another moment and I can open my eyes. Dr. S—— is standing over me with a basin of water, from which he is sprinkling my face and bathing my temples, though, oddly enough, I cannot feel either his touch or the water. Mr. C—— is standing with his back to me washing his hands, and one of the pupils is packing up the mahogany box, whilst the other is watching me with a look which seems to me very like one of regret that it is all over, and that there is no more to be seen. The nurse is carrying away the two buckets, and I can even see that the water is very red. I see all this at a glance; I am perfectly conscious, nnd yet I can feel nothing. Not only am I free from pain, but there is a numbness over all my limbs. I cannot feel my own touch—I have no sensation whatever. In this state I am lifted into the bed and placed in a comfortable position, not even the movement causing any sensation. Gradually, however, a slight tingling comes on, somewhat similar to that which takes place when a hand or foot has, what is commonly called, gone to sleep. This is succeeded by a smarting pain at the seat of the wound, which increases in intensity until, after some minutes, it becomes very severe. Sensation has returned to my body, and with it comes the after pain of the operation. This, of course, is all the more severe, because I have been spared the torture of the operation itself. It does not, however, last very long, and within half an hour it has entirely ceased.—British Army and Navy Review.

MRS. FARNHAM AND HER "ERA."

MRS. FARNHAM, whose name is familiar to Californians, has lately written a strong-minded book entitled, Woman and her Era, which the reviews handle rather ungallantly. Says one:

Mrs. Farnham could overthrow any opponent in the world, whether saint or plain man or worse, by her knack of pouring forth n stream of mysterious aphorisms, worthy of the palmiest days of the Transcendental Mecca. If one were to urge any of the common facts by which the world is wont to justify the comparative subordination of women in the social system, she would never think of closing with the fact, but would start from some sonorous proposition, that "Sentiment may be defined as the pure, simple reflection of the Truth which the consciousness entertains," or "That life is most elevated in itself and its uses in which there is the largest amount of voluntary and mixed function, for so it has the largest intelligent hold on results." If this is not enough, we are laid low by a couple of pages from Mr. Walt Whitman, that wicked Tupper, whose writings, it seems, are a sort of precursor of the era of the Feminine. After we have been properly stupefied by awful aphorisms on Life, and Truth, and Intuitions, and Conscionsness, we are finally despatched at the hands of Walt Whitman, thus:

You Hottentot with clicking palate!
You owned persons, dropping sweat-drops or blood-drops!
You poor Koboo, whom the meanest of the rest look down upon!
You dwarfed Kamschatkan, Greenlander, Lapp!
You Austral negro, naked, red, sooty, with protrusive lip, grovelling, seeking your food!
You Caffre, Berber, Soudanese!
You haggard, uncouth, untutored Bedowee!
You bather, bathing in the Ganges!
You benighted roamer of Amazonia! You Patagonian—you Fegee man!
I do not prefer others so very much before you either!

What this has to do with the argument we cannot guess, but we have a vague fancy that it is meant to be abusive. And Mrs. Farnham is a very good vilifier on her own account when the occasion requires that men should be thoroughly scolded and exposed. "Who are the gourmands," she asks, "and for whom are concocted the thousand and one compounds known as bitters, cordials, stimulants to appetite, stomachics, tonics, etc., with which the walls of modern cities are illustrated?" The termagnnt of an Irish street-row might vainly envy Mrs. Farnham's fluency of vituperation. "Who consumes the tobacco, opium, hemp, and other narcotics? Who located the soul in the ventricles of the brain, then in the stomach, then in the pineal gland, then in the spleen, then in the muscular heart, then in the frontal sinus? Who shut up Galileo, and rejected the prayers of Columbus, and scouted the idea of the circulation of the blood?" This ferocious indictment goes on nntil the wretched masculine shuts up the book and calls upon the rocks to fall upon him and the mountains to cover him.

Mrs. Farnham's æsthetic argument for the superiority of her sex is chiefly based on the supposed fact that "the Venus de' Medici outlives all male marbles, and is not only visited and admired by men, but by women, who either never hear of the Apollo Belvidere, or pay him but a scanty homage if they do." Poetry plainly shows the same thing, and verses are quoted from Lord Houghton, Miss Jewsbury, Whittier, Mrs. Hemans, and others, in illustration of the writer's position. But Mrs. Farnham evidently thinks her strongest point is the organic argument, nnd into this, unhappily, we are quite unable to follow her. It would be very unfair to say that it is abominably indecent, as one is at first strongly inclined to do, because, after all, the reproduction of the species is a proper subject enough for scientific discussion, and Mrs. Farnham pretends to be scientific, whether she is or not. If we are to have lady doctors, we suppose we shall have to accustom ourselves to hearing women talk in public about the physical relations of the sexes. At present it is rather startling, and we can only venture to state the lady's conclusion, which is that in these functions, as in everything else, woman plays a vastly superior part to man, and that paternity is a poor and contemptible office, while maternity is the most glorious part of human destiny. However, we may mention one of Mrs. Farnham's incidental arguments without offence. The respective positions of the sexes are broadly hinted at, we are told, in the difference between the bearded face of man and the delicacy of the feminine countenance. The character of woman is open, noble, and fearless, so nature has thrown no mask over her face. Man, on the contrary, is subtle, deceitful, and cunning, and this would be too plainly written on his features did not kind nature furnish him with a means of concealing his revolting lineaments. The beard, in short, Mrs. Farnham alleges, is given to man on the same principle on which tails are given to the brutes. This is a modest and delicate sample of the physical arguments by which this enterprising feminine proves her case, and it is about the only one which we can transcribe.

POETIC IMPECUNIOSITY.—At one of many breakfasts we had the honor and good fortune to enjoy at No. 22 St. James's place, we found the poet Rogers in his drawing-room in a more than usually pleasant vein. Taking our hand, holding it, and leading us to the window, (half smiling, half laughing all the time,) he exclaimed, "I have an anecdote for you, and in your way: Coming from the city yesterday I took Fetter-lane, Fleet street, in my road, that I might see, reverentially, the newly-discovered house in which Dryden is said to have lived. I asked for the house, and could for a long time obtain no better reply to my repeated question, 'Which is Dryden's house?' than 'Dryden, Dryden, (the policeman I spoke to thinking for a time with his finger, Sterne-like, to his ear,) 'Dryden; is he backward with his rent?' That policeman knew to the life the poetical character. I went laughing home, and, as you see, am laughing still."

ALFONSO LOMBARDI, a celebrated sculptor of the Emperor Charles V., was a great coxcomb. He got punished one day by a lady of Bologna, to whom he took it into his head to make love in a foppish manner. She was his partner at a ball, in the midst of which he turned to her, and, heaving a profound sigh, said, as he looked her in the face with what he thought ineffable sweetness in his eyes, and we may suppose some fantastic and writhing gesture: "If 'tis not love I feel, pray what is it?" "Perhaps," said the young lady, "something bites you."

FLUNKEYISM.

THE Freeman of the 17th inst., has an article, headed "Flunkeyism of the Licensed Victuallers." On the 9th inst. the statue was inaugurated of the late Prince Consort, in the old Kent-road, by the Prince of Wales. We quote the following observations from the Freeman on the conduct of the victuallers:

"Not improper was it that the son of the Prince Consort should be treated with all honor, when he came to the Licensed Victualler's Asylum, to 'unveil' the statue of his father. He is the son of the Queen of England, and is himself the prospective occupant of the British throne; and all sentiment both of loyalty and propriety demand that he should be treated always with all respect—a respect due alike to his high position, and, for anything we know, to his personal character likewise. But—and it is here our difficulty begins—if he is a Prince, he is a Prince in England; and—though he is a Prince—he is not yet the chief person in the English realm. We cannot understand how any Englishman—we cannot understand how any Englishman who remembers that there is a Queen—can use to a Prince of Wales such language as was used without a blush last Tuesday. Two addresses were presented. We quote one of them:

"'May it please your Royal Highness—Most Illustrious Patron—We, the chairman, trustees and governors of this asylum, beg permission to approach your august person for the purpose of expressing to your Royal Highness our high sense of the lasting obligation which you have laid us under by the distinguished honor which you have this day conferred upon us. This act of your Royal favor, most noble Prince, is a cause of profound gratification not only to ourselves as the executive, but also to every member of the trade by whose voluntary contributions the institution is supported, and will ever be remembered by us with feelings of deepest gratitude and of the most heartfelt pride. Associated, Sire, as are the events of the day with the memory of our lamented patron, our thoughts cannot but recur with real and fervent sympathy to our Royal Queen, your Royal mother, and we pray sincerely and devoutly that Almighty God may, of His Goodness long preserve her Majesty, and pour the rich blessings of His peace and consolation into her sorrowing heart. For yourself, most illustrious Prince, and for your Royal consort, we humbly pray that God may vouchsafe to each of you a long life of health and happiness. For your Royal son we pray that he may grow up to be a blessing and a daily source of increasing joy to yourself and her Royal Highness, the Princess of Wales; and for your Royal House we pray that you may live for ever in the hearts of a loving and devoted people. And now, most noble Prince, with every sentiment of loyalty to our Queen, and of profound respect for the person of your Royal Highness, we beg to renew the expression of our gratitude for the mark of gracious condescension which you have to-day been pleased to bestow upon us.'

"Now we put it to Englishmen—Englishmen of the nineteenth century—whether this is language fitting, from their lips, for any man living. Such an address ought to have been presented, as to an Eastern monarch, by persons having 'their hands upon their mouths, and their mouths in the dust.' By what right is the Prince of Wales 'most illustrious,' and 'most noble?' In the course of the two addresses, these words are used, each of them, not less than four times. Even the word 'Sire'—never before assuredly given to one less than a monarch—is addressed to the Prince once at least. The chairman, trustees and governors, 'beg permission to approach his august person.' Again and again they assure him of their 'profound respect,' and of their high sense of his 'gracious condescension.' We do not know how all this will strike our readers, but to us it seems unworthy of Englishmen. Such language is unworthy alike of those who offer it and of him to whom it is offered. For is not the Prince of Wales a gentleman? Is it not the first characteristic of a 'gentleman' to respect others as well as himself? And are there to be no degrees in adulation? If this is fitting language for a young man, only twenty-two years old, and fresh from college, how must he be addressed when some day he shall be King of England? What language would these 'licensed victuallers' have for the Queen, if she were to condescend to visit them?

"To ourselves, this spirit of adulation, which we fear is on the increase, seems worthy only of contempt and condemnation. The danger of its increase arises from the real respect and affection in which the present Royal family are held. But that respect may be carried too far. It will be a sad thing for England if Englishmen forget their own dignity, even in the presence of their greatest men. Our fathers spoke not, nor wrote so. To be an Englishman was itself sufficient dignity to them, in whatever presence they stood. Let us act worthily of our fathers. Let us 'honor' our kings and princes, but let us also respect ourselves. After all, princes are made for peoples, not peoples for kings. If Albert Edward should ever be in danger of forgetting this truth, it will be the people themselves who will to be blame!"

TATTLING.—"It is a great thing to mind one's own business," said a certain philosopher, and he was right. It is a great thing to let other people's business alone, and this much is implied by the maxim above quoted. In our view, there is hardly a class of people in modern society—and they are numerous—so superlatively contemptible as that class known as tattlers, or meddlers in other people's business. We don't admire a thief; we have no affinity with gamblers; abominate drunkards, and have no respect for misers; but any one of these is a first-class gentleman in comparison with the jealous-minded tattler, who goes mousing about in a garb of social respectability, poking his or her nose into the affairs of their neighbors, and seizing upon every trifling circumstance which comes within the wide scope of their remorseless curiosity, for the purpose of making capital against those whose character they cannot understand, because it is pure and above impeachment. The mischief-making busy-bodies are simply all unmitigated nuisances, and should be frowned on by all sincere lovers of social peace and happiness. The man or woman who can find no better employment than tattling, had better jump into the nearest pool of water, and become food for respectable fishes. In that way the eels would gain a little in their commissary department, and society above water would be immensely purified.

SERIALS AND THREE VOLUMES.

I LIKE what in our modern slang are called serial stories. The writers understand one requirement at least of their trade—they do not give too much at a time; and in so far they resemble the heads of the profession, the old Eastern story-tellers, who only told the Calif each evening enough to set him asleep. Now this alone is a great point. Another advantage is this—they cannot cram into their limited space any of those long-winded descriptions, especially of scenery, which the three volume people are so prone to inflict; neither have they so much of the page open to emotional expatiation. They are bound by their very limits to be more short, sharp and decisive. Lastly, they must endeavor to interest by something else than story—that is, they must try what can be done to amuse by humoristic views of life, shrewd touches of character, quaint pictures of people not the less recognizable that they are not met with every day, and occasionally—which Three Volume probably thinks beneath him—they must make us laugh. In the very fact that the reader is not bound to them beyond the monthly part before him, lies their heaviest obligation to interest them. It is like a shilling stage, and if you dislike the conveyance, or feel tired of the company, you can get out and walk home. For all these reasons I incline much to the serial. I do not know how it may be with others, but for myself I am not over-grateful to the man who invests his story with that amount of interest that engrosses my attention too far, and in this way turns me from the real business of life to involve me in cares and sorrows that have no reality. I want to be amused by the novel pretty much as I feel amused with the play—that is, I want what will present a certain number of pictures to my mind without the cost of being obliged to retain them thereafter. If I be obliged to do this, the novel becomes a burden, not a relaxation. I want, besides, the writer to let me so far into his mind that I may know what he thinks is droll, what strange, what picturesque, what attractive, what ridiculous. When I have arrived at that understanding—any one number will suffice for so much—I am able to guess if I should care for more of his company. The three-volume man affords me no such clue as this. All he is thinking of is his wind-up in the last volume. It is for the grand finish alone he cares; his heart, like the Irish postilion's, is fixed on keeping a "trot for the town." No matter how he stumbled and staggered during the stage, so that he comes up to the door at last with whip-cracking, and the jaded team spirited up to a lively tramp. The serial writer, too, performs usually to a larger public, and, consequently, is less addicted to conventionalities than Three Volume, who has a more select few for his audience, and who could not so easily stoop to the vulgarity of common people, and their ways and doings. But as I have said already, the serial is more prone to make me laugh, and for this great gift I prize him most of all. I have very grave doubts if age has anything heavier in all its inflictions than in the diffiently—yearly increasing in a terrific ratio—the difficulty of enjoying a good laugh. For my own part, baldness, adiposity and suchlike, are all lighter evils to me than the gravity I feel stealing over me, the little tolerance I have for small fun, and the growing conviction that the pleasant people have gone home, and that I am left to walk back with the dreary ones. Blackwood's Magazine.

BOY LOVE.—One of the queerest and funniest things to think of, in after life, is boy love. No sooner does a boy acquire a tolerable stature than he begins to imagine himself a man, and to ape mannish ways. He casts side-glances at all the tall girls he may meet, becomes a regular attendant at church or meeting, carries a cane, holds his head erect, and struts a little in his walk. Presently, and very soon, he falls in love—yes, falls is the proper word, because it best indicates his happy, delirious, self-abasement. He lives now in a fairy region, somewhat collateral to the world, and yet blended somehow inextricably with it. He perfumes his hair with fragrant oils, scatters essences over his handkerchief, and desperately shaves and anoints for a beard. He quotes poetry in which "love" and "dove" and "heart" and "dart" peculiarly predominate; and he plunges deeper in the delicious labyrinth, fancies himself filled with the divine afflatus, and suddenly breaks into a scarlet rash—of rhyme. He feeds upon the looks of his beloved; is raised to the seventh heaven if she speaks a pleasant word; is betrayed into the most astonishing ecstacies by a smile; and is plunged into the gloomiest regions of misanthropy by a frown. He believes himself the most devoted lover in the world. There never was such another. There never will be. He is the one great idolator! Wealth! he despises the grovelling thought. Poverty, with the adorable beloved, he rapturously apostrophises as the first of all earthly blessing; and "love in a cottage, with water and a crust," is his beau ideal paradise of dainty delights. He declares to himself, with the most solemn emphasis, that he would go through fire and water; undertake a pilgrimage to China or Kamschatka; swim storm-tossed oceans; scale impassable mountains, and face legions of bayonets, for but one sweet smile from her dear lips. He dotes upon a flower she has cast away. He cherishes her glove—a little worn in the fingers—next to his heart. He sighs like a locomotive letting off steam. He scrawls her dear name over quires of foolscap—a fitting medium for his insanity. He scornfully depreciates the attention of other boys of his own age; cuts Peter Tibbets dead because he said that the adorable Angelina had carroty hair; and passes Harry Bell contemptuously for daring to compare "that gawky Mary Jane" with his incomparable Angelina. Happy! happy! foolish boy love! with its joys, and its hopes, and its fears; its sorrows, its jealousies, and its delights; its raptures and its tortures; its ecstatic fervors and terrible heart-burnings; its solemn ludicrousness, and its intensely prosaic termination.

WHEN some stupid fellow charged Sheridan with inconsistency, the wit replied that the accusation reminded him of the reasoning of the entertainer of a convivial party, who hearing his friends observe that it was time to take leave, as the watchman was crying "Past three." "Why, you don't mind that fellow, do you? He changes his story every half hour!"

PERILS OF RAILWAY TRAVELLING.—The wisdom of allowing railway companies to regulate their lines as they please, without insisting, at least, upon obvious precautions for the safety of the public, has been again illustrated by a case in murder. Last week five persons left King's-cross by the night train for Edinburgh. As the train was starting, the guard, against their wish, pushed into the carriage a sixth passenger, a "tall and strongly-built man," says the Scotsman, "dressed as a sailor, and having a wild and haggard look." The impression he made on his fellow passengers at first glance was that he was intoxicated; but before long they had painful reason to believe that he was suffering from delirium tremens. The train had hardly got upon its way when he started up, declared he had been robbed, and began to rush about the carriage, uttering the most fearful shrieks and imprecations. For a time the others took no notice of him; but by and by they tried to pacify him; but as he became more and more violent, dashing up and down the carriage, and striking out right and left, they saw that their only chance was force. Luckily they were more than a match for him; but it was all that four of them could do to keep him from throwing himself out of the window in his endeavor to break from them. One of the party had a strap, and with that they tied his arms behind him, and at the same time taking his knife from him; but, even then, his struggles were so violent that it took two of them to hold him down on the seat, and they were not safe until they had tied his legs together with their handkerchiefs.

Bound hand and foot, he still struggled, and if the strap, which was not a very strong one, had given way, there is no saying what the result of this journey to Edinburgh might have been. One of the passengers was an elderly gentleman, too much terrified to render assistance; another, who had struggled with the maniac, was in a fainting state; and the train had to run nearly eighty miles, from London to Peterborough, without stopping. Under these circumstances, the parties did what they could to attract the attention of the guard, but in vain. The passengers in the neighboring carriage heard what was going on; men shouted, women screamed. Every effort that either could make to attract attention was made; and in fact the officials at one of the stations saw that something was wrong, and showed the danger signals. The train began to slacken its pace, and the passengers thought that the hour of their deliverance was at hand; but no sooner were the danger lights passed than the train tore away again at its old pace, and it was not till Peterborough was reached that the man was removed from the carriage.

When we read such a narrative as this, and think of the namby-pamby terms in which the Board of Trade has invited the railway companies to reflect whether it may not be "deserving of consideration" that passengers should have the means of communication with the guard, we cannot restrain our indignation at such miserable folly. On this question the Board of Trade have the whole country on their side, and when they suggest a reform which everybody demands, they should say, "Either you must do this, or we will do it for you."—London Review.

YOUNG LADY CONFIDANTES.—There are two kinds of young-lady confidantes. One adopts this line with a definite object in view—as a means to an end, that end being matrimony. Like a skilful general, convinced that the enemy's position is impregnable in front, she seeks to vanquish him by an adroit flank movement. Overpowering beauty, overpowering cleverness, overpowering fortune are, in their way, like the gros bataillons by which Napoleon swept all before him. A woman who commands such mighty weapons for enslaving the heart of man is irresistible. But one who has them not, or has them in a less degree, cannot expect the same easy triumph. To gain her point she must often have recourse to manœuvre. And no manœuvre is more congenial to the female strategist than that of gradually but surely possessing herself of all the avenues to a man's tastes and predilections. This is what she is quietly doing while he waxes confidential. She is taking the measure of his intellect, noting his likes and dislikes, observing his habits, his hobbies, his weaknesses, reconnoitring his most accessible side. The result of this study of character is treasured up for future use. Supposing him to have revealed in an unguarded moment a passion for botany, she will surprise and delight him one fine day by giving a wild flower an alarmingly scientific name. If he is fond of field sports, she will secretly take in the Field, and astonish his weak mind by her knowledge of natural history. If politics are his chief interest, she listens again and again with unflagging interest to his résumé of the state of parties, and his view of the Schleswig-Holstein question: and when she has made out on which side his sympathies lie in the American struggle, loudly proclaims her own adhesion thereto. With the votary of art she adores art. With the pre-Raffaellite she is pre-Raffaellite, and lays aside her crinoline, heroically sacrificing her love of the Fashionable to her sense of the Beautiful. With an enthusiast for Gothic she is all for Gothic, and, as a proof of the perfect conformity of her own tastes with his, she manages to give a Gothic bend to her last new bonnet. Music, if her friend avows a passion for music, she declares a necessity of her being. All this delicate flattery tells. It gratifies the self-esteem which characterizes the lords of creation. But it is not by operating on this sentiment that she hopes to succeed. She speculates on the chance of making herself indispensable. Some day, she thinks, the object of her ambition will suddenly awake to the consciousness that he cannot do better than make a lady who understands him so well his wife. He will say, Here is a person to whom I have told everything, from whom I have no secrets, who knows my tastes and shares them, whose sympathies exactly coincide with mine; where can I possibly find a woman better calculated to make me happy? He will perceive at last that years of unreserved confidence have completely mined his position as a bachelor, that it is no longer tenable, and that he must instantly decamp or capitulate. Whether the latter alternative is adopted depends mainly on the lady herself—on her firmness in forcing matters to a crisis, and her tact in making that crisis take a direction favorable to her wishes. If she fail in either of those qualities, success will never crown her efforts, however her pertinacity may deserve it. Her fate will be to be involved for an indefinite term in a long, dreary, aimless, damaging flirtation, which perishes at last of disgust and inanition.

FREDERICK THE GREAT AND VOLTAIRE.

FROM CARLYLE.

SOME apology may be proper for inflicting Carlyle and his style upon anybody at this day—a style forcibly affected, spasmodically involved, hardly English, thoroughly repugnant to most readers, yet made bearable, even attractive, by cultivation, like many other queer tastes and habits. At times, but seldom, it flows smoothly, with a steady stream of simple thoughts in simple language, boiling up then into broken rapids, and ultimately rolls contractedly down some precipitous cataract—a pent-up, condensed mass of foam, iridescently beautiful in color, movingly descriptive in power—description splendidly graphic, compressed into single phrase, word, or even syllable.

In his volume but recently published is given an eminently characteristic account of the visit and residence of Voltaire at the Court of Berlin, urgently pressed upon him by Frederick—Voltaire accepting, secretly with intense gratification of pride, openly in a hesitating, delaying way, to excite the King's urgency, and ending in mutually disagreeable, disastrous results. No where could the genius of Carlyle find fitter room for its peculiar powers: the eccentricities of two sensitive, fiery, wayward and capricious, yet extraordinary men, treated con amore by the most eccentric, wayward and capricious of authors. How he revels in his theme, and dashes with a light, joyous step along the trackless path of a mutilated, dateless and vague German record! He has done a great work among these German mysteries and myths, bringing light to life from loose, discordant and repulsive elements—to the historian an invaluable disinterment, to the world a story "pleasant but mournful;" for small and great things, mean and magnanimous, are alike set out in bold, bright foreground, by the artful hand of the master sketch-man.

Let the picture from the work—brilliant but envenomed—speak for itself:

Voltaire's visit lasted, in all, about Thirty-two Months; and is divisible into Three Acts or Stages. The first we have seen: how it commenced in brightness as of the sun, and ended, by that Hirsch business, in whirlwinds of smoke and soot,—Voltaire retiring, on his passionate prayer, to that silent Country-house which he calls the Marquisat; there to lie in hospital, and wash himself a little, and let the skies wash themselves.

The Hirsch business having blown over, as all things do, Voltaire resumed his place among the Court-Planets, and did his revolutions; striving to forget that there ever was a Hirsch, or a soot-explosion of that nature. In words nobody reminded him of it, the King least of all: and by degrees, matters were again tolerably glorious, and all might have gone well enough; thongh the primal perfect splendor, such fuliginous reminiscence being ineffaceable, never could be quite re-attained. The diamond Cross of Merit, the Chamberlain gold Key, hung bright upon the man; a man the admired of men. He had work to do: work of his own which he reckoned priceless (that immortal Siécle de Louis Quatorze; which he stood by, and honestly did, while here; the one fixed axis in those fooleries and whirlings of his);—work for the King, "two hours, one hour, a day," which the King reckoned priceless in its sort. For Friedrich himself Voltaire has, with touches of real love coming out now and then, a very sincere admiration mixed with fear; and delights in shining to him, and being well with him, as the greatest pleasure now left in life. Besides the King, he had society enough, French in type, and brilliant enough: plenty of society; or, at his wish, what was still better, none at all. He was bedded, boarded, lodged, as if beneficent fairies had done it for him; and for all these things no price asked, you might say, but that he would not throw himself out of a window! Had the man been wise—But he was not wise. He had, if no big gloomy devil in him among the bright angels that were there, a multitude of ravening tumultuary imps, or little devils very ill-chained; and was lodged, he and his restless little devils, in a skin far too thin for him and them!—

Reckoning up the matter, one cannot find that Voltaire ever could have been a blessing at Berlin, either for Friedrich or himself: and it is to be owned that Friedrich was not wise in so longing for him, or clasping him so frankly in his arms. As Friedrich, by this time, probably begins to discover;—though indeed to Friedrich the thing is of finite moment; by no means of infinite, as it was to Voltaire; "At worst, nothing but a little money thrown away!" thinks Friedrich: "Sure enough, this is a strange Trismegistus, this of mine: star fire-work shall we call him, or terrestrial smoke-and-soot work? But one can fence oneself against the blind vagaries of the man; and get a great deal of good by him, in the lucid intervals." To Voltaire himself the position is most agitating; but then its glories, were there nothing more! Besides he is always thinking to quit it shortly; which is a great sedative in troubles. What with intermittencies (safe hidings in one's Marquisat, or vacant interlunar cave), with alternations of offence and reconcilement; what with occasional actual flights to Paris (whitherward Voltaire is always busy to keep a postern open; and of which there is frequent talk, and almost continual thought, all along), flights to be called "visits," and privately intending to be final, but never proving so,—the Voltaire-Freidrich relation, if left to itself, might perhaps long have staggered about, and not ended as it did.

ON Lord Henry Pelly's iron tax being withdrawn, some one suggested a tax on coals, to make up the deficiency. "Poh!" said Sheridan, "do you want to raise a rebellion in our kitchens? The cooks are worse than the blacksmiths. Tax coals instead of iron! That would be jumping out of the frying-pan into the fire!"

HOTEL CHANGE.—The Railroad House has recently been purchased by C. L. Ross, Esq., an old pioneer resident of our city, and doubtless well known to thousands of our readers, who has thoroughly renovated the house and fitted it up with every convenience. Mr. Ross says that he will make the "Railroad," famous for its good living, and moderate charges, an oasis in the very business heart of the city; and from his business activity and experience we have no doubt but that he will do it.

HAPPENINGS OF THE WEEK.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 2D.

THE week opens perspiringly. Handkerchiefs and fans in demand; shirt-collars wilt; display of muslins and light fabrics wonderful. Every woman that has been dying to appear in gossamer has a chance and improves it; and they are all out, looking very zephyr-like and angelic—a little red in the face for angels, perhaps, but their wings are all right.

Offishal: Another whale comes ashore on the beach, adding a new odor to the "spicy gales of Araby, the blest," in that direction. Foster, at the Cliff House, has reversed his telescopes and opera-glasses, and people are requested to see the whales in that method, as it removes them to a greater distance, and, of course, the perfume also. Foster is a genius.

MONDAY, OCTOBER 3D.

WHEW! how hot—awful papers! Thermometer at 85, yesterday, and it seems a little warmer to-day.

The steamer Golden Age sails at 3½ P. M. The firemen's "strike" culminates in a bit of a row. They strike several people, giving striking proofs of being in earnest. The Police and Provost Guard march to the Mail Company's wharf, fully armed, and there is a good chance for somebody to get hurt. Of course, it won't be any of those who deserve it, but some open-mouthed looker-on, who ought to be somewhere else.

Billy Birch and George Pen Johnston fraternize and settle the affairs of the nation. Billy walks alongside Johnston with a codfish in his hand—a favorable omen that the North and the South will soon lay aside cold steel and be playful little lambs together.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 4TH.

THE Courts adjourn in respect for the memory of Judge Baldwin.

The Provost Guard increased by the addition of Company E, 9th U. S. Infantry. The Guard now numbers 160.

The elegant French carom billiard table raffled at the Fair was won by Ticket No. 852. Who was the lucky holder? Give us the cue. (Since turned up.)

Ship Victor, from Puget Sound, bound for Valparaiso, lost her mainmast in a squall, and put into this port in distress.

John Davis, sentenced to board perpetually at the San Quentin Academy, at the expense of the State, was brought down from Sacramento last evening. John's personal expenses are considerably reduced by this movement, and he can live without being bothered with a board-bill every Saturday. Is this Honest John Davis, of Massachusetts?

The race for $5,000 a side, between the well-known trotter, Fillmore, and the Unknown, pacer—two-mile heats—was won by the latter. The pacer seems to be a mine of wealth to the owner—not an imaginary but a Real del Monte vein; the dividends are more satisfactory than the original ever paid. We did not gamble on the result. Time—5:16, 5:19, 5:23. Over $50,000 changed hands on this race.

Awful hot again to-day. Sherry cobblers in demand; ice cream received coldly.

Business at the Fair closed, and all property being removed, "meet me by gas-light alone, at the Big Cheese at the Fair," is no longer possible. Lovers in despair!

The Alta receives a dozen nice white wine, ig-noah-ing the CALIFORNIAN—all owing to its removal to the new office, opposite Odd Fellows' Building. The Alta is informed that we never lend our corkscrew, but wine can be brought to our office and opened, without charge of "corkage."

Proposition from Mr. O'Donnell, of San José, to ornament the Plaza—which is not much of an ornament of itself, in its present dry and dusty condition. If allowed to pitch in, Mr. O'Donnell will improvise turpentino walks and a lemonade all round.

A couple of tons of silver ore from the Shoshone mine, Reese River, received—giving from $4,000 to $6,000 per ton. Reese is looking up, and the people are beginning to show themselves men of metal.

Several ladies appear in the street in the new-fashioned swallow-tailed dresses; the tale is authentic.

A Difference of Opinion: The rebel papers claim that Early whipped Sheridan. If they are satisfied with such victories, we are, certainly; and we would like to get thrashed in that manner every day.

A "cave" in the Gould and Curry mine reported; there has been considerable of a "cave" in the stock, lately, burying some of the holders.

Ferrand's Patent Oscillating Amalgator takes the premium of the Mechanics' Fair. It is a splendid machine, and every mill should have them.

Assessors around lively after Federal officers and employés to levy the additional tax of 5 per cent. on all incomes for 1863, being a special tax in addition to all others for the equipment and pay of the one-hundred days men. A little steep, but can't be helped; so pungle down the greenbacks. The hardest part of it comes to those who have spent their incomes for '63 and have nothing left out of that of 1864 to pay with. It is a luxury that those not in the employment of Government escape.

Another run-away, from carelessness, and a lady seriously injured. About one man in fifty knows how to drive, or has common sense and judgment sufficient to be trusted with women and children. And yet in San Francisco every other man drives a horse, and it is about an even thing, half the time, whether it is not a horse at one end and a jackass at the other.

Fifteenth District Court: Grant vs. Moore—The jury Grant the plaintiff $5,000 damages for the strength of defendant's attachment, which he (plaintiff) says nearly or quite ruined him. (Often the result of attachments.) He asked for Moore, but got less than his figures, but still a very respectable amount of consolation. Moral: Mind how you grab!

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Kean arrive from Australia, accompanied by Mr. George Coppin, Miss Chapman, George Everett and J. F. Cathcart, of the profession.

An attaché of the press has $88. Such a remarkable and unusual circumstance attracts the attention of everybody, and among others a gentleman who had not eighty-eight dollars nor eighty-eight cents, and concluded to freeze to a man who had, and "spe-'im-'ome." On the way, fearing that so much money in the hands of an attaché of the press might be made the medium of starting another weekly paper, and believing it his duty to check such an insane idea, he checked on this bank and drew the funds. Nobody arrested—Chief Burke probably pooh-poohing, the story as ridiculous. He probably never in all his life before heard of a newspaper man having that amount of coin. We never did either, and believe the whole story is "a 'oax."

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 5TH.

THE Club-house and stables of the Eastonia Park Association burn up or down—either way amounts to about the same. Loss, $30,000; insured for $12,000. The $18,000 of Irish dividend is apportioned out to about fifteen gentlemen, most of whom are not greatly scorched by the operation, as they can stand it.

The Pacific Dry Dock Company file their certificate of incorporation. Capital stock, $1,000,000, in 2,000 shares of $500 each. They propose to build a dry dock in the water over about Hunter's Point. Their enterprise is a pacific one.

A young lady "does" several gentlemen of our acquaintance by "selling them" tickets reading thus: "Investment of one dollar in a Sewing Machine, Orphan Fair. G." The only sewing machine the gentlemen will find their money invested in will be the one in crinoline. What the "G" stands for we can't imagine, unless it is for "gammon." The young lady is reported good-looking, and consequently she met with good success; but it won't be easy to find a man who will admit that he invested in this fair orphan.

E. P. Peckham, commissioned as Notary Public, files his bonds to-day. We swear by Ned, and there's Not-ary other more popular recorder of solemn assertions. It appears to be a great relief for people to go to his office and "cuss,"—consequently his customers are numerous.

E. P. Hilton starts a manufactory of California-grown tobacco. Prime Havanas will now be cheaper.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 6TH

REMOVAL of arms from various places to City Hall. They were too "handy." People without arms are not very dangerous.

A man named Robert fell off one of the wharves into the water. A bystander remarked that he was bob-in for eels. The man was knocked down immediately for his temerity.

A dog gets his head entangled in a lady's hoops, and between the struggles of another dog to get at him, and his to get away, the lady is upset. There would have been a large crowd of Bummers to witness the sight, but as the curtain was down they could not get a view of the stage of proceedings. The fight was curtailed by the man belonging to one of the dogs coming to the rescue.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 7TH.

THE Assistant Treasurer of the Mint has come out with a new hat.

Billy Williamson indulges in a new suit, either by purchase or won on the race.

We knew by the wrinkles that so gracefully curled in the coat-tails, that the steamer was here. The Constitution arrived at 9 o'clock. The Commodore is constitutionally correct in time, and the time made was good for his constitution.

Sanborn, broker, has settled with all of his creditors in full, and is again "lively" on stocks. He handed over all his old business to Judge ——, who closed it up very handsomely in a few days, and Sanborn stock is on the rise.

Something "out" in Gould and Curry to-day. Not less than fourteen crazy brokers have rushed into the CALIFORNIAN office, (proving their insanity,) to buy the stock. Sold fourteen feet at $1,500 per foot, to arrive—deliverable when we get it, and we hope they may get it.

We are going to the "swarry" at the Mechanics' Fair this evening, and a negotiation pending for a new suit requires our attention. Trismegistus is anxious to ascertain if the young lady will be there at whose feet he knelt, in Montgomery street, to pick up his hat. We saw her at the Academy, the other evening, looking beautifully. Adieu for this week.

TRICKS OF THE SHOWMAN'S TRADE.—Lady giants, for instance, are always humbugs; they have long dresses made to trail on the floor of the caravan, in order to hide the erection on which they are mounted—viz., a pair of high sandals, with soles perhaps six or eight inches thick, on which they walk up and down the exhibition booth with great dignity; and with such aids it must be admitted that they do look rather tall. I remember even of a giantess who walked on short stilts; and on one of these going through a hole in the caravan, she bent forward in order to release it, and, to the great horror of the spectators, broke her leg; but it only ended in an expose and a burst of laughter at the deception. As to exhibitions of mermaids, six-footed sheep, three-horned bulls, etc., I can honestly say, from personal experience, that most of them are shams. I knew of one show which was drawn from fair to fair by two oxen. It always arrived about midnight, so that nobody saw how it was propelled; and when I state that these very identical oxen, painted fantastically, one of them ornamented with an additional horn, and the other with an additional tail, formed the very prosperous and sole exhibition of the ingenious showman—my readers will see how they can be gulled. Even as I correct these sheets for the press, a paragraph is "going the round," explaining how a cattle-dealer had cheated the judges at the prize cattle-show, by putting false horns upon one of the prize animals, and otherwise ingeniously cooking it up for the show. Farmers, however, have not one-half the ingenuity of showmen, who can make any man's eye the fool of his other senses. . . .

I knew a man who made a deal of money by exhibiting a few colored views of Windsor Castle through a magnifying-glass at a penny per head. The shaved bear was the last remaining inhabitant of a menagerie. The proprietor saw that he was used up in the wild beast line, and so he had his old performing bear done up as a woman, clean shaved, and tied into a chair, and then announcing her as the celebrated pig-faced lady, recruited his finances, and so replenished his menagerie. In fact, there is no end to the trickery, and barefaced, although amusing, robbery which are perpetrated by showmen and exhibitors. In the right hands, as I have indicated already, anything will make a show. I have seen a more than ordinarily large egg (it was cut out of chalk and deftly spotted) exhibited in an English market town.

THOSE usually deserve most from their friends who expect least of them.

AT what point do armies generally enter hostile cities? At the point of the bayonet.

A CARD.—After a Rip Van Winkle sleep, Mr. Price replies to our Card. Our statements in that Card were true. As to the challenge, that Mr. Price may ease his mind from its natural hallucination, we herewith reiterate that "Mr. Price is not the best Cutler in San Franciso, nor can he personally make a presentable piece of work. And we challenge him to make prize Cutlery—anything from a Jacknife to Broadsword—for $500 a side; the articles to be accompanied by a sworn statement that they were forged from the rough and FINISHED OFF IN THE SHOPS of the respective parties." We did not enter our goods as specimens of Blacksmith work, or any other class of forging. And as Mr. Price seems to labor under his usual mixed impressions, we will just inform him that Cutlery is not made in the single act of a fire-eating forger. A piece of work in that line, before being presented to a Fair Committee, must undergo seven processes: First, it is taken hold of by the Forger, but a different style of one from you, Mr. Price; then it is Filed; then Hardened; then Tempered; then Ground; then Polished, and, lastly, Finished. We did not intend to teach you, Mr. Price, but having more regard for the information of the public than you seem to have, with your Barber Certificates and Fair Committee Reports, that you make Razors equal to Sheffield, it is but right that we should expose the intrigue. You know as well as we do that you cannot do it; so own up; tell the truth for once in your life and shame the "Divil." Your blarney to the "Colonel," "don't mind him," is nate. Your hedging out of the road of our challenge while you shove that much-to-be-pitied Committee in front of you like breastworks; your curious endeavor to separate one partner from another, all through your card; and your false construction placed upon every one of our charges, lets you out, Mr. Price. You have a bad opinion of your craftsmen. Let us tell you, we would rather take the honest hand of many journeyman cutlers in this world, than the hand of a certain "Artful Dodger" whom we know. If you can prove to us, that in our card we said you "did not forge" in your shop, we will eat it, (the card.) But you "feel bad." "A guilty conscience is its own accuser," and don't, Mr. Price, if you have any idea at all of a hereafter, call Fred Will a fire-eater! A fire-eater, Mr. Price, is a person who carries and throws knives. Fred Will never carried one in his life, unless to a customer or engraver. A fire-eater is a man bred to fighting, and who brags that his first impressions of God's footstool were "to put up well," "touch him on de smeller." etc. There is one thing we beg to impress on your memory; that is, our challenge as we first published it is open to you, Mr. Price. Cutlery is our theme; we do not confine ourselves to forging in any sense of the word, and you do not dare to take it up. WILL & FINK,

* Excelsior Cut'ers, 605 Jackson street.

KERBY, BYRNE & Co., No. 7 Montgomery street, are now opening the choicest lot of Silk Cloaks, Merinos, Empress and Ottoman cloths, and other styles of Dress Goods ever imported to San Francisco. Call and examine the new goods. *

HAVE YOUR PIANOFORTES TUNED BY A Competent Workman. Leave orders at oc8 KOHLER'S Music Store.

PIANOFORTES TO RENT—NO CHARGE FOR KEEPING them in tune. Leave orders at
A. KOHLER'S Music Stores,
620 and 622 Washington street,
or8 and 424 Sansome street.

ON ALL SIDES WE HEAR THE MERITS OF THE Grover & Baker Sewing-Mchaine extolled. The ladies declare it the "very best," and prove to us in so many undeniable facts that we are bound to confess our conviction of the truth of the declaration. What other machine will embroider so beautifully, braid so elegantly, hem so faultlessly, quilt so evenly, stitch so accurately, gather so regularly, operate so easily? None, we conscientiously affirm.

THE POETRY OF ART HAS ACHIEVED ITS crowning triumph.—PHALON & SON'S Extract of the "NIGHT BLOOMING CEREUS" is among perfumes what the master-piece of Beethoven is to music. It takes the sense captive. It has no competitor in delicacy, permanence and floral freshness. PHALON & SON, New York, proprietors. Sold by all Druggists.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Wholesale Agents.

RICHES HAVE WINGS.—Nothing illustrates this more forcibly than the recent fall in mining Stocks. Therefore, provide n certainty for your family in the future by insuring your life in the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company—cash assets, $6,500,000.
BIGELOW & BRO., Agents,
'y30-1m Over Parrott's Bank.

MR. CHRISTIAN PFISTER has the honor of calling public attention to his great assortment of Perfumery, Brushes, fine Hair-pins, Hair of all lengths and colors, Peruques, Toupes, Combs—tortoise-shell, buffalo and Irish horn, ivory and rubber; Cravats of all kinds; Jouvin's Gloves, ladies' and gentlemens'; silk Suspenders and common ones; Shirts and Collars; new styles of Head Dresses, etc. Having made new arrangements with Paris houses, it is within his power to offer to his numerous customers superior advantages over any others in the trade. Six artist coiffeurs will always be found ready for business in the gentlemen's room. A special apartment is provided for the coiffure of ladies.

W. P. HARRISON & Co.,
PRINTERS,
Engravers and Electrotypers,
PRINTERS' WAREHOUSE,
417 Clay street.

oc8-3m

STERETT'S
STEAM
PRINTING HOUSE,
533
CLAY STREET.

PACIFIC
Insurance Company,
436 CALIFORNIA STREET,
SAN FRANCISCO.

INSURE AGAINST LOSS OR DAMAGE
BY FIRE,

On Buildings, Merchandise, Wares, and other Personal Property.

CASH CAPITAL - - - - - - - - $750,000
ALL PAID UP IN GOLD COIN,

All Losses payable in United States Gold Coin.

The Personal Liability of Stockholders, under the Law of this State, recognized.

J. HUNT, President.
A. J. RALSTON, Secretary. oc8

J. R. MEAD & CO.,
Importers, Wholesale and Retail Dealers in Fine Clothing
AND GENTLEMEN'S
FURNISHING GOODS,
TRUNKS, VALISES, CARPET BAGS, &c.,
200 & 202 Montgomery Street, Corner of Bush,
SAN FRANCISCO.

RAILROAD HOUSE,
316, 318, AND 320 COMMERCIAL STREET,
SAN FRANCISCO.

THE Undersigned respectfully begs leave to inform the travelling public that he has assumed the entire charge of the above House, and had the same thoroughly renovated, and put in complete order. New furniture has been added, and he flatters himself that in point of cleanliness and comfort the House will compare favorably with any in the city.

Being conducted on the European plan the
RAILROAD HOUSE
affords an extra inducement for travellers, and no pains or expense will be spared to make it as pleasant and popular a stopping place as can be found in the city, and at much lower rates than respectable accommodations can be found elsewhere.

The RAILROAD HOUSE COACH will convey passengers to the house, free of charge.

☞ BARBER SHOP, with Warm, Cold and Steam Baths connected with the House.

oc8-3m C. L. ROSS.

FIRST PREMIUM
Billiard Table Manufactory.

P. LIESENFELT,
No. 612 Battery street, between Jackson and Pacific,
SAN FRANCISCO.

Constantly on hand a large assortment of the Best Billiard Tables, with the modern improvements, as well as Billiard Trimmings, of every description, at the lowest prices.

☞ All goods warranted. oc3-1m

H. P. WAKELEE,
CORNER OF MONTGOMERY AND SUTTER STREETS,
IMPORTER OF
F. M. Farina's Cologne,
Lubin's Perfumes and Soaps,
Prout's Tooth and Hair Brushes,
Low's Old Windsor and Honey Soap,
Eau Lustrale, Pomades, Tooth Powders,
DRESSING CASES,
And other elegant articles for the the Toilet.

Agent for Nelson's Extract of ROSE AND ROSEMARY, for the Hair. se24

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

The following steamships will be despatched in the month of OCTOBER, 1864:

OCTOBER 3d - - - - - - - GOLDEN AGE
OCTOBER 13th, - - - - - - CONSTITUTION
OCTOBER 22d, - - - - - - SACRAMENTO

From Folsom-street Wharf, at nine o'clock, A. M., punctually,

FOR PANAMA.

Passengers will be conveyed from Panama to Aspinwall by the PANAMA RAILROAD COMPANY, and from Aspinwall to New York by the ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

A. B. FORBES, Agent P. M. S. Co.,
oc1 Cor. Sacramento and Leidesdorff sts.

Canton Tea Store, Established 1858.

GEO. S. HASKELL & CO.
IMPORTERS,
WHOLESALE AND RETAIL DEALERS
— IN —
JAPAN AND CHINA TEAS,
AND
GROCERIES.
Store fronting on
514 Market & 15 Sutter St.
☞ THREE DOORS
BELOW THE MARKET HOUSE,
San Francisco.
Our Motto, ☞ "Large Sales at Small Profits for Cash."

SAN FRANCISCO AND SAN JOSE RAILROAD.
CHANGE OF TIME.

On and after OCTOBER 1st, 1864, Passenger Trains of the San Francisco and San Jose Railroad Company will run as follows:

Leave San Francisco at 8:30 A. M., 10:30 A. M., and 4 P. M.
Leave San Jose at 8:10 A. M. and 3:40 P. M.
SUNDAY TRAINS
Leave San Francisco at 8.30 and 10:30 A. M. and 4 P. M.
Leave San Jose at 8:10 A. M. and 3.40 and 6:30 P. M.
FREIGHT TRAINS
Leave daily (Sundays excepted) as follows: San Francisco at 4:45 P. M.; San Jose at 6 A. M.

A. H. HOUSTON,
se General Superintendent.

MARKET STREET RAILROAD.
CHANGE OF TIME TABLE.

ON AND AFTER APRIL 1, 1864, Trains will start from the City and the Mission as follows:

Between the hours of 8:20 A. M. and 6 P. M., every 40 minutes, instead of, as heretofore, every 30 minutes, thus

FROM THE MISSION.

9:40	10:20	11:00	11:40

FROM THE CITY.

10:00	10:40	11:20	12:00

And so on till 6 o'clock.

Before 9 A. M. and after 6 P. M., the running will be the same as before.
my28 F. McCOPPIN, Superintendent.

TYLER BROTHERS,
Importers, Wholesale and Retail Dealers in
School Books, Stationery,
PHOTOGRAPH ALBUMS,
PORTFOLIOS JUVENILE BOOKS, CHILDREN'S PICTURE BOOKS, FANCY ARTICLES, etc.,
NO. 632 WASHINGTON STREET,
SAN FRANCISCO.
nu27-tf

CARPETS.

WE have just received and are now opening
NEW AND MAGNIFICENT STYLES OF WILTON
—AND—
Royal Velvet Carpets,

The finest Goods ever Imported into this State, to which we invite particular attention. Also a New Stock of

BRUSSELS CARPETS,

THREE-PLY AND INGRAIN CARPETS,
OIL CLOTHS, ALL WIDTHS AND STYLES,
PAPER HANGINGS, BROCATELLE CURTAIN REPS, SILK DAMASK,
WINDOW SHADES, MATS, ETC., ETC.

House-keepers and others in want of the above goods, will find our stock the most complete, and our

PRICES THE LOWEST IN THE CITY!

KENNEDY & BELL,
Southwest cor. Montgomery and California streets.
se24

NELSON'S EXTRACT OF
Roses And Rosemary.

THE FOLLOWING IS A BRIEF NOTICE of some of its principal virtues, as a mild stimulative, corrective and preservative agent for the hair:

Infancy.—It insinuates its balsamic properties into the pores of the head, nourishes the hair in its embryo state, accelerates its growth, sustains it in maturity, and continues the possession of healthy vigor, silky softness, and luxuriant redundancy, to the latest period of human life. Genial and purifying, it dispels all scurf and impurity, and renders the use of the fine comb unnecessary.

The Beard, Whiskers, and Mustachios.—Its extraordinary power in promoting the growth of the hair is singularly displayed in creating these ornaments of manhood.

Curl and Embellishment.—In dressing the hair nothing can equal its effect, rendering the hair so admirably soft that it will lie in any direction, producing beautifully flowing curls, and, by the transcendant lustre it imparts, rendering the coiffure inexpressibly attractive.

Grey Hair.—Its nourishing properties are eminently successful in the prevention of Grey Hair, and in numerous instances, in the restoration to its original color.

Baldness.—Its productive powers are constantly and surprisingly shown in cases of Baldness, so that in numerous instances where other specifics have been tried in vain, this celebrated Oil has effected a complete restoration of Beautiful Hair.

Sea-Bathing and Violent Exercise.—After indulging in either of these, so apt to exhaust the nourishing matter secreted at the roots or bulbs of the hair, the Roses and Rosemary will be found most efficacious, both in preserving and in immediately restoring the hair to its usual appearance of health with renovated brightness.

Its invaluable properties have obtained the patronage of every Court of the civilized world; and the high esteem in which it is universally held, together with numerous testimonials constantly received of its efficacy, affords the best and surest proofs of its merits.

Sold by all Druggists, and by H. P. WAKELEE, corner of Montgomery and Sutter streets, and corner of Bush and Montgomery streets. se24

LAWRENCE & COMPANY'S

PATENT IMPROVED

Flesh Gloves and Straps!

For Producing a Healthy State of the System by Friction, Without the Risk of Tearing the Skin, as all the Ordinary Horse-Hair Gloves are liable to do.

THE GREAT VALUE OF THE HORSE-HAIR Renovator as a therapeutic agent, when applied to the human body, is now too well known to every one who has paid the least attention to the importance of a healthy action of the Skin, to require further comment.

The superior advantages of the Patent Flesh Gloves and Straps, manufactured under this Patent, are that, by a peculiar process in the machinery employed in their manufacture, the points of the Hair are brought perpendicularly to the surface, thereby removing the liability to tear the Skin (a very general complaint against the ordinary kind,) rendering them more pleasant to use, at the same time enabling the process of friction to be much more effectually performed; they are, indeed, a positive luxury to use, apart from their salutary effects.

The peculiar fabric manufactured expressly for the use of Ladies deserves their special attention; it has been highly recommended by the most eminent of the medical profession, and given universal satisfaction to those who have used it.

For sale by
H. P. WAKELEE,
se24 Cor. Montgomery and Sutter streets.

THE OXFORD WASHING PAD.

This article, suggested by an Oxford man, for removing Stains from the Hands, being found to thoroughly answer the purpose, has established fair pretensions to become of universal use, which it is rapidly doing.

Manufactured by LAWRENCE & CO., and sold by

H. P. WAKELEE,
se24 Cor. Montgomery and Satter streets.

PHINEAS BANNING,
FORWARDING AND COMMISSION AGENT,
WILMINGTON & LOS ANGELES,
DEALER IN
LUMBER, COAL, IRON, FLOUR, GRAIN, etc., etc.,
And Proprietor of the United States Mail Stage Line between Los Angeles and Wilmington. se24

REMOVAL.

LAWRENCE & HOUSEWORTH,
OPTICIANS,

IMPORTERS OF OPTICAL, MATHEMATICAL AND PHILOSOPHICAL INSTRUMENTS,

STEREOSCOPIC GOODS,

PHOTOGRAPHIC ALBUMS,

CARTES DE VISITE,

AND

JOSEPH RODGERS & SON'S

SUPERIOR CUTLERY,

HAVE REMOVED TO

No. 315 Montgomery street, bet. California and Pine.

(ESTABLISHED IN 1851,)

HAVE FOR SALE THE LARGEST STOCK ON THE PACIFIC COAST, consisting in part as follows:

720 dozen SPECTACLES, in Gold, Silver, Steel and Plated Frames.
300 dozen EYE GLASSES, in Gold, Silver, Steel, Horn, Shell and Rubber Frames.
150 dozen WIRE GAUZE GOGGLES.
300 dozen SPECTACLE GLASSES and BRAZILIAN PEBBLES.
350 dozen SPECTACLE and EYE GLASS CASES.

395	Opera and Marine Glasses.	20,500	Card Photographs, Photographic Albums,
75	Telescope and Spy Glasses,	600	Album Pictures—in oil colors,
178	dozen Magnifying Glasses,	50	doz. Union Card Frames,
80	doz. Pocket Compasses,		Joseph Rodgers & Son's CUTLERY,
825	Hand Stereoscopes,	100	doz. Table Knives,
74	Revolving Stereoscopes	260	doz. Pocket Knives,
1025	doz. Stereoscopic Views	120	doz. Razors,
	Drawing Instruments in German Silver and Brass,	50	doz. Razor Strops,
	Boxwood and Ivory Scales,	130	doz. Scissors, SCISSORS, in Cases,
	Microscopes in every Style,	100	doz. Gyroscope Tops,
25	Magnetic Machines for Medical purposes,	169	doz. Thermometers,
	Aneroid Barometers,	25	doz. Hydrometers, Galvanic Batteries.

☞ COUNTRY TRADERS will consult their own interest by examining our Stock and Prices before purchasing elsewhere.

 ORDERS FROM THE COUNTRY promptly executed.

☞ CATALOGUES sent to any address FREE.

Address

LAWRENCE & HOUSEWORTH,
OPTICIANS,
315 MONTGOMERY STREET,
oc1 SAN FRANCISCO.

BOYS! BOYS! BOYS!

NOW IS THE TIME!

H. M. LOCKWOOD & CO.,
New No. 624) § CLAY STREET, § (Old No 176
Have received a Large Stock of
GENTS' AND BOYS' CLOTHING
—AND—
FURNISHING GOODS,
Which they are selling
AT VERY LOW PRICES.

Every Garment warranted. All are invited to call and examine our goods.

H. M. LOCKWOOD & CO.,
my28 624 Clay street, San Francisco.

DR. GEORGE F. WOODWARD,

SURGEON U. S. PENSION BUREAU.
OFFICE, 127 MONTGOMERY STREET,
Opposite the Occidental Hotel, San Francisco.
jy30-tf

THE MOST EXTENSIVE,

BEST SELECTED, CHEAPEST,

—AND—

LATEST STYLES

—OF—

Furniture.

GOODWIN & CO.,
No. 528 Washington street,

Are constantly receiving, and have on hand a large assortment of FINE ROSEWOOD, MAHOGANY, and BLACK WALNUT PARLOR, LIBRARY and CHAMBER SUITS, with DINING ROOM SUITS TO ORDER.

☞ We guarantee both Price and Quality satisfactory to our Patrons.

GOODWIN & CO.,
jul8 No. 528 Washington street.

H. LUCKE,

BOOTMAKER, AND IMPORTER
—OF—
FRENCH BOOTS, SHOES AND GAITERS OF THE LATEST PARISIAN MAKE AND MODE.

Lady customers can have their measures forwarded and their shoes made in Paris in the latest style and by the most celebrated manufacturers, at moderate rates.

No. 648 Washington street, below Kearny,
SIGN OF THE GOLDEN BOOT. jy30 3m

FOLSOM STREET PROPERTY

FOR SALE!

COMPRISING TWO 50-VARA LOTS ON THE NORTH side of Folsom street, fronting also on Clementina street. Will be sold as a whole, or in subdivisions of 25 by 80 feet.

WM LEFFINGWELL,
se24-tf 619 Montgomery street

SELLING OFF,

TO CLOSE BUSINESS,
ON ACCOUNT OF LEAVING FOR THE EAST.

ROSENBLATT'S

Palace of Fashion,

Number 125 Montgomery street.
OPPOSITE THE OCCIDENTAL HOTEL.

Branch, 125 J street, between Fourth and Fifth streets, Sacramento.

WILL SELL THE ENTIRE RICH STOCK OF REAL LACE Collars, Sleeves, Pocket Handkerchiefs, Hoop Skirts, Russia Leather Bags, Hosiery, Fancy Boxes, Fans, Portemonnaies, and Silk, Velvet, Cloth and Opera Cloaks,

AT HALF THE USUAL PRICES.

Real Point Lace Collars at - - - - - $2 50
French Corsets - - - - - - - - - 1 00

☞ STORE TO LET, and FIXTURES FOR SALE.
se24-1m

SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES!

Motto—The Singer Sewing Machines are the only machines that can sew all kinds of cloth, and with all kinds of thread.

THE SINGER LETTER A
TRANSVERSE SHUTTLE FAMILY
MACHINES,

With recent improvements for

HEMMING, FELLING,
TUCKING, GATHERING,
BINDING, CORDING,
QUILTING, BRAIDING, etc.,

Are unrivalled for Family and light Manufacturing purposes. We invite the special attention of ladies to the Folding Top Cabinets, our latest improvement. They are the most useful, convenient and novel Cabinets yet introduced, and are worthy of examination.

SINGER'S STANDARD
MANUFACTURING MACHINES,

For Tailoring, Boot and Shoe Making, Harness and Carriage Trimming, are the cheapest, best and only Machine worthy of patronage for general purposes.

☞ Call and examine, or send for a pamphlet.

THE SINGER MANUF. COMPANY,
No. 139 Montgomery street.
WM. BRODERICK, Agent. se3-3m

$2,000 REWARD!

A REWARD OF TWO THOUSAND DOLLARS IS OFfered by the subscriber to any person who will discover or produce a better article for dressing and preserving the HAIR than the

TRICOMALICUM!!

known in California for many years for its wonderful properties.

The TRICOMALICUM, composed of substances tonic and strengthening, possesses the priceless quality of renewing the Hair, of destroying dandruff, and of dressing and keeping it in a perfectly healthy state.

PRINCIPAL DEPOT at the store of the Inventor,
CHRISTIAN PFISTER,
se3-tf No. 227 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

TELEGRAPHIC EXCHANGE

—ON—

NEW YORK,

PAYABLE IN GOLD,

For sale in sums to suit by
au20-tf WM. T. COLEMAN & CO.

EXCHANGE

ON NEW YORK,

In sums to suit, at the lowest rates, for sale by
au20-tf WM. T. COLEMAN & CO.

GREAT TRIUMPH!!

STEINWAY & SONS

Were awarded the FIRST PRIZE MEDAL at the late great INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION AT LONDON, over the two hundred and sixty-nine Pianos entered for competition from all parts of the world.

The Special Correspondent of the New York Times says: "Messrs. Steinway & Sons' indorsement by the Jurors is emphatic, and stronger and more to the point than that of any European maker."

A constant supply of the above superior instruments can be found at the Agent's,

M. GRAY, 613 Clay street.

PIANO TUNING done by a first-class Workman, from Steinway & Son's Factory, New York. my28

COMMERCIAL STEAM PRINTING

HOUSE.

FRANCIS, VALENTINE & CO.,
517 CLAY and 514 COMMERCIAL STREETS.

Every description of BOOK, JOB and POSTER PRINTING done in the best style and at the lowest rates.
BOOK-BINDING and RULING done to order.

GREGORY YALE,

ATTORNEY AT LAW,

OFFICE—On second floor of Sather & Co.'s Bank, corner Montgomery and Commercial streets, Nos. 2, 3 and 4, San Francisco. jy2

A LADY WISHES TO EXCHANGE LESsons in French, Music or Painting, for a room and board. Address "E. D. W.," care of W. H. BANCROFT, 609 Montgomery street. au13

REDINGTON & CO.'S ESSENCE OF

Jamaica Ginger!

This valuable compound, which is now regarded as one of the most popular remedies in the domestic practice for various complaints of the digestive organs, such as Dyspepsia, Nausea, etc., is prepared solely from the WHITE JAMAICA GINGER, which is the best of all the varieties in use. In the preparation of

REDINGTON & CO.'S
ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER,

Great care is taken to have none but select Root, and to manufacture it in air-tight vessels, thus preventing the evaporation of its delicate essential oil, and preserving the true aroma of the Ginger. It thereby contains in its concentrated form all the valuable properties of the Jamaica Ginger, and is guaranteed to be free from any impurities whatever.

It is a grateful stimulant and carminative, giving warmth and tone to the stomach equal to Brandy, without any of its injurious effects.

It will cure Nausea, caused by riding in railroad cars, or from sea-sickness, or other causes.

Miners and others who are exposed to the heat of the Sun often whilst working in cold water, should never be without

REDINGTON & CO.'S
ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER.

As by taking it as a tonic two or three times a day, it is almost a sure preventive to Chills and Fever; and to those who are farming the rich bottom lands of California it is likewise invaluable as a tonic, and should invariably be taken in the early morning before going to the fields, at the mid-day lunch, and before leaving off work at night.

Ask for REDINGTON & CO.'S ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER, and take no other, if you would always have a Pure and Reliable article.

An excellent external application for Gout, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, &c.

REDINGTON & CO., Proprietors,
416 and 418 Front street,
my28 San Francisco.

RAREY'S CONDITION POWDERS.

THE MOST POWERFUL AND BENEFICIAL AGENT known on the Stomach, Blood, Lungs and Bowels of HORSES, MULES, CATTLE, AND STOCK of all descriptions.

GREAT BENEFIT TO HARD-WORKING HORSES.

All diseased Stock SPEEDILY and CERTAINLY CURED; healthy Stock will be brought into the very HIGHEST STATE of PERFECTION by giving them a SPOONFULL, WEEKLY.

NO LIVERY STABLE SHOULD BE WITHOUT

RAREY'S
CELEBRATED CONDITION POWDERS!

All FARMERS and RANCHMEN should use constantly

RAREY'S
CELEBRATED CONDITION POWDERS

TEAMSTERS and STAGE COMPANIES everywhere should keep constantly on hand and freely use

RAREY'S
CELEBRATED CONDITION POWDERS!

They are equal to a Life Insurance on all Stock, as will be fully appreciated on trial by all True Economists.

REDINGTON & CO., Sole Agents,
my28 416 and 418 Front Street, San Francisco.

DEATH'S DOINGS!

THE DEAD TELL NO TALES, 'TIS SAID. WHAT A pity 'tis 'tis true; for if they could, what a "skedaddling" there would be among the numerous quacks and impostors of the present time.

THE MEDICAL FACULTY

May differ in relation to the treatment of disease, but there is very little diversity of opinion among them as to its origin. The philanthropist does not contend that any man becomes at once a

DRUNKARD OR A THIEF.

Nor does the well informed physician maintain that any one becomes at once an invalid. He knows that almost all diseases are of slow growth; that the seeds of disease are often sown at a remote period, and only await some change of climate or condition of the individual to manifest themselves.

A COMMON COLD!

Is the forerunner of many a fatal disease; a leading symptom of Consumption; a general disturber of the human system, and

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP

Is the greatest barrier that can be thrown in the way of its progress. Its timely use will ward off Consumption, cure the Asthma, Bronchitis, Sore Throat, and the thousand and one other ills so sure to follow in its wake when too long neglected or improperly treated.

REDINGTON & CO., Agents,
San Francisco.
And for sale everywhere. se10 tf

ALLEN'S

LUNG BALSAM!

THE REMEDY FOR CURING

CONSUMPTION, COUGHS, COLDS,

ASTHMA, CROUP,

DISEASES OF THE THROAT, BRONCHITIS,

Pains and Oppression of the Chest or Lungs,

DIFFICULT BREATHING,

AND ALL THE

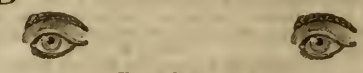
DISEASES OF THE PULMONARY ORGANS.

ITS ACTION IS EXPECTORANT, ALTERATIVE, SUDORIFIC, SEDATIVE, DIAPHORETIC and DIURETIC, which renders it one of the most valuable remedies known for curing diseases of the lungs. It excites expectoration, and causes the lungs to throw off the phlegm or mucus, changes the secretions and PURIFIES THE BLOOD; heals the irritated parts; gives strength to the digestive system, brings the liver to its proper action, and imparts, beyond the possibility of doubt, strength to the whole system. Such is the immediate and satisfactory effect, that it is warranted to break up the most distressing cough in a few hours' time, if not of too long standing. It is warranted to give entire satisfaction even in the most confirmed cases of Consumption. It is warranted not to produce costiveness, which is the case with most remedies, or affect the heart, as it contains no Opium in any form. It is warranted to be perfectly harmless to the most delicate child, although it is an active and powerful remedy for restoring the system. There is no real necessity for so many deaths by Consumption, when ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM will prevent it, if only taken in time.

Sold by all Druggists. Price $1 per bottle.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,
Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,
au27 Corner of Clay, San Francisco.

DR. STEPHENS'



CELEBRATED

Eye Salve!

AN INFALLIBLE REMEDY FOR

DISEASES OF THE EYE,

Acute or chronic, ulceration of the lachrymal glands, film and weakness of the vision from any cause; it is the most effectual remedy ever discovered.

Sold by all Druggists.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,
Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,
au27 Corner of Clay, San Francisco.

CATARRH!

DR. H. GOODALE'S

Catarrh Remedy!

FOR CENTURIES CATARRH HAS DEFIED THE skill of physicians and surgeons. No medical work contains a prescription that will eradicate it. Nothing save DR. GOODALE'S REMEDY will break it up, radically destroying the principle of the disease, and precluding the possibility of a relapse. Medical men have attempted to explain what it is, but admit that they have not discovered its antidote. Dr. Goodale offers this simple definition of its character: It is a disorder which he DOES CURE and they DO NOT. This is the great fact which it imports the sufferer to know, and a single trial will establish it beyond a question. Price, $1. Sold by all Druggists.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,
Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,
au27 Corner of Clay, San Francisco.

KENDALL'S AMBOLINE!

THE GREAT
UNEQUALLED
PREPARATION
FOR
RESTORING, INVIGORATING, BEAUTIFYING
AND
DRESSING
THE Hair!

IT IS A STIMULATING, OILY EXTRACT OF BARKS and Herbs. It will cure all diseases of the scalp and itching of the head, entirely eradicates dandruff, prevents the Hair from falling out, or from turning prematurely gray, causing it to grow thick and long. It is entirely different from all hair preparations, and may be relied on.

Put up in boxes containing two bottles—Price $1.

☞ Sold by all Druggists.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,
Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,
Corner of Clay, San Francisco.

REMOVAL.

INSURANCE AGINST FIRE.

THE NORTH BRITISH AND MERCANTILE
INSURANCE COMPANY
OF LONDON AND EDINBURGH.

ESTABLISHED, 1809.

Capital, $10,000,000. Accumulated Funds, January 1, 1864, $11.169,140. Deposit in California under State law, $75,000. Limit on single Risks, $100,000. Bankers, Messrs Tallant & Co. Fire Policies on buildings and contents, throughout the Pacific States and Territories, granted on the most liberal terms. Losses promptly adjusted and paid here in U. S. Gold coin.

Office removed to 414 California street, opposite Alsop & Co. WM. H. TILLINGHAST, Agent.
au19-3m

MANHATTAN FIRE INSURANCE

COMPANY OF NEW YORK.

Cash Capital and Surplus.....$750,000
Deposit in San Francisco.....$75,000

COLUMBIA FIRE INSURANCE CO.,
OF NEW YORK.

Cash Capital and Surplus.....$600,000
Deposit in San Francisco.....$75,000

THE ABOVE MENTIONED WELL-KNOWN and responsible Companies, having complied with the law enacted at the last session of the Legislature, and deposited with Messrs. Donohoe, Ralston & Co.

$75,000 EACH,

As additional security to Policy-holders, will continue to insure

BUILDINGS,
MERCHANDISE,
FURNITURE,

And other property in California, Oregon and Nevada Territory, against Loss or Damage by Fire, upon the most favorable terms.

All Losses promptly paid in United States Gold Coin.

R. B. SWAIN & CO., Agents,
jn25-tf 206 Front street, corner of California.

R. G. SNEATH,

408 FRONT STREET, SAN FRANCISCO,

Importer and Wholesale Dealer in

GROCERIES, PROVISIONS, FLOUR, RICE

TOBACCOS, LIQUORS, ETC.

Branch House, - - SNEATH & BOARMAN, - - Red Bluff.

Forwarding Agent, D. W. EARL, Sacramento, who will receive and fill orders for all kinds of Goods on my account, and keep a large stock of Flour, Barley, Potatoes, Ground Feed, etc., etc. No charge for forwarding.

ALMADEN QUICKSILVER!

Orders for Goods not in my line furnished customers without extra charge. Orders for Goods in the Eastern markets attended to promptly. Daily Prices Current furnished when desired.

Orders respectfully solicited. jul1-1m

CONTINENTAL HOTEL,

SAN JOSE.

GEORGE T. BROMLEY.....Proprietor.

As a desirable place of resort for health or recreation, the above Hotel is not surpassed in the State.

Excellent accommodations for families, by the day, week, or month, on reasonable terms.
ju25

REMOVAL.

A. EDDY'S

Dancing Academy,

Platt's (Middle) Hall.

PUPILS TAUGHT IN ONE-HALF THE TIME OF elsewhere.

CLASSES—MONDAYS and FRIDAYS. Ladies at half-past 2 P. M.; Gents at half-past 7 P. M.

CHILDREN'S CLASSES—On SATURDAYS, at 2 P. M.; also, on WEDNESDAYS, at half-past 3 P. M.

Private instructions given separately or to classes, to suit the convenience of applicants.

SELECT SOIREES on alternate weeks. au6-tf

CARRINGTON & CO'S

GENERAL PURCHASING AGENCY,

No. 40 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Personal Orders, small or large, and for articles of every descriptions, PROMPTLY and carefully attended to.

Who wants anything from New York?

THIS AGENCY

Enables Country Residents to make purchases in the City without troubling busy friends, or mere acquaintances.

IF YOU WANT

Books, Prints, Clothing, Instruments, Music, Tools, Weapons, Sporting Implements, Fancy Stock, Jewelry, Silver or Plated Ware, Wines, Cigars, Fine Groceries, Furniture; in short, any Article, large or small, singly or in quantity, for Ladies' or Gentlemen's use or wear,

or for Dealers' Supplies, from a seal-ring to a steam-engine—a Cameo or a Cashmere; lace or leather,

SEND ON YOUR ORDERS.

We can fill them on better terms than you could obtain if here; while our commission, even on large orders, is much less than the expense of visiting the city in person.

Orders under $10, from places within reach of our daily Expresses, (except for perishable articles,) can be paid for on delivery by Express; others should be remitted for, either direct, or through some city friend to be paid when filled. Every order should be as clearly worded as possible.

Orders may be given in French, Spanish or German.

COMMISSION CHARGE, - - - FIVE PER CENT.

Address:

CARRINGTON & CO.,
au6 40 Broadway, N. Y.

REOPENED FOR THE SEASON.

THE CRYSTAL SPRINGS HOTEL,

Situated four miles from the San Mateo Railroad depot, in a most splendid valley, surrounded with large, beautiful, natural trees, is now open for the public. The road from San Mateo to the house has been recently macadamized, making it the finest drive in California. The House and Cottages have been refitted and thoroughly renovated. New spring beds and every modern improvement have been added to the sleeping department. The larder, as usual, contains all the delicacies of the season. Stages leave San Mateo depot on the arrival of the trains for Crystal Springs.

A fine stable is now opened at San Mateo by Messrs. Byrnes & Ames, who will furnish horses and carriages, or saddle horses, at low rates, to the public. Parties wishing rooms or meals, on arrival, can engage them by telegraph, via San Mateo.

jn11-tf TONY OAKES, Proprietor.

McRUER & MERRILL,

WHOLESALE AUCTION HOUSE,

204 and 206 California street.

Regular Sale Days - - - WEDNESDAYS and SATURDAYS (Advances on Consignments.)

NOTICE!

From this date Mr. A. P. EVERETT has an interest in our business. McRUER & MERRILL.

San Francisco, October 20, 1862.

A. P. EVERETT, - - - - - - - - - Auctioneer.
jn11-3m

SQUARZA'S PUNCH.

First Premium, Sacramento, 1862.
First Premium at San Francisco District Fair, 1863.
First and Special Premium, Sacramento, 1863.
Wholesale and Retail.

my28 44 Leidesdorff street, San Francisco.

EDWARD BOSQUI & CO.,

517

CLAY STREET, SAN FRANCISCO.

BOOKBINDERS, PAPER-RULERS, AND

ACCOUNT-BOOK MANUFACTURERS.

Blanks of all kinds printed and ruled to any desired pattern. my28

MRS. HENDRICKS,

No. 629 MISSION STREET,

Devotes herself exclusively to

EMBROIDERY, STAMPING AND PINKING,

And she does more work than any other person in her line. She has by far the best collection and the largest assortment of stamps in the city. Her patterns are the most carefully drawn, and her marking is the evenest and the easiest to work, especially for those who are not very skilful. The coloring of all others rubs out, and the figures, if not traced round with thread, are effaced before the work is done; but Mrs. Hendricks' coloring, on all kinds of stuff, is warranted to defy rubbing, though it can be easily washed out. She is an engraver and engraves her own stamps, and thus is enabled to supply herself with all the latest patterns fashionable in Eastern and European cities.

Any customer can get a new pattern cut without charge, if Mrs. Hendricks can use it afterwards. Although there are many others in the same business in San Francisco, all acknowledge the superiority of Mrs. Hendricks, and send the most difficult work to her. Ladies are invited to call and examine her patterns.

☞ Remember the number, 629 Mission street, San Francisco. jy30tf*

DR. J. H. HATCH,

DENTIST,

Graduate of the Pennsylvania College of Dental Surgery.

All operations pertaining to the profession thoroughly and skillfully performed. Entire satisfaction in all cases guaranteed.

Office, 645 Clay street, between Montgomery and Kearny street, San Francisco. au27

SAVE YOUR

E. F. BUNNELL, D.D.S.,

ROOMS, NO. 51 SECOND STREET.

DR. BUNNELL WILL SAVE EVERY TOOTH THAT ACHES from exposure of the nerve, or refund the charge for the operation, and extract each tooth without pay in EVERY case of failure. Teeth filled with gold, artificial bone, and golden lithodeon. Plate teeth on vulcanite and gold enameled base, of surpassing beauty and comfort.

☞ All work warranted. Price low. ☜

N. B.—More than 1,000 aching teeth have been saved in succession, without the loss of one. sn27-3m

REMOVAL.

DR. JOHN HEALD,

DENTIST,

OFFICE AND RESIDENCE: STEVENSON HOUSE, Montgomery street, corner of California. Entrance on both streets. Rooms 12 and 13. jy30-3m

WONDERFUL TRIUMPH

IN AMERICAN DENTISTRY.

DR. BEERS & CO.,

617 Clay street,

ARE NOW MANUFACTURING THE NEW style of ARTIFICIAL TEETH so highly approved at the East, and which to be appreciated only requires to be seen. The Teeth, Gums and Plate are made of one entire piece of Porcelain without seam or joint, combining great strength and beauty with absolute purity and freedom from any metallic taste, while the coloring of the gums and the interior of the mouth are so perfect as to almost defy detection. All interested in the progress of the Arts are invited to examine samples of this work.

Superior Gold and Vulcanite Work also manufactured as usual, but at greatly reduced prices. jul8

THE CALIFORNIAN.

A PAPER FOR THE TIMES.

Devoted to Live Topics,

AND THE

BEST INTERESTS OF CALIFORNIA.

Is published

EVERY SATURDAY MORNING,

AT

328 MONTGOMERY STREET.

Nothing will be spared that will enable THE CALIFORNIAN to appeal to the Public for support, not only as the

BEST JOURNAL ON THE PACIFIC COAST,

But also as being

THE EQUAL OF ANY ON THIS CONTINENT!

Paper of a superior quality and weight is being made

EXPRESSLY FOR THE CALIFORNIAN,

THE BEST TALENT OF THE STATE

Is employed upon THE CALIFORNIAN, and arrangements have been made with contributors abroad for

EASTERN AND FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE.

The voluntary notices bestowed by the press of the Eastern cities have been no less warm and congratulatory than those which we have received at the hands of our cotemporaries of the Pacific. Their verdict is unanimously in favor of

THE CALIFORNIAN,

and all join in pronouncing their unqualified approval of its unequalled merits.

Its reputation is now fully established. It is not

EXCELLED BY ANY LITERARY JOURNAL on the Continent.

Let the people of the mountains and the valleys

BUY THE CALIFORNIAN!

Let every lover of choice literature throughout the States and Territories of the Pacific coast

READ THE CALIFORNIAN!

Let no family be without this paper, which, as an Eastern cotemporary remarks, is creditable to the people who sustain it. Therefore,

SUBSCRIBE

FOR THE

CALIFORNIAN!

THE TERMS OF THE CALIFORNIAN are $5 per year by mail to subscribers, invariably in advance; 50 cents per month served by carriers.

All communications and correspondence must be addressed to "THE CALIFORNIAN,"

Office, No. 328 Montgomery street,

SAN FRANCISCO.

FARRAND'S OSCILLATING

Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALLED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REduction and amalgamation of Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY.

As a guarantee of what this machine will do, I propose, with any gentleman who will produce an Amalgamator that will work the same amount of ore in the same number of hours, with the same outlay of power, and produce the equal result, to deposit the sum of FIVE HUNDRED DOLLARS each, the money so deposited to be drawn by the person who shall be declared to have produced the best result. The money (the $500) by whichever party won to be paid over to some one of the benevolent institutions in this State, to be named by the party losing. This proposition is not made with the view of detracting from the merits of any Amalgamator now before the public, but for the purpose of placing this valuable improvement before such persons as may be interested in quartz milling, and to whom the matter properly belongs.

I CHALLENGE COMPETITION.

CALL AND SEE THE MACHINES WORK!

W. D. FARRAND.

R. L. OGDEN, Agent, Southeast corner of Montgomery and California streets, San Francisco. jy30tf

NOTICE TO SHIPPERS

—TO—

Red Bluff.

ON AND AFTER TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 20th, the steamers of the California Steam Navigation Company

WILL LEAVE SACRAMENTO

FOR RED BLUFF,

EVERY TUESDAY AND FRIDAY,

At 7 o'clock, A. M.

se24-tf J. WHITNEY, JR., President.

OCCIDENTAL HOTEL—Corner Montgomery and Bush streets, San Francisco.

This House possesses all the requirements of a FIRST CLASS HOTEL, its spacious READING ROOM, with large MINERAL CABINET and extensive COLLECTION OF SPECIMENS from the different Mining Regions of the Pacific Coast—BRANCH TELEGRAPH OFFICE connecting with Lines throughout the country—and NEWS STAND—all contributing to make it the Headquarters and Home for the Californian business man and tourist.

The TABLE of this House shall not be excelled by any.

BOARD, THREE DOLLARS PER DAY.

LEWIS LELAND & CO.,
my28 Proprietors

JOSEPH A. DONOHOE, San Francisco. | EUGENE KELLY, New York.

DONOHOE, KELLY & CO.,

SAN FRANCISCO.

EUGENE KELLY & CO.,

NEW YORK.

Bankers.

EXCHANGE ON

NEW YORK,
BANK OF LONDON, - - - - London.
BANK OF IRELAND. jy2

LOCKE & MONTAGUE,

IMPORTERS OF

STOVES AND METALS,

Nos. 112 and 114 Battery street,

jy2 SAN FRANCISCO.

GEORGE B. MERRILL,

ATTORNEY AT LAW,

Office, 520 Montgomery street, (over Messrs. Sather & Co.'s Bank,)

SAN FRANCISCO.

Gives special attention to the Probate of Wills and the Administration of Estates. au20

JOHN GORMAN,

NOTARY PUBLIC AND CONVEYANCER,

No. 705 MONTGOMERY STREET,

(Near Washington,)

Metropolitan Block, SAN FRANCISCO.
jy9

LEGAL.

ADMINISTRATOR'S SALE of Real ESTATE.

NOTICE IS HEREBY GIVEN, THAT IN PURSUANCE of an order of the Probate Court of the city and county of San Francisco, State of California, made on the 16th day of August, 1864, in the matter of the Estate of ANDREW ROBESON, deceased, the undersigned Administrator, with the will annexed, of said deceased, will sell to the highest bidder for cash, payable in United States gold coin, and subject to confirmation by said Probate Court, on MONDAY, the 10th day of OCTOBER, 1864, at 12 o'clock, noon, of that day, at No. 108 Front street, in said city and county, all the right, title and interest of the said Andrew Robeson at the time of his death, and all the right, title and interest that the said estate has, by law or otherwise, since acquired, other than or in addition to that of said deceased at the time of his death, in and to all that certain lot of land situated in said city and county, and described as follows:

Commencing at a point on the north line of Ellis street 77 1-2 feet west from the northwest corner of Mason and Ellis streets; thence running westerly along said line of Ellis street 20 feet, thence at a right angle northerly 60 feet, thence at a right angle easterly 20 feet, and thence at a right angle southerly 60 feet to the point of beginning.

And the said Administrator will receive offers or bids therefor at said place, No. 108 Front street, from this date till said 10th day of October, 1864.

EDWARD F. STONE,
Administrator, with the will annexed, of Andrew Robeson, deceased.

D. P. Barstow, Attorney for Administrator, 24 Montgomery Block. se10-5t

FIRST PREMIUM

Awarded by the Mechanics' Institute Fair,

SAN FRANCISCO, SEPTEMBER, 1864.

R. LIDDLE & CO.,

Sporting Emporium!

418 WASHINGTON ST.,

(Near Post-office.)

SAN FRANCISCO.

GUN & RIFLE MAKERS,

AND

Importers of all Classes

OF

SPORTING TACKLE!

Constantly on hand Guns from the first makers of London, viz., William Greener, William Moore, Mooro & Harris, Redfern, Hollis & Son, and all other makers. Also the best stock of American Rifles, Pistols, and Carbines on the Pacific Coast, viz.: Colt's, Sharp's, Smith & Wesson's Remington's, and all the latest patents of Pistols. Sharp's, Wesson's, Ballards, Spencer's and Henry's Patent Breech-loading Rifles.

☞ Cartridges of all kinds constantly on hand.

Authorized agents for Henry's Patent Breech-loading Rifle. oc8 3m

NEW SEVEN-OCTAVE PIANOS,

OF THE BEST AMERICAN MAKERS,

$300! $300!

For Three Hundred Dollars and Upwards, at

WALTER S. PIERCE & CO.'S

Pianoforte Warerooms, No. 26 Montgomery street, oc8 Opposite the Lick House.

SAILING DAY, OCTOBER 19TH.

PRICES REDUCED TO SUIT THE TIMES!

OPPOSITION TO NEW YORK,

VIA NICARAGUA!

CARRYING THE U. S. MAIL!

650 MILES LESS OCEAN TRAVEL IN THE TROPICS THAN BY PANAMA!

THE CENTRAL AMERICAN TRANSIT COMPANY will despatch the commodious and favorite steamship

MOSES TAYLOR,

J. H. BLETHEN, - - - - - Commander,

FOR SAN JUAN DEL SUR, NICARAGUA,

ON WEDNESDAY, - - - - OCTOBER 19TH,

From Mission street Wharf, at 10 o'clock, A. M., precisely,

Connecting at GREYTOWN with the new and splendid Steamship

GOLDEN RULE,

3,500 TONS, FOR NEW YORK.

The transit over the Isthmus is now in fine order. The coaches on the road, and the steamers on the Lake and River are all new, and built expressly for this route. Particular attention paid to the comfort of ladies and families by a Conductor, who will go through to New York with them.

☞ Note the change in the day of sailing. No Opposition until OCTOBER 19, 1864.

For information or passage, apply to

I. W. RAYMOND, AGENT, Agent,

Northwest corner Battery and Pine streets

oc1 Up stairs, San Francisco.

IMPORTANT TRIUMPH OF SCIENCE!

YEARS of patient research and unwearied experiment, kindly assisted by the first

SCIENTIFIC AND PROFESSIONAL CHARACTER

In New York, have produced and perfected

CHEVALIER'S

Life for the Hair!

THE BEST HAIR DRESSING

ever offered to the public. It RESTORES GRAY HAIR TO ITS ORIGINAL COLOR, giving it a Fresh and Natural appearance; braces the Pores, strengthens the weakest Hair, promotes a LUXURIANT GROWTH, and

Will Stop its Falling Out in Three Days!

Keeps the head clean, cool and healthy, removes all irritation from the skin, and is an excellent remedy for

NERVOUS AND ALL FORMS OF HEADACHE,

Does not stain the skin or soil the whitest fabric. Is entirely different from any other preparation, and composed mostly of vegetable substances. Is a clean, delightful Hair Dressing, by the use of which you cannot have a gray Hair in your head.

The entire freedom from all injurious qualities (that in many other preparations injure the Hair and soil the clothes,) the nicety of the composition, and its render it the most desirable article for the toilet and hair-dressing yet offered to the public.

SWEET AND DELICATE PERFUME

CHEVALIER'S LIFE FOR THE HAIR

IS WARRANTED!

to produce the results claimed for it, when used according to directions.

Put up in neat paper Boxes, and for sale by

c8 H. P. WAKELEE.

MAGUIRE'S OPERA HOUSE.

T. MAGUIRE - - - - - - - PROPRIETOR.
C. L. GRAVES - - - - - - - STAGE MANAGER.
W. STEVENSON - - - - - - - TREASURER.

AFTERNOON PERFORMANCE TO-DAY,

FOR LADIES AND CHILDREN,

At HALF PRICES,

Commencing at 2 o'clock.

MR. MAGUIRE has great pleasure in announcing the arrival in San Francisco of the celebrated English performers,

MR. AND MRS. CHARLES KEAN,

(formerly Miss Ellen Tree,) on their way from Australia to Europe, and with whom he has entered into a professional engagement to appear at the Opera House.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Kean's stay in California will be limited to a few weeks, and is their first and will be their only visit to this part of the world. These great artistes are accompanied by their niece, Miss CHAPMAN, Mr. J. CATHCART, and Mr. GEORGE EVERETT, of the London Theatres.

MR. and MRS. KEAN will make their first appearance

This (Saturday) Evening, October 8th, 1864,

In Shakspeare's tragedy of

Henry VIII.,

Cardinal Woolsey - - - - -	MR. CHAS. KEAN
King Henry VIII. - - - - - -	Frank Mayo
Cromwell, servant to Wulsey - -	Mr J. F. Cathcart
Earl of Surrey - - - -	Mr. George Everett
Duke of Buckingham - - - -	Pierpont Thayer
Duke of Norfolk - - - - - -	Louis Aldrich
Cardinal Campeius - - - - -	D. C. Anderson
Queen Catherine - - - - -	Mrs. CHAS. KEAN
Anne Boleyn, her Maid of Honor - -	Miss Chapman
Lady Denny, friend to Anne Boleyn -	Mrs C R Saunders

To conclude with the comedy, condensed in three acts, entitled,

The Jealous Wife!

Mr. Oakley - - - - - - -	Mr. Chas. Kean
Major Oakley - - - - - -	Mr. George Everett
Charles Oakley - - - - -	Mr. J. F. Cathcart
Mrs. Oakley - - - - - - -	Mrs. Chas Kean
Lady Freelove - - - - - -	Mr C. R. Saunders
Harriet - - - - - - - -	Miss Chapman

ON SUNDAY EVENING, OCT. 9.

MR. COPPIN, the celebrated Australasian comedian and manager, will make his appearance in three characters.

ON MONDAY EVENING,

Mr. and Mrs. KEAN will appear in the great play of

LOUIS XI.

In consequence of the great expense of this engagement, Mr. Maguire finds it necessary to place the prices to the following scale.

Dress Circle, Orchestra, and Parquette, - -	One Dollar
Reserved seats, - - - - - -	Fifty cents extra
Gallery, - - - - - - - - -	Fifty cents

PAUL JULIEN'S

Grand Farewell Concert,

WILL BE GIVEN

On Tuesday Afternoon, October 11th, 1864,

—AT THE—

METROPOLITAN THEATRE,

At which he will be assisted by the following talent:

Signora Bianchi,	Mrs. Marriner,	Signor Bianchi,
Mr. J. DeHaga,	Mr. Crowly,	Mr. L. Schmidt

And a grand and select ORCHESTRA,

Under the direction of

PROFESSOR R. HEROLD.

TICKETS, - - - - - - - -	ONE DOLLAR.
Reserved Seats - - - - - - -	Fifty cents extra
Gallery - - - - - - - - -	Fifty cents

☞ Box office open on MONDAY. oc8

EUREKA MINSTREL HALL,

Montgomery street, near Pine.

T. MAGUIRE - - - - - - - - Proprietor
GEO. H. COES - - - - - - Stage Manager

GRAND OPENING NIGHT!

MONDAY EVENING - - - SEPT. 5TH.

THE EVER POPULAR

SAN FRANCISCO MINSTRELS!

Consisting of the following well known Artists:

Billy Birch,	Charles Backus,
D. S. Wambold,	Sig. R. Abecco,
George H. Coes,	Martin Simonsen,
Frank Medina,	S. Washburg,
C. F. Shattuck,	Signor Pluto,
F. Harris,	E. Groh, and

MRS. FANNY SIMONSEN.

A grand CHANGE OF PERFORMANCE EACH EVENING.

NEW SONGS, ACTS, BURLESQUES, DANCES, etc., will be performed in rapid succession.

Dress Circle and Orchestra Seats, 50 cents; Parquet, 25 cents; Private Boxes, $5; Reserved Seats, 25 cents extra.

Doors open at 7 o'clock. Curtain will rise at 8 o'clock, precisely.

GRAND

Promenade Concert

AND BALL!

FOURTEENTH ANNIVERSARY

—OF—

KNICKERBOCKER ENGINE CO., No. 5,

AT PLATT'S HALL,

On Monday Evening, October 17th.

☞ Full particulars in future programme.

MAGUIRE'S ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

THOMAS MAGUIRE - - - - - - Proprietor
PETER RICHINGS, - - - - - - - Manager
GEO. EVANS, - - - - - - Musical Director

The Manager respectfully begs leave to announce that this popular establishment will be re-opened

On Monday evening, October 10th, 1864,

For a Second Season of ENGLISH OPERA..

He has also much pleasure in recording the re-engagement

OF THE

Richings' Opera Troupe!

Who upon this occasion will produce, for the first time,

Auber's celebrated opera, entitled

THE CROWN DIAMONDS.

Principal characters by

Miss CAROLINE RICHINGS,
Miss JENNY KEMPTON,
Mr. W. J. HILL.
Mr. EDWARD SEGUIN,
Mr. H. C. PEAKES,
Mr. CHARLES.

In active preparation,

LUISA MILLER, and DINORAH.

PRICES OF ADMISSION.—Dress Circle and Orchestra Seats $1; Parquet 50c.; Gallery 25c.

Doors open at 7 o'clock. Performances will commence at 8 precisely. se17

NOVELTY! NOVELTY! NOVELTY

WILSON, ZOYARA & CARLO'S

Great Circus!

THIS MAMMOTH COMBINATION OF CIRCUS TALENT

Will give their last Saturday afternoon and evening performance in the

LARGE AND ELEGANT PAVILION,

Adjoining International Hotel,

TO-DAY, OCTOBER 8TH.

NOVEL ENTERTAINMENT!

ZOYARA IN MALE ATTIRE!!

Twenty beautiful Presents will be given away.

POSITIVELY THE LAST PERFORMANCE!!!

PRICES OF ADMISSION.

Dress Circle - - - - - - - - -	$1 00
Second Circle - - - - - - - - -	0 50
Reserved Chairs - - - - - - - -	50c extra

☞ Grand Afternoon Performance for families every Saturday.

Doors open at 7 o'clock; performances commence at 8.

GILBERT'S MUSEUM,

Market street, opposite Second street, over the Occidental Market.

F. GILBERT - - - - - - - - Proprietor
J. A. ROWE, - - - - - - - - Manager

OPEN EVERY DAY AND EVENING.

HOME AGAIN!

JAMES MURPHY, THE IRISH GIANT BOY,

Who has just returned from the interior.

ALBINO FAMILY,

GREAT SNAKE-CHARMER, M. DE BAR.

Also, the great Mathematical Wonder,

THE LIGHTNING CALCULATOR,

From Barnum's Museum.

Notwithstanding the great expense attending this unprecedented array of novelties, the management announces the prices as before.

THE GREAT CEROPLASTIC GROUP OF LIFE-LIKE FIGURES, AND

UPWARDS OF 2,000 CURIOSITIES!

Also, a beautiful set of COSMORAMIC VIEWS, illustrating the PRINCIPAL CITIES OF AMERICA. There is also an AQUARIA GARDEN attached to the Museum.

The admission to the entire Exhibition is only 25 cents. Children, 15 cents. se3 1m

BURDELL'S

Oriental Tooth Wash.

SOUND AND WHITE TEETH

Are Indispensable to Personal Attraction, and to Health and Longevity, by proper mastication of the food.

THIS UNIQUE PREPARATION IS OF INESTIMABLE value in preserving and beautifying the Teeth, strengthening the Gums and in imparting a delicate fragrance to the breath. It eradicates tartar from the Teeth, removes spots of incipient decay, and polishes and preserves the enamel, to which it imparts a PEARL-LIKE WHITENESS.

Its anti-sceptic and anti-scorbutic properties exercises a highly beneficial and salutary influence; they arrest the further progress of the decay of Teeth, induce a healthy action of the Gums, and cause them to assume the brightness and color indicative of perfect soundness; while, by confirming their adhesion to the Teeth, they give unlimited enjoyment and fresh zest to appetite, by perpetuating effective and complete mastication. It speedily removes those ravages which children sustain in the teeth, owing to the improper use of sweet and acid substances.

Sold by all Druggists, and by

H. P. WAKELEE,

Corner Montgomery and Sutter streets, and corner Bush and Montgomery streets. se24

HEALTH

AND AMUSEMENT,

COMBINED!

C. J. ROBINSON'S SELECT CLASSES,

In Dr. Dio Lewis's System of

LIGHT GYMNASTICS!

At MISS ALDRICH'S ACADEMY, Stevenson street,

Near corner of Market and Second streets, San Francisco,

For Scientific Physical Training and Recreative Exercise, in classes, by persons of all ages and conditions of health, and by both sexes, with light and movable apparatus, and an invariable and appropriate musical accompaniment. While the Exercises of the Light Gymnastics impart strength, grace, activity and symmetry to the person, they at the same time furnish an exhaustless fund of social enjoyment and mental recreation.

Mr. ROBINSON has recently been employed to teach this system in all the public schools of this city.

CLASSES meet on Tuesdays and Fridays at 8 P. M. For admission or further information, apply at the Academy.

Mr. ROBINSON will give instruction, on application to classes and private pupils, in VOCAL CULTURE and ELOCUTION, as taught by the best masters in the East.

jy23-1m

NEW BOOKS.

JUST RECEIVED,

—AT—

A. Roman & Co.'s.

TENNYSON'S NEW POEMS. Enoch Arden, and Other Poems. 12mo.

Imogene; or, the Marble Heart. By Pierce Egan, Esq.

The Finger Post to Public Business; containing the mode of forming and conducting Societies, Clubs and other organized associations, etc. 12mo.

Biographical Sketches of the Loyalists of the American Revolution. With an Historical Essay by Lorenzo Sabine. 2 vols.

Azarian; an Episode. By Harriet E. Prescott, author of the "Amber Gods," etc. 12mo.

Talks on Women's Topics. By Jennie June. 12mo.

The Coward; a Novel of Society and the Field in 1863. By Henry Morford, author of "The Days of Shoddy," etc. 12mo.

The Monomaniac; or, Shirley Hall Asylum. By William Gilbert. 12mo.

The Water Babies; a Fairy Tale for a Land Baby. Illustrated. By the Rev. Charles Kingsley. Square 16mo.

The Cradle of Rebellions; a History of the Secret Societies of France. By Lucien de la Hodde. 8vo.

Capt. Brande of the Centipede; a Pirate of eminence in the West Indies. 8vo. Illustrated. By Harry Gringo.

The Early Dawn; or, Sketches of Christian Life in England in the Olden Time. By the author of "Chronicles of the Schönberg Cotta Family." 12mo.

Margaret and her Bridesmaids. By the author of "The Queens of the Country," etc. 12mo.

Jomini's Life of Napoleon. Translated by Gen. H. W. Halleck. 4 vols. 8vo. With an Atlas of 60 maps.

Battle Fields of our Fathers. By Virginia F. Townsend. 12mo.

Poems by David Gray. With Memoirs of his Life and an Introductory Notice by R. M. Milnes. 12mo.

Out in the World. A Novel, by T. S. Arthur. 12mo.

Naomi Torrenti; or, the History of a Woman. By Gertrude F. Vingut. 8vo.

Libby Life, or Experiences of a Prisoner of War in Richmond, Va. 1863-4. By Lieut.-Col. Cavada. 12mo;

The Potomac and the Rapidan; Army Notes from the failure at Winchester to the reinforcement of Rosecrans-1861-3. By A. H. Quint, Chaplain 2d Massachusetts Regiment. 12mo.

The Gold Hunter's Adventure; or, Life in Australia. By a returned Australian. Illustrated 12mo.

Savage Africa; being the Narrative of a Tour in Equatorial and Western Africa. With notes on the Habits of the Gorilla, etc. etc. By W. W. Reade. With Map and Illustrations. 8vo;

A Woman's Philosophy of Woman; or, Woman Affranchised. An answer to Proudhon, Michelet, Legouve, and other modern innovators. By Mme. d'Hericourt, Translated from the last Paris edition.

Together with an extensive and complete stock of

Choice and Standard Books,

In all the departments of

LITERATURE, ART AND SCIENCE.

A fine collection of Standard authors in fine bindings, suitable for private Libraries.

☞ A full assortment of CHILDREN'S BOOKS, SCHOOL BOOKS, PHOTOGRAPHIC ALBUMS, etc, etc.

All for sale at the lowest Prices, wholesale and retail.

A. ROMAN & CO.,

BOOKSELLERS, PUBLISHERS AND IMPORTERS,

and 419 MONTGOMERY STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO.

se17-1m

QUINTESSENCE OF

ENGLISH GARDEN LAVENDER FLOWERS,

Prepared from ingredients imported expressly for the purpose by

H. P. WAKELEE, Druggist,

Montgomery street, cor. Sutter, San Francisco.

Lavender has always maintained the highest rank as a perfume in England, but owing to the inferior qualities usually imported, has almost fallen into disuse in the United States. When pure and distilled from the flowers, it is the most delicate and refreshing perfumes in use. This preparation is recommended as the pure essence of Garden Lavender Flowers. se24

The Californian.

"SURELY THERE IS A VEIN FOR THE SILVER AND A PLACE FOR GOLD WHERE THEY FINE IT."

VOL. I.--NO. 21. SAN FRANCISCO, OCTOBER 15, 1864. TERMS { $5 A YEAR, BY MAIL, IN ADVANCE. 50 CENTS A MONTH, BY CARRIER.

CONTENTS:

ORIGINAL ARTICLES:

An Incident of the Mexican War—By "A. M. K."
On a Vulgar Little Boy—By "Bret"
Frod's Retrievor—By "Podgers."
Still Further Concerning that Conundrum—By "Mark Twain."
Ten Minutes—By "E. H. L. P."
Smoky.
Notes of Mines and Mineralogy.
Scientific Sketches—By "Trismegistus."

THE WHITE WOLF—A Translation

POETRY—

Tell Me—By "Emilie Lawson."
At the Sepulchre.
Poetical Review of New Books.

EDITORIALS:

The Demonstration To-night.
Suggestions to the Idle.

NEW BOOKS:
A Review of New Publications.

SELECTED SKETCHES, STORIES, etc.

Down Stream.
Tarco Asiatic Sketches.
New Railway Signals.
Steve Lidyard's Adventure.
Humors of the Law.
Don Quixote Dramatized.
The Maiden at the Inn.
Southern Insects.

POETRY—

The Pen and the Album.
Maternity.
"Judy Callaghan" in a New Dress.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL:

A review of the Drama and Lyric Stage, etc.

HAPPENINGS OF THE WEEK:
A Digest of Passing Events.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

TELL ME!

BRIGHT, budding heliotrope!
Whose amethyst eyes at her warm breathing ope,
Tell me if those dear feet—
Wait for my coming with impatient beat?

Sweet tuft of mignonette!
So daintily upon her bosom set,
Tell me if her dear heart
Heaves with regretful throbbing when we part?

Delightful jessamine!
Clasping her hair with that sweet clasp of thine,
Tell me if her dear head
Bend dreamily in thought of fond hours fled?

Beautiful tell-tale flowers!
Ever around her in her tenderest hours,
Ye may each sweet sign see—
Tell me if, as I love her, she loves me!

EMILIE LAWSON.

STILL FURTHER CONCERNING THAT CONUNDRUM.

IN accordance with your desire, I went to the Academy of Music on Monday evening, to take notes and prepare myself to write a careful critique upon the opera of the Crown Diamonds. That you considered me able to acquit myself creditably in this exalted sphere of literary labor, was gratifying to me, and I should even have felt flattered by it had I not known that I was so competent to perform the task well, that to set it for me could not be regarded as a flattering concession, but, on the contrary, only a just and deserved recognition of merit.

Now, to throw disguise aside and speak openly, I have long yearned for an opportunity to write an operatic diagnostical and analytical dissertation for you. I feel the importance of carefully-digested newspaper criticism in matters of this kind—for I am aware that by it the dramatic and musical tastes of a community are moulded, cultivated and irrevocably fixed—that by it these tastes are vitiated and debased, or elevated and ennobled, according to the refinement or vulgarity, and the competency or incompetency of the writers to whom this department of the public training is entrusted. If you would see around you a people who are filled with the keenest appreciation of perfection in musical execution and dramatic delineation, and painfully sensitive to the slightest departures from the true standard of art in these things, you must employ upon your newspapers critics capable of discriminating between merit and demerit, and alike fearless in praising the one and condemning the other. Such a person—although it may be in some degree immodest in me to say so—I claim to be. You will not be surprised, then, to know that I read your bosky criticisms on the opera with the most exquisite anguish—and not only yours, but those which I find in every paper in San Francisco.

You do nothing but sing one everlasting song of praise; when an artist, by diligence and talent, makes an effort of transcendent excellence, behold, instead of receiving marked and cordial attention, both artist and effort sink from sight, and are lost in the general slough of slimy praise in which it is your pleasure to cause the whole company, good, bad and indifferent, to wallow once a week. With this brief but very liberal and hearty expression of sentiment, I will drop the subject and leave you alone for the present, for it behooves me now to set you a model in criticism.

The opera of the Crown Diamonds was put upon the stage in creditable shape on Monday evening, although I noticed that the curtains of the "Queen of Portugal's" drawing-room were not as gorgeous as they might have been, and that the furniture had a second-hand air about it, of having seen service in the preceding reign. The acting and the vocalization, however, were, in the main, good. I was particularly charmed by the able manner in which Signor Bellindo Alphonso Cellini, the accomplished basso-relievo furniture-scout and sofa-shifter performed his part. I have before observed that this rising young artist gave evidence of the rarest genius in his peculiar department of operatic business, and have been annoyed at noticing with what studied care a venomous and profligate press have suppressed his name and suffered his sublimest efforts to pass unnoticed and unglorified. Shame upon such grovelling envy and malice! But, with all your neglect, you have failed to crush the spirit of the gifted furniture-scout, or seduce from him the affectionate encouragement and appreciation of the people. The moment he stepped upon the stage on Monday evening, to carry out the bandit chieftan's valise, the upper circles, with one accord, shouted, "Supe! supe!" and greeted him with warm and generous applause. It was a princely triumph for Bellindo; he told me afterwards it was the proudest moment of his life.

I watched Alphonso during the entire performance and was never so well pleased with him before, although I have admired him from the first. In the second act, when the eyes of the whole audience were upon him—when his every movement was the subject of anxiety and suspense—when everything depended upon his nerve and self-possession, and the slightest symptom of hesitation or lack of confidence would have been fatal—he stood erect in front of the cave, looking calmly and unflinchingly down upon the camp-stool for several moments, as one who has made up his mind to do his great work or perish in the attempt, and then seized it and bore it in triumph to the foot-lights! It was a sublime spectacle. There was not a dry eye in the house. In that moment, not even the most envious and uncharitable among the noble youth's detractors would have had the hardihood to say he was not endowed with a lofty genius.

Again, in the scene where the Prime Minister's nephew is imploring the female bandit to fly to the carriage and escape impending wrath, and when dismay and confusion ruled the hour, how quiet, how unmoved, how grandly indifferent was Bellindo in the midst of it all!—what solidity of expression lay upon his countenance! While all save himself were unnerved by despair, he serenely put forth his finger and mashed to a shapeless pulp a mosquito that loitered upon the wall, yet betrayed no sign of agitation the while. Was there nothing in this lofty contempt for the dangers which surrounded him that marked the actor destined hereafter to imperishable renown?

Possibly upon that occasion when it was necessary for Alphonso to remove two chairs and a table during the shifting of the scenes, he performed his part with undue precipitation; with the table upside down upon his head, and grasping the corners with hands burdened with the chairs, he appeared to some extent undignified when he galloped across the stage. Generally his conception of his part is excellent, but in this case I am satisfied he threw into it an enthusiasm not required and also not warranted by the circumstances. I think that careful study and reflection will convince him that I am right, and that the author of the opera intended that in this particular instance the furniture should be carried out with impressive solemnity. That he had this in view is evidenced by the slow and stately measure of the music played by the orchestra at that juncture.

But the crowning glory of Cellini's performance that evening was the placing of a chair for the Queen of Portugal to sit down in after she had become fatigued by earnestly and elaborately abusing the Prime Minister for losing the Crown Diamonds. He did not grab the chair by the hind leg and shove it awkwardly at her Majesty; he did not seize it by the seat and thrust it ungracefully toward her; he did not handle it as though he was undecided about the strict line of his duty or ignorant of the proper manner of performing it. He did none of these things. With a coolness and confidence that evinced the most perfect conception and the most consummate knowledge of his part, he came gently forward and laid hold of that chair from behind, set it in its proper place with a movement replete with grace, and then leaned upon the back of it, resting his chin upon his hand, and in this position smiled a smile of transfigured sweetness upon the audience over the Queen of Portugal's head. There shone the inspired actor! and the people saw and acknowledged him; they waited respectfully for Miss Richings to finish her song, and then with one impulse they poured forth upon him a sweeping tempest of applause.

At the end of the piece the idolized furniture-scout and sofa-skirmisher was called before the curtain by an enthusiastic shouting and clapping of hands, but he was thrust aside, as usual, and other artists, (who chose to consider the compliment as intended for themselves,) swept bowing and smirking along the footlights and received it. I swelled with indignation, but I summoned my fortitude and resisted the pressure successfully. I am still intact.

Take it altogether, the Crown Diamonds was really a creditable performance. I feel that I would not be doing my whole duty if I closed this critique without speaking of Miss Caroline Richings, Miss Jenny Kempton, Mr. Hill, Mr. Seguin and Mr. Peakes, all of whom did fair justice to their several parts, and deserve a passing notice. With study, perseverance and attention, I have no doubt these vocalists will in time achieve a gratifying success in their profession.

I believe I have nothing further to say. I will call around, to-morrow, after you have had time to read, digest and pass your judgment upon my criticism, and, if agreeable, I will hire out to you for some years in that line.

MARK TWAIN.

P. S.—No answer to that conundrum this week. On account of over-exertion on it the old woman has got to having fits here lately. However, it will be forthcoming yet, when she runs out of them, if she don't die in the meantime, and I trust she will not. We may as well prepare ourselves for the worst, though, for it is not to be disguised that they are shaking her up mighty lively.

THE BEKTASH, OR PHILOSOPHER, OF THE EAST.—"I am," said Mossa Effendi, "a bektash, what you Franks call a philosopher. The bektashes love wisdom rather than religion. Indeed, we regard all religions as much alike, and pay more attention to morality; we are a large body in this empire." "And does your Government allow you to exist without interference?" "What had Government to do with men's consciences? We pay our taxes, we serve the State, we even call ourselves Mussulmans—what more can we do? The Government is too wise to stir up mischief, and make us dangerous martyrs; besides, some of the greatest men in the empire are bektashes, and they are the best men, too." Have you, then, no religion? Do you not believe in Mahomet? Do you not believe in God?" "We do not disbelieve in God. But what is poor finite man that he should impiously try to comprehend the incomprehensible—that he should, like the Greek Athanasius, babble incoherent nonsense about the person and persons of the infinite, intangible great cause and centre of the universe? We confine ourselves to the comprehensible; and as for Mahomet, we regard him as a great man, and so far the apostle of God that he waged war on the worshippers of idols, and brought his sword amongst a depraved race. Wallah! we want another Mahomet. As for our religion, I tell you it is philosophy, and whoever speaks the words of truth and morality, he is one of our priests, be he Mussulman, Christian, or Pagan. Can you find fault with that, Hekim Bashi?"

GALENA has been artificially made in the following manner, by M. Margny, and received by the French Academy of Sciences with marked approval: A mixture is made of 300 grammes of litharge, 60 grammes of pyrites, and 5 or 6 grammes of starch, and is then put in an earthen crucible, covered with borax, and exposed for half an hour to a very high temperature. When the crucible is withdrawn from the fire, and allowed to cool slowly, large and brilliant crystals of galena are produced.

THE PEN AND THE ALBUM.

"I AM Miss Catherine's book" (the Album speaks);
"I've lain among your tomes these many weeks';
I'm tired of their old coats and yellow cheeks.

"Quick, Pen! and write a line with a good grace;
Come! draw me off a funny little face;
And, prithee, send me back to Chesham Place."

PEN.

I am my master's faithful old Gold Pen;
I've served him three long years, and drawn since then
Thousands of funny women and droll men.

O Album! could I tell you all his ways
And thoughts, since I am his, these thousand days,
Lord, how your pretty pages I'd amaze!

ALBUM.

His ways? his thoughts? Just whisper me a few;
Tell me a curious anecdote or two,
And write 'em quickly off, good Mordan, do!

PEN.

Since he my faithful service did engage
To follow him through his queer pilgrimage,
I've drawn and written many a line and page.

Caricatures I scribbled have, and rhymes,
And dinner cards, and picture pantomimes,
And merry little children's books at times.

I've writ the foolish fancy of his brain;
The aimless jest that, striking, hath caused pain;
The idle word that he'd wish back again.

* * * *

I've helped him to pen many a line for bread;
To joke, with sorrow aching in his head;
And make your laughter when his own heart bled.

I've spoke with men of all degree and sort—
Peers of the land, and ladies of the Court;
Oh, but I've chronicled a deal of sport.

Feasts that were ate a thousand days ago,
Biddings to wine that long hath ceased to flow,
Gay meetings with good fellows long laid low;

Summons to bridal, banquet, burial, ball,
Tradesman's polite reminders of his small
Account due Christmas last—I've answered all.

Poor Diddler's tenth petition for a half-
Guinea; Miss Banyan's for an autograph;
So I refuse, accept, lament, or laugh,

Condole, congratulate, invite, praise, scoff,
Day after day still dipping in my trough,
And scribbling pages after pages off.

Day after day the labor's to be done,
And sure as comes the postman and the sun,
The indefatigable ink must run.

* * * *

Go back, my pretty little tome,
To a fair mistress and a pleasant home,
Where soft hearts greet us wheusoe'er we come.

Dear, friendly eyes, with constant kindness lit,
However rude my verse, or poor my wit,
Or sad or gay my mood, you welcome it.

Kind lady! till my last of lines is penned,
My master's love, grief, laughter at an end,
Wheue'er I write your name, may I write friend!

Not all are so that were so in past years;
Voices, familiar once, no more he hears;
Names, often writ, are blotted out in tears.

So be it: joys will end and tears will dry . . . .
Album! my master bids me wish good-by;
He'll send you to your mistress presently.

And thus with thankful heart he closes you;
Blessing the happy hour when a friend he knew
So gentle, and so generous, and so true.

Nor pass the words as idle phrases by;
Stranger! I never writ a flattery,
Nor signed the page that registered a lie.

[W. M. Thackeray.

"LAMBERT."—A cant word has lately pervaded Paris and literally been in everybody's mouth. It is "Lambert." A few days ago it assailed the ear at every turn, and on the occasion of the late fetes was shouted in the Camp de Mars by fifty or sixty thousand people. It is said to have originated innocently enough, to have been, in fact, simply a pleasantry of some farceurs in an excursion train—the travellers by trains de plaisur being notoriously noisy. However, the variations on the word, and their more or less pointed application, on the night of the 15th in the Champ de Mars, has given offence in high quarters, and drawn the attention of the police to the matter. The latter have been instructed to put down the obnoxious word in all its varieties. Political allusions were becoming frequent under the mask of the unmeaning "Lambert." "Lambert has a granite phiz, but a naptha flame burns below." "Gare a Lambert; He is treacherous—a petroleum lamp." "Lambert wears a harlequin's coat—a patch of everybody's color is tagged on it, for Lambert went to prison once upon a time." "Lambert est un digne apotre. He is a fisher of men is Lambert. He nets fishes of all sorts and sizes." "Il est gourmand ce Lambert; sa digestion est bonne quoique ses medecins disent que non." Other allusions, more or less pointed, may have assailed the ears of the Emperor and Empress during their nocturnal drive through Paris on the 15th. So obnoxious to the authorities has the cant term become that a thousand copies of a meaningless ballad, the refrain of which was "Lambert," have been seized in the Ternes market. The Prefect of Police has issued an ukase that "MM. les Voyageurs," per rail, must not relieve the monotony of their trip by boisterous inquiries after "Lambert" or any one else, or they will be prosecuted for "impeding the traffic." An unfortunate little snob who joined the crowd on the 15th, in shouting "Lambert," "Voila Lambert," after a foreigner, and who demurred to being taken into custody, and even pushed away a sergeant de ville, has been sentenced to a fortnight's imprisonment for "assaulting a public functionary in performance of his duty." Two or three hundred of these ejaculators of "Lambert" were arrested on the 15th. They were, however, released after the fete.

TEN MINUTES.

LOUNGING on my sofa just now, I took out my watch to see what time it was. It told me four o'clock. With the watch still in my hand, I fell into a reverie; and when my eyes again fell on the still open face, I found that it was ten minutes after four. Consequently, ten minutes had slipped away without my knowing or being at all conscious of the flight of time. This again led me into another reverie. How have those ten minutes passed with the rest of my fellow-beings? thought I. No doubt, with most of them it has been a dull, unnoticed ten minutes in the dull twenty-four hours. But with many how full of importance has it been!

Let me fancy myself gifted with wings for half an hour, and we will find out how those ten minutes have passed with a few of our fellow-beings: We are in a fine, large bedroom. In the spacious bedstead is a noble-looking, grey-haired old man, reclining, his head propped up with a pillow. On one side of the bed, with the old man's right hand in both of hers, kneels a young and beautiful girl, weeping bitterly. On the other side stands a young man, still handsome, though bearing the marks of great and excessive dissipation. As he bends over the old man, his face wears a troubled and remorseful expression. The clock strikes four. "Kiss me, my darling Harrie," faintly speaks the old man to his daughter; "and say good-by. Nay, you must not weep so. God will guard and take care of you, my child. And you, my son! Oh, I beg with my latest breath that you will give up all those companions who have been drawing you into evil. Lead a good and honorable life, and take my place with your sister. Guard and cherish her, and, obeying these my last wishes, God will bless you." The head falls back, the eyes close, and the old man breathes slowly. Daughter and son both bend anxiously over him. The breathing become less distinct; in a moment it ceases altogether. He has passed quietly away. It is ten minutes past four!

We are standing on the platform of a railway station. The engine stands snorting out its impatience to be off, and passengers are hurrying hither and thither to find their baggage, or wishing their friends good-by. The first bell rings. It is four o'clock. In ten minutes the train will start. A young man stands on the platform near an open carriage, clasped in his mother's embrace. He is going to seek his fortune in Australia, and his poor old mother may never see him again. "Oh! my dear, dear son, may God bless and protect you forever! Write to me often, and never forget your poor mother." In a passion of grief she again embraces him. The bell rings again. The engine whistles. It is ten minutes after four. After one long kiss, the son jumps into the car, brushing his coat-sleeve across his eyes. As the train moves slowly out of the station the poor mother waves her handkerchief, and the last words she says to her son are: "Don't catch cold, dear John. You will find the sandwiches in the carpet-bag."

This time we find ourselves in a small, poorly-furnished sitting-room. A careworn-looking man is sitting at a little table with his head resting on his hands. He is evidently poor, as his coat is threadbare, though clean and brushed, and his socks show in two or three places through his boots, notwithstanding his efforts to hide them by putting ink on. The clock on a neighboring church-steeple strikes four. The man gets up and commences to walk up and down the room. He talks to himself: "No, there is absolutely nothing to live for! Poor, unknown, and starving—shut up in a great city, in the midst of riches, and still unable to obtain a meal. Nobody will miss me and nobody will mourn me. Next world! Pah! I don't believe in one! Mother! She is gone. So thus let me end the miserable dream!" He takes a pistol from a drawer, places it to his ear and fires. His brains are splashed about the room just as the church clock chimes ten minutes after four.

It is a gorgeously furnished drawing-room. A charming girl sits at a piano, inadvertently running her fingers over the keys. She is evidently not thinking of what she is doing. Her thoughts are away. Suddenly she starts and a bright color comes into her cheeks. The door opens and a tall, handsome young man enters the room, as the brilliant French clock on the mantel-piece tinkles out four. He goes straight up to her, and taking both her hands in his, he looks into her eyes. She turns her face away, blushing. "Dearest Mary, I have come to ask you to be mine. I love you passionately and cannot be happy without you. Speak, my dearest one, and tell me if you love me." As he says this, the young man falls on his knees before the girl. For a moment, with her head bowed, she says nothing. Then suddenly turning round, she flings her arms around his neck and hides her face on his shoulder. He is happy, and it is ten minutes after four.

Again, we enter a magnificently furnished room, but although it is only just striking four, all the blinds are down and the room is lighted with wax candles. At a table in the middle of the room four gentlemen are playing at cards. At the side of each stands a little supporter with glasses, wines and cigars upon them. They seem deeply interested in their game, and, from their slightly haggard looks, have evidently been playing for many hours—probably all the previous night. One of them, in particular, is very pale, and although he calmly smokes his cigar, you can tell, from the slight nervous twitching of his mouth now and then, that he is very much excited. No wonder! He has staked his last five thousand in the world, and, if he loses, his young wife, only six months married, will be brought to beggary. Already, no doubt, she is dreadfully alarmed at his absence for so many hours. He has made a vow to himself that if he wins this once he will never gamble again. This trick will decide. Yes, he wins! He has the ace. His hand trembles as he takes up the cash and the clock points to ten minutes past four. He rises and says he must go. Let us hope he will keep his vow.

Thus goes the world. We little think of ten minutes now, although some day we may be willing to give the world for ten minutes. "Apres moi le déluge," is always our cry.

E. H. L. P.

"JUDY CALLAGHAN" IN A NEW DRESS.

THE following clever translation of "Judy Callaghan" originally appeared in Fraser's Magazine as "The Sabine Farmer's Serenade," and purported to be an authentic classical fragment. It actually deceived many scholars, until accident traced its authorship to Dr. Maginn:

'Twas on a windy night,
About two o'clock in the morning,
An Irish lad so tight,
All wind and weather scorning,
At Judy Callaghan's door,
Sitting upon the palings,
His love-tale he did pour,
And this in part his wailings:
Only say
You'll be Mrs. Brallaghan;
Don't say nay,
Charming Judy Callaghan.

Oh! list to what I say,
Charms you've got like Venus;
Own your love you may,
There's the wall between us.
You lie fast asleep,
Snug in bed a-snoring;
Round the house I creep,
Your hard heart imploring.
Only say
You'll have Mr. Brallaghan;
Don't say nay,
Charming Judy Callaghan.

I've got an acre of ground,
I've got it set with praties;
I've got of 'baccy a pound,
I've got some tea for ladies:
I've got the ring to wed,
Whiskey to make us gaily;
I've got a feather bed,
And a handsome new shillelagh.
Only say
You'll have Mr. Brallaghan;
Don't say nay,
Charming Judy Callaghan.

For a wife till death,
I am willing to take ye
But, och, I waste my breath,
The devil sure can't wake ye,
'Tis just beginning to rain,
So I'll get under cover;
To-morrow I'll come again,
And be your constant lover.
Only say
You'll be Mrs. Brallaghan;
Don't say nay,
Charming Judy Callaghan.

ERAT turbida nox,
Hora secunda mane,
Quando pronit vox
Carmen in hoc mane;
Viri miseri mens
Meditabatur hymen,
Hinc puellæ flens
Stabat obsidens limen.
Semel tantum die
Eris nostra Lalage;
Ne recuses sic,
Dulcis Julia Calage.

Planctibus aurem fer,
Venere tu formosior;
Die hos muros per,
Tuo favor potior!
Voce beatum hac;
En, dum dormis, vigilo,
Nocte obambulans hac
Domum plancis stridulo.
Semel tantum die
Eris nostra Lalage;
Ne recuses sic,
Dulcis Julia Calage.

Vis poma terræ? sum
Uno dives jugere;
Vis hic et mella, cum
Bacchi succo, sugere?
Vis aquæ vitæ vim?
Plumoso sommum sacculo?
Vis ut paratus sim
Vel annulo vel haculo?
Semel tantum die
Eris nostra Lalage;
Ne recuses sic,
Dulcis Julia Calage.

Conjux utinam tu
Fierce, lepidum cor, mi!
Habitum perdimus, heu,
Te sopor urget. Dormi
Ingruit imber trux—
Jam sub tecto pellitur
Is quem erastina lux
Referet hinc fideliter,
Semel tantum die
Eris nostra Lalage;
Ne recuses sic,
Dulcis Julia Calage.

SHAKSPEARE'S SONGS.—A curious question here arises, whether and in what degree Shakspeare can be fittingly associated with such music as that with which the English public is familiar. In this time (as we have seen in foregoing paragraphs) the old mystic and miracle plays had nearly disappeared, while the modern oratorio had not yet arisen. Church music, of a kind superior to any previously known, was produced in Italy; and in England there were many fine compositions for the organ and the singing-men in cathedrals. The more prevalent music, however, was of the madrigal class, composition in three or four-part harmony, either with a very simple instrumental accompaniment or none at all. Composition on the grand choral scale were almost unknown. Scattered throughout Shakspeare's plays are many beautiful songs, some of which are sung on the stage, some omitted, according to the degree of completeness with which the dramas are produced. "Ye Spotted Snakes," in The Midsummer Night's Dream; "Under the Greenwood Tree," "Blow, Blow, thou Winter Wind," "What Shall He have that killed the Deer?" "It was a Lover and His Lass," in As You Like It; "Come Unto these Yellow Sands," "Full Fathom Five," "Where the Bee Sucks," in The Tempest; the Witches' songs in Macbeth; and other songs scattered through these wonderful plays, have been set to music at some time or other, and some of them more than once, as is the case with "As it fell upon a day" and "I know a Bank." If these songs, or any of them, are fitted for choral singing by many hundred persons, it would probably depend more on the music than the words; seeing that Shakspeare certainly did not contemplate such musical gatherings as we are now accustomed to. Something of this kind has already been tried. The London Division of the Handel Festival Choir, numbering sixteen hundred singers, sang five of Shakspeare's songs, ("Blow, Blow, thou Winter Wind," "As it Fell upon a Day," "Sea-Nymphs Hourly Sing His Knell," "Orpheus with His Lute," and "Ye Spotted Snakes," together with the fine lines beginning "The Cloud-Capt Towers,") at Exeter Hall on the 18th of March last, to music by Purcell, Stevens, Mornington and Macfarren. It was a wonderful body of musical sound, as all the meetings of that choir present. As to the musical performances at St. James' Hall, the Agricultural Hall, the Crystal Palace, the theatres, the new Rotunda at Stratford-on-Avon, and elsewhere, during the last ten days in April, they were of three kinds—Shakspeare's songs, sung as solos, duets, glees, or in choral harmony; music composed for special portions of Shakspeare's works, such as Locke's music to Macbeth, Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream, Sullivan's Tempest, Nicolai's Merry Wives of Windsor, and the like; and great choral performances, such as Handel's Messiah, bearing no relation to Shakspeare either in the words or the music. There appears to be no help for a certain degree of incongruity in this matter; if we want grand music at our festivals, and if Shakspeare wrote no words expressly for such music, some sort of cutting and contriving become necessary.—Churchman's Family Magazine.

REMOVAL.

LAWRENCE & HOUSEWORTH,
OPTICIANS,

IMPORTERS OF OPTICAL, MATHEMATICAL AND PHILOSOPHICAL INSTRUMENTS,

STEREOSCOPIC GOODS,

PHOTOGRAPHIC ALBUMS,

CARTES DE VISITE,

AND

JOSEPH RODGERS & SON'S

SUPERIOR CUTLERY,

HAVE REMOVED TO

No. 315 Montgomery street, bet. California and Pine.

(ESTABLISHED IN 1851,)

HAVE FOR SALE THE LARGEST STOCK ON THE PACIFIC COAST, consisting in part as follows:

720 dezen SPECTACLES, in Gold, Silver, Steel and Plated Frames.
305 dozen EYE GLASSES, in Gold, Silver, Steel, Horn, Shell and Rubber Frames.
150 dozen WIRE GAUZE GOGGLES.
300 dozen SPECTACLE GLASSES and BRAZILIAN PEBBLES.
350 dozen SPECTACLE and EYE GLASS CASES.

395 Opera and Marine Glasses.	20,500 Card Photographs, Photographic Albums,
75 Telescope and Spy Glasses,	600 Album Pictures—in oil colors,
178 dozen Magnifying Glasses,	50 doz. Union Card Frames,
80 doz. Pocket Compasses,	Joseph Rodgers & Son's CUTLERY,
325 Hand Stereoscopes,	100 doz. Table Knives,
74 Revolving Stereoscopes	260 doz. Pocket Knives,
1025 doz. Stereoscopic Views	120 doz. Razors,
Drawing Instruments in German Silver and Brass,	50 doz. Razor Strops,
Boxwood and Ivory Scales,	130 doz. Scissors,
Microscopes in every Style,	SCISSORS, in Cases,
25 Magnetic Machines for Medical purposes,	100 doz. Gyroscope Tops,
Aneroid Barometers,	169 doz. Thermometers,
	25 doz. Hydrometers,
	Galvanic Batteries.

☞COUNTRY TRADERS will consult their own interest by examining our Stock and Prices before purchasing elsewhere.

 ORDERS FROM THE COUNTRY promptly executed.

☞CATALOGUES sent to any address FREE.

Address

LAWRENCE & HOUSEWORTH,
OPTICIANS,
315 MONTGOMERY STREET,
oc1 SAN FRANCISCO.

BOYS! BOYS! BOYS!

NOW IS THE TIME!

H. M. LOCKWOOD & CO.,

(Now No. 624) CLAY STREET, (Old No 176

Have received a Large Stock of

GENTS' AND BOYS' CLOTHING

—AND—

FURNISHING GOODS,

Which they are selling

AT VERY LOW PRICES.

Every Garment warranted. All are invited to call and examine our goods.

H. M. LOCKWOOD & CO.,
my28 624 Clay street, San Francisco.

DR. GEORGE F. WOODWARD,

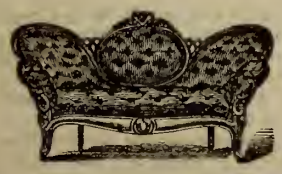
SURGEON U. S. PENSION BUREAU.

OFFICE, 127 MONTGOMERY STREET,

Opposite the Occidental Hotel, San Francisco.

jy30-tf

THE MOST EXTENSIVE,



BEST SELECTED, CHEAPEST,

—AND—

LATEST STYLES

—OF—

Furniture.

GOODWIN & CO.,

No. 528 Washington street,

Are constantly receiving, and have on hand a large assortment of FINE ROSEWOOD, MAHOGANY, and BLACK WALNUT PARLOR, LIBRARY and CHAMBER SUITS, with DINING ROOM SUITS TO ORDER.

☞ We guarantee both Price and Quality satisfactory to our Patrons.

GOODWIN & CO.,
jul8 No. 528 Washington street.

H. LUCKE,

BOOTMAKER, AND IMPORTER

—OF—

FRENCH BOOTS, SHOES AND GAITERS OF THE LATEST PARISIAN MAKE AND MODE.

Lady customers can have their measures forwarded and their shoes made in Paris in the latest style and by the most celebrated manufacturers, at moderate rates.

No. 648 Washington street, below Kearny,

SIGN OF THE GOLDEN BOOT. jy30-3m

FOLSOM STREET PROPERTY

FOR SALE!

COMPRISING TWO 50-VARA LOTS ON THE NORTH side of Folsom street, fronting also on Clementina street. Will be sold as a whole, or in subdivisions of 25 by 80 feet.

WM LEFFINGWELL,
se24-tf 619 Montgomery street

SELLING OFF,

TO CLOSE BUSINESS,

ON ACCOUNT OF LEAVING FOR THE EAST.

ROSENBLATT'S

Palace of Fashion,

Number 125 Montgomery street.

OPPOSITE THE OCCIDENTAL HOTEL.

Branch, 125 J street, between Fourth and Fifth streets, Sacramento.

WILL SELL THE ENTIRE RICH STOCK OF REAL LACE Collars, Sleeves, Pocket Handkerchiefs, Hoop Skirts, Russia Leather Bags, Hosiery, Fancy Boxes, Fans, Portemonnaies, and Silk, Velvet, Cloth and Opera Cloaks,

AT HALF THE USUAL PRICES.

Real Point Lace Collars at - - - - $2 50
French Corsets - - - - - - - - 1 00

☞STORE TO LET, and FIXTURES FOR SALE.
se24 1m

SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES!

Motto—The Singer Sewing Machines are the only machines that can sew all kinds of cloth, and with all kinds of thread.

THE SINGER LETTER A
TRANSVERSE SHUTTLE FAMILY
MACHINES,

With recent improvements for

HEMMING, FELLING,
TUCKING, GATHERING,
BINDING, CORDING,
QUILTING, BRAIDING, etc.,

Are unrivalled for Family and light Manufacturing purposes. We invite the special attention of ladies to the Folding Top Cabinets, our latest improvement. They are the most useful, convenient and novel Cabinets yet introduced, and are worthy of examination.

SINGER'S STANDARD

MANUFACTURING MACHINES,

For Tailoring, Boot and Shoe Making, Harness and Carriage Trimming, are the cheapest, best and only Machine worthy of patronage for general purposes.

☞ Call and examine, or send for a pamphlet.

THE SINGER MANUF. COMPANY,
No. 139 Montgomery street.
WM. BRODERICK, Agent. se3-3m

TELEGRAPHIC EXCHANGE

—ON—

NEW YORK,

PAYABLE IN GOLD,

For sale in sums to suit by

au20-tf WM. T. COLEMAN & CO.

EXCHANGE

ON NEW YORK,

In sums to suit, at the lowest rates, for sale by

au20-tf WM. T. COLEMAN & CO.

GREAT TRIUMPH!!

STEINWAY & SONS

Were awarded the FIRST PRIZE MEDAL at the late great INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION AT LONDON, over the two hundred and sixty-nine Pianos entered for competition from all parts of the world.

The Special Correspondent of the New York Times says: "Messrs. Steinway & Sons' indorsement by the Jurors is emphatic, and stronger and more to the point than that of any European maker."

A constant supply of the above superior instruments can be found at the Agent's,

M. GRAY, 613 Clay street.

PIANO TUNING done by a first-class Workman, from Steinway & Son's Factory, New York. my28

COMMERCIAL STEAM PRINTING

HOUSE.

FRANCIS, VALENTINE & CO.,

517 CLAY and 514 COMMERCIAL STREETS.

Every description of BOOK, JOB and POSTER PRINTING done in the best style and at the lowest rates.

BOOK-BINDING and RULING done to order.

GREGORY YALE,

ATTORNEY AT LAW,

OFFICE—On second floor of Sather & Co.'s Bank, corner Montgomery and Commercial streets, Nos. 2, 3 and 4, San Francisco. y2

JOHN GORMAN,

NOTARY PUBLIC AND CONVEYANCER,

No. 705 MONTGOMERY STREET,

(Near Washington,)

Metropolitan Block, SAN FRANCISCO.

jy9

OCCIDENTAL HOTEL—Corner Montgomery and Bush streets, San Francisco.

This House possesses all the requirements of a FIRST CLASS HOTEL, its spacious RF'DING ROOM, with large MINERAL CABINET and extensive COLLECTION OF SPECIMENS from the different Mining Regions of the Pacific Coast—BRANCH TELEGRAPH OFFICE connecting with Lines throughout the country—and NEWS STAND—all contributing to make it the Headquarters and Home for the Californian business man and tourist.

The TABLE of this House shall not be excelled by any.

BOARD, THREE DOLLARS PER DAY.

LEWIS LELAND & CO.,
my28 Proprietors

REDINGTON & CO.'S ESSENCE OF Jamaica Ginger!

This valuable compound, which is now regarded as one of the most popular remedies in the domestic practice for various complaints of the digestive organs, such as Dyspepsia, Nausea, etc., is prepared solely from the WHITE JAMAICA GINGER, which is the best of all the varieties in use. In the preparation of

REDINGTON & CO.'S

ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER,

Great care is taken to have none but select Root, and to manufacture it in air-tight vessels, thus preventing the evaporation of its delicate essential oil, and preserving the true aroma of the Ginger. It thereby contains in its concentrated form all the valuable properties of the Jamaica Ginger, and is guaranteed to be free from any impurities whatever

It is a grateful stimulant and carminative, giving warmth and tone to the stomach equal to Brandy, without any of its injurious effects.

It will cure Nausea, caused by riding in railroad cars, or from sea-sickness, or other causes.

Miners and others who are exposed to the heat of the Sun often whilst working in cold water, should never be without

REDINGTON & CO.'s

ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER,

As by taking it as a tonic two or three times a day, it is almost a sure preventive to Chills and Fever; and to those who are farming the rich bottom lands of California it is likewise invaluable as a tonic, and should invariably be taken in the early morning before going to the fields, at the mid-day lunch, and before leaving off work at night.

Ask for REDINGTON & CO.'S ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER, and take no other, if you would always have a Pure and Reliable article.

An excellent external application for Gout, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, &c.

REDINGTON & CO., Proprietors,
416 and 418 Front street,
my28 San Francisco.

RAREY'S CONDITION POWDERS.

THE MOST POWERFUL AND BENEFICIAL AGENT known on the Stomach, Blood, Lungs and Bowels of

HORSES, MULES, CATTLE, AND STOCK

of all descriptions.

GREAT BENEFIT TO HARD-WORKING HORSES.

All diseased Stock SPEEDILY and CERTAINLY CURED; healthy Stock will be brought into the very HIGHEST STATE of PERFECTION by giving them a SPOONFULL, wee

NO LIVERY STABLE SHOULD BE WITHOUT

RAREY'S
CELEBRATED CONDITION POWDERS!

All FARMERS and RANCHMEN should use constantly

RAREY'S
CELEBRATED CONDITION POWDERS

TEAMSTERS and STAGE COMPANIES everywhere should keep constantly on hand and freely use

RAREY'S
CELEBRATED CONDITION POWDERS!

They are equal to a Life Insurance on all Stock, as will be fully appreciated on trial by all True Economists.

REDINGTON & CO., Sole Agents,
my28 416 and 418 Front Street, San Francisco.

DEATH'S DOINGS!

THE DEAD TELL NO TALES, 'TIS SAID. WHAT A pity 'tis 'tis true; for if they could, what a "skedaddling" there would be among the numerous quacks and impostors of the present time!

THE MEDICAL FACULTY

May differ in relation to the treatment of disease, but there is very little diversity of opinion among them as to its origin. The philanthropist does not contend that any man becomes at once a

DRUNKARD OR A THIEF.

Nor does the well informed physician maintain that any one becomes at once an invalid. He knows that almost all diseases are of slow growth; that the seeds of disease are often sown at a remote period, and only await some change of climate or condition of the individual to manifest themselves.

A COMMON COLD!

Is the forerunner of many a fatal disease; a leading symptom of Consumption; a general disturber of the human system, and

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP

Is the greatest barrier that can be thrown in the way of its progress. Its timely use will ward off Consumption, cure the Asthma, Bronchitis, Sore Throat, and the thousand and one other ills so sure to follow in its wake when too long neglected or improperly treated.

REDINGTON & CO., Agents,
San Francisco.
And for sale everywhere. se10-tf

ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM!

THE REMEDY FOR CURING

CONSUMPTION, COUGHS, COLDS,

ASTHMA, CROUP,

DISEASES OF THE THROAT, BRONCHITIS,

Pains and Oppression of the Chest or Lungs,

DIFFICULT BREATHING,

AND ALL THE

DISEASES OF THE PULMONARY ORGANS.

ITS ACTION IS EXPECTORANT, ALTERATIVE, SUDORIFIC, SEDATIVE, DIAPHORETIC and DIURETIC, which renders it one of the most valuable remedies known for curing diseases of the lungs. It excites expectoration, and causes the lungs to throw off the phlegm or mucus, changes the secretions and PURIFIES THE BLOOD; heals the irritated parts; gives strength to the digestive system, brings the liver to its proper action, and imparts, beyond the possibility of doubt, strength to the whole system. Such is the immediate and satisfactory effect, that it is warranted to break up the most distressing cough in a few hours' time, if not of too long standing. It is warranted to give entire satisfaction even in the most confirmed cases of Consumption. It is warranted not to produce costiveness, which is the case with most remedies, or affect the head, as it contains no Opium in any form. It is warranted to be perfectly harmless to the most delicate child, although it is an active and powerful remedy for restoring the system. There is no real necessity for so many deaths by Consumption, when ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM will prevent it, if only taken in time.

Sold by all Druggists. Price $1 per bottle.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,
Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,
nu27 Corner of Clay, San Francisco.

DR. STEPHENS'

CELEBRATED

Eye Salve!

AN INFALLIBLE REMEDY FOR

DISEASES OF THE EYE,

Acute or chronic, ulceration of the lachrymal glands, film and weakness of the vision from any cause; it is the most effectual remedy ever discovered.

Sold by all Druggists.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,
Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,
au27 Corner of Clay, San Francisco.

CATARRH!

DR. H. GOODALE'S

Catarrh Remedy!

FOR CENTURIES CATARRH HAS DEFIED THE skill of physicians and surgeons. No medical work contains a prescription that will eradicate it. Nothing save DR. GOODALE'S REMEDY will break it up, radically destroying the principle of the disease, and precluding the possibility of a relapse. Medical men have attempted to explain what it is, but admit that they have not discovered its antidote. Dr. Goodale offers this simple definition of its character: It is a disorder which he DOES CURE and they DO NOT. This is the great fact which it imports the sufferer to know, and a single trial will establish it beyond a question. Price, $1. Sold by all Druggists.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,
Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,
au27 Corner of Clay, San Francisco.

KENDALL'S AMBOLINE!

THE GREAT
UNEQUALLED
PREPARATION
FOR
RESTORING, INVIGORATING, BEAUTIFYING
AND
DRESSING
THE Hair!

IT IS A STIMULATING, OILY EXTRACT OF BARKS and Herbs. It will cure all diseases of the scalp and itching of the head, entirely eradicates dandruff, prevents the Hair from falling out, or from turning prematurely gray, causing it to grow thick and long. It is entirely different from all hair preparations, and may be relied on.

Put up in boxes containing two bottles—Price $1.

☞ Sold by all Druggists.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Agents,
Nos. 401 and 403 Battery street,
Corner of Clay, San Francisco.

AN INCIDENT OF THE MEXICAN WAR.

PRECIPITATE WRED "SEES THE ELEPHANT."

"PRECIPITATE, my son, the infernal Mexicans have crossed to our side of the Rio Grande and threaten to annihilate our brave troops. Now, I'll stay home and look after the old woman and the girls, and do you go right away and help to drive the rascals back. Remember, my boy, your grandfather served his country in the Revolution, and I kept up the game in the last war with the British: and if you are a son of mine——"

"Stop, stop, old gentleman! I am already mustered into service and under marching orders. Give me some tobacco and your blessiug, and take my love to the old lady and the girls. In half an hour I must report at the Barracks."

"God bless you, my boy — here's a whole plug! I'll go at once and fit you out with everything uecessary for your comfort during the campaign."

This hurried dialogue between the venerable Mr. Wred and his son Precipitate, occurred shortly after the reception of the intelligence at New Orleans, in the spring of '46, that Gen. Taylor and his little band of heroes had been cut off from Fort Brown by the Mexican General, Ampudia, with a force of seven thousand men. The people of that city were thrown into the wildest state of excitement, and the Governor's proclamation, calling for six regiments of volunteers, was almost immediately complied with by the patriotic citizens of all classes. Mechanics and merchants, lawyers and literary men, speculators and sportsmen, mingled with remarkable unanimity in the desire to wipe out the insult to our nationality of a foreign invasion.

Precipitate Wred, (or "Precip.," as he was familiarly called,) although youug in years, had about "finished" the lively Crescent City by a series of extraordinary explorations into the mysteries of Life in the Southwest, and was rapidly losing his appetite for a sublunary existence wheu the War Spirit dawned upon his horizou, and he hailed its crimsou glow as a godsend. Partaking freely of the prevailing mania, he followed a drum and fife around three or four blocks, until a procession of about a hundred men were collected, when they filed into a vacant hall, elected their captain and lieutenants, marched theuce to the Governor, and were duly received as volunteers.

Within a week the advance had landed at Point Isabel, just in time to hear the thuuder of Old Zach's artillery saluting the Stars and Stripes as they were hoisted in triumph over the Government Plaza of Matamoros. The Mexicans had been whipped and their army thoroughly routed in two eugagemeuts, three days before—"Palo Alto" and "Resacca de la Palma"—and already our victorious army had commenced the invasion of Mexico without a formal declaratiou of war by our Government.

The brave fellows who had volunteered so promptly were sadly disappointed on finding they were too late for the "fandango," and that under the militia laws then existing their term of service would expire in three months, which would preclude their sharing in the glorious campaign they had anticipated. Doomed to the dull routiue of camp life—daily drills and guard duty—in a hot, unhealthy climate, and coarser fare than they had been accustomed to, many resorted to rather questionable expedients, in a moral point of view, to while away the time; among which were huntiug "slow deer"—of course, taking the cattle of the euemy was prohibited—playing "draw poker," "old sledge," and "euchre;" and drinking bad whisky as an antidote to "the stings and arrows of outrageous" mosquitoes, centipedes and tarantulas. Consequently, when their three-months term expired, the greater portion of them had acquired a lively disgust for the "gay life" of a soldier.

Not so, however, with the ardent Precipitate Wred. On his return home his old chums were shocked at his metamorphosed appearance, and endeavored to convince him that he had beeu badly sold. They would indulge in ironical debates on his eligibility as a candidate for the Legislature, and as to whether he would be entitled, in the event of his death, to a military funeral and a monument, and such like provoking innuendos that worked up the Wred blood in his veins to something like desperation.

His old friend "Jack" D——u had just been commissioned a Captain of Dragoons, as a reward for some daring service he had rendered the Government, and was gathering about him some of the choice boys of the city for service on Scott's line, from Vera Cruz to the City of Mexico. It was a safe bet that if there was any fighting to be done, Captain "Jack" would take a hand in it, for he was kuown throughout the Southwest as one of the most daring adventurers of his day, and had fought more successful duels thau any man above ground. "Precip." enrolled himself in this company for "during the war," and thereby convinced his friends that he meant to "see the elephant—tusk, trunk and tail."

The elder Mr. Wred approved and applauded the resolution of his hopeful son, in whom he fancied there dwelt the germ of a regular adobe; and, in truth, his face did "give outward indications of an inward" brick. Originally a blonde, (in very early youth, however,) it had now assumed a color which might be termed the pink of perfectiou in manly beauty. A jolly red nose occupied a large portion of his face, and bushy red whiskers, moustaches and eyebrows took up the balance; under his hat he wore a huge shock of "solferino" hair, that, since his volunteer life had commenced, defied Macassar, and shot out to all points of the compass, presenting an almost impregnable barrier to brickbats and shilelghs.

Precipitate Wred soon found himself in Vera Cruz, and an occasion shortly after occurred to gratify his ambition to "see service." The Quartermaster of the Department had purchased a large drove of horses and mules from the natives, which were to be delivered at Alvarado, some twenty miles south of Vera Cruz, and a squad of twenty-five dragoons were detailed from the several companies stationed there, to go after them. The command of the detachment was entrusted to an old Indiana captain, and our friend "Precip." was "lanced" as a corporal for this occasion, and ordered to accompany the expedition.

A corporal-by-brevet is not a highly distinguished position, truly, but Mr. Wred assumed it with dignity and composure, regarding it as the first rouud in the ladder which led to the yellow sash of a General.

The whole detachment was composed of raw recruits, (it only required a few days service, however, to do them brown,) who had never faced the music of an enemy's fire, and the announcement that they would probably have a brush with the guerrillas before their return made them exceedingly suspicious of every puff of wind that rustled the branches of the chaparral.

A ride of a dozen miles along the beach brought the party to the mouth of a cañon or gap in the hill-side, through which they had to pass to reach their destination. This cañon had a forbidding look, for it was evident that here a very few men could stampede a drove of horses and make frightful havoc with their escort, with comparatively little danger to themselves, and the party would be compelled to return by this route with their cavalcade. The corporal-by-brevet was so impressed with the importance of his reflections, and feeling that some responsibility rested on his shoulders, ventured to ride to the front and communicate with the commanding officer, and suggested the propriety of leaving a portion of the command to hold the place. The captain gruffly informed Mr. Wred that his suggestion was a piece of impertinence, and threatened him, if he again meddled in matters beyond his legitimate jurisdiction, to reduce him to the ranks.

Precipitate felt the rebuke keenly. He had been educated to believe himself a sovereign citizen of the greatest nation on earth, and on an equality with any king, prince, potentate, or any other man. He restrained his indignation, however, and reflected that military discipline required every man to mind his own business, and determined to adopt the mode militaire, and get even on the first insolent private who would dare to have an opinion of his own.

A few hundred yards of travel through the cañon brought the party into a beautiful valley, down which they proceeded two or three miles when they met a swarthy son of the soil, mounted on a spirited mustang, who seemed impatient to communicate important information to the commanding officer. He proved to be a member of a guerrilla band, but in the secret service of Uncle Sam, who had stolen away from his comrades to expose their designs against our party. He stated that a band of 200 guerrillas had left Alvarado a few minutes before, by another route, to take possession of the cañon, and that it was their intention, so soon as the horses were delivered to the Yankees and receipted for, to stampede the cavalcade and murder the escort. A halt was ordered, and a council of war called, in which our friend Precipitate was blandly invited by the captain to lend the light of his countenance. "Precip." loosed the girths of his horse's saddle and turned him out to grass, took a fresh quid of tobacco, and boldly marched into the council. The captain, lieutenant, sergeant and corporal-by-brevet composed the junta, and the three latter were each in turn invited to suggest a plan of operations. The lieutenant advised to carry out the order and return with the horses, or die in the attempt. The sergeant proposed to enter and burn the town, and hang the authorities; and Mr. Wred was of the opinion that they could reach the cañon before the guerrillas and hold it against the odds, while messengers could be despatched to Vera Cruz for reinforcements. The captain did not like any of the proposed plans, and ordered the men immediately to mount and retrace their steps to Vera Cruz as quick as their horses would carry them—an order that was obeyed with the alacrity of veterans. In two minutes the command were mounted and moving off at a trot towards the cañon, and just as they ascended the sandy hill the guerrillas hove in sight, on the margin of the valley, about half a mile distant. The captain would have liked a fight above all things, perhaps; but he feared if he were captured he would be compelled to sign a receipt for the horses he was sent after, which would be a serious pecuniary loss to his venerable Uncle Samuel; and as but very little glory could possibly result from the affair, he put spurs to his horse and headed him for Vera Cruz in a gallop. The rest of the command were too devoted to the captain to remain without him, and they, too, pricked their horses into a lively gait. Precipitate, whose position was in the rear of the party, also made up his mind to abandon his favorite project of holding the cañon, and ventured to feel his horse with his sharp-pointed rowels, when, as bad-luck would have it, his saddle turned completely under the horse's belly, and landed the rider head-foremost in the soft sand. He had neglected to tighten his girths in the hurry of the order to retreat, and in consequence here he was, in about as disagreeable a predicament as an inexperienced trooper would desire to be placed. The reflection that the enemy were rapidly approaching, combined with the shock he received by diving into the sand, had the effect of reviving scenes of his early childhood, and he mentally ejaculated:

"Now I lay me down to sleep"—

But it suddenly occurring to him that he was not sleepy at all; that this prayer was not suitable to the occasion, and not being familiar with any other, he arose and betook himself to resaddling his horse as rapidly as the circumstances would allow. The task was most irksome, but he finally accomplished it, and remounted his horse with the determination to overtake his party if it lay in the power of horse-flesh. Turning to look in the direction of the Mexicans, he discovered them filing into the cañon not a hundred yards from him, and they simultaneously discovered him. With admirable forethought for a novice, he fired his pistol and immediately put spurs to his horse. Half a dozen escopeta balls whistled past his head; but the guerrillas came to a halt, evidently mistaking him for a picket-guard, and supposing the rest of his party ambuscaded in the chaparral. Their halt enabled him to get through the cañon to the beach with safety, and the tide being out afforded him a hard, sandy bottom for his horse-race.

Mr. Wred wasn't naturally of a poetic temperament, but the magnificent prospect which here disclosed itself aroused in him a feeling of gratitude and admiration. The setting sun poured out a flood of golden light upon the placid surface of the gulf, and shed a halo about the emerald tops of the compact chaparral which stretched along the shore as far as the eye could reach. A gentle breeze sprang up to cool his fevered brow, and revive his jaded horse, who also seemed to partake of the spirit of thankfulness that now inspired his rider. Far along the beach he descried his comrades, still progressing at the lively pace with which they left him.

The reader must not suppose that Precipitate had stopped to admire the beauties which surrounded him. He had reined in from a gallop to a trot, but he kept an eye on the mouth of the cañon, while he reloaded his pistol and capped his carbine preparatory to selling out at as high a price as possible. Presently the guerrillas emerged from the cañon, and, espying the body of dragoons in the distance, immediately gave chase.

Wred had gained some six hundred yards on them by their cautious delay, and inwardly determined to gain as much more in as short time as possible. He overtook his comrades in about half an hour. They had to make a detour of a quarter of a mile to ford a small stream, and had just returned to the beach when Wred came up to the mouth of the river.

Plunging in, he swam his horse to the opposite side of the stream and related his mishap to the captain, informing him that the guerrillas were pursuing him in force, though not visible owing to the gathering darkness. The captain decided there was nothing to gain and everything to lose by making a stand, and determined to continue on to Vera Cruz. But Wred's horse now gave unmistakable signs of breaking down, resulting from his recent cold bath and previous race, and the captain proposed that Precipitate should remain concealed in the house of a native a short distance ahead, while his horse would be left for him at a given place until opportunity offered for his escape. Arrived at the house, the captain told the proprietor that he intended leaving one of his men there till his return the next day, and if anything befell him, the lives and property of the household should pay the penalty. The frightened landlord made all sorts of pledges of good faith, and escorted "Precip." through the bar-room to a closet beneath a flight of stairs. The furniture of this apartment comprised a lot of greasy gunny sacks, a cheese-box, a lot of empty bottles, and a variety of rubbish "of no use to any one but the owner." The top and sides were gracefully festooned with pendant strings of jerked beef and dried fruits, intertwined with cobwebs of tropical spiders, filled with the carcases of defunct flies, victims of their rapacity; and an odor of decayed meat, old cheese, and vile aguardiente pervaded the place to an overpowering degree.

Wred entered this delectable spot, which he had reason to believe was to be his tomb, with the stoicism of a martyr, and rolling himself up in a blanket supplied him by the landlord, spread the gunny sacks negligently over himself, and, leaving the door ajar to ventilate the hole as much as possible, he patiently awaited the course of events.

His comrades had been gone scarcely ten minutes when the tramp of horses and clattering of sabres and loud "carrajos" of the natives gave token that the guerrillas had arrived. Peering through the door of his hiding-place, "Precip." ascertained that only the advance of the band had arrived there, and it soon became evident they had abandoned the pursuit, and intended quartering there for the night. They were a motley crowd, and although all were dressed in the garb of Mexicans, the most of this party were French, German, Irish and English sailors, who had probably deserted their ships and started in the sailor-hotel business before the war, and now deemed it a duty they owed their adopted country to defend it against the Yankees, on the guerrilla mode of warfare.

After demolishing a meal of jerked beef and tortillas thickly spread with Chile colorados, a party of them gathered round a table and engaged in a game of cards, while the others conversed in mixed languages about their failure to capture the cavalcade of horses and the Yankee dragoons. Their animosity to the Americans knew no bounds, and they indulged their hatred of the absent Yankees with expressions worthy of the occasion and the party. They smoked cigaritos, drank aguardiente, and finally fell to quarrelling with each other. As the excitement increased, "Precip.," anticipating a lively fight, could not resist the temptation to see it, and arose from his recumbent position. In doing so he clumsily overturned the cheese-box, bottles, and everything else about him, raising a clatter that for a moment arrested the attention of the whole party. The landlord's presence of mind, however, prevented an investigation by some allusion to his dog, and the "muss" went on as though nothing had happened. Soon the victim who had been accused of treachery, disengaged himself from the crowd and rushed frantically towards the door of the closet to seek a shelter from their fury, and would certainly have exposed its occupant, had not the proprietor seized the man by the collar just as he was in the act of pulling open the door, and dragging him to the back-door of the apartment, "let him out" with a kick in the nether extremities. The card party, who were officers of the band, now sprang up from the table, and, drawing their knives, cleared the room. After the crowd were turned out of the house the confusion gradually subsided, until it was evident that all the party were wrapt in slumber, save the four men at the card-table, and they were getting "blind drunk" as fast as aguardiente and the fumes of tobacco could accomplish it.

Precipitate now began to regard his situation as unbearable. He was worked up to such a state of frenzy that he would have wrenched the linch-pin out of the globe had he known then where to lay his hand upon it. He raised himself up in his hiding place and reconnoitred the premises—seanned the features of the party well, and calculated the chances of despatching them without alarming the remainder on the outside. Just then a big, sailor-looking Irishman entered, leaned his escopeta against the wall, and informed the party that it was just 3 o'clock and everything quiet, and complained of being tired and sleepy. He had been doing sentry duty, and, as daylight was near at hand, thought it unnecessary to put on another guard. The whole party then took a drink of aguardiente, and began to lay themselves out for a nap. The captain of the gang put a six-shooter and a knife in his sombrero, and placed them on the table; then rising to remove his serapé from his shoulders, he fell sprawling on the floor, and was too drunk to rise again. In a few moments the whole party were "sounding their bugles" in a maudlin stupor.

"Precip." now cautiously emerged from his hiding-place, appropriated the captain's sombrero, weapons, and serape to disguise himself with, and started for the door. The guerrillas lay around promiscuously, wrapped in their blankets. About fifty yards from the door two or three of them lay on the ground awake and talking to each other. Precip. feigned drunkenness, and staggered off in a different direction toward the chaparral. He heard the words "capitan" and "boracchio," and, as they did not rise, he felt assured they were deceived by his disguise.

Repairing to the spot where his horse had been left for him, he found it staked out in a grass plot and refreshed by a good night's rest. Tightening up the girths of his saddle, this time, and adjusting his weapons, he mounted his horse, boldly pushed for the beach, and headed for Vera Cruz, where he arrived in about an hour and a half, and related his adventures to his comrades.

At the "tattoo" roll-call that evening, the orderly sergeant called through the alphabetical list of members, and dwelt with marked emphasis on the name of—

"Wred—Precipitate!"

"Here I am, sir—safe and sound!"

"Mr. Wred," continued the O. S., "it is Capt. D——u's order that you wear the chevrons of a corporal from this date. To-morrow you will select your own squad of a dozen men to assist you in ferreting out the leaders of the band of guerrillas, and if you succeed I am authorized to promise you further promotion."

The boys joined their voices in three hearty cheers for the corporal, whose urbanity had made him a general favorite with his comrades.

Within ten days thereafter he was rated on the muster-roll as "Sergeant Precipitate Wred." . . . But I have encroached too much on your space this week to relate how he attained to that distinction. A. M. K.

A Perilous Position.—The Buffalo Courier, of the 9th ultimo, says: It has been known that Farini, the funambulist, who several years ago was Blondin's rival on the tight-rope at Niagara Falls, was making preparations to ford the rapids above the American Fall on a pair of iron stilts contrived for the purpose. The exhibition was to have come off on the 15th. Early yesterday morning, we learn, the foolhardy man went out to rehearse the dangerous feat. He succeeded in getting more than half across, at a point between the Falls and the Great Island bridge, when one of his stilts broke or gave way, and he was instantly in the rapids. Fortunately, the place of his accident was directly above Robinson's Island, a small piece of wooded land which lies to the right of Lunn Island, and very near the brink of the American Fall. He succeeded in struggling to the shore of this island, and dragged himself from the water. He had apparently sustained a painful injury in one of his limbs. The poor man was soon discovered sitting very composedly on a log at the edge of the island. A large and not very sympathizing crowd collected on the Goat Island bridge and elsewhere, but up to yesterday afternoon not an effort had been made to rescue the unfortunate man. In fact, our informant tells us that in a few hours public curiosity seemed to have sated itself, and scarcely any excitement was visible. Farini's frightful perch is about 800 or 1,000 feet below the bridge spoken of, and undoubtedly a rope could be floated to him, and thereby a cable perhaps be swung, by which, if the man be not too much exhausted or injured, he might be able to effect an escape. It is feared, however, that before anything is done he will be incapable, from lack of food and nervous excitement, to help himself. At present he can be distinctly descried, cool enough, apparently, but making not the slightest effort to attract attention or signal for relief. He is in his tights and bareheaded, and is seen frequently to rub and press his wounded limb. A more frightful predicament than that he is in could not easily be conceived. We understand that some persons suppose Farini to be playing a practical joke, or to be practicing an advertising dodge. It is scarcely possible that this can be the case, or that any such felicitous results can come from such a desperate-looking state of things. From the latest reports it appears that Farini was still a prisoner on Robinson's Island, about 2,000 feet above the American Falls, and where the rapids have a tremendous velocity. His partner had succeeded in effecting a line of refreshment communication with the forlorn stilt-walker, who had been in his uncomfortable position over forty hours. What steps are being taken to rescue him, if any, were not known. A large crowd was expected down from Buffalo and Rochester to see the sad spectacle. The condition of this poor fellow was really heartrending. He was within speaking distance of the shore, but the throngs who had assembled to witness his critical situation were powerless to help him.

THE WHITE WOLF.

(TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH OF PAUL FEVAL.)

Chapter II.—The Iron Coffer.

When Nicolas Tremi reached home, it was quite night. He threw the bridle to his servant without speaking, mounted the steps with a pre-occupied air, and sought the apartment of his grandson. Georges was sleeping. He was a pretty child, fair and rosy, and his light curls fell gracefully over his embroidered pillow. Apparently, a sweet dream visited him in his sleep, for his mouth was half-opened in a charming smile; and when a child smiles in his sleep the good people of Rennes say he is "laughing with the angels." This is a beautiful and poetic thought, but in Brittany all that is poetical and charming soons turns to melancholy; they regard this joy in sleep as a presage of death, and think that the child "laughs with the angels" because they are around his bed and ready to carry his soul to God.

Nicolas Tremi leaned over the couch of his grandson, and his bearded lip touched the satin cheek of the child, who still slept on. "Arthur of Brittany!" murmured the old nobleman, who could not forget the words of Jean Blanc. "If the last scion of my race should be sacrificed! . . . But, no; this man is an idiot—this Jean Blanc; and my cousin de Vaunoy does not at all resemble the Englishman, John Lackland!

He sat down near the bed, and was soon lost in deep thought.

M. de Tremlays had lost his only son two years before. This son, who was named Jacques, was the father of Georges, and had been a brave man. Nicolas Tremi had early inculcated in him his hatred for France and his love for Brittany, two sentiments which in his opinion affected the whole character. The death of Jacques was a cruel blow. He was not only his son but the heir to his belief. He felt himself growing old. Would there be time to instil into the breast of Georges this hatred and this love?

There lived somewhere in the province of Brittany a family, poor and of doubtful nobility, who claimed to be a branch of the house of Tremi, and added this name to their own. Before the death of his son Jacques, M. de la Tremlays had commenced an action against this family of Vaunoy to force them to desist from all pretension to the name of Tremi. The action was pending at the time of Jacques' death, and the Parliament of Rennes seemed about to decide against the family of Vaunoy. The death of his son appeared to change suddenly the designs of M. de la Tremlays. He stopped the action in the Parliament of Rennes and invited Hervé de Vaunoy, the eldest of the family to visit him, and Hervé knew better than to refuse the invitation.

He traversed the forest mounted on a sorry-looking horse, and as he passed through the woods of Bouexis, he took off his felt hat and respectfully saluted all these riches, while a smile of triumph played around the corners of his thin lips.

Hervé de Vaunoy was about forty years of age. He was a little, stout man with exuberant, reddish looks which surrounded a smiling face. His grey eyes almost disappeared under their long lashes, but what was seen of them was very pleasing, and accorded well with the fresh vermillion of his cheeks. One would say, on seeing him the first time, "There is an excellent little man!" The second time one would say nothing; and the third, one would think, "Perhaps that little man is not quite as good as he desires to appear!" He inspected the manor of Bouexis, and found it much to his liking—also the famous manufactories, etc., and during this inspection he smiled, and one would have said that the little man already saw himself as future proprietor and lord of all these fine possessions. But what delighted him the most was the Castle of Tremlays. "Great Heavens!" murmured he, "it will go hard but M. Nicolas Tremi, my cousin, will give me some little corner here, and when one has a footing and a good strong will, the devil will do the rest." He raised the heavy knocker of the door and changed his satisfied smile for a more humble and reserved expression.

M. de la Tremlays was seated in the large dining hall, while at his side a large, fine dog was indolently sleeping; little Georges, then four years old, was playing on his nurse's knee.

Hervé de Vaunoy was announced.

The old lord turned slowly toward the new-comer, while the dog gave a heavy growl.

"Peace, Job!" said M. de la Tremlays.

The dog lay down again without removing his eyes from the spot where Hervé stood with uncovered head, and respectfully bowing.

After two or three moments of silence, M. de la Tremlays appeared to take a sudden resolution and rose.

"Approach, my cousin," said he, with hurried courtesy; "you are welcome to the castle of our common ancestors."

Hervé could scarcely restrain an exclamation of joy on seeing his relation, whom he supposed to be so unfavorably disposed, so soon and easily reconciled.

The interview was short and decisive.

"I hope, M. de Vaunoy, that you are a true Breton?"

"Yes, by Heaven! my cousin—a true Breton," replied Hervé; "determined to give his life for the good of the dukedom—his life and his blood, M. de la Tremlays! his flesh and his bones! detesting France! abhorring France! my worthy relative."

"Well said!" cried Nicolas Tremi, delighted; "give me your hand, Vaunoy, my friend. We will understand each other wonderfully well, and in case of misfortune, my little grandson Georges will have a father."

Hervé was installed, that same evening, in the Castle of Tremlays, and from that time did not leave it. Georges was especially confided to his care, and we must remember that on all occasions he affected an extraordinary tenderness for the child.

Matters remained thus for eighteen months. M. de la Tremlays took Hervé into his confidence. He looked upon him as an excellent, loyal relation. The subordinates of the castle took their tone from their master, and Vaunoy had the esteem of every one. There were but two individuals with whom he had no favor. The first and most important was Job, the favorite dog of Nicolas Tremi; the second was Jean Blanc, the albino. Vannoy did his best to conciliate the dog, but could not succeed. Job, good Breton that he was, was obstinate and headstrong. M. de la Tremlays often reflected upon the aversion manifested by the dog for M. de Vaunoy, for he thought Job a very discriminating dog, and possessed of good sense and judgment.

But Vaunoy was so good, so humble, so useful and devoted—and then he hated France so cordially. As to Jean Blanc, his hatred was less to be dreaded. He occupied in the social circle a much humbler scale than Job. He was by trade a maker of barrel hoops; he passed for an idiot, and could not have maintained his old father without the charitable help of M. de la Tremlays. He was received into the kitchens of the castle, because Breton hospitality was open to all; but still it was with difficulty he could gain a place by the fire, and he was obliged to execute many of his capers in order to gain the good will of the distributor of provisions. "Keep back, White Rabbit!" would say this chief of the valets of Tremi "Are you not ashamed, you miserable outcast, to ask charity of a Christian?"

Jean, according to the humor he was in, would burst out into a laugh, or sometimes lower his eyes, full of tears. Sometimes a flash of reason would seem to visit his brain; then the inflamed border of his eyelids would turn livid, while a scarlet spot would appear on each cheek. It lasted but an instant.

NOTES OF MINES AND MINERALOGY.

The most remarkable slate quarries in the world are found in England. Some idea of the extent of these workings can be formed from the fact that in two quarries alone 6,000 men are employed, and that the slate trade has outrun all possibility of supply—orders being 18 months ahead of time, and the price of slate doubled in the last two years.

Of all the slate districts the Carnarvon is probably the richest, from the extent of the formation, the beauty of the colors the finess of the texture, and the durability of the produce.

There is no uniform color, the slates being blue, red, purple and all the intermediate shades of these colors.

The quarry of Col. Pennant last year yielded a net profit of £250,000 and gave employment to 3,500 men—that of Lord Palmerston £40,000 with 400 men at work.

—

The supply of black-lead, or plumbago, used in the arts for the manufacture of lead pencils and crucibles, came largely, if not exclusively from the celebrated mine of Borrowdale, in Cumberland, England. The pure ores, which alone, were of any value in the arts, and which in this mine were the purest known, have been exhausted, and the mine is no longer worked. Unsuccessful attempts have been repeatedly made to produce it artificially, being a carburet of iron whose composition is simple, and supposed to be capable of easy imitation. These all failed, and resort is now had to a mechanical preparation of the impure ores found abundantly in many places, whereby an article of absolute purity is obtained for commerce, in any quantity required. The ores are placed in a furnace of simple construction and subjected to a moderate red heat for a few hours. By this treatment the iron is converted into a magnetic carburet of iron, and by the use of the ordinary or electro-magnet, this carburet is taken up, and removed from the mass, chemically and mechanically pure—the deleterious substances remaining behind in the mass.

—

A furnace for roasting ores was recently exhibited and explained at the Franklin Institute, Philadelphia, which possesses one point of considerable merit and novelty. The ore is contained in a central chamber, across which the products of combustion are caused to pass regularly in one direction. By a device for discharging the ore the rate of descent can be regulated at pleasure, so that each particle of ore can be submitted to the action of the fire for any length of time desired. By the constant and regular course given to the draught across the chamber, the sulphurous and other pernicious vapors are taken direct to the chimney, and the ore undergoing roasting is thereby freed from contact by these vapors.

—

Many disastrous accidents have come from the use of the iron rod used in tamping the blast-holes in mining. Heavy oak bars have been tried, but were found to be too light to be effective, and a substitute has been suggested by fixing a copper head to the iron rod, thus combining the weight and strength of iron with the softness and malleability of the copper. This may seem a small matter, but those who incur the danger and know the effects of a dreadful and premature explosion will readily recognize its merit.

MATERNITY.

HEIGH HO! daisies and buttercups,
Fair ye low daffodils, stately and tall,
When the wind wakes how they rock in the grasses,
And dance with the cuckoo-buds, slender and small:
Here's two bonny boys, and here's mother's own lasses,
Eager to gather them all.

Heigh ho! daisies and buttercups:
Mother shall thread them a daisy chain;
Sing them a song of the pretty hedge-sparrow,
That loved her brown little ones, loved them full fain;
Sing, "Heart thou art wide though the house be but narrow"—
Sing once, and sing it again.

Heigh ho! daisies and buttercups,
Sweet wagging cowslips, they bend and they bow;
A ship sails afar over warm ocean waters,
And haply one musing doth stand on her prow.
O bonny brown sons, and O sweet little daughters,
Maybe he thinks on you now!

Heigh ho! daisies and buttercups,
Fair yellow daffodils, stately and tall;
A sunshiny world full of laughter and leisure,
And fresh hearts unconscious of sorrow and thrall,
Send down on their pleasure smiles passing its measure—
God that is over us all.—Jean Ingelow.

DOWN-STREAM.

IT is late autumn, and all London is out of town save myself. I am detained in that hateful brick-kiln, while my friends and acquaintances are upon the breezy moors, or climbing snowy mountain-tops, or lying listless by the calm cool seas. I shall have no autumn holiday this year; nothing remains for me but iced beverages and the memory of vanished pleasure-trips. Let me recall one of these latter, and set it down; for while I do so a panorama of exquisite landscape pictures passes through my brain, and, for the time, obscures the desolate, dusty road, the white and blinding street. My mind, thank Heaven, is stored with many such recollections. Which of them shall I summon up to comfort me? Already I feel myself a willing captive, taken in a net of sunny thoughts. I draw at random from the rainbow skein.

It is a record of last spring-time, a gossamer-memory, with the dew and sun-ray on it still.

In the early summer, not when "the spring is setting in with its usual severity," but a little later, when the streets are filled with light, white-awning carts, full of blooming flowers, and when women, bearing baskets of charming posies, make sweet the London air: then it is, even more than in the autumn, that one longs to flee from bricks and mortar into the country. Moreover, (which is surely a charm,) one should not do it. Business demands one's presence in the metropolis; there is no legitimate vacation at that period for people of our quality. Hence it is the very time for a holiday. Nor can we properly enjoy it alone. I don't say that one should take one's wife and family; far from it; they will go to the sea-side, doubtless, in due time; but the epoch of which we speak is essentially masculine and, (if I may say so,) bachelory. It is necessary to take three friends—all of whom are also doing wrong in leaving their business at such a season—for, notwithstanding the lavish promises of the barometer, it may be wet: and the country under rain, and without the raw material of a rubber at whist, is well known to be unbearable. Also, these friends must be judiciously chosen. A morose man, a stingy man, a fool, or one incapable of laughter, would shipwreck the whole clandestine scheme. Many a man who is a very decent companion at the club in Pall Mall, would be hateful in a village inn. Finally, let everybody have to be back in town again by a certain day and hour, upon business of the most serious importance, and let nobody get back when he intended, and let that business be postponed. A certain recklessness of consequences is indispensable.

Upon the occasion I have in my mind, we were four chosen souls. Each, if not at the very summit of his profession, deserved to be there, and may be designated as if he was. There was the Merchant Prince, a man truly gorgeous in his ideas, and magnificent in the execution of them; there was the Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer, who audited our accounts, and exhorted us to stand upon our rights whenever men oppressed us; there was Professor Beeswing, of the Entomological Society, with the most varied information, perhaps, that ever existed in a single human store-house; and there was the Deathless Author, a gentleman whose powers of fiction are by no means confined to the construction of books. It was this last individual who had organized the expedition and settled its destination—Willow Bridge, beautifully situate upon the river Thames, and not a thousand miles from Marlow. "We will fish for gudgeon—creatures that you catch in myriads as you sit in an arm-chair in your punt. Then we will drop down to Cliefden Spring, and stroll in those glorious woods. I know every inch of the river. It will be divine."

Something like this he said to all, but exhibiting some especial bait to each. To the M. P. he spoke of the cookery of river-fish, which he portrayed as unique and perfect; to the L. C. B. he held out a solemn promise that we should be warned off a certain island, which the public had nevertheless an indefeasible right to land upon and occupy; while to the Professor he painted a particular species of butterfly to be found in the vicinity of Marlow only, in the lively colors of his own imagination. Thus it was that he seduced the party to Willow Bridge, where they put up at the Swan-on-Horseback, a "famous inn." In an hour or so we had left London behind us at an infinite distance, with all its wicked works. It was a holiday in itself to mark the landlord "seeing what he could do" in the way of sleeping apartments and a private sitting-room; to hear the landlady express her opinion that "it might be done"; to behold the waiter, unconcerned in these arrangements, taking the air at the front door and shading his eyes from the fiery sun with a napkin; to watch the people leaning over the bridge, with their heads close together, and chewing straws or pieces of stick, which presently they dropped into the fleeting stream and set to work anew. Nobody was in a Cheapside hurry; nobody was possessed by the devil of Competition to toot for custom. When the Deathless Author led us down to the river-side, and bade us choose our fishing-punt, we were not torn to pieces by the skinny fingers of opposition Ancient Mariners.

"Did you want to go on the water, gentlemen?" inquired a comfortable boatman, lazily removing his pipe from his mouth with one hand, and scratching his head with the other.

"Certainly, my good man," replied the D. A. cheerfully; "we are come to fish for gudgeon. Big punt—arm chairs—lots of luncheon—worms and ground-bait—floats and rods. Come, look alive!"

But the mariner only shook his head.

"There ain't no ground-fishing yet awhile, bless ye. You may get a trout mayhap; but it's like to be a long business. How many days are you going to stay?"

"Oh, this is so like the Deathless Author," cried the Merchant Prince with a scornful smile. "I wonder there's a river here, for my part."

"My dear sir—my very dear sir," cried the D. A., "there must be some frightful mistake. Now leave this man to me. Do you really mean to say that we can't go gudgeon-fishing?"

"Why, in course you can't. It's a fenced month."

"A what? a what?" exclaimed the L. C. B., speaking very fast. "That's a very nice question; I should be inclined to dispute the fact. Now, here is my name and address, my worthy man. O yes, we'll try this question. What do you say, Beeswing?"

"Hush! be quiet; don't move—don't stir," returned the Professor earnestly. "You've got the most splendid specimen of the stinging dragon-fly on the nape of your neck. Only wait till I get my net."

"The river is charming," remarked the Deathless Author, with galvanic enthusiasm—"perfectly charming. It would have been almost too hot for fishing; let us row to Cliefden Spring. It is the most beautiful stream scenery in the world, and the duchess permits everybody to enjoy it. I am quite sure that will please you. Yes, let us row up there. You call it 'up' to Cliefden, don't you, my man?"

"Well, sir, it's down-stream, anyway," replied the mariner, regarding the D. A. as if he were a little better than a born idiot.

"And this is the man who has brought us to Willow Bridge, under pretence of knowing the country!" ejaculated the M. P. "He pretends to have been born in the district. He assured me only last night that the Swan-on-horseback made up a hundred beds."

"Never mind," said the Professor good-naturedly; "let us forgive him. There are beds enough, and the genus Cimicidæ is doubtless unknown to them."

"I am appeased," quoth the Merchant Prince sententiously. "Let us take the boat, and be off." And there being no gilded barge in waiting, manned with slaves in crimson, pulling silver oars, or other vessel suitable to his quality, we stepped into a painted pleasure-boat, and set off for Cliefden Springs.

I do not describe that voyage, since the same water was afterwards rowed over by the same goodly company; enough to say that it was charming as a siren's song; the Lord Chief Baron's brow grew smoother with every dip of the oar; Professor Beeswing sat with half-closed eyes watching the insect creatures skimming the stream, like a happy cat dreaming of entrées of fish and mice. The Merchant Prince was pleased to acknowledge the attention that was shown him by the setting sun, and to express his satisfaction with the general arrangements of nature for his reception on the river. The Deathless Author kept a divine silence, partly because he wished the scene to sink into the souls of his companions, whose indignation still might smoulder, and partly because speech was frozen within him, with the apprehension of that very misfortune which subsequently occurred.

When they came in sight of Cliefden's hanging woods, a murmur of admiration broke from two of those who had not seen that leafy paradise before. "We forgive you—we thank you—we applaud you," exclaimed they with a single voice, and grateful looks towards him who had organized the expedition. "How charming it will be to plunge into the green coolness of those woods!"

The Merchant Prince, without lifting himself down to vulgar jubilation, regarded the white palace glinting from the full-foliaged hill above us, as though he would like to buy it.

"Can one go up to the house, and see the place?" inquired he of one of the boatmen.

"No, sir, nor hood at all, if the duchess is at Cliefden."

"What!" cried the three strangers, turning like one man—and not a good-tempered one either—upon the Deathless Author. "Can this be true?"

The unhappy fictionist smiled in a ghastly manner, and gave them to understand that the boatman was a well-meaning dullard, whom it would be idle to cross-examine. "And besides," said he, "the duchess is sure not to be there."

"I don't like that," observed the M. P. sharply, who, though so wealthy, was not deficient in intelligence.

The Lord Chief Baron cast a withering glance upon the deceiver, as upon some prevaricating witness, whom he should like to turn inside out by cunning questions.

The Professor regarded him with that calm contempt which he bestows upon mayflies, and the less common Neuroptera, of of which he has already specimens in his collection.

The Deathless Author offered not a syllable in defence. He already perceived an official person of forbidding exterior standing at the head of the landing stairs. He knew what he was put there to say.

"Nobody can come ashore to-day, gentlemen; the duchess is at Cliefden."

"I suppose it is her private property," observed the L. C. B. reflectively; "one couldn't prove right of way."

At this audacious observation the ancestral retainer glared at us as at a ship-load of blasphemers and river pirates, and waved us off with a majestic motion of the hand.

The boatmen grinned in their sleeves, or would have done so if they had not been bare-armed, and turned the head of our little craft towards Willow Bridge.

In half an hour or so—such is the blessed influence of stream-scenery—all disappointment had faded from the memory, and even confidence in the Deathless Author was almost restored.

Of our stay at that admirable river-inn I shall say nothing. The chief charm of life in such a place is that nothing happens worthy of being recorded. To eat, to drink, to sleep, to saunter on the sloping lawn, and smoke the dream-compelling weed; to lie at length within the rocking skiff, and hear the whisper of the river-nymphs, and feel their cool breath through the tender plank; to bask beneath the willow, lulled to sleep by the thunder of the roaring weir—these things, distinct enough in the clear depths of Memory, have not a substance that the pen can picture. Man, being made for action and material matters, tires in time of all such pleasant shadows. There was a bridegroom staying at Willow Bridge, who, it was plain, for his part, had had more than enough of them. How he did gape, and yawn, and sigh for very weariness! The obsequious manner in which he strove to make himself agreeable to us, and thereby win conversation and relief from inexpressible tedium vitæ was touching to behold.

But four is company, and five is none, so we cast the poor wretch from us. We froze him with our icy speech as he strove to climb into our pleasure-gallery out of the ocean of ennui; we jested among each other at his drowning agonies, and threw champagne bottles, as it were, at his head as he went down. We chopped his fingers, figuratively speaking, with sharp epigrams, and so made him loose his hold. He must have looked upon us like a second crew of the Flowery Land.

The L. C. B., who is a determined bachelor, remorselessly bade him cleave to his lawful wife. Indeed, we had no sort of pity for him. We had not been shut up for three weeks at Willow Bridge with a feeble young female, who objected to smoking. We did not hear a still small voice—but getting perceptibly louder—crying: "Charles, love, the tea has been brought up! THE TEA IS READY, CHARLES, DEAREST! THE TEA IS GETTING COLD, CHARLES!"

At which last sentence, or ultimatum, Charles surrendered at discretion, and went in wearily through the French window. No, for our part, we welcomed such lotus-eating (which included two courses of excellent fresh-water fish) very gladly, and were truly grieved when the time came for us to part. When it became absolutely essential that the M. P. should preside at the meeting of the Golconda Mine Company; then it was a sine qua non that the L. C. B. should state his views upon a matter of trespass before a high legal tribunal; when the Professor must needs read his exhaustive paper upon the emanation of the Silphidæ before the Society for the Encouragement of Insect Knowledge; when the Deathless Author, whose word was his bond—and quite equal in pecuniary value—and solemnly promised to personally superintend the production of one of his own volumes in Paternoster Row; it was on that very morning. I say, when Duty, with her customary scowl, was bidding us resume hateful Toil within city walls, and leave the rare spring sunshine, and the gleaming river, and the emerald fields, that the Merchant Prince astonished the company, as the fatal railway omnibus drove to the door, by observing with audacious calmness: "I have a great idea, my friends; we won't go by the train at all."

"Our luggage is packed," sighed the Professor, pointing mournfully to his large tin butterfly case and little carpet-bag awaiting removal in the passage.

"Let the luggage go, then," returned the M. P. authoritatively. "But as for us, let us drop down the river to London."

So immeasurably distant did Willow Bridge, and especially its winding river, appear to us to be from the great Babylon, that this suggestion struck us all aghast.

"Drop down the river!" repeated the L. C. B. doubtfully, and as though he saw several flaws in the proposition already. "Down to Windsor, you mean."

"Down to London Bridge!" quoth the M. P., resolutely. "Land short of that—say at Blackfriars—and the whole scheme would be a failure."

The Deathless Author already perceived himself in a strange skiff, amid the whirling eddies of Westminster, rocked by express steamers, and coming to grief against the piers of bridges. His countenance was unmistakably negative.

The Professor murmured that it was impossible to observe the Phryganeæ beyond Hammersmith.

"Very good," observed the Merchant Prince, with the air of a man who has given up a point to oblige his fellow-creatures. "Let us say Hamptou Court. We shall then have only fifty miles or so to row."

"Row!" exclaimed the L. C. B. "I would not row ten miles for"——

"My friends," interrupted the Merchant Prince majestically "the matter is in my hands. When I say 'we shall row,' I mean it in the same sense as 'we shall sail.' No physical exertion will be necessary. I engage a crew of two. We take turns in the arduous duties of steering. I invite you to dine with me at Hamptou Court."

In half an hour, we were dropping down the river, in the good skiff Cygnet, between the level meadows down to Camelot—no, to Cookham. The boat was green and gold, the cushions a brilliant scarlet, and the even dip of the four oars had a silver sound. All else was silent, save for the hiss of the angry swan, as we came too near her throne among the osiers, or infringed upon her royal progress through the river; and save for the monotone of the cuckoo in the far distant woods. Only, ever and anon, our stroke would rest upon his oars, and raise his voice in a wild melody of 'Lok, Lok, Lok,' and the lockman would come forth from his cottage, and open wide the barriers of the flood, and shut us in. Then slowly sank the boat, and the water with it, till the trim bright garden sloping gently to the brink could be seen no more, and the black gates loomed larger and larger momently, and the dark sides of our water prison deepened. Then, upon ransom being counted out, sometimes into a little cup at the end of a pole, with which, for convenience of payment, our warder favored us—as a child feeds Bruins in a bear-pit—he let the sunlight once more in upon us, and set us on the broad and shining river-road. I am afraid to say how many of these aquatic turnpikes we passed through, but we never tired of them, though each was as like to each as are sweet-peas. We concocted of them a sensation novel for the Deathless Author, entitled the Lock-keeper's Daughter, of which, since he was not grateful for it, I am almost induced to publish the plot. Suffice it to say, however, that our heroine fled from her amphibious home in an evil hour, and returned only to perish there by her own act: when her father opened the gates to the first-comer in the summer morning, her golden hair was mingled with the weeds that clung to them; and ever afterwards there was a ghastly cry of "Lok, Lok, Lok" oft heard at night. If the plot of the Lock story should be too involved, suggested the L. C. B., (whose nature is cynical,) Chubb of which there was plenty in the neighborhood, would doubtless supply it with a Key.

We composed the most thrilling part of this original narrative in the various boat-houses into which we were driven by the passing spring showers; and a general curdling of the blood, known to novel-readers as "creepiness" (a little assisted, perhaps, by the change of temperature,) was inwardly experienced on such occasions. The steering into these havens of refuge was by no means an easy matter; the entrances were always narrow, though they afforded a wide field for discussion as to how they should be approached; and often-times the passengers of the Cygnet found themselves, along with their unskilful coxswain, exposed to the whole fury of the elements, while the rowers, in the more favored half of the boat, were under cover. Everybody thinks that he can poke a fire and steer a boat. I dare not record how many times we grounded on the golden shallows under the haughty guidance of the Merchant Prince; how often we stuck upon sand-banks, over which the L. C. B. insisted upon trying his favorite question of right of way; how often the spectacled Professor, bent on dragon flies, took us slap into the osiers. Once the Deathless Author, (besides minor errors,) seeking to win renown by taking the boat through a narrow arch without unshipping, came full butt against the buttress, and nearly brought both voyage and voyagers to their end. There were lively discussions upon our individual merits as navigators, ingenious theories as to why swans tip themselves topsy turvy, and remain with the other end of them (if I may say so) growing perpendicularly out of the water like a white cabbage; and learned explanations from the Professor of the phenomenon of the legs of the cattle upon the bank being only reflected in the stream half-way, and of what became of the other half.

The cattle, whether they so stood in the cool meadow grass, or descended to the cooler wave, were always a charming sight, as likewise were the swans, whichever end was uppermost. From stately Windsor, crowned with its royal abode, down to the smallest hamlet, every dwelling-place of man looked bright and beauteous. A hundred gray church towers greeted us through stately trees; a thousand villages smiled upon us from their flowery gardens.

"Nice," said the Merchant Prince, with semi-approval "from June to August; from August to June, nice also doubtless, for frogs, toads, newts, and water-rats.

But the M. P. had been put out of bliss by some cow-beef of which we had imprudently partaken at a river-inn; we are also made a little despondent by certain memoranda in a literary work—The Oarsman's Companion, I think it was called—found in the pocket of our stroke. Nobody, it is said, should ever step into a pleasure-boat without knowing how to behave towards the apparently drowned.

Avoid all rough usage, was the first canon.

"Why, what a set of ruffians aquatic folks must be," exclaimed the M. P., "to need such an admonition! Would these boatmen proceed to kick us, if we fell overboard?"

Never hold the body up by the feet!

"Did you ever hear of anything so barbarous!"

Nor roll the body on casks!

"Really, this is too horrible! Casks!"

Nor rub the body with salt or spirits!

"These men must be cannibals, my friends."

Nor inject tobacco-smoke or its infusion into the nostrils.

"I don't like this," quoth the Merchant Prince, closing the horrid little volume, and wiping his brow with his pocket-handkerchief; "let us go out and take a walk."

"Ay, let us walk," cried the L. C. B., who is a member of the Alpine Club; "'we have had enough of sitting and steering, we.'"

"We have had more than enough of your steering," replied the Deathless Author viciously; "but let me beg that there may be no pedestrianism. Walking means no pleasant talking, no leisure, no merry laughter; it just means perspiration, dust; and the malignant joy of seeing others more tired than ourselves."

But the words of the wise were disregarded. It was finally arranged that the boat should go on to Hampton in advance of us, while we disembarked, and made our way thither by the duty roads. Those whom the gods wish to ruin, they first cause to take to take to pedestrianism. Before he left the galley, however, the M. P. had a lucid interval. "Let us write down," said he, "our orders for dinner, so that our boatmen may leave them with the landlord, and we may find the banquet prepared on our arrival. Which is the best inn?"

"The Toy, the Toy," returned the Deathless Author gloomily, averse to leave the silvery stream, the frequent splash of happy bathers, the scarlet cushions, and the motion without toil.

"To the landlord of 'the Toy,' then, greeting: Whitebait indispensable," quoth the Merchant Prince, holding a turquoise pencil in his jewelled fingers; "asparagus unlimited; Moselle-cup iced. Let us leave the rest of the repast to his own genius!"

I forbear to speak of that walk to Hampton along the hot white roads; after the first ten minutes all sank into the usual sulky silence. The L. C. B. alone, knowing what his legs could do, smiled grimly. All of a sudden, as we drew near our bourne, after hours of painful exertion, we beheld vast crowds of people coming forth to meet us.

The Deathless Author, well convinced that all would be laid to him in the way of misadventure, hung back a little, and addressed his silent friends, all walking for their lives."

"Look here," said he; "you'll say it's me, of course; but I never advised your coming to dine at Hampton Court on a Whit-Monday."

At these hideous words, the three stopped suddenly, and gazed reproachfully at the speaker.

"So like him," said the M. P., pointing with a scornful finger—"so very like him!"

"There will be nothing to eat at all," groaned the L. C. B.

"Little or nothing," sighed the Professor, looking into his case of entomological specimens as into a larder.

We trudged on in dust and gloom. There were forty thousand persons under the chestnuts in Bushy Park. There would be a good many more in the inns. Still, man is prone to hope. We inquired at the first house we came to, which was the way to "the Toy."

"'The Toy,'" was the reply, "does not exist; "it has been turned these three years into a row of private houses."

All groaned.

"So very, very like him," quoth the Merchant Prince, with majestic pity. "Here is a fly—jump in. To the 'Star and Garter,' Richmond."

"But the boatmen?" murmured the L. C. B; "we are clearly liable."

"They have my name and address," responded the M. P. loftily. "I am as fixed to go to Richmond as was ever Gen. Grant."

So, in the glorious eventide, it happened that, sitting after a royal banquet over goodly wine, we once more saw the winding river which had borne us so far upon its quiet bosom, smelt once more the cool, soft river-airs, made odorous on their way by lilac flower and chestnut bloom, and all the sweetness of the land in spring. Then, pledging each the other, did we vow we never should forget that glorious holiday, but, marked with white in our life's kalends, would keep it sweet and fair within our memory for evermore.

THREE ASIATIC SKETCHES.

A TARTAR BEAUTY.

We saw here a native girl, whose appearance struck us with admiration and astonishment. She was from 16 to 18 years old, and was exceedingly beautiful. As we entered the house, she was standing in the shade of rather a dark room, which was only lighted by the open door, and we only got to see her in a more favorable light as she passed out of the door and across the yard, to an outbuilding on the opposite side of the enclosure. We were endeavoring to procure fresh caviar, but failed to make the man understand. When the girl returned into the house, she seemed at once to comprehend the word "rebah"—Russian for fish. She led us across the open space in front of the house to the storehouse, or magazine. Her arms were bare to the shoulders, and beautifully formed, and she wore only a very light single chemise or kalat, tucked up on one side under a girdle, which gave her limbs free motion; her head thrown back, with a light, elastic step that would grace Diana, she hastened towards the storeroom. When in the room she stood with one hand clasping a beam overhead, and occasionally showed a pearly set of teeth, in trying to make us understand the names and uses of the various articles stored within.

These were dried fish, caviar, sturgeons' entrails, dried herbs, meat, skins of various kinds, seeds and grain, with an indescribable medley of half-savage, half-Tartar gear, with implements of the chase, nets and fishing spears, mixed in great confusion. But we were now less interested concerning the caviar, and more than interested in our Goldee belle, who was indeed a jewel for which barbaric princes would have given thousands, or have shared a throne to possess, and which made the civilized wanderer from far-distant lands wish that she could have been transplanted to a more genial soil, where cultivation and art could have developed, perhaps, a mind more than equal to the charms and graces of her person. Our memories will often go back to that wild green shore, where dwells the Tartar maiden on the banks of the Sakhah-lin.

JAPANESE WRESTLERS.

A company of wrestlers were exhibiting in a square kind of rough enclosure back of the town; the sides were enclosed with boards and cloth, and the top with bushes and cloth; a range of boxes ran around the sides raised a few feet from the ground, which were occupied by the aristocracy, while the people were squatted on the ground around a platform of earth raised some three feet from the ground in the centre. The wrestlers entered from the rear and ranged themselves by nines on opposite sides of the platform or ring, in a sitting posture; they were naked except a girdle about the loins; they awaited the master of ceremonies, who now ascended the platform and announced in a loud singing tone and with many flourishes of his elegant fan the order of performance and the manner of the entertainment; he then descended, making his bow to the audience; soon another attendant, who appeared to be the property-man of the establishment, came upon the ring, and in a loud voice, with a peculiar flourish of his fan, announced the names of the wrestlers by pairs, who immediately, one from each side, stepped upon the arena; the last attendant remained to direct the exercises and regulate the contest. The wrestlers walked back and forth, took a sup of water from a small wooden vessel, squatted upon their haunches, smoothed the sand upon the arena with their hands, rubbed their bodies and armpits with the sanded hand, scattered pinches of salt or some other charm from a little bag hanging to the corner post of the arena, faced one another half squatting, half standing, and at the word agreed upon between themselves or given by the master, sprang like tigers at each other's throats, with the guttural growling of bears. Now they tug and strain, bending every muscle to the combat, first at arms' length, then at under hold, again at back and side hold—they are all well matched, and are blowing and puffing, and reeking with perspiration. The attendant arrests them as they stand, unlocking their muscular and brawny arms from close embrace to give them a few minutes respite—they take a sup of water, spit it out, stretch their limbs, squat upon their hocks, spread the sand with their hands, wipe their faces with sheets of paper handkerchiefs hanging to the corner posts of the arena, throw the soiled paper upon the ground, spit, blow the nose, and wipe their faces again with paper. The attendant now places them exactly in the position they held at first, and the combat is renewed with fierce and excited zeal; a feint, a forward bend of the body, one knee upon the sand, head thrust against the chest, and the victim is flying over the head of the victor, and in an instant his brawny body is rolling upon the sand or hurled from the arena, amid an approving murmur from the audience; the attendant elevates his fan, the victor bows with his hands on his knees and leaves the ring.

This is repeated not only by the nine pair, but by a second nine pair, who make their appearance after a short interval and who go through quite a similar performance. During the play a variety of refreshments were hawked round within the "Smo," as it is called by the Japanese; tea and fruits were served in private boxes, and families partook of their meals during the performance. Our party had tea served with some rice cakes and fruit; and all smoked who chose. Two-sworded soldiers served as policemen during the entertainment, which was conducted with decorum. Children played, laughed, and occasionally imitated the wrestlers; old people smoked, drank their tea and gossiped, while black-eyed, betel-chewing, red-lipped girls looked a little curious out of the corners of their eyes.

FIRST WHITE WOMAN IN HAKODADI.

While we lay at Hakodadi the bark Messenger Bird came into the bay and anchored. The captain's wife was on board with her two children, one a fat little cherub, a baby of only a few months old, born on the passage since leaving the Sandwich Islands.

I shall never forget the day on which the first American woman and her baby appeared on the streets of Hakodadi.

The population, men, women and children, priests, soldiers, barbers, merchants, all seem to have deserted with one accord their various callings to gaze upon Mrs. Homer and her infant. The baby excited the most intense curiosity among the women and children; with gaping mouths, outstretched necks and piercing eyes they followed it through the streets; every turn, every movement, was watched; police officers would occasionally drive them off, but it was only to give place to more eager faces; at the turn of every street troops would dash off and seek to get a better view by appearing through other streets to intercept her at the next corner. As we turned the corner of the street leading to the temple, on one side of which the foreign bazaar was held, the crowd, men, women and children, made a rush for the inner court to gain the temple. There was a perfect stampede; the clattering of wooden-shod feet over the rocky pavement with the hum of a thousand voices filled the air; they piled upon the steps, rushed pell-mell into the temple and crowded the court, hoping to get a better view. In this they were doomed to disappointment, except a favored few who reached a back balcony, from whence they had a full view of the lady and baby as they sat within the bazaar.

Upon her return the streets were again filled with curious people following her to the gate of the custom-house which led to the boat, in which she reached the ship, eyed as she passed through a labyrinth of junks by the curious Japanese sailors, who beheld for the first time a white woman.—Overland Explorations, by P. McD. Collins.

NEW RAILWAY SIGNALS.

Mr. Justice Punch has now much pleasure in submitting to the public a set of entirely New Rules and Regulations which are drawn up for the future guidance of the officials connected with the New Railway Line, which, when opened, will be entitled, "The N. S. E. W. Colwell Hatchney Railway":

I. GENERAL SIGNALS.

Blowing a Whistle.
Blowing a Nose.
Playing the Trombone.
Waving your Hand gracefully.
Waving an Objection politely.
Stirring the Fire with the Sugar-tongs.
Imitating Herr Von Joel on a Walking Stick.
Winding up a Watch (Anybody's) the wrong way.
(With Power to Add to their Number.)

As these general signals have no arbitrary signification, they may mean anything, everything, or something, which it will be the duty of the stoker, the engine-driver, the signal man, the butcher, the baker, and the candlestick-maker, sitting in Committee on the top of a first-class compartment, in an express train, to decide upon, and see carried out, even if accompanied with personal violence.

2. The persons employed on the Line shall be a tinker, tailor, soldier, sailor, ploughboy, apothecary, thief. This will ensure due attention being paid to all classes of Her Majesty's subjects. Each one of these shall be empowered to give signals to any one else.

3. Waving a black flag on a black dark night far away from any light, means danger.

4. Standing on a Line on which the express train is just coming, means danger to one person. Two in the same position, means danger to more, and so on.

TIME.

1. The Trains on the New Line shall run every seven minutes, and in order to prevent confusion, fifteen minutes at least shall be allowed between the starting and departure of each Train.

2. Every ten minutes, a plate-layer shall cross the line as a signal to the fireman that his dinner is ready.

3. There shall be five minutes' difference between all the clocks at the several stations on the Line, so as to ensure the quickest train reaching its destination in no time, and to suit the requirements of Bradshaw's Railway Guide.

4. The Company intend to run Trains just whenever they like, without reference to any stated times, which are only a source of nuisance, and unnecessary excitement to the travelling public.

DUTIES OF SIGNALMAN.

The Red Flag. The Signalman may wave the Red Flag, whenever he feels elated or excited, as a signal of his jollity and happiness.

Red and Blue Flags. To be waved as a signal that it is a Director's birthday.

Waving a White Flag Violently. Means "Hooray!" "Three cheers," etc., or anything of that sort.

The Red Light shall mean "Stop!" except when it means "Go on!"

The Blue, vice versa.

The Green shall mean nothing.

The Yellow anything.

General Rules.—Blue on yellow, Red's your prayer in hand. As at Pool, so here, the aim of the Company is to fill the Pockets, and "lives" are lost at this game.

THE GUARDS.

Every Guard shall carry a Red light, a Blue light, a Bengal light and a box of Child's Night Lights. He shall also be light-headed. He will also be provided with as many flags as Mr. Robin used to produce out of an ordinary hat; besides the Standards of all Nations. He shall also carry all the Acts of Parliament affecting Railways, and a book containing Lines from different Poets, and a short history of the Seven Sleepers. He must know the current number of Bradshaw by heart.

NOTICE.

The Company will hold themselves responsible for nothing.

NOTICE

The publication of "The Californian" takes place on Saturday mornings, and copies may be obtained in the City at all News-stands, and of our News-agents through the country. It will also be served by carriers on the morning of publication.

* Correspondents will address all communications, business and otherwise, to "The Californian," office, No. 328 Montgomery street, San Francisco.*

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 15, 1864.

THE DEMONSTRATION TO-NIGHT.

OPPONENTS of our Government and sympathisers with traitors have, thus far, had the advantage of loyal citizens in the matter of ostentatious display and theatrical demonstration. Steadfast Union men have deemed it unnecessary to take such methods to proclaim their strength and fealty, have tacitly conceded to Broom Rangers and Copperheads the use of highways, torchlights and flaming symbols, and have been content to retain their strength for the ballot-box. They have been willing to yield to their antagonists the inalienable right of making up by vociferation and clamor what they lacked in numbers and principle, and have not cared to answer the rhetoric of ungrammatical transparencies. But they have committed the error which a good many Union men fell into early in the rebellion. Numbers must be met by numbers, display by counter-display. There are hundreds of timid, vacillating men in this city who are affected by the show of the enemy, who require renewed confidence in the strength of their own party. For such the demonstration to-night is offered, as well as to ocularly convince the Democratic party, that loyal men are not so much pre-occupied by the cares of business that they cannot spare one night to the service of their country. And to make this expression the more thorough and convincing it must be complete and overwhelming. No truly loyal citizen has the right to let his tastes or prejudices interfere with his duty to the Government at such a moment.

If we are to have a demonstration, then let all participate. Let bankers, merchants, professional men, clerks, artisans and mechanics march together in the same ranks. Let dwellings, stores and public buildings along the route be illuminated. Let there be such an exhibition to-night as will forever silence the doubts of the timid and weak-hearted, and disarm the taunts of Copperheads in regard to the loyalty of San Francisco. Let them witness enthusiasm without frenzy, power without brutality, conviction in place of prejudice, and let the marching host remember that, in their peaceful way, they but emulate the armed tramp of those devoted men who even now, with faces to the foe, are braving death for the same principles and the one blessed country!

SUGGESTIONS TO THE IDLE.

THERE are at the present writing some thousands of idle men in San Francisco who have nothing better to do than to stand about the street corners with their hands in their pockets, or polishing the door-posts of saloons and public places, waiting for something to "turn up." The chances for improvement in the financial condition of these "Micawbers" are not flattering. The rainy season is nearly upon us, and our dull season at hand. A long winter presents no very encouraging propects for these idle persons. Many of them are of a class superior to the laboring man, and some are men of education and ability, in their own particular way. Many are well born and well brought up, but have no special talent or forte for anything, and have never "succeeded" in anything they have undertaken. Their friends are tired of trying to aid them, when failure is the result of every attempt to put them in the way of taking care of themselves. California at the present time presents very few openings for men of this class; there seems to be no way for them to benefit their condition by any lucky "strikes" in the mines, or in stock speculations: First, because they are unaccustomed to labor, and cannot swing the pick and shovel, with the energy and strength which that species of labor demands; secondly, because they have no capital to speculate with, and stock operations are, at best, but a lottery, with scarce one chance in a hundred of winning, and only those of great experience and shrewdness are successful; yet even they get many a "set-back."

The next class are those who are able and willing to work, but can get no employment. The state of business affairs makes it necessary for the community to retrench expenses, and those that own property, do not feel able at this time to make improvements; consequently there is but a narrow field for labor. The limited number of persons employed are principally mechanics, and there are more of those than the demand requires. The public works employ but few men, and the sphere for labor is diminishing rather than improving. In the mining districts labor is in less demand, owing to the hard times, the want of capital for improvements and the development of claims; and we hear of hundreds being out of employment at Virginia City, Reese River, etc. The chances are, therefore, very poor, in that way, and yet every steamer arriving brings large numbers of persons seeking employment, lured hither by visions of "rich strikes" in El Dorado. They find that mining here has now become a question of capital, and presents but few openings for individual labor, and that all the minor positions are filled by men of experience, who have the preference over green hands. Under all these circumstances, the question arises, how can all these idle persons be provided for, and earn their daily bread?—for it is a fixed fact, that the human system requires a certain quantity of nourishment, and that certain quantity becomes very uncertain when their small means are exhausted, and they can find no way of replenishing them.

There remains, however, one, and only one, way of insuring a comfortable existence, without hard labor or any great amount of physical exertion—and that is to enlist in the service of their country. There are now several new regiments being raised, and consequently there is a demand for able-bodied men, and also to fill the companies in the old regiments depleted by expiration of service. The service on this coast is easy, compared with that in the East, and the casualties are few, as there is no actual war and not likely to be. The soldier is well-clothed, well-fed and cared for. If he is sick, he has the best of medical attendance, and he has only to perform his duties in a proper manner to insure good treatment; and, if he has ability and zeal, promotion is within his reach. A few months of service may see him promoted to the rank of a non-commissioned officer, and, step by step, he may win by his good conduct and strict attention to his duties a commission. There are dozens of officers in the Volunteer regiments who have, by their own diligence and abilities, raised themselves from the ranks to commissions, and are now commanding the companies they entered as privates. The romances of the French stage are more than realized in the history of this war: men who entered the service as privates have achieved by gallantry and distinguished services the yellow sash of a Brigadier, and the honors so won command the respect of the public and those in power who confer them.

Independent of those considerations which every loyal heart will suggest, how much better it is, therefore, for these idle and unemployed men to enlist, than eke out a precarious existence, not knowing where the next meal is to come from, or how soon they may not have a crust to keep body and soul together. The pay of a soldier is not great, it is true, when the difference between gold and paper is considered; but it is quite sufficient for his few wants that are not supplied by the Government; and the State offers a liberal bounty, which is paid in coin. A dog-fight in our streets will in two minutes collect a crowd sufficient to fill the ranks of two or three companies. It is well for them they are not in Richmond, for they would be conscripted in a body; and if a dog-fight in any Southern city could collect a fraction of the number we see assemble on such occasions here, it would become a public institution. Again, we say, let those who are out of money and out of work enlist. The service is honorable and respectable; men of all classes can be found in the ranks; and they have the consciousness that they are serving their country and earning an honest livelihood, relieving themselves from all care of the present, their friends from the burthen of supporting them, and they can live comfortably in the hope of better days to come.

ON A VULGAR LITTLE BOY.

THE subject of this article is at present leaning against a tree, directly opposite to my window. He wears his cap with the wrong side before, apparently for no other object than that which seems the most obvious—of showing more than the average quantity of very dirty face. His clothes, which are worn with a certain buttonless ease and freedom, display, in the different quality of their fruit-stains, a pleasing indication of the progress of the seasons. The nose of this vulgar little boy turns up at the end. I have noticed this in several other vulgar little boys, although it is by no means improbable that youthful vulgarity may be present without this facial peculiarity. Indeed, I am inclined to the belief that it is rather the result of early inquisitiveness—of furtive pressures against window panes, and of looking over fences, or of the habit of biting large apples hastily—than an indication of scorn or juvenile superciliousness. The vulgar little boy is more remarkable for his obtrusive familiarity. It is my experience of his predisposition to this quality which has induced me to write this article.

My acquaintance with him began in a moment of weakness. I have an unfortunate predilection to cultivate originality in people, even when accompanied by objectionable character. But, as I lack the firmness and skilfulness which usually accompanies this taste in others, and enables them to drop acquaintances when troublesome, I have surrounded myself with divers unprofitable friends, among whom I count the vulgar little boy. The manner in which he first attracted my attention was purely accidental. He was playing in the street, and the driver of a passing vehicle cut at him, sportively, with his whip. The vulgar little boy rose to his feet and hurled after his tormentor a single sentence of invective. I refrain from repeating it, for I feel that I could not do justice to it here. If I remember rightly, it conveyed, in a very few words, a reflection on the legitimacy of the driver's birth; it hinted a suspicion of his father's integrity, and impugned the fair fame of his mother; it suggested incompetency in his present position, personal uncleanliness, and evinced a skeptical doubt of his future salvation. As his youthful lips closed over the last syllable, the eyes of the vulgar little boy met mine. Something in my look emboldened him to wink. I did not repel the action nor the complicity it implied. From that moment I fell into the power of the vulgar little boy, and he has never left me since.

He haunts me in the streets and by-ways. He accosts me, when in the company of friends, with repulsive freedom. He lingers about the gate of my dwelling to waylay me as I issue forth to business. Distance he overcomes by main strength of lungs and he hails me from the next street. He met me at the theatre the other evening, and demanded my check with the air of a young footpad. I foolishly gave it to him, but re-entering sometime after, and comfortably seating myself in the parquet, I was electrified by hearing my name called from the gallery with the addition of a playful adjective. It was the vulgar little boy. During the performance he projected spirally-twisted playbills in my direction, and indulged in a running commentary on the supernumeraries as they entered.

To-day has evidently been a dull one with him. I observe he whistles the popular airs of the period with less shrillness and intensity. Providence, however, looks not unkindly on him, and delivers into his hands as it were two nice little boys who have at this moment innocently strayed into our street. They are pink and white children, and are dressed alike, and exhibit a certain air of neatness and refinement which is alone sufficient to awaken the antagonism of the vulgar little boy. A sigh of satisfaction breaks from his breast. What does he do? Any other boy would content himself with simply knocking the hats off their respective heads, and so vent his superfluous vitality in a single act, besides precipitating the flight of the enemy. But there are æsthetic considerations not to be overlooked; insult is to be added to the injury inflicted, and in the struggles of the victim some justification is to be sought for extreme measures. The two nice little boys perceive their danger and draw closer to each other. The vulgar little boy begins by irony. He affects to be overpowered by the magnificence of their costume. He addresses me, (across the street and through the closed window,) and requests information if there haply be a circus in the vicinity. He makes affectionate inquiries after the health of their parents. He expresses a fear of maternal anxiety in regard to their welfare. He offers to conduct them home. One nice little boy feebly retorts; but alas! his correct pronunciation, his grammatical exactitude and his moderate epithets only provoke a scream of derision from the vulgar little boy, who now rapidly changes his tactics. Staggering under the weight of his vituperation, they fall easy victims to his dexter mawley. A wail of lamentation goes up from our street. But as the subject of this article seems to require a more vigorous handling than I had purposed to give it, I find it necessary to abandon my present dignified position, seize my hat, open the front door, and try a stronger method.

BRET.

AT THE SEPULCHRE.—T. S. K.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 9TH, 1864.

HERE in God's sunshine, peaceful lie,
Though not beneath yon arches' swell;
One springing roof alone—the sky—
Can hold the flock that loved thee well.

Yon sacred gates are free to all,
Who join in Sabbath praise and prayer;
Thy pulpit grave, beside, shall call
A week-day fold from street and square.

Though o'er thy tomb no anthems rise,
The world its labor-hymn shall sing,
And sliding footsteps drown the sighs
Of small-tongued grasses, whispering.

And greener yet that spot shall grow,
For thy dear dust within it laid,
And brighter yet the sunlight glow—
And dim and grateful seem the shade.

For when the sun slopes down the west,
The shadow of yon sacred wall,
Like God's right arm across thy breast
Near and protectingly shall fall.

And all night long above thy urn
The patient stars shall pierce the gloom,
Like those eternal lamps that burn
And circle round a royal tomb.

And those who deemed they knew thee best
Shall find how foolish was their claim—
And fear thy liberal bounty, lest
It clip their dividend of fame.

And some of humbler faith shall stand
Before thy tomb, and watch its door,
Expectant that some angel's hand
May roll the stone that lies before.

H.

SANITARY FUND.—The Executive Committee report the following further receipts since our last issue: From the Camanche, $380 80; Healdsburg, $1,479 55 in coin and $25 in Legal Tender Notes; North Bloomfield, $25; San Leandro, $10 in Legal Tender Notes; You Bet, $53; Placerville, $60; Bay View Park Horse Fair, $173 50; Bolinas Bay, $114; San Francisco, $125. Total, $2,410 90 in coin and $35 in Legal Tender Notes.

By the steamer Constitution, October 13th, the Committee made remittance to the Treasurer of the United States Sanitary Commission, New York, of $10,000 in coin and $4,000 in Legal Tender Notes.

SCIENTIFIC SKETCHES.

LIBERTY—not License. "An unseen hand makes all the moves," says Cowley in his "Ode to Destiny," describing a game of chess in which all the pieces are managed, combinations made and feints planned by some invisible power. What a fine subject for a picture expressive of Nature's mode of operation! Mysterious, but not on that account to be twisted by the acutest ingenuity into support of infidelity. On the contrary, the secret, inexplicable character of many things in science legitimately leads, not to scepticism, to a licentious use of reason, but justly and logically to the conclusion that these are yet to be brought to light by further development of facts in the physical sciences, and by a keener, more acute cultivation of the mental faculties, whereby what is now obscure and dark will be made to throw off the veil of mystery, in turn unfolding to view new points ahead of us in the path of progress of whose existence before—even dim existence—we were ignorant.

It is as unreasonable to think of science without secrets as a religion without mystery. Because of this truth, will you deny the existence of science, its power and achievements? As well might you deny the mighty stream because at times lost to the eye down some sharp, sudden fall, or the gentle slope of even surface whose uniformity is broken on some line by gorge and ravine, or disturbed at some point by massive upheaval or loose debris.

In her moments of liberal mood Nature strews with a lavish hand, both in the heavens and on earth, her rich stores of simple beauties and awful mysteries, defying the keenest scrutiny of the human intellect; to the ordinary mind a thing of wonder—may be, at times, of indifference; to the man of thought, provoking thought, yet setting a limit and a lesson to his ambition and pride of reason; to the religionist a source or comfort, hope, even belief, for to this the mind ever tends, leaning on mysterious power, indulging in hero-worships throughout all ages and among all people, from the savage to the civilized. The ancients gave it the form of mythology, with its deities, half god, half-man, its Sibylline verses and oracles—a miraculous testimony to the Christian in the first days of his faith—and, now, in the day of a gross materialism, not satisfied with its triumph, almost god-like power over matter, the longing for things spiritual, the love of mystery and sure reliance upon it for religious belief, is one of the distinguishing marks of the age we live in. Else whence comes the renewed strength and growth of the various forms of mystical belief so prevalent on the one side, on the other the present languid tone and weak condition of the evangelical creed? Undoubtedly from one cause—and that very evident—the combined feeling of love for the mysterious, and belief in the adequacy of the intellect to solve all questions human, even divine. The right use of reason, freely exercised—the liberty of reason, so to speak—recognizes the limits of its own power, subject to established law and even forms, and halting short of the threshold, dares not tread the realm of the mysterious infinite. But watch the steps of license in its nature-worship, its intellectual idolatry! See, it rushes into the very presence of revelation itself, seeks to discuss even Divinity and reduce to laws of formal force, by the rules of a cold, rigid, mathematical expression, the existence and attributes of an essence, ardently intent to show that x ⋈ y= to the scheme of salvation, and utterly, restlessly discontent to find how meaningless, how barren is the expression, and but little caring to know that the effort is as stolidly, heartlessly impious as its result is intellectually stupid.

We can vividly remember while at sea the first impressions made upon us by the mirage—of all the wonderful phenomena of nature, perhaps, the most strange, ay, mysterious in its effect. More than a mere illusion, deceptive utterly, but more—instantly suggestive of established laws at work, may-be beyond the poor powers of man to fathom to their depth, but not beyond some reasonable solution, we hope. Let us try: the view is somewhat broken seaward by islands of lofty height, precipitous sides and rugged outline, openings between giving sight of the horizon, and behind which the sun is sinking into a sea made gorgeous by reflection from clouds of brilliant hue. Everything is distorted, magnified and inverted, momentarily changing without perceptible cause of change, into every conceivable and inconceivable shape and form. The sun, enlarged seemingly to bursting by some expansive force within, lingers for a time in balloon-shape just above the line of sky and water, still falling, in the moment of contact assumes the unearthly figure of a flattened sphere, and, disappearing, leaves on the western sky, from sea to zenith, a glowing pencil of light. "How is this?" is the earnest, instant question; "If this be reasonable, what is truth?"

The answer came as readily from an able, natural philosopher, who, travelling in company, stood near at hand; point after point followed in the chain of sequence, till the few simple laws in operation were set out in light, clear beyond question. But is this all: do you stop? An unequal refraction of the sun's rays in the lower strata of a rarified atmosphere—true; but whence comes refraction? Why the deflection of a ray of light because passing into a medium of different density?

Again the answer came, but in different spirit. Our daily life is a miracle; as surely as there is infinity, so surely has reason its limits like all other faculties of mind and body. Seek no more—to know but this, that reason, however great, however god-like, has not yet become on earth a goddess.

TRISMEGISTUS.

FRED'S RETRIEVER.

HAPPENING up at Napa during the sporting season, and observing that the ducks and geese were abundant, I borrowed a gun and a pair of long boots for the purpose of making a "raid"—Early next morning. But I had no dog, and could not hear of a good one that could be borrowed. On putting the question to my brother Fred, he answered, "Dog? why, what do you want better than my dog?"

"Your dog!" said I, "I have not seen any around the house."

"Come along," said he; "I'll show you the best dog in Napa;" and he took me out to a kennel at the back of the house, and there, chained up, was a regular stub-tailed, crop-eared, bow-legged bull-terrier—not quite a full-grown dog, but yet "a little more nor a pup."

"Why," said I, "that's a bull-dog. What the deuce do I want with a bull dog, for retrieving!"

"Never mind," said he; "you will be pleased with Pat; he is a splendid retriever; will bring anything from a bullock to a chipping bird."

I looked at Pat, with his red eyes and projecting lower jaw, and, as he observed my scrutiny, evidently considered it his duty to look as handsome as possible; he winked, twisted himself around, and vibrated his brief "narrative;" smiled, showed his teeth, and made himself otherwise fascinating. "Well," said I, "Pat, you don't 'handsome' much, and if you are a Retriever, you have strayed a long way from your original calling;" to which compliment Pat again vibrated his tail vigorously, sneezed, rubbed his nose and made frantic efforts to leap to my shoulder, evidently well satisfied that he had made an impression.

Next morning I got an early start, and with Pat, at my heels, walked down the bank of the creek for two or three miles, then struck back for some small fresh-water lakes surrounded by tules.

As I cautiously approached, I heard the quacking of mallards, and, creeping noislessly as possible towards the lake, I prepared for a shot. During this proceeding Pat eyed me very closely, and evidently was somewhat puzzled. He did not see any sense in so much mystery, and scorned anything like creeping on a foe, in that surreptitious manner, and so would dash forward occasionally on his own account, probably with visions of a stray pig in his eye, to be done for; but by grabbing him by the collar and administering a few hearty cuffs he would subside behind me. The trail to the lake was very narrow through the tules, and I was thus able to keep him in the rear; but now and then he would hear something, or fancy he was being imposed upon and defrauded of his right to be "in," and would make a dash to go over my head as I crept along in a stooping position, or else would make a plunge to go between my legs; he nearly capsized me three or four times. Finally, taking my gun in one hand and his collar in the other, I dragged him along, as I had got too near to let him get away, fearing he would cut up some caper and spoil my "shot." The collar was rather tight, and he would every now and then give a little cough, to prevent which I jammed his nose in the mud. Finally, having reached within easy shooting distance, I carefully parted the tules with my gun, and, peeping through, saw a flock of two or three dozen splendid mallards, all within a circle of ten feet, clustered together beautifully for a raking shot. I crept a few steps further to a little round "bog," just large enough to stand upon fairly, and, dragging Pat along, stowed him away between my feet, and giving him two or three cuffs by way of warning, I rose gradually to get a good view through the tops of the tules. Raising my gun slowly to my shoulder, I was reckoning about six on the shot, when Pat, who had watched my proceedings with evident suspicion gleaming from his upturned eye, gave a little bark and a struggle which I nipped in the bud by again jamming his nose in the mud. I cuffed him and tried it a second time; but just as I got ready to shoot he would make a struggle to get up. At last, getting his head down, and putting my foot on the back of his neck, I held him long enough to get the gun to my shoulder and fire both barrels. The next thing I knew I was going upward, and then I was going downward, and did not stop until I was up to my waist-buttons in water and black mud, my gun about three feet under, also. I grabbed the tules and struggled out. As I did so I glanced into the lake, and there lay five or six splendid ducks. I looked around for Pat, but he was not visible. Getting out of the tule, I whistled and called, but he was not there. Extending my range of vision, however, I caught sight of an object making tall time through the grass, and could see a pair of crop-ears rise, then disappear, and a short stub-tail come up as the head went down. It was my retriever, making the most frantic plunges through the grass and a straight wake for home. I won't say I was mad at having to come away and leave those mallards after a three-mile tramp before breakfast; but it was useless to try to get them. I was already wet, it is true; but it was too cold for a swim, and as the pond was ten feet deep I could only do that. I turned away with a regret that my gun was not loaded, and that that infernal dog was not within shootable distance.

I trudged home with bitterness in my heart, and water in my boots, which I did not dare remove, fearing I could not get them on again. I tried lying down and elevating my heels to let the water run out; but, with strange perverseness, it insisted on running up my pantaloons legs.

I reached the house tired and hungry, but the first thing I did was to look for Pat. I found him with his head and body jammed in his rather tight-fit of a kennel, and that stub-tail of his sticking out. Getting hold of that, I dragged him forth. Rolling up his eye and recognizing me, he made for the hole again, scratching and digging so that I feared if I did not let go his tail it would come out. I staid at Napa two days, and up to the hour of my leaving, Pat had not been enticed out of his box. Tempting bones had been swung before his door without effect, and I learn since that it was only when well satisfied I had left the place, that Pat ventured forth. It is only necessary now to show him a gun to see him make tall jumps for the kennel. As near as I could calculate, from the moment I fired and he upset me, in his astonishment and fright at the explosion over his head, until he plunged through the garden fence and head-foremost into his kennel, the time did not exceed six minutes. He had made the three miles in the briefest time on record.

It is my private opinion that a bull-terrier may possess qualifications of a high order in his particular line of business, but as a sporting dog I cannot conscientiously recommend the breed. However, if you have lost a bone, or have found a rat's nest, I can recommend Fred's Retriever, who may be able to retrieve a pig or a bullock, but not ducks or his character.

PODGERS.

SMOKY.

DROPPING in at Jones' sample-rooms the other day we observed through the bottom of a tumbler that we had elevated to a line of vision a case of pipes which are beyond comparison the handsomest collection we ever saw. They were exhibited in the Fair by H. Schumann, and for beauty of design, finish and elegance, exceed anything we have ever met with, and we pretend to be au fait on these articles—have a weakness, in fact, for a fine pipe. In these days of expensive habits, cigar smoking is a serious matter, and it costs almost as much to smoke good cigars as to support a family. Pipes have therefore come into use freely, and with good tobacco, a fine pipe is a luxury few can resist. Unfortunately, a good article is scarce and high; yet it is no comparison in expense to cigars. A pound of tobacco costing a dollar will last as long as a box of cigars costing eight, and it is easier to get good smoking tobacco than good cigars.

It is all folly for the housewives to cry out against pipes in the house; they are no more objectionable than cigars, and the curtains will not suffer, nor retain the odor from a pipe as long as from a "weed." When we are talking about pipes we don't mean a stumpy, vulgar, black, strong thing, but a beautiful transparent piece of meerschaum, with solid silver mountings, a fragrant cherry stem and amber mouth-piece. With such a pipe, slippers, an easy chair, a newspaper, (THE CALIFORNIAN, of course,) a man ought to feel amiable towards "all the world and the balance of mankind."

Meerschaum is sometimes termed "foam of the sea;" but it is composed of a hydrate of magnesia and silica, with a trace of decomposed carbonate of magnesia, and is found in veins of serpentine, in Greece, in Spain near Madrid, in Sweden, in Monrovia; but the commercial supply comes chiefly from the peninsula of Naton, Asia Minor, where the vein is six feet in width. When first exposed to the air, it is soft and plastic, and will make lather like soap; when carved and moulded into pipes it is boiled in wax and oil, which fill the pores and in turn give place to the oil of the tobacco that turns the pipe to a rich dark mahogany color. The Germans have recently discovered a method of coloring pipes artificially, and only a good judge can detect the difference until the pipe is smoked, when it proclaims itself a bogus; and there is the same difference that there is between the artificial color on a lady's cheek and the real damask that Nature put there. The old Turks know what comfort and luxury are, and smoking is one of their principal ones. They probably seek relief from the affliction of a dozen or two wives in this soul-soothing pastime, and it does them good. They thrive on it, and let the world wag as it pleases. There are a great many men who have but one wife, who would take to meerschaum if they could find the peace and comfort in it that poor henpecked human nature seeks in vain; but if there is any comfort to be found in this vale of tears, that is the source. Try it, and all your cares will end in smoke.

General Orders of the War Department for 1861, '62 and '63. Chronologically arranged, and with an Alphabetical Index to Contents, etc.

This work is almost indispensable to military men, and more especially disbursing officers, who will find there laid down all orders up to the end of December, 1863, bearing upon their duties; and, in these days, when the "Regulations" are no longer a guide on account of the constant changes going on, seriously affecting the old system governing disbursements, it is a necessity. It will be found invaluable for reference, being complete, and embracing every general order issued up to that date.

REMOVAL.—Lawrence & Houseworth have removed to 317 Montgomery street, nearly opposite the office of THE CALIFORNIAN, and are furnishing their store with the most extensive stock of fine cutlery, optical and mathematical instruments and stereoscopic goods ever displayed in California. Their windows are also graced with some magnificently executed photographs of California scenery that win homage from thousands who travel Montgomery street.

NEWSPAPERS.—Major Stratman has our acknowledgments for favors in the way of choice readable European and Atlantic papers. We have not space to enumerate them, but will merely add that Stratman keeps all the papers, from the Pacific Appeal to Punch.

STEVE LIDYARD'S ADVENTURE;

OR, THE MYSTERIOUS CITY.

I GIVE the following as I heard it from Steve's own lips, as I and half a dozen of us sat in a garden one sunny afternoon, a fine cedar lifting up its stately and spreading branches between us and the ardent sun above, and forming a very welcome shade. Cigars and sherry were within easy reach, and among our listeners, besides the city "fogies," there were their matrons and one or two very pretty girls: admirable listeners these last, when they did not, with their own pleasant prattle and musical laughter, break upon the more serious progress of the conversation.

"So it's my turn, is it?" said Steve, in reply to a challenge. "Very well, here goes."

Steve Lidyard, I may say, par parenthése, was a fine athletic fellow, much on the sunny side of thirty, bearded, bronzed, and bearing about him evident tokens of having seen hard work and done good service, and, as he had been "out with Garibaldi" up to the last catastrophe at Aspromonte—as he wore a medal or two, and could sport a decoration, though only a "civilian," —it was evident, and well known, in fact, that Steve Lidyard was one of that gallant band of Englishmen who had volunteered to fight in a cause not their own, save that "Liberty" is a watchword which rings across the world, and has therefore a significance to every Englishman's sense to which his heart responds in an instant, and in no passive manner either. Steve Lidyard, it is seen from my exordium, is therefore a man of some mark; and I shall now proceed with his narrative, which, according to a phrase now in vogue, is "always to relate."

"So it is my turn, is it?" said Steve. "Well, I'll astonish your weak nerves, if you have any, which I assume at once—'nerves' being quite a fashionable disease; so I'll give you an episode of one of my adventures when 'out with Garibaldi.'

"I pass over our entrance into Palermo," continued Steve, after some little introductory matter, "over excursions into the wild country towards the mountains, sometimes in pursuit of the flying enemy, sometimes in small detachments, being driven back and pursued in return; and as you may recollect that 'Bombina,' son of 'Bomba,' had put the place under martial law, all the nameless atrocities peculiar to the soldiery of Ferdinand were committed; but all this is beside the subject of my relation, so we will pull up at once, and try back.

"I had some curiosity to see a little of the country inland, of which not much appeared to be known, and before long the opportunity was offered me. I had under me a party of a dozen men, plucky fellows every one, and crack shots into the bargain. With these I had some very ticklish business to perform.

"Some brigands, miscreant cut-throats imported from Calabria, mixed up with others of Ferdinand's broken and half-disorganised troops, were scattered hither and thither, making now as they best could for any Sicilian port favorable to the Bourbons, where they might again unite their shattered and scattered forces; these, in broken bands, were straggling to and fro, and several companies of Garibaldians were deputed to decimate these gentry, if they objected to be taken prisoners, and so put up with the casualties of fair and open war.

"Some considerable distance from the city of Palermo there lies a region of wild and sterile mountains for the most part, the interior of which is traversed by a valley almost parallel to one much better known as the Valley of Ispica, the former being shunned by the dwellers of the region from superstitious of a most formidable character, and which, in fact, are its especial property, thus rendering its precincts unapproachable; and even those who have by hap strayed into its recesses have brought back such a catalogue of its horrors as was always calculated, from immemorial time, to curdle the very blood! Ugh!"

Steve Lidyard shuddered as he spoke, and sent a "sensational" thrill through his listeners.

"In fact, the Harz Mountains, the Black Forest, with their charcoal-burners, their Erl kings and grisly hunters, the witch-haunted 'Broeken,' the impish Blocksberg, scarcely rival in diablerie the traditions of this eldrich valley, and certainly do not outvie them."

"But, goodness gracious me, Mr. Lidyard," cried Lucy Parker, "what was there in these—these stories, after all?"

Steve turned on the fair speaker one of those looks peculiar to him, shaking his head as in mild reproach, and affecting surprise at the interruption; to which, Lucy Parker being strong-minded, she paid little heed, and, reassured by the encouraging laughter of the rest, came to charge once more.

"Come don't be silly, sir; let us know at once," she exclaimed, with startling well-affected severity.

Steve sighed, and shook his head, still reproachfully, as though he would plainly say, "This is really too bad."

"Do you mean to speak, Mr. Lidyard—do you intend to answer my question?" demands the imperious young beauty, to which, entrenous, Steve is a slave.

Steve nods assent.

"Did you ever hear of ghouls?" asks Steve, in a deep tragedy whisper.

"O!" ejaculated the ladies.

"Of vampires?" proceeds Steve, improving his opportunity.

"Gracious! Goodness!"

This time the ejaculations go as in a horror skilfully moved.

"Of anthropophagi?" proceeds the bearded narrator.

"Of what, sir?"

This question imperiously, fiercely put, in fact.

"Of an-thro-po-pha-gi," pronouncing it slowly.

Under any circumstances it is not a nice word, and perhaps the slower the better.

Lucy Parker, resuming the narrative form, nodded her head at each syllable, as though she meant to master it thoroughly.

"An-thro-pop-poff—pooh! what?"

"Men who eat one another, whose heads do grow beneath their snoulders, who——"

"Whatever can he be talking about?" said Rosey Parker, Lucy's pretty giggling sister.

"Hadn't you better let me proceed?" put in Steve.

"We-ll—hem—yes; move on."

"With all my heart. Well, one morning with my party—we had bivouacked for the night under the shelter of some crags—I found myself and comrades waking up in the chill morning air; but we were soon astir and warm with motion once more, and I really admired the place of our retreat: some overhanging rocks completely sheltering us from the dews, which are very copious, and in other respects the spot was very eligible—well, we awoke——"

"Famished, no doubt."

"Hungry, if you please, not famished! No, we had in our haversacks some cold fowl, bread and so on, and each one had his flask of wine or brandy, as the case might be: in fact, we had provided for a couple of days at least; leaving it to chance to renew our supplies, when necessity should urge us to forage for them.

"I must tell you that we had travelled, with our revolvers, ammunition, haversacks, and so on, through a country which, the more we ascended, seemed to consist of nothing but huge boulders, all presenting an aspect of grim and sterile desolation inexpressibly dismal to contemplate. Vast masses of fractured rocks, a very Arabia Petrea of a region; rugged ravines, and as difficult as dangerous to clamber through and over; while below us, far away now, we could distinctly behold the fair 'greeneries' fringing the lower slopes of the mountain, or, rather, mountains; for the chain seemed to run on in endless links—colossal, rugged, with a touch of the horribly sublime about it.

"We beheld then—what, as clearly we had not remarked on the preceding evening—that this was the way (entrance it could scarcely be called) into the shunned valley I have just mentioned, and, looking downward now, on the opposite side found all 'beautiful exceeding' to the eye; for green and purple blended formed a mirage round the vast stems of great old trees; the rich-green leafage, the yellow oranges and citrons, the ruddy grapes, a wandering, intertwining under and overgrowth; and, oh, didn't we wish we had found that inviting pass before!"

There now occurred a slight pause, which gave the narrator the opportunity of moistening his throat with a glass of sherry. He then resumed.

"Turning the eye from the valley, as we sat, pipe in mouth—we had halted to look about us—I may say that a lovelier panorama than that which now erected our eager gaze would be difficult to meet with, save alone in those golden climes which border the Mediterranean on its European side.

"The morning sun," continued Steve, rising now from a poet into a colorist, "flashing across the Ægean, tinting with myriad miraculous hues what soon became a waving sea of molten splendor, fell on a gaunt spur of rock which overlooked the mysterious valley—the Val di Dimone, forming, in the midst of this fervid glare, a wondrous association, as real as unreal, of mountain ridges and darkling gloom, enshrouded valleys—fathomless gulfs, rather—rugged grim rivers, which ran, but irregularly, east and west across the length of this half-enchanted island.

"What, in fact, did we not see within the limits of the horizon of blending gold and purple which faded between sea and air, and was crossed by pearly lines, these again tinted rosily here and there! What an enchanting prospect—so boundless, so indescribably lovely! Islands, continents, seas, bays, cities, shifting and changing everlastingly! I believe now in Turner's painting of Ulysses and Polyphemus, all vague, wandering, dreamy, as it is; but here we had it in its actual reality, from the mountain peaks to the cities far below: the latter, marble white, dotting the distance; the blue level of the calm sea beyond, over which we could see stately ships glide along, the huge steam-frigate forging ahead, the smoke coming out of her vast funnel and curling into a thin vapor as it does now from the tip of my cigar.

"The sound of a bugle waking up the sleeping echoes in the mountains put every ear on the stretch. I knew by the call," continued Steve, "that it didn't belong to our side, as, for obvious reasons, there's a difference in notation, so to speak. We were at once on the qui vive; and by Jove, I can tell you, not before it was necessary.

"All eyes were turned in one direction—that, of course, from whence the sound came; and across the peaks of the mountain ridge—a singular conglomeration of limestone and lava—there appeared a dozen military caps with beards peeping beneath their fronts—caps which we knew but too well; and presently more appeared, making in all about twenty men, including rifles—a trifle not to be forgotten.

"They crossed the ridge, evidently having a suspicion that we were somewhere about—crossed the ridge, as I have said—descended into a ravine, and watching for about an hour, I began to understand that they were seeking to circumvent and trap us, intending by the detour they took, to ascend and surprise us on the plateau we occupied.

"'Keep your fire, lads,' said I, 'while I clamber up in this direction.' I saw a pathway bearing upward, looking very much like a fissure or enormous rent. 'I will fire as a signal if they are likely to outflank us;' and, rifle in hand, I ascended, soon attaining a height where, at a turn, a perpendicular wall of rock barred farther progress.

"Nevertheless, I could look down from my 'bad eminence.' Heavens! what a hideous gorge descended sheer below into fathomless deeps, as if it were the black and cindery crater of some volcano, which, having 'shut up shop' there, had transferred its business elsewhere; but joking apart, anything more appalling than that measureless depth, its indescribable and lonely aggregate of all that is hideous, its black, cindery, and rifled interior, exceeded in the aggregate of what is stupendously terrible all I had ever read of.

"Well and fitly was that awful region below called the Val di Dimone.

"Stretching forward to have a fuller view of this Tartarean region, and leaning against some loose conglomerate to look into the Hades where the ancient fires had burnt out, I found the small rampart yield, and—horror of horrors!—I felt myself sliding hopelessly towards the verge of this awful gulf!"

At this juncture of the narrative, and naturally so—for during a short pause over so many minor events may occur, such as a glass of wine, a fresh cigar, etc.—the lady listeners gave utterance to a suppressed scream, and the gentlemen turned pale, each one shifting uneasily in his seat.

"Where I was descending to," went on the young man, "or how I was stayed in my way into the depths of an abyss that would have fitted one of the dismalest books of Dante's Inferno, I know not. I found myself seated on a ledge, where I was safe for the present, though a little scratched and bruised; and I had clung with instinctive tenacity to my rifle: this indispensable adjunct to my further safety, and very likely what for a time I might have to depend on for sustenance, was still in my possession.

"I now heard the faint sound of dropping shot coming from the other side of the riven shell I now occupied, and believing that my lads were hotly engaged, I sought for a way back; but, following the course of the ledge, found that it descended and wound round, in and out, in a most curious manner, until, at last losing sight of the accursed place, I found myself sole occupant of a spot, a glance around which made my heart beat; for if the other was but a simple and unpicturesque horror, this was calculated to inspire one with a more than nameless awe.

"I stood in the midst of an excavated city—a city as old, probably, as the mythic ages themselves; and, since all I saw suggested mythic types, this must have been one that may have assisted Hesiod in his Genesis.

"I stood," continued Steve—descending a little from the ladder Lempriere had lent him—"I stood in the midst of a street, wide, smooth, level, clean, as if newly swept; subterranean pathways, hewn streets, stretched out on either hand, and, looking upward along the solid walls—or rather, exterior of houses, palaces, I know not what they may have been—all hewn, pillared, carved, some exquisitely, others on a more colossal scale of rudeness—all having a wild fantastic sort of life-in-death in their aspect. A strip of sky clipping sharply over the extreme edge of these singular cuttings, allowed the red sun to pour his rays downward, where they lighted up this enormous 'trench'—I can call it nothing else, street as it may have been, and stupendously beautiful too—lighted it up and filled it with a stream of meandering, but unreal and shadowy gold.

"Everything," he continued, "as I looked upward in bewilderment, took an almost Alpine attitude, and row after row, the habitations, cut, carved, hollowed from the bottom to the very top, gave indications of an enormous humanity which must have existed here at one time.

"These streets, these chambers, these weird, solemn, silent receptacles of the mighty dead, now dust—for I began to gather into my conjecture catacombs as adjuncts of a once mighty city, a city of that far, far off infinite past, which may be in the dreamland of mythology or the earliest cradles of fable, if you like—made me dumb with astonishment, with awe; and I was traversing those awful silent spaces where the foot of man had trod—when——"

"The last time, of course," broke in Lucy saucily, as though by way of relief; "but I beg your pardon, Steve; it is growing interesting, so please to go on."

"A turning to which I came at last—there always is a turning in the very longest lane, you know—a turning indeed invited me to pass into a wide, a spacious, a noble street; pillars, pilasters, pediment, frieze—I know not what adornment it had or had not—were there, and which would have challenged admiration for their rare beauty and finish had not the towering scale been so colossal as to be absolutely crushing in its vastness.

"As I strolled on, my astonishment, my awe, hovering on the confines of terror, increased; for while I admitted the singular harmony of proportion carried out on either side, I could not but think of Polyphemus of the Titans, of some one-eyed Cyclop, some bruising Lestrigonian, who might be thrusting his huge arm forth and snatching me up as a mere mouthful, after which morsel he would scarcely deign to pick his teeth.

"The unearthly sense of life, of existence suspended, and so remaining petrified, was almost overwhelming. As I still rambled on, I came to portcoes again leading to openings where there were no doors. 'Were there ever any doors to these wondrous edifices?' I asked myself. Towering pillars outlived windows, where windows there were none. 'Were there ever any?' As I walked now almost breathlessly along, having totally forgotten my pursuers in the novelty of my position, I could not but expect to see some one or other of the old dwellers come to the doorway and salute me. Taking courage now, I entered into a dwelling that might perhaps be statelier than the rest, its chambers and stone staircases lighted up by means I cared not to account for, though the light was rather a softened gloom than a clear bright daylight such as I had left without.

"Without!—but where?

"To my surprise, to my dismay rather, I soon found that what I had taken for a dwelling was only the section of a vast catacomb, and the real ancient city, whose (once) living had peopled the grand and gloomy receptacle of the dead, must be contiguous to this spot, but which, as yet, I had not fallen upon; or, that it might have been subject to the influence of earthquake or volcanic fires, and so blended itself and become lost in the formless chaos of the surrounding mountain region.

"Retracing my steps and again passing on, the light began to stream along the floor, so to call it, ruddier, brighter, until, as I arrived at the extremity of the passage, it became a perfect blaze of sunshine. Before quitting the said broad and commodious passage I took the opportunity to look back.

"Well, at the extreme end where I had entered a few minutes ago, a diminished orifice giving entrance to a circle of light showed the opening, while on either hand, to the right and to the left, were darker and gloomier passages leading farther and into recesses more mysterious, and which, I promise you, I did not care to explore.

"Nothing had impeded my footsteps hitherto—no mounds, no fallen rocks, no crumbling bit of ruin lay in my path; no evil odors had assaulted the sense. Where, then, had they placed their dead, after all?

"With my own life in peril, which might meet me at any moment for aught I knew, I could not forbear asking myself two or three curious questions, arising naturally from all that was at hand, but principally, Where did the dead of this 'dead' city repose?

"Evidently," he continued thoughtfully, "the dead I was so curious about must have been sepultured and walled-in in the living rock, for I could now distinctly trace the outlines of slabs, mural tablets, covered with inscriptions and characters of quite an unknown form, and quite beyond my comprehension.

"So, concluding my thinking, and following my way, I crossed the last granite threshold, and stood in the very heart and burst of the sunshine. But what a place, what a scene what horror mingled with a startling sublimity, met my bewildered gaze now!

"I stood in a great square, the four sides of which, in pillar and cornice, in frieze, pediment, and every imaginable form of architectural splendor, all rose upon a scale of dimensions which quite baffled the powers of calculation; and there clomb up, hundreds of feet above me, a superb square into which the sun poured down its rays as into a well, so that for a moment I was half blinded, and indeed, half stupefied.

"But this was not all. Looking around me on every side, I certainly uttered a cry of irrepressible fear; but the fear chained my feet to the ground, and I could not move a step.

"What I could take in, in my bewildered glance, were countless enormous pillars, sixty or eighty feet high, supported by pediments equally colossal. Each pillar was a caryatide, which, to simplify the matter, means that it was carved in the shape of a woman; and they were multiplied by scores, by hundreds, by myriads, I verily believe. But the distortion of these monstrous figures, the insufferable horror of their vast distorted countenances, the demoniac expression stamped on their varying faces—faces!—the glaring of their cold, fiendish eyes, all so living, as it were, in the very force of expression—froze me. The ample tide and flow of descending hair, flying, too, in every direction, had, under the skill of the workman, become a petrifaction quite as wonderful; for, the highest, if distorted, form of art was evident. It was as fantastic in design as it seemed to be revelling in a fantasy of Gorgonian horrors, and which it may be the province of a particular age and clime to introduce, but which really seems to belong to insanity alone to invent.

"This, and such as this, formed the frontage facing where I stood. The ghostly towering frontage to my right might have represented a 'Macabre' dance—a Dance of Death, but after an antique fashion far more appalling than Holbein's, and utterly destitute of his sinister humor.

"The frontage to the left consisted of one vast human face, its dimensions being only to be guessed at. It was so calm, terrible, appalling, even in its awful quietude, that I scarcely knew whether that or its magnitude overwhelmed me most.

"I could look no more, bear no more, endure nothing further. I turned and fled, regaining the streets of the catacombs, where, at least, I had no sufficiency of fresh terrors to feast upon. Hurrying on, almost deliriously, I emerged at last by a narrow way leading to a ravine, and presently stood panting in the open air, inhaling gratefully the refreshing coolness of the passing breeze. I then sat down to think—to try to think, rather; but I could not. All seemed like a dream, a nightmare; all surely must be a dream, but a dream out of which I found it impossible to awaken; and which therefore must, with all its fantasy, partake of reality.

"By degrees I began to recall certain vague mythic traditions found in wonderful old books, to the effect that in some part of the island there was a 'Palace of Monsters;' that this place, in very ancient times, was haunted and infested by a race of evil creatures, who, under the forms of women, and denominated 'Lamiæ,' 'Striges,' 'Phorkyas,' and other hard names, worked out all sorts of hideous mischiefs among men; and the colossal pile I had quitted—so gorgeous, yet so hideous—this monstrous monument hewn and carved by a might allied to the supernatural, in order to perpetuate a creed of darkness, was ocular and demonstrative proof that fables are not so remote from fact as men are willing to suppose.

"While musing thus, I again heard gunshots ringing in a valley beyond.

"I had quite enough of this, and was not sorry to be in motion again. Grasping my rifle, after seeing that the charges were right, I strode out by an aperture so narrow that I could scarcely discern a faint glimmer of light at the extremity, and went on, slowly feeling my way, for I knew not what awful pit-fall might yawn before me till in the blessed sunshine once more. So, having taken a pull at my flask, I toiled on, and, after about an hour, found myself descending a mountain slope, not a vestige of the astounding vision I had seen being within sight; all lay hidden behind me, buried in silence and solitude, a vast and cavernous tomb, never again to be wended, perhaps, by the foot of man.

"Suddenly, however, I was brought up with a start, a cry of suppressed terror escaping my lips; for all of a moment I pulled up on the verge of a chasm some seven or eight feet wide, while it descended down, down below, as into a bottomless pit, lost in a darkness which the sun never lighted up.

"I had blindly, at sudden sight of this horrible chasm, cast my rifle across; and lo! a moment after, a mocking laugh greeted me; an olive-tinted scoundrel I had come into collision with before, and had no reason to love, stood on the opposite side, on a space somewhat lower than the one I occupied. By this he had caught up my rifle, and then put it butt down, leaning against the rock, and within reach of his hand.

"His laugh absolutely chilled me; but, besides his own rifle, he had also mine, and was doubly armed, and had a command of my life any moment he chose. I had no way of escape. Deliberately I saw him lift up his weapon, take aim at me, and I closed my eyes, feeling my knees double under me as I murmured a brief prayer.

"He fired. Why the bullet missed me, as it did, I know not, and attributed it to his having aimed at my head, which my momentary collapse removed out of his line. A moment, and I nerved myself to the worst.

"I sprang across the chasm like a panther, and found myself in his grasp, but my sword-shaped bayonet, which I had instinctively drawn, was driven through his breast, the force of the leap having given me this advantage, and we fell together on the platform."

"The impetus of my desperate leap cast us both at the moment from the extreme verge more upon the platform. I was faint with reaction, but this was speedily dissipated by feeling myself being drawn, by the last efforts of a dying, determined man, to the edge of the cursed chasm. He intended, no doubt, that we should both go down together.

"His body was hanging over the ledge, and by an effort I managed to release myself from his relaxing grasp, and then I heard—"

Here Steve slightly changed color.

"I heard that horrid crash which succeeds the fall of a human being from some great height—a sound that, I venture to say, has not its equivalent in nature; it carries a horror beyond words; and I fainted. . . .

"How I got back to Palermo safe and sound needs further details; but as I am here in good trim to tell you my story, why my service to you. Lucy, my love, a glass of wine, and if there's another cigar about, I'll thank you to hand it over."

HUMORS OF THE LAW.

OF MASTER AND SERVANT.

HAVING commented on the people in their public relations, we now come to private relations, including Master and Servant, Husband and Wife—which, by-the-by, is a relation something like that of master and servant, for the wife is often a slave to the husband—Parent and Child, and Guardian and Ward—the latter being a sort of relationship which is seen upon the stage, where a choleric old man with a stick is always thwarting the affections of a young lady in white muslin.

We shall begin with Master and Servant—showing how such relationship is created and destroyed. There is now no such thing as pure and proper slavery in England; so that a servant of all-work who says, "Hang that door-bell—I am a perfect slave to it," has recourse to a fiction.

England is so repugnant to slavery, that directly a negro sets his foot on English ground he is free; but if he has lost both his legs, he cannot of course put his foot on British soil, and would remain a slave to circumstances. A menial servant is so called from the word mœnia, which signifies walls, and arises probably from the practice of brushing down cobwebs from the mœnia, or walls, with a Turk's-head, or hair broom. The old doctrine of a month's wages or a month's warning is always acted on in London, except when a servant refuses to obey his master's orders, when it seems the master may give the servant kicks—and kick him out—instead of halfpence.

Another species of servants are called Apprentices, from the word apprendre, to learn; and thus a barber's apprentice learns to shave on the faces of poor people, who, in consideration of their paying nothing, allow themselves to be practised on by beginners who have never handled the razor.

Next come the Laborers, whose wages were formerly settled by justices of the peace at session, or the sheriff; but now the master settles the wages, or if he does not settle, he is a very shabby fellow for failing in doing so.

Stewards, Porters, and Bailiffs come next; but no one would think of having a bailiff as his servant, unless there were an execution in the house, and the bailiff were thrust into livery to save appearances.

A master may correct his apprentice for negligence; and if a grocer's apprentice neglects to sand the sugar, the master may give him the cane for neglecting his business.

A master may maintain or assist his servant in an action at law; and if one's footman happens to be a rightful heir in disguise, the master may lend him the money to go to law against the wrongful heir, for the purpose of recovering the property.

A master may assault a man for assaulting his servant, on the principle, probably, that in a row, as in everything else, the more the merrier.

"If any person do hire my servant," says F. N. B. 167, 168—but whether F. N. B. is a policeman or what, it is impossible to say, for we only find him alluded to in the books as F. N. B. 167, 168—"if any person do hire my servant," says he, "I may have an action for damages against both the new master and the servant, or either of them." This glorious old privilege is rather obsolete, for we do not find the courts much occupied in trying actions between ladies and gentlemen and their late menials.

The master is amenable, to a certain extent, for the act of his servant; and, therefore, if a servant commit a trespass by order of his master—such as if a gentleman riding by a field were to order his groom to jump over into it and pull up a turnip—the master, though he did not eat the whole of the turnip, or any of it, would be liable for the trespass. If an innkeeper's servant rob a guest, the innkeeper is liable, on the principle of like master like man; for the law very reasonably thinks that, if the servant is a thief, the master very likely may be.

If I usually pay my tradesman ready money, I am not liable if he trusts my servant; but if I do not usually pay him any money at all, then I am liable to pay the money—when he can get it out of me. This is on the authority of Noy's Maxims—and a maxim is always supposed to contain the maximum of wisdom.

By an old statute, called "An Act for the better and more careful use of the Frying-pan," it is provided that any servant who sets the house on fire by carelessness shall forfeit 100*l.*, or go to the workhouse, where the servant would forfeit so many pounds of flesh by the spareness of the diet; but this act, savoring too much of the spirit of Shylock, is now seldom acted on. A master is liable if anything is thrown from the window of a house; but it has been decided that if a house should be on fire, and a servant should throw himself on the indulgence of the public, by jumping amongst the crowd and should hurt any one, the master would not be liable, for this would not be wilful damage.

If a pea-shooter be discharged from the garret, and the pea enter the eye of a passenger, the pater-familias, or master of the house, is, in the eye of law, answerable for the pea in the eye of the stranger; for it is a common-law right, inherent in every one, to protect his own pupil.

Such are the leading features of the law of master and servant. The modern tiger has not been regarded by the ancient Constitution; but we find in Petersdoff's Abridgment a quaint allusion to the legs of footmen, some of whom, he says, appear to be regularly calved out for the prominent situations they occupy.—Gilbert Abbot a Beckett in "The Comic Blackstone."

A Virginia lawyer once objected to an expression of the Act of Assembly of Pennsylvania, that "the State-house yard should be surrounded by a brick wall and remain an open enclosure forever." "But," replied a Pennsylvanian who was present, "I put it down by that Act of the Legislature of Virginia, which is entitled 'A supplement to an Act to amend an Act making it penal to alter the mark of an unmarked hog.'"

Voltaire once praised another writer very heartily to a third person. "It is very sorange," was the reply, "that you speak so well of him, for he says that you are a charlatan." "Oh," replied Foltaire, "I think it very likely that both of us may be mistaken."

DON QUIXOTE DRAMATIZED.

A MELO-DRAMA, founded upon the renowned history of "Don Quixote," is the latest sensation in Paris. The play-wright was M. Sardou, and the theatre where the play is performed is the Gymnase. The London Times' correspondent thus describes the effect: The incidents in Don Quixote that have been dramatized by M. Sardou for the Gymnase are among the most familiar. The knight stalks upon the stage holding in his left hand an old volume bound in parchment, completely absorbed in its perusal. He wants to turn the leaf that clings to the next page, and he does it with a sword of immense length which he carries under his arm. He soon after makes his arrangements with "Sancho," and soon they both set out on their adventures. One of the first they meet with is that of the gang of galley slaves who are set free by the valiant arm of the knight. The scene of the wind-mill is exceedingly well got up. While "Don Quixote" looks at it, it suddenly, by the skill of the machinist, assumes the form of a giant, who grinds his teeth, brandishes a sword, and defies the knight, who in turn calls upon "Sancho" to look at the monster, while he himself proceeds to mount. When Sancho turns his head in that direction, lo and behold! the giant vanishes, and the wind-mill only is in motion. The knight bestrides Rosinante, and Sancho, with Dapple, keeps at a safe distance. He rushes at the sails, disappears, and the next moment you see a form on a white horse hurled through the air. After various pleasant incidents in the interior of the inn, we have the watching of the arms and the knighting of Don Quixote by the burly and good-natured landlord, who reads from a large volume some outlandish gibberish, and who lays in due form the sword on his shoulders. The full moon is shining, and gradually assumes the features of "Dulcinea," sheds tears, and then laughs as she disappears under a thick cloud. The feast of Gamacho is very well done. We see the ox roasted whole, festoons of fowl and game dangling from the trees, cheeses and loaves of bread piled to a great height, skins bursting with wine, and fifty cooks clean, bustling and joyous, preparing the banquet. Bands of dancers, boys and girls, fill up the intervals. The best tableau of the whole nine into which the piece is divided is that which represents, and with much fidelity, a square in Toledo on the day of a bull fight. The antiquated houses with their red tiles, their over-hanging balconies, and their drapery; guitars and castanettes sounding at every corner; the lamps burning before the image of the Virgin; the squabbles between the suspicious duennas and the gay señorita, the affray between the bull fighters and the students, all for the black eyes and sweet smiles that beam upon them from above. Amid the din and uproar is heard the bell of the Angelus. Instantly the multitude, men and women, young and old, high and low, fall down upon their knees, and repeat the prayer in the deepest silence. The Ave Maria over, the song, laugh and sport begin again. The piece is interlarded with episodes of his own by the dramatizer of 'Don Quixote;' they are common-place and tedious, and the audience seem anxious to get over them as quickly as possible to return to the knight and his squire. Indeed, it would be difficult to imagine a better representative for Don Quixote than M. Lesueur; or than M. Pradeau, who takes Sancho. Lesueur is tall, and one of the thinnest of men; and Pradeau, so long known as a favorite at the Bouffes, is, I am tempted to think, more like Sancho in face, figure and obesity than Sancho himself. Dapple is perfect, but Rosinante is in too good condition for the Rosinante of history. I must admit that both the steed and the ass go through their work with much credit. In truth, Lesueur seems to take his part in right earnest, and I would not affirm that in certain passages he does not persuade himself that he is the very Knight of La Mancha himself; Anne Chery (Mme. Lesueur) is the very picture of "Maritornes." The other characters—there are not less than thirty-six in the piece, exclusive of dancers—are creditably sustained. "Cardenio" is well got up by Berton; and Mme. Fremontin looks interesting as "Dorothea," whether in her woman's dress or disguised as a shepherd. The parts of "Lucinda" and "Juniata," are filled by Mlles. Pearson and Montaland, which is saying enough. On the whole, Don Quixote has been very successful, and would, perhaps, be more so if it were curtailed to similar proportions.

Uncomfortable Literature.—The literature of this day—so far, at least, as novels, serials, sketches, etc., go—might be classed under the head of "uncomfortable." No one ever rises from a work of fiction, written by a living popular author, feeling placid and content. Only now and then are any of the purer emotions awakened. As a general thing, to do them justice, sensation writers keep up a certain feverish interest, and wield the pen in a manner which makes one wonder why they do not do better things. But, nevertheless, the perusal of a modern novel has generally the same effect that might be supposed to arise from six months' residence in a jail, and confidential conversation with its worst inmates. Bigamy is always introduced with plausible excuses. Mothers commit such strange crimes as the murder of their infants and the concealment of their eldest sons, to spite their husbands. To assassinate is as common as to breakfast; delicate maidens have furious conflicts with ferocious bandits to whom they have been previously wedded, and fling them over precipices. Revenge is a prime virtue, and the best character in the book has always placed himself in the power of the worst one by the commission of some terrible crime. When one rises from the literary feast it is with a mental indigestion, owing to the consumption of too many horrors, heavy as lead, and unrelieved by any such light food as a pure woman, a man of principle, or an ordinarily honest person who would not murder his dearest friend for the sake of fortune, title, or revenge. We say again, the literature of this day is uncomfortable, and calculated to inspire the rising generation with the belief that theft (not of spoons, perhaps, but certainly of wills) is commendable, murder excusable, revenge a virtue, and an unfaithful wife a highly praiseworthy person, providing she has the excuse of being jealous without reason, and that all faults, lesser or greater, may be expiated by suicide.

NEW BOOKS.

Religion and Chemistry; or, Proofs of God's Plan in the Atmosphere and its Elements. Ten Lectures by Josiah P. Cooke, Jr., Erving Professor of Chemistry and Mineralogy in Harvard University. Roman & Co.

This work is printed on fine paper, in large, clear type, making it easy to the eye, and is of convenient size and form to handle. Its illustrations and diagrams to explain the text are distinct and intelligible to the most inexperienced in matters of science—a book admirably arranged in natural order and sequence, and written in the simple style always characteristic of the thorough student, earnest thinker and practiced author.

While claiming for science great power in elucidating the truth of religion on natural grounds, it is still eminently orthodox, and ably fixes the limit to scientific investigation, which, unrestrained, too often tends to scepticism in its form of pantheistic rationalism. It draws from the atmosphere and its elements, by a discussion of its composition and laws, the most absolute and conclusive proof, short of revelation, of the existence of a Divine Creator from the design seen in his works, and beautifully unfolds to the scientific mind as well as the popular understanding the unity that pervades all the works of creation. What the labors of Dugald Stewart and others are to moral, this is to physical science. It is a most readable book—fit to be closely studied or lightly perused, as may suit the reader's quality.

—

Theory and Practice of the Movement Cure. Roman & Co.

This book by Charles Fayette Taylor, M. D., treats of the method of curing disease of the spine, paralysis, indigestion, angular curvatures and other deformities and diseases of both sexes, and gives cuts and directions for following the course laid down in its system. It is a work of 300 pages, and seems to apply a system of gymnastic exercises to the cure of diseases, and describes clearly the action of particular exercises upon the diseased portion of the body. It is an useful book, and by its directions medicine can be dispensed with in the cure of many of the ills that flesh and bone are heir to.

—

Alcohol and Tobacco; a Work on the Use and Abuse of Tobacco. By John Lizars. Roman & Co.

A perusal of this work rather startles a smoker and chewer, and gives one an idea of the silent work going on in the system, while the absorber fancies he is enjoying himself hugely. It certainly shows that a man must sooner or later feel the pernicious influences of alcohol and tobacco, unless his stomach is made of leather. Let smokers and absorbers read it, and then make their calculations on the length of time they will last under a continuation of the evils, and whether it is not best to heed the facts there laid down and "moderate" a little.

—

Hall's Master and Masonic Monitor; a guide to Master of Lodges in the doctrines and work of Freemasonry, by John K. Hall. San Francisco: Roman & Co.

A snug little pamphlet beautifully got up with gilt edges, no larger than a pocket memorandum-book and useful to all masons.

—

Philosophy of Marriage in its Moral, Social and Physical Relations. By Michael Ryan, M. D. Roman & Co.

[BY THE "CALIFORNIAN'S" POETICAL REVIEWER.]

—

SPECTROPIA; or, Surprising Spectral Illusions, showing Ghosts Everywhere, and of any Color. With sixteen Illustrations. San Francisco: Roman.

I HAVE found out a gift for my fair—
I know how a skeleton's made;
O come, we'll a spectre prepare,
When this little hook we've surveyed.
Nay, dearest, 'tis perfectly true:
Gaze hut at this small asterisk
One minute, and straightway you'll view
A gorgon or gay hasilisk!

The method I'll simply explain,
When I gaze on those fountains of blue,
My crystalline humors retain
A duplicate vision of you;
The retina often will hold
A trace of the object gone by—
So most of the ghost-stories told
Are apt to he "all in my eye."

—

THE CRUISE OF THE ALABAMA AND SUMTER, from the Private Journals and other papers of Commander Semmes and other officers. San Francisco: Sold by Roman & Co.

SALT sea Guerrilla,
What is, I pray,
Thy share of siller,
Should this book pay?
Or, if some publisher
Stole it from thee,
Thou wast the victim—
The pirate is he!

O Alabama!
Likewise, O Semmes!
Some of thy grammar
Murray condemns;
And for the snatches
Thy lines reveal,
Prigging of watches
Isn't genteel!

Mustached dandy,
Confess that animus furandi
Governed thy plan.
Why turned thy tiller
At chance of fray—
Salt sea Guerrilla,
Whither away?

HAPPENINGS OF THE WEEK.

—

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 9TH.

OPENS beautifully and calmly as a pan of milk on a summer's morning. A general rush of the foreign element down to the briny element at the beach, to see the two whales, which now treat the visitors to two distinct odors—the one being an O dear! of greater antiquity than the other, which is—O heavens! A big lubber taking off the blubber a-crying shame, and as bad as the Jerseyites at Squam Beach, who outstrip any other people in their world. Trying out oil must be very trying to their constitutions; but if they can stand it in such close proximity to the monster of the beach, we certainly can at this distance, and distance assuredly lends freshness to the smell.

—

MONDAY, OCTOBER 10TH.

THE fish question still in a scaly condition. The anglers find the course of strikes rather angular and hard to travel; but they do not abait in their demands. They want the license reduced so that they can peddle, and have petitioned the Board of Supervisors to that effect, but they have not yet taken official action upon it.

Mr. and Mrs. Kean make their second appearance this evening. At the Academy of Music, Crown Diamonds.

Uncle Freddy Coombs indignantly repudiates the brooms; says he is no Ranger, and is to their principles a stranger; was not in the "procession" seen—may be yellow; but not so green.

Police force gains one recruit. A star baby born to one of the old guard.

The San Francisco and Alameda Railroad Company have ordered a new double-ender ferry boat, similar to those in use on the ferries at New York; and a good reason for adopting that rule will be that it will work both ways. It may puzzle gentlemen full of "lager" to decide which way they are going, but that don't matter as long as they pay their fare.

J. W. Tucker gets his receipt in full for all liabilities from Judge Cowles.

James H. Ballard also settles up.

Forty-eight voters made to-day—adding that number to the native population who will go for "Linkum" sure.

A lady of Irish extraction, who has fraternized with a gentleman from China, and finds it anything but a Celestial sphere, because John gives striking proof of his affection, applies at the station-house for protection from the tea-dium of domestic infelicities.

The Great Cheese is going East.

William Birch, Esq., seen in Montgomery street in good condition for the evening's performance at the Eureka.

Conclude to speak to Norris and Dick Jessup again, as the California Steam Navigation Company declares a dividend, which is "werry" acceptable.

William Tinder, a young gentleman who took fire at some remarks and fell to saying hard things of the Chief Magistrate, discharged for want of proof to convict him. What he said was probably not his honest convictions, but in a Pickwickian sense. William, you should not do so—it's no neither proper nor genteel.

Chief Burke converts the Mechanics' Fair Pavilion into a drill-room. A good idea. A fine place for light skirmishers—plenty of room. We saw during the Fair over a thousand infantry there.

—

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 11TH.

Two hundred and fifty Celestial gentlemen, who are supposed to have made their piles, depart to-day for Hongkong, taking with them the latest fashions, Colt's pistols, cartes de visite, and last, not least, an idea that California is a pretty fast country, and sometimes rather hurrying to John.

A large fire on Goat Island destroys the city, consisting of one house. The boys did not get to the fire.

Ah Yu, will you kidnap a respectable lady from the Flowery Land and deprive her of that liberty so dear to every American citizen woman from China or any other country. Ah Yu did it anyhow, and special officer D. M. Lewis, for helping you, got permission to "travel" and consider himself permanently an outsider.

Stock looking up and people coming down quite handsomely for Gould and Curry, Chollar, etc. There's a good time coming.

A wide difference of opinion on the question of widening Kearny street.

The Richmond papers claim that Col. Witcher made a raid, capturing and destroying a million dollars worth of Yankee property, which-ar a whopper.

The Tiger engine boys house their new machine, and have a jolly time.

—

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 12TH.

A CHINAMAN, Un Go by name, steals a pair of pants and runs away, but it was no go; and he must have been as crazy as a loon (pantaloon) to have expected to outrun some of these new long-legged policemen, who appear to have been selected for their length, which will go a long way towards bringing culprits within their reach.

The McClellan men were out gay last evening. It is right jolly to have these big processions and demonstrations, as the music is good and they enliven up things generally—furnish business to the painters. Of course, the object is perfectly transparent, and it is easy enough to see through the dodge; but if there were not two sides to politics there would be no fun.

A suspicion of rain; and sharp-eyed people begin to look round for umbrellas left in stray corners last spring. THE CALIFORNIAN has a good stock on hand, having "hagged" four on the first shower, a few days since.

—

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 13TH.

THE great cheese gone.

Steamer Constitution sailed to-day, and so did Captain Chadwick, of the Chrysopolis, who goes East to see if he can't do something towards removing the political "Hog's Back," and to enjoy himself.

Paul Julien's concert last evening was a grand affair. The Metropolitan Theatre crowded, and more white bonnets, red cloaks, white cloaks and red gloves, than we have seen together for some time.

Capt. John C. Cremony, who has been serving for three years in the cavalry service down in that God-forsaken country, Arizona, has returned to San Francisco, to taste the pleasures of civilization and get a snuff of cool fresh air once more. Glad to see him!

—

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 14TH.

WEATHER threatening and murky. If it intends to rain, why don't it and not be fooling the community into buying umbrellas and losing them in advance. (THE CALIFORNIAN makes one more, coming five now.) Sun came out finally, much to the disappointment of any number of ladies, who crowded Montgomery street in hopes of a rain, that they might get bedraggled, or illustrate the utility of the pucker-your-dress style.

Great race to-day between Real Del Monte and Chollar—i. e.—the pacing mare Unknown and the horse Fillmore. It is calculated that the latter will fill more pockets than he empties. Hope nobody's choler will rise thereat.

Wambold's benefit this evening. He goes to the race with a grey horse and comes back with a very pretty brown filly.

Inigo goes to the race also. Everybody goes.

The Foreman of THE CALIFORNIAN says nothing more must happen this week, as he has not room for another item.

P. S.—Peakes has a new hat, a real Pyrence, peaked-crowned feller. He looks gay in it, does "me baby Lahlaehe.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

AT Maguire's Opera House on Saturday evening, the Keans opened with Henry VIII. to a very large attendance. The applause which followed the entrance of these famous artists would have been more general, but the majority of a California audience are youthful, and there were few present who remembered and recognised at first the actors who, twenty years ago, created such a furore in the Atlantic cities. Charles Kean still displays that artistic education and polish which age cannot rob him of, and also some of those mannerisms which he could not well part with without losing his originality. His voice was at times uncertain and uneven, but in the trick of accent and emphasis, subdued action and subtile analysis, his original genius flashed bright as ever through the courtly and crafty lips of "Cardinal Wolsey." The "Queen Catherine" of Mrs. Kean was a most finished and elaborate conception; and, in her vital power and vigor of dramatic execution, excelled her husband, whose character gave but little scope for action. The Jealous Wife was perhaps a more satisfactory performance to the audience generally, and in Louis XI. on Wednesday evening, both artists appeared to better advantage. To-night the Wife's Secret and Monday the Merchant of Venice.

The Richings opera troupe began their new season of opera at the Academy of Music on Monday night with Crown Diamonds. The house was well attended in spite of out-door political excitement and rival attractions. The orchestra, reconstructed and much improved, did full justice to the instrumentation of Auber's beautiful opera. The first act passed off very smoothly, although the music seemed rather high for the tenor. There was some jarring in the second and third acts, in which Mr. Peakes ("Count Campo Mayor") was frequently at fault. A little more study of his part would have obviated the difficulty, and a little forethought have prevented such minor blunders as standing with his back to his Queen while she was addressing him. A duet between "Diana" (Miss Kempton) and "La Catarina" (Miss Richings) in the second act was very prettily sung. The opera was well set on the stage, and, as a whole, creditably performed. When we consider that in Europe, six months is given for the rehearsal of a new opera, we can the better appreciate the hasty efforts of our troupe. The house will be closed to-night, in deference to the great political demonstration. On Sunday the Crown Diamonds will be repeated. Don Pasquale on Monday, which should draw a full house. In rehearsal, La Fiancée, or the National Guard; also Boildieu's opera (in French) of La Dame Blanche, and Meyerbeer's opera of Dinorah.

THE Eureka continues to be well filled every night. D. S. Wambold had a well-deserved bumper of a benefit last evening. Manager Coes has announced on his posters the coming production of a "new comic Opera entitled The Runaway Husband." Probably this husband has run away from the Academy of Music. Have they missed a new opera from their repertoire there?

GILBERT'S Museum has the Carolina Slave dwarf, and a "young Hercules" (who handles snakes with remarkable familiarity) for its new novelties. The Cosmoramic Views, the life-sized figures of President Lincoln, McClellan and others, and the numerous other attractions, not forgetting the mammoth African Lion, who receives all visitors with such majestic amiability, serve to add to its features and attractions.

THE Knickerbockers' (No. 5) Anniversary Festival will be given at Platt's Hall on Monday evening next. A fine concert will precede the ball, in which Signor and Signora Bianchi, and Mr. De. Haga, will appear, supported by an efficient orchestra. Mrs. Sophie Edwin will recite "Drake's address to the American Flag," and Charley Schultz has composed a new march, entitled the "Grand Knickerbocker March," dedicated to the company, with which he will open the ball. Besides this, nearly all the belles in town are expected to grace Number 5's Fourteenth Anniversary Festival. The "Knicks" have yielded a willing efficiency to the call of the bell for years past, and doubtless will be more willing than ever to attend to the call of the belles on the night in question.

JUST before his death, Meyerbeer authorised the representation and publication of l'Africaine. Conformably to the wish of the illustrious composer, Madame Meyerbeer, on the 12th of August, signed a contract with M. Perrin, director of the Imperial Opera. L'Africaine was to be put in rehearsal immediately after the above arrangement was effected, and will be brought out in February next. Already seats have been secured for the first representation.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

A PAPER FOR THE TIMES.

Devoted to Live Topics,

AND THE

BEST INTERESTS OF CALIFORNIA.

Is published

EVERY SATURDAY MORNING,

AT

328 MONTGOMERY STREET.

Nothing will be spared that will enable THE CALIFORNIAN to appeal to the Public for support, not only as the

BEST JOURNAL ON THE PACIFIC COAST,

But also as being

THE EQUAL OF ANY ON THIS CONTINENT!

Paper of a superior quality and weight is being made

EXPRESSLY FOR THE CALIFORNIAN;

THE BEST TALENT OF THE STATE

Is employed upon THE CALIFORNIAN, and arrangements have been made with contributers abroad for

EASTERN AND FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE.

The voluntary notices bestowed by the press of the Eastern cities have been no less warm and congratulatory than those which we have received at the hands of our cotemporaries of the Pacific. Their verdict is unanimously in favor of

THE CALIFORNIAN,

and all join in pronouncing their unqualified approval of its unequalled merits.

Its reputation is now fully established. It is not

EXCELLED BY ANY LITERARY JOURNAL

on the Continent.

Let the people of the mountains and the valleys

BUY THE CALIFORNIAN!

Let every lover of choice literature throughout the States and Territories of the Pacific coast

READ THE CALIFORNIAN!

Let no family be without this paper, which, as an Eastern cotemporary remarks, is creditable to the people who sustain it. Therefore,

SUBSCRIBE

FOR THE

CALIFORNIAN!

THE TERMS OF THE CALIFORNIAN are $5 per year by mail to subscribers, invariably in advance; 50 cents per month served by carriers.

All communications and correspondence must be addressed to "THE CALIFORNIAN,"

Office, No. 328 Montgomery street,

SAN FRANCISCO.

THE ANNUAL MEETING OF THE STOCKHOLDERS of the Indian Valley Gold and Silver Mining Company will be held at my office, corner of California and Montgomery streets, on TUESDAY, OCTOBER 18th, at 7 o'clock, P. M., for the election of Officers for the ensuing year, and such other business as may come before it.

R. L. OGDEN,
oc15-1t President Indian Valley G. & S. M. Co.

MR. CHRETIEN PFISTER, No. 221 Montgomery street, under the Russ House, respectfully calls the attention of the public to his extensive assortment of Perfumery, Brushes, Hair-pins, Hair of all lengths and colors, Wigs, Toupes, Combs of every style; Cravats of all kinds; Jouvin's Gloves for ladies and gentlemen; Suspenders, Shirts and Collars; new styles of Head Dresses, and all the latest Parisian accessories of the Lady's and Gentleman's toilet table. Having made new arrangements with his agent in Paris, he can now offer to his numerous customers superior advantages over any others in the trade. Six artist coiffeurs will always be found ready for business in the hair-dressing room. A special apartment is provided for the coiffure of ladies.

TO THE PUBLIC.—Go to the South Beach Bathing House, foot of Third street, near the Camanche, for comfort, pleasure or health; where can be found at all hours warm, cold, or shower Salt Water Baths. The water is taken through pipes extending over five hundred feet in the bay, and as pure as can be drawn from the ocean. The public have only to give this place a trial to satisfy themselves that this is the best fitted up Bathing House in this city—the North Beach House having blown up.

N. B.—The boiler and machinery are entirely separate from the Bathing House.

oc15-tf STACY, Proprietor.

THE CRITERION OF FINE TASTE.—"She uses the Extract of the 'NIGHT BLOOMING CEREUS,'" is a remark that extinguishes all doubts as to a lady's taste in perfumes. What the America was among yachts this extract is among its would-be rivals,—"so far first it has no second." Manufactured by PHALON & SON, New York, and sold by all Druggists.

* HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN, Wholesale Agents.

HAVE YOUR PIANOFORTES TUNED BY A Competent Workman. Leave orders at

oc8 KOHLER'S Music Store.

IMPORTANT TRIUMPH OF SCIENCE!

YEARS of patient research and unwearied experiment, kindly assisted by the first

SCIENTIFIC AND PROFESSIONAL CHARACTER

In New York, have produced and perfected

CHEVALIER'S

Life for the Hair!

THE BEST HAIR DRESSING

ever offered to the public. IT RESTORES GRAY HAIR TO ITS ORIGINAL COLOR, giving it a Fresh and Natural appearance; braces the Pores, strengthens the weakest Hair, promotes a LUXURIANT GROWTH, and

Will Stop its Falling Out in Three Days!

Keeps the head clean, cool and healthy, removes all irritation from the skin, and is an excellent remedy for

NERVOUS AND ALL FORMS OF HEADACHE,

Does not stain the skin or soil the whitest fabric. Is entirely different from any other preparation, and composed mostly of vegetable substances. Is a clean, delightful Hair Dressing, by the use of which you cannot have a gray Hair in your head.

The entire freedom from all injurious qualities (that in many other preparations injure the Hair and soil the clothes,) the nicety of the composition, and its render it the most desirable article for the toilet and hair-dressing yet offered to the public.

SWEET AND DELICATE PERFUME

CHEVALIER'S LIFE FOR THE HAIR

IS WARRANTED!

to produce the results claimed for it, when used according to directions.

Put up in neat paper Boxes, and for sale by

c8 H. P. WAKELEE.

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

The following steamships will be despatched in the month of OCTOBER, 1864:

OCTOBER 22d, - - - - - - - SACRAMENPO

From Folsom-street Wharf, at nine o'clock, A. M., punctually,

FOR PANAMA.

Passengers will be conveyed from Panama to Aspinwall by the PANAMA RAILROAD COMPANY, and from Aspinwall to New York by the ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

A. B. FORBES, Agent P. M. S. Co.,
oc1 Cor Sacramento and Leidesdorff sts.

FIRST PREMIUM

Billiard Table Manufactory.

P. LIESENFELT,

No. 612 Battery street, between Jackson and Pacific,

SAN FRANCISCO.

Constantly on hand a large assortment of the Best Billiard Tables, with the modern improvements, as well as Billiard Trimmings, of every description, at the lowest prices.

☞ All goods warranted. oc3-1m

FIRST PREMIUM

Awarded by the Mechanics' Institute Fair,

SAN FRANCISCO, SEPTEMBER, 1864.

R. LIDDLE & CO.,

Sporting Emporium!

418 WASHINGTON ST.,

(Near Post-office,)

SAN FRANCISCO.

GUN & RIFLE MAKERS,

AND

Importers of all Classes

OF

SPORTING TACKLE!

Constantly on hand Guns from the first makers of London, viz., William Greener, William Moore, Moore & Harris, Redfern, Hollis & Son, and all other makers. Also the best stock of American Rifles, Pistols, and Carbines on the Pacific Coast, viz.: Colt's, Sharp's, Smith & Wesson's Remington's, and all the latest patents of Pistols. Sharp's, Wesson's, Ballards, Spencer's and Henry's Patent Breech-loading Rifles.

☞ Cartridges of all kinds constantly on hand.

☞ We are the only authorized agents for the genuine "Greener Guns" on the Pacific Coast.

Authorized agents for Henry's Patent Breech-loading Rifle. oc8-3m

---

W. P. HARRISON & Co.,
PRINTERS,
Engravers and Electrotypers,
PRINTERS' WAREHOUSE,
417 Clay street.

oc8-3m

STERETT'S

STEAM

PRINTING HOUSE,

533

CLAY STREET.

J. R. MEADE & CO.,

Importers, Wholesale and Retail Dealers

—IN—

Fine Clothing

—AND—

GENTLEMEN'S

FURNISHING GOODS,

TRUNKS, VALISES, CARPET BAGS, &c.,

200 & 202 Montgomery Street, Corner of Bush,

SAN FRANCISCO.

Canton Tea Store, Established 1858.

GEO. S. HASKELL & CO.

IMPORTERS,
WHOLESALE AND RETAIL DEALERS
— IN —
JAPAN AND CHINA TEAS,
AND
GROCERIES.

Store fronting on

514 Market & 15 Sutter St.

☞ THREE DOORS ☜

BELOW THE MARKET HOUSE,

San Francisco.

Our Motto, ☞ "Large Sales at Small Profits for Cash. ☜

SAN FRANCISCO AND SAN JOSE RAILROAD.

CHANGE OF TIME.

On and after OCTOBER 1st, 1864, Passenger Trains of the San Francisco and San Jose Railroad Company will run as follows:

Leave San Francisco at 8:30 A. M., 10:30 A. M., and 4 P. M.

Leave San Jose at 8.10 A. M. and 3:40 P. M.

SUNDAY TRAINS

Leave San Francisco at 8.30 and 10:30 A. M. and 4 P. M.

Leave San Jose at 8:10 A. M. and 3.40 and 6:30 P. M.

FREIGHT TRAINS

Leave daily (Sundays excepted) as follows: San Francisco at 4:45 P. M.; San Jose at 6 A. M.

A. H. HOUSTON,
8o General Superintendent.

PIANOFORTES TO RENT—NO CHARGE FOR KEEPING them in tune. Leave orders at

A. KOHLER'S Music Stores,
620 and 622 Washington street,
oc8 and 424 Sansome street.

RICHES HAVE WINGS.—Nothing illustrates this more forcibly than the recent fall in mining Stocks. Therefore, provide a certainty for your family in the future by insuring your life in the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company—cash assets, $6,500,000.

BIGELOW & BRO., Agents,
'y30-1m Over Parrott's Bank.

PACIFIC

Insurance Company,

436 CALIFORNIA STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO.

INSURE AGAINST LOSS OR DAMAGE

BY FIRE,

On Buildings, Merchandise, Wares, and other Personal Property.

CASH CAPITAL - - - - - - - - $750,000

ALL PAID UP IN GOLD COIN,

All Losses payable in United States Gold Coin.

The Personal Liability of Stockholders, under the Law of this State, recognized.

J. HUNT, President.
A. J. RALSTON, Secretary. oc8

RAILROAD HOUSE,

316, 318, AND 320 COMMERCIAL STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO.

THE Undersigned respectfully begs leave to inform the travelling public that he has assumed the entire charge of the above House, and had the same thoroughly renovated, and put in complete order. New furniture has been added, and he flatters himself that in point of cleanliness and comfort the House will compare favorably with any in the city.

Being conducted on the European plan the affords an extra inducement for travellers, and no pains or expense will be spared to make it as pleasant and popular a stopping place as can be found in the city, and at much lower rates than respectable accommodations can be found elsewhere.

RAILROAD HOUSE

The RAILROAD HOUSE COACH will convey passengers to the house, free of charge.

☞ BARBER SHOP, with Warm, Cold and Steam Baths connected with the House.

oc8-3m C. L. ROSS.

H. P. WAKELEE,

CORNER OF MONTGOMERY AND SUTTER STREETS,

IMPORTER OF

F. M. Farina's Cologne,
Lubin's Perfumes and Soaps,
Prout's Tooth and Hair Brushes,
Low's Old Windsor and Honey Soap,
Eau Lustrale, Pomades, Tooth Powders,

DRESSING CASES,

And other elegant articles for the the Toilet.

Agent for Nelson's Extract of ROSE AND ROSEMARY, for the Hair. se24

BURDELL'S

Oriental Tooth Wash.

SOUND AND WHITE TEETH

Are Indispensable to Personal Attraction, and to Health and Longevity, by proper mastication of the food.

THIS UNIQUE PREPARATION IS OF INESTIMABLE value in preserving and beautifying the Teeth, strengthening the Gums and in imparting a delicate fragrance to the breath. It eradicates tartar from the Teeth, removes spots of incipient decay, and polishes and preserves the enamel, to which it imparts a PEARL-LIKE WHITENESS.

Its anti-sceptic and anti-scorbutic properties exercises a highly beneficial and salutary influence; they arrest the further progress of the decay of Teeth, induce a healthy action of the Gums, and cause them to assume the brightness and color indicative of perfect soundness; while, by confirming their adhesion to the Teeth, they give unlimited enjoyment and fresh zest to appetite, by perpetuating effective and complete mastication. It speedily removes those ravages which children sustain in the teeth, owing to the improper use of sweet and acid substances.

Sold by all Druggists, and by

H. P. WAKELEE,

Corner Montgomery and Sutter streets, and corner Bush and Montgomery streets. se24

$300! $300!

NEW SEVEN-OCTAVE PIANOS,

OF THE BEST AMERICAN MAKERS,

For Three Hundred Dollars and upwards, at WALTER S. PIERCE & CO.'s Pianoforte Warerooms, No. 26 Montgomery street, Opposite the Lick House. oc8

MARKET STREET RAILROAD.

CHANGE OF TIME TABLE.

ON AND AFTER APRIL 1, 1864, Trains will start from the City and the Mission as follows:

Between the hours of 8:20 A. M. and 6 P. M., every 40 minutes, instead of, as heretofore, every 30 minutes, thus

FROM THE MISSION.

9:40	10:20	11:00	11:40

FROM THE CITY

10:00	10:40	11:20	12:00

And so on till 6 o'clock.

Before 9 A. M. and after 6 P. M., the running will be the same as before.

my28 F. McCOPPIN, Superintendent.

THE MURDER AT THE INN.

JONATHAN BRADFORD kept an inn on the London road to Oxford, in the year 1736. Mr. Hays, a gentleman of fortune, being on his way to Oxford, put up at Bradford's, and there joined company with two gentlemen, with whom he supped. In conversation he unguardedly mentioned that he had about him a large sum of money. In due time they retired to their respective chambers; the two gentlemen to a double bedded room, leaving a candle burning in the chimney corner.

Some hours after they were in bed, one of the gentlemen being awake, thought he heard a deep groan in the adjoining chamber, and this being repeated, he softly awakened his friend. They listened together, and the groans increasing, as of some one dying, they both instantly arose, and proceeded silently to the door of the next chamber, from whence they heard the groans. The door being ajar, they saw light in the room: they entered, but it is impossible to paint their consternation on perceiving a person weltering in his blood in the bed, and a man standing over him with a dark lantern in one hand and a knife in the other. The man seemed as petrified as themselves; but his terror carried with it all the terror of guilt! The gentlemen soon discovered the murdered person was the stranger with whom they had that night supped, and that the man who was standing over him was their landlord. They seized Bradford directly, disarmed him of his knife, and charged him with being the murderer: he assumed by this time the air of innocence, positively denied the crime, and asserted that he came there with the same humane intentions as themselves; for that hearing a noise, which was succeeded by a groaning, he got out of bed, struck a light, armed himself with a knife for his defence, and had but that minute entered the room before them.

These assertions were of little avail: he was kept in close custody till the morning, and then taken before a neighboring justice of the peace. Bradford still denied the murder, but, nevertheless, with such apparent indication of guilt, that the magistrate hesitated not to make use of this extraordinary expression on writing out his committal: "Mr. Bradford, either you or myself committed this murder."

This extraordinary affair was the conversation of the whole country. Bradford was tried and condemned, over and over again, in every company. In the midst of all this predetermination came on the assizes at Oxford. Bradford was brought to trial, and pleaded "Not guilty." Nothing could be more strong than the evidence of the two gentlemen; they testified to the finding Mr. Hayes murdered in his bed; Bradford at the side of the body with a light and a knife; that knife, and the hand which held it, bloody; that on entering the room he betrayed all the signs of a guilty man, and that a few moments preceding they had heard the groans of the deceased.

Bradford's defence on the trial was the same as before the gentlemen: he had heard a noise: he suspected some villany transacting; he struck a light; he snatched a knife (the only weapon near him) to defend himself; and the terrors he discovered were merely the terrors of humanity, the natural effects of innocence as well as guilt, on beholding such a horrid scene.

This defence, however, could be considered but as weak contrasting with several powerful circumstances against him. Never was circumstantial evidence more strong. There was little need of comment from the judge in summing up the evidence. No room appeared for extenuation—the jury brought in the prisoner "Guilty," even without going out of the box. Bradford was executed shortly after, still declaring he was not the murderer, nor privy to the murder of Mr. Hayes; but he died disbelieved by all.

Yet were those assertions true! The murder was actually committed by Mr. Hayes' footman, who, immediately on stabbing his master, rifled his breeches of his money, gold watch, and snuff-box, and escaped to his own room; which could have been, from after circumstances, scarcely two seconds before Bradford's entering the apartment of the unfortunate gentleman. The world owes this knowledge to a remorse of conscience in the footman (eighteen months after the execution of Bradford) on a bed of sickness; it was a death-bed repentance, and by that death the law lost its victim.

It is much to be wished that this account could close here, but it cannot. Bradford, though innocent, and not privy to the murder, was, nevertheless, the murderer in design. He had heard, as well as the footman, what Mr. Hayes had declared at supper, as to his having a large sum of money about him, and he went to the chamber with the same diabolical intentions as the servant. He was struck with amazement!—he could not believe his senses!—and in turning back the bed-clothes, to assure himself of the fact, he, in his agitation, dropped his knife on the bleeding body, by which both his hands and the knife became bloody. These circumstances Bradford acknowledged to the clergyman who attended him after his sentence.

The wayside inn where the tragedy took place was long afterwards declared to be haunted, not only by the ghost of the murdered gentleman, but likewise by that of Jonathan Bradford, who was frequently seen, it was said, with the halter round his neck.

THE Paleontologist finds no trace in nature of the golden age of the world of which the poets delighted to sing, when all creatures lived together in unbroken peace, and war and bloodshed were unknown. Ever since animal life began upon our planet, there existed, in all the departments of being, carniverous classes, who could not live but by the death of their neighbors, and who were armed, in consequence, for their destruction, like the butcher with his axe and knife, and the angler with his hook and spear.—Hugh Miller.

LET us assert that in the Divine government the matter of fact always determines the question of right, and that whatever has been done by him who rendereth no account to man of his matters, he had in all ages and in all places an unchallengable right to do.—Hugh Miller.

SOUTHERN INSECTS.

IT is, however, impossible to enumerate one's entomological opportunities, whether when sitting within the southern mansion, or inhaling the perfume of trailing and festooned roses upon the piazza. While the microscope is revealing to delighted eyes the wonderful apparatus by which the handsome "yellow jacket" carves one's skin, other delights, large and small, will hover round, or settle on one's cuff, especially in the shape of lovely little gem-like creatures which are simply beautiful, and as innocent as beauty should be. Plenty of these will come, quiet, graceful, pellucid—elegant insects, of every color, whose entire organism is discernible through the transparent membrane which we call skin—a heart, or lungs, or some strange digestive apparatus of two simple longitudinal serrated valves, palpitating to and fro, seeming, after all, to be all it has inside it, and to leave nothing else to palpitate; so exquisitely delicate, so slight and tender is each little thing of life; so fragile, yet so perfect, that as one gazes from its wonderful body to the lovely wings, its lustrous eyes, and its articulated antennæ, then, moving aside the lens held over it, can scarcely discern the fairy marvel.

We need not permit attention to be distracted by those myriads of ephemera that dart under the hat or down the throat; they are not venomous, only numerous; they are harmless as the pretty green lizard that has lost its way among the folds of your skirt, and is now running up your sleeve, whence it is as glad to get away as you can be to part with it. I once had one upon my head. Its feet were, no doubt, entangled in my hair, for I felt a wonderful fuss and scuffling, and thought that some monstrous insect must be entertaining bad designs upon my scalp; when suddenly a lady, with a loud shriek, still more alarming than the fuss and scuffle I had felt, aimed a great blow at my head, and I turned in astonishment in time to catch sight of the terrified little creature in its coat of lovely green, as it was vanishing beneath the sofa. Not all the combined efforts—prompted by horrors—of the household could get me another peep; so lithe and rapid were its movements that it had glided away through some imperceptible chink long ago.

In his sylvan ramble the only difficulty of the entomologist will be to know which first to secure of all the dazzling creatures that flit round. The air is alive with them. The cicada, from every branch rings forth its incessant whizzing clicking buzz, crescendo ad diminuendo, responsively or in chorus. Suddenly a splendid fellow with wings of burnished gold and crimson will start up, and as suddenly sink again invisible upon a fallen stem. In vain I seek for it, till again like a flash of fire he rises, and then vanishes once more. He settled close before me, but he is also a cicada, though not of the noisy tribe above; and, when he alights, his lovely wings are so compactly folded that he cannot be distinguished from the dingy bark.

After the entomologist has filled his specimen-boxes, he seldom knows how much he carries home about him. The thermometer stands at one hundred degrees, and he throws himself into a chair at the well-supplied table for his evening meal. Sweet and savory dishes are attractive not to him alone. Not one flitting, hopping, crawling entomological specimen that has visited him during the day is now without its representative, from the great feathery lepidoptera that will come flopping into the lamp, and hurling itself among the glasses, or falling helplessly into the sugar-basin, or the huge coloptera, two or three inches long, with terrible mandibles and wonderful antennæ, too innumerable smaller beetles, black, brown and green: daddy-long-legs appears with a length of limb incredible; moths come, gnats and mosquitoes—flies, of course, and nondescripts innumerable. Such a buzzing and such a dashing, and such a flirting out of candles, such charges at your nose, such an entanglement of creatures among curls or whiskers, or the braids of hair; such mad plunges into the cream-jug or at preserves, and rash attacks upon soft butter-pats, whence there is no escape; such spinning and fizzing round your teacup, or under the knife and fork upon your plate; such incessant work for servants and children in the catching and despatching of these evening visitors, would be the death of a timid maiden lady of delicate Northern nerves: but the entomologist then dines in Paradise.

At length he beats a retreat to his chamber. The evening breeze comes gratefully through the open windows, but so also do the fresh specimens. In a few moments entangled legs and wings are struggling round the candle-wicks. The room is noisy with the monsters that dash against walls and ceiling, whence the concussion sends them whizzing to the floor. The candles are almost extinguished by their reckless assaults, and, in spite of the intolerable heat, even the sated entomologist is fain to close the windows in order that he may take his bath in peace. Then he finds that his skin, moist and sensitive from perspiration, is speckled all over. With what? Not only red spots and itching tumors, but with scores of little dark brown creatures, clinging and grappling so firmly that he cannot brush them off. With delight he recognizes in them divers species of "ticks," but he must detach each one quickly and carefully, and think himself lucky to have espied them soon enough. However, he must discard from his chamber every garment he wore in the woods, for only the laundress can effectually rid him of the foreign multitude which has established colonies thereon.

That strange excrescence growing out of one shoulder, and another in his side, a third on his ribs, and more elsewhere, puzzle him for a minute. He must go close to the candle, and will find these to be halves of ticks of a larger kind—half only of each, the rest of the specimen being buried deeply, head-foremost, in his own flesh. Our friend will be very careful how he pulls them out, for these shining, tough little suctoria may be cut in two sometimes before one can dislodge them. The entomologist will probably find himself the habitat of three varieties of these small crab-like ticks. What with ticks proper, and those locally called red bugs, answering to our English harvest bugs, but which in the South arrive with the fruits and flowers of May, jiggers, chiggers, or chegoes and chinches; piques, nigua or tingua: punez, betes-rouges, cirons des paupieres, brulots, and all other biting, stinging and penetrating creatures, one gets such a mottled result that it is impossible to decide which is the identical red bump or tumor that each insect has produced.

One other description of a minute tormentor can no more be evaded here than we can evade the ever-present specimen itself in that prolific sunny South. It is certainly not one of the acari, "whose motions are rather slow," or the "ricini, that live exclusively on the class aves," though it might even be the terrible sarcopata, that "were carried away to the sea in baskets-full." Its local name is chicken-mite, but whether it has eight legs, or whether it leaps or flies, I cannot declare. There is no escaping him. Like the chegoe, he attacks the freshly-landed European, which proves—as the illustrious Humboldt declared—that these little horrors "can distinguish what the most delicate chemical analysis has hitherto failed to do," namely, that "difference of blood, which forms so"—more than ever—"interesting a question" at the present day.

You are quietly seated within the house, reading, perhaps. Suddenly a sensation, as a single hair drawn over your hand, causes you to look down. At first you see nothing: yet there is certainly something moving quickly towards your wrist or your knuckles, and, upon looking intently, you discover a tiny globule sliding or rolling along with amazing rapidity. It is so minute that a touch will effectually check its career; but, if you are expert enough to catch it under your lens, you will see a creature so delicately formed and gracefully agile that you will recall its aspect with less unkindly feelings, though, withal, it is a very noxious insect, and you dare not spare its life. Its bite causes a very painful tumor, of which the poison may not be absorbed for many days. The effect is much the same as that produced by the almost invisible speck of life called red bug. Take care how you lean against the piazza upon which the pigeons are fond of alighting; be cautious how you handle even your pet birdlings; and avoid the hen-coop at all hazards. Unless the poultry-yard is very carefully tended the young chickens are destroyed by these acari. On a plantation near the Gulf of Mexico, where neglect had resulted in a terrible accumulation of chicken-mites, not a chicken, a young turkey, or a guinea-fowl could be reared during one entire season. The poor hens grew thin and sickly on their nests, and looked as if every drop of blood was drained from them; their combs and gills lost every vestige of color; and, as soon as the little chickens were hatched, they were smothered with the mites, which were literally heaped up in the nests. These mites are not confined to poultry. Birds in cages, and the nests of wild birds, are alike infested, though the instinct of the latter is a match for them. The neglected domestic fowl is the greatest sufferer.

THE FIRST AND THE SECOND INTERVIEW.—My first interview with my dear departed friend Sir William Napier was on the battle-field of Cazal Noval. I was then captain of the grenadier company of the Royal Scots. We were advancing towards the enemy, when I saw an officer at the distance of about eighty yards stretched on the ground beneath an olive-tree, to the right of my company. Believing him to be either dead or badly wounded, I ran towards him and said, "I hope you are not dangerously wounded," at which he shook his head. "Have you been attended to by a surgeon?" He nodded assent. "Can I be of service to you?" I said; and he again shook his head, but did not utter a word. He looked deadly pale, and I was deeply impressed with the classical outline and beautiful expression of his handsome countenance. I told him I had some cold tea and brandy in my flask, and asked him if I should give him a little of it; at which he raised his head, a sudden beam of pleasure sparkled in his eye—she stretched out his hand, and I gave him a tumblerful, which he drank with a most interesting expression of unexpected enjoyment—so much so, that I gave him a second dose; and when he had finished, he seized my hand and grasped it several times, as much as to say, "I don't know who you are, my good fellow, but I feel most gratefully thankful for your kindness." I then said, "Heaven protect you!" and ran off to join my company. I had not the slightest knowledge who he was, and amidst the firing and excitement of the moment I did not notice his uniform. In after life I often spoke of this wounded officer as the handsomest man I had ever beheld. I never met him again in my wanderings through the various thoroughfares of military life, until about sixteen years afterwards, when he resided at Freshford, near Bath. I was then on a visit to Lady Wilson's father, when dear "William" dined there, and after dinner, when we were just about to join the ladies, and while I was standing near the fireplace with my arm resting on the mantelpiece, the gentlemen were speaking about "handsome men," and I said, of all the handsome men I ever saw in the various parts of the world where I had been, there was none at all to be compared with the one whom I then described to them as above written. Napier sprang from his chair, put his arms round me, and exclaimed: "My dear Wilson, was that you? that glass of tea and brandy saved my life!" And a few tears trickled from his bright and animated eyes, expressive of his grateful recollection of the good service I had rendered him in that hour of his need and painful suffering.—Bruce's "Life of Sir W. Napier."

"THE RAVEN."—The London correspondent of the Western Morning News says:—"Speaking of poetry recalls a very singular circumstance that has recently been talked about, and which is probably new to most readers. Every one has read or heard that wonderful poem of Edgar Poe's—'The Raven'—and probably most of those who have read it know also of the very singular essay in which the poet explains the manner in which the poem was composed. He tells them how he came to make choice of the particular metre, how the burden suggested itself to his mind, how the last verse was written first and the others to lead gradually up to it, with a variety of minute and particular details, all tending to show its originality. The whole of this essay turns out to be as ingenious a fiction as any of the 'tales of mystery' with which it is usually bound up. Poe's sole accomplishment was a minute and accurate acquaintance with Oriental languages, and this he turned to account by translating almost literally the poem of 'The Raven' from the Persian. The translation is so minute and accurate that even the cadences are preserved throughout, while the curious repetition of rhymes by which it is distinguished is equally characteristic of the work of the Persian poet. As a singular specimen of a literary imposture such a matter as this deserves notice. The discovery is due to the well-known Eastern traveller, Mr. Lang, formerly of the Bombay service, and has since been corroborated, I hear, by some of the most celebrated Orientalists in England."

NELSON'S EXTRACT OF Roses And Rosemary.

THE FOLLOWING IS A BRIEF NOTICE of some of its principal virtues, as a mild stimulative, corrective and preservative agent for the hair:

Infancy.—It insinuates its balsamic properties into the pores of the head, nourishes the hair in its embryo state, accelerates its growth, sustains it in maturity, and continues the possession of healthy vigor, silky softness, and luxuriant redundancy, to the latest period of human life. Genial and purifying, it dispels all scurf and impurity, and renders the use of the fine comb unnecessary.

The Beard, Whiskers, and Mustachios.—Its extraordinary power in promoting the growth of the hair is singularly displayed in creating these ornaments of manhood.

Curl and Embellishment.—In dressing the hair nothing can equal its effect, rendering the hair so admirably soft that it will lie in any direction, producing beautifully flowing curls, and, by the transcendant lustre it imparts, rendering the coiffure inexpressibly attractive.

Grey Hair.—Its nourishing properties are eminently successful in the prevention of Grey Hair, and in numerous instances, in the restoration to its original color.

Baldness.—Its productive powers are constantly and surprisingly shown in cases of Baldness, so that in numerous instances where other specifics have been tried in vain, this celebrated Oil has effected a complete restoration of Beautiful Hair.

Sea-Bathing and Violent Exercise.—After indulging in either of these, so apt to exhaust the nourishing matter secreted at the roots or bulbs of the hair, the Roses and Rosemary will be found most efficacious, both in preserving and in immediately restoring the hair to its usual appearance of health with renovated brightness.

Its invaluable properties have obtained the patronage of every Court of the civilized world; and the high esteem in which it is universally held, together with numerous testimonials constantly received of its efficacy, affords the best and surest proofs of its merits.

Sold by all Druggists, and by H. P. WAKELEE, corner of Montgomery and Sutter streets, and corner of Bush and Montgomery streets. se24

LAWRENCE & COMPANY'S

PATENT IMPROVED

Flesh Gloves and Straps!

For Producing a Healthy State of the System by Friction, Without the Risk of Tearing the Skin, as all the Ordinary Horse-Hair Gloves are liable to do.

THE GREAT VALUE OF THE HORSE-HAIR Renovator as a therapeutic agent, when applied to the human body, is now too well known to every one who has paid the least attention to the importance of a healthy action of the Skin, to require further comment.

The superior advantages of the Patent Flesh Gloves and Straps, manufactured under this Patent, are that, by a peculiar process in the machinery employed in their manufacture, the points of the Hair are brought perpendicularly to the surface, thereby removing the liability to tear the Skin (a very general complaint against the ordinary kind,) rendering them more pleasant to use, at the same time enabling the process of friction to be much more effectually performed; they are, indeed, a positive luxury to use, apart from their salutary effects.

The peculiar fabric manufactured expressly for the use of Ladies deserves their special attention; it has been highly recommended by the most eminent of the medical profession, and given universal satisfaction to those who have used it.

For sale by

H. P. WAKELEE,

se24 Cor. Montgomery and Sutter streets.

THE OXFORD WASHING PAD.

This article, suggested by an Oxford man, for removing Stains from the Hands, being found to thoroughly answer the purpose, has established fair pretensions to become of universal use, which it is rapidly doing.

Manufactured by LAWRENCE & CO., and sold by

H. P. WAKELEE,

se24 Cor. Montgomery and Sutter streets.

PHINEAS BANNING,

FORWARDING AND COMMISSION AGENT,

WILMINGTON & LOS ANGELES,

DEALER IN

LUMBER, COAL, IRON, FLOUR, GRAIN, etc., etc.,

And Proprietor of the United States Mail Stage Line between Los Angeles and Wilmington. se24

REMOVAL.

INSURANCE AGINST FIRE.

THE NORTH BRITISH AND MERCANTILE INSURANCE COMPANY OF LONDON AND EDINBURGH.

ESTABLISHED, 1809.

Capital, $10,000,000. Accumulated Funds, January 1, 1864, $11,169,140. Deposit in California under State law, $75,000. Limit on single Risks, $100,000. Bankers, Messrs Tallant & Co. Fire Policies on buildings and contents, throughout the Pacific States and Territories, granted on the most liberal terms. Losses promptly adjusted and paid here in U. S. Gold coin.

Office removed to 414 California street, opposite Alsop & Co.

WM. H. TILLINGHAST, Agent.

au19-3m

MANHATTAN FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY OF NEW YORK.

Cash Capital and Surplus.....$750,000
Deposit in San Francisco.....$75,000

COLUMBIA FIRE INSURANCE CO., OF NEW YORK.

Cash Capital and Surplus.....$600,000
Deposit in San Francisco.....$75,000

THE ABOVE MENTIONED WELL-KNOWN and responsible Companies, having complied with the law enacted at the last session of the Legislature, and deposited with Messrs. Donohoe, Ralston & Co.

$75,000 EACH,

As additional security to Policy-holders, will continue to insure

BUILDINGS,
MERCHANDISE,
FURNITURE,

And other property in California, Oregon and Nevada Territory, against Loss or Damage by Fire, upon the most favorable terms.

All Losses promptly paid in United States Gold Coin.

R. B. SWAIN & CO., Agents,

ju25-tf 206 Front street, corner of California.

R. G. SNEATH,

408 FRONT STREET, SAN FRANCISCO,

Importer and Wholesale Dealer in

GROCERIES, PROVISIONS, FLOUR, RICE

TOBACCOS, LIQUORS, ETC.

Branch House, - - SNEATH & BOARMAN, - - Red Bluff.

Forwarding Agent, D. W. EARL, Sacramento, who will receive and fill orders for all kinds of Goods on my account, and keep a large stock of Flour, Barley, Potatoes, Ground Feed, etc., etc. No charge for forwarding.

ALMADEN QUICKSILVER!

Orders for Goods not in my line furnished customers without extra charge. Orders for Goods in the Eastern markets attended to promptly. Daily Prices Current furnished when desired.

Orders respectfully solicited. jul1-1m

CONTINENTAL HOTEL,

SAN JOSE.

GEORGE T. BROMLEY.....Proprietor.

As a desirable place of resort for health or recreation, the above Hotel is not surpassed in the State.

Excellent accommodations for families, by the day, week, or month, on reasonable terms.

ju25

REMOVAL.

A. EDDY'S

Dancing Academy,

Platt's (Middle) Hall.

PUPILS TAUGHT IN ONE-HALF THE TIME OF elsewhere.

CLASSES—MONDAYS and FRIDAYS. Ladies at half-past 2 P. M.; Gents at half-past 7 P. M.

CHILDREN'S CLASSES—On SATURDAYS, at 2 P. M.; also, on WEDNESDAYS, at half-past 3 P. M.

Private instructions given separately or to classes, to suit the convenience of applicants.

SELECT SOIREES on alternate weeks. au6-tf

CARRINGTON & CO'S GENERAL PURCHASING AGENCY,

No. 40 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Personal Orders, small or large, and for articles of every descriptions, PROMPTLY and carefully attended to.

Who wants anything from New York?

THIS AGENCY

Enables Country Residents to make purchases in the City without troubling busy friends, or mere acquaintances.

IF YOU WANT

Books, Prints, Clothing, Instruments, Music, Tools, Weapons, Sporting Implements, Fancy Stock, Jewelry, Silver or Plated Ware, Wines, Cigars, Fine Groceries, Furniture; in short, any Article, large or small, singly or in quantity, for Ladies' or Gentlemen's use or wear,

or for Dealers' Supplies, from a seal-ring to a steam engine—a Cameo or a Cashmere; lace or leather,

SEND ON YOUR ORDERS.

We can fill them on better terms than you could obtain if here; while our commission, even on large orders, is much less than the expense of visiting the city in person.

Orders under $10, from places within reach of our daily Expresses, (except for perishable articles,) can be paid for on delivery by Express; others should be remitted for, either direct, or through some city friend to be paid when filled. Every order should be as clearly worded as possible.

Orders may be given in French, Spanish or German.

COMMISSION CHARGE, - - - FIVE PER CENT.

Address:

CARRINGTON & CO.,

au6 40 Broadway, N. Y.

REOPENED FOR THE SEASON.

THE CRYSTAL SPRINGS HOTEL,

Situated four miles from the San Mateo Railroad depot, in a most splendid valley, surrounded with large, beautiful, natural trees, is now open for the public. The road from San Mateo to the house has been recently macadamized, making it the finest drive in California. The House and Cottages have been refitted and thoroughly renovated. New spring beds and every modern improvement have been added to the sleeping department. The larder, as usual, contains all the delicacies of the season. Stages leave San Mateo depot on the arrival of the trains for Crystal Springs.

A fine stable is now opened at San Mateo by Messrs. Byrnes & Ames, who will furnish horses and carriages, or saddle horses, at low rates, to the public. Parties wishing rooms or meals, on arrival, can engage them by telegraph, via San Mateo.

jul1-tf TONY OAKES, Proprietor.

McRUER & MERRILL, WHOLESALE AUCTION HOUSE,

204 and 206 California street.

Regular Sale Days - - - WEDNESDAYS and SATURDAYS. (Advances on Consignments.)

NOTICE!

From this date Mr. A. P. EVERETT has an interest in our business. McRUER & MERRILL.

San Francisco, October 20, 1862.

A. P. EVERETT, - - - - - - - - Auctioneer.

jul1 3m

SQUARZA'S PUNCH.

First Premium, Sacramento, 1862.
First Premium at San Francisco District Fair, 1863.
First and Special Premium, Sacramento, 1863.

Wholesale and Retail.

my23 44 Leidesdorff street, San Francisco.

EDWARD BOSQUI & CO.,

517

CLAY STREET, SAN FRANCISCO.

BOOKBINDERS, PAPER-RULERS, AND ACCOUNT-BOOK MANUFACTURERS.

Blanks of all kinds printed and ruled to any desired pattern. my28

MRS. HENDRICKS,

No. 629 MISSION STREET,

Devotes herself exclusively to

EMBROIDERY, STAMPING AND PINKING,

And she does more work than any other person in her line. She has by far the best collection and the largest assortment of stamps in the city. Her patterns are the most carefully drawn, and her marking is the evenest and the easiest to work, especially for those who are not very skilful. The coloring of all others rubs out, and the figures, if not traced round with thread, are effaced before the work is done; but Mrs. Hendricks' coloring, on all kinds of stuff, is warranted to defy rubbing, though it can be easily washed out. She is an engraver and engraves her own stamps, and thus is enabled to supply herself with all the latest patterns fashionable in Eastern and European cities.

Any customer can get a new pattern cut without charge, if Mrs. Hendricks can use it afterwards. Although there are many others in the same business in San Francisco, all acknowledge the superiority of Mrs. Hendricks, and send the most difficult work to her. Ladies are invited to call and examine her patterns.

☞ Remember the number, 629 Mission street, San Francisco. jy30tl*

DR. J. H. HATCH,

DENTIST,

Graduate of the Pennsylvania College of Dental Surgery.

All operations pertaining to the profession thoroughly and skillfully performed. Entire satisfaction in all cases guaranteed.

Office, 645 Clay street, between Montgomery and Kearny street, San Francisco. nu27

SAVE YOUR

E. F. BUNNELL, D. D. S.,

ROOMS, NO. 51 SECOND STREET.

DR BUNNELL WILL SAVE EVERY TOOTH THAT ACHES from exposure of the nerve, or refund the charge for the operation, and extract each tooth without pay in EVERY case of failure. Teeth filled with gold, artificial bone, and golden lithodeon. Plate teeth on vulcanite and gold enameled base, of surpassing beauty and comfort.

☞ All work warranted. Price low. ☜

N. B.—More than 1,000 aching teeth have been saved in succession, without the loss of one. au27-3m

---

REMOVAL.

DR. JOHN HEALD,

DENTIST,

OFFICE AND RESIDENCE: STEVENSON HOUSE,

Montgomery street, corner of California. Entrance on both streets. Rooms 12 and 13. jy30-3m

---

WONDERFUL TRIUMPH

IN AMERICAN DENTISTRY.

DR. BEERS & CO.,

617 Clay street,

ARE NOW MANUFACTURING THE NEW style of ARTIFICIAL TEETH so highly approved at the East, and which to be appreciated only requires to be seen. The Teeth, Gums and Plate are made of one entire piece of Porcelain without seam or joint, combining great strength and beauty with absolute purity and freedom from any metallic taste, while the coloring of the gums and the interior of the mouth are so perfect as to almost defy detection. All interested in the progress of the Arts are invited to examine samples of this work.

Superior Gold and Vulcanite Work also manufactured as usual, but at greatly reduced prices. jul8

FARRAND'S OSCILLATING Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALLED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REduction and amalgamation of Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY.

As a guarantee of what this machine will do, I propose, with any gentleman who will produce an Amalgamator that will work the same amount of ore in the same number of hours, with the same outlay of power, and produce the equal result, to deposit the sum of FIVE HUNDRED DOLLARS each, the money so deposited to be drawn by the person who shall be declared to have produced the best result. The money (the $500) by whichever party won to be paid over to some one of the benevolent institutions in this State, to be named by the party losing. This proposition is not made with the view of detracting from the merits of any Amalgamator now before the public, but for the purpose of placing this valuable improvement before such persons as may be interested in quartz milling, and to whom the matter properly belongs.

I CHALLENGE COMPETITION.

CALL AND SEE THE MACHINES WORK!

W. D. FARRAND.

R. L. OGDEN, Agent, Southeast corner of Montgomery and California streets, San Francisco. jy30tf

---

TYLER BROTHERS,

Importers, Wholesale and Retail Dealers in

School Books, Stationery,

PHOTOGRAPH ALBUMS,

PORTFOLIOS JUVENILE BOOKS, CHILDREN'S PICTURE BOOKS, FANCY ARTICLES, etc.,

NO. 632 WASHINGTON STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO.

au27-tf

CARPETS.

WE have just received and are now opening

NEW AND MAGNIFICENT STYLES OF

WILTON

—AND—

Royal Velvet Carpets,

The finest Goods ever Imported into this State, to which we invite particular attention. Also a New Stock of

BRUSSELS CARPETS,

THREE-PLY AND INGRAIN CARPETS,

OIL CLOTHS, ALL WIDTHS AND STYLES,

PAPER HANGINGS, BROCATELLE CURTAIN REPS, SILK DAMASK,

WINDOW SHADES, MATS, ETC., ETC.

House-keepers and others in want of the above goods, will find our stock the most complete, and our

PRICES THE LOWEST IN THE CITY!

KENNEDY & BELL,

Southwest cor. Montgomery and California streets. se24

NOTICE TO SHIPPERS

—TO—

Red Bluff.

ON AND AFTER TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 20th, the steamers of the California Steam Navigation Company

WILL LEAVE SACRAMENTO

FOR RED BLUFF,

EVERY TUESDAY AND FRIDAY,

At 7 o'clock, A. M.

se24-tf J. WHITNEY, Jr., President.

JOSEPH A. DONOHOE, San Francisco. | EUGENE KELLY, New York.

DONOHOE, KELLY & CO.,

SAN FRANCISCO.

EUGENE KELLY & CO.,

NEW YORK.

Bankers.

EXCHANGE ON

NEW YORK,
BANK OF LONDON, - - - - London.
BANK OF IRELAND. jy2

LOCKE & MONTAGUE,

IMPORTERS OF

STOVES AND METALS,

Nos. 112 and 114 Battery street,

jy2 SAN FRANCISCO.

TO ALL THE LOYAL MEN

—OF THE—

County of San Francisco!

THE COPPERHEAD PARTY ASSERTS that San Francisco county will cast its vote for McClellan on the 8th proximo. So persistently has this been asserted, that in some places in the interior of the State it is nearly believed.

THIS SLANDER

Upon the Good Name of the City and County of San Francisco.

CAN BE REMOVED, !

AND FOREVER SILENCED,

IF THE LOYAL

Mechanics,
Artisans,
Draymen,
Butchers,
Lumbermen,
Watermen,
Stevedores,
Wholesale Dealers,
Retail Dealers,
Merchants,

WILL SHOW THEIR STRENGTH,

On this (Saturday) Evening, October 15th,

—IN THE—

Grand Procession!

San Francisco is steadfast and immovable in her old love of Liberty and Union. Let us prove it on that occasion.

A. J. BRYANT,
Chairman Union State Central Committee.
CHAS. WESTMORELAND, Sec. oc15

O. F. WILLEY & CO.,

Carriage Depository,

316 CALIFORNIA STREET.

Constaatly on hand all kinds of CARRIAGES from the most celebrated manufacturers in the United States, such as CONCORD CARRIAGES and WAGONS, of all kinds, of superior quality.

LIGHT BUGGIES AND CARRIAGES, adapted to private use, from the celebrated maanfactories of BREWSTER & CO., STIVERS & SMITH, DUSENBURY & VAN DUSER, of New York.

This is one of the largest collection of

SUPERIOR CARRIAGES,

ever offered to the people of the Pacific Coast, and the Proprietors believe that they can sell their stock

ON MORE FAVORABLE TERMS THAN CAN BE OBTAINED ELSEWHERE.

O. F. WILLEY & CO.,

oc15 316 California street, San Francisco.

B. P. MOORE & CO.,

FURNITURE.

WAREROOMS : SOUTHEAST CORNER OF SANSOME
oc15-3m and PINE STREETS.

$2,000 REWARD;

A REWARD OF TWO THOUSAND DOLLARS IS OFfered by the subscriber to any person who will discover or produce an article for dressing and preserving the HAIR equal to the

TRICOMALICUM!!

known in California for many years for its wonderful effects on the HAIR.

THE TRICOMALICUM is composed of salutary and strengthening substances, and possesses the rare qualities of renewing and invigorating the Hair, of destroying dandruff, and of being an unequalled dressing for the Hair and keeping it in a perfectly healthy state.

PRINCIPAL DEPOT at the store of the Inventor,

CHRETIEN PFISTER,

oc15-tf No. 221 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

MAGUIRE'S OPERA HOUSE.

T. MAGUIRE - - - - - - - PROPRIETOR.
C. L. GRAVES - - - - - - - STAGE MANAGER.
W. STEVENSON - - - - - - - TREASURER.

AFTERNOON PERFORMANCE TO-DAY,

The Play of

A LIFE'S REVENGE!

FOR LADIES AND CHILDREN,

At HALF PRICES,

Commencing at 2 o'clock.

Second Week in San Francisco of the celebrated English performers,

MR. AND MRS. CHARLES KEAN,

Supported by their niece, Miss CHAPMAN, also, Mr. J CATHCART, and Mr. GEORGE EVERETT, of the London Theatres.

Together with

THE LEGITIMATE COMPANY.

This (Saturday) Evening, October 15th, 1864,

First night of the Wife's Secret!

An unpublished Play, written expressly for Mr and Mrs KEAN by George Lovell, Esq:

Sir Walter Amyott - - - - MR. CHAS. KEAN
Jabez Sneed, his steward, - - - Mr J. F. Cathcart
Lord Arden, a fugitive. - - - Mr. George Everett
Branillard, a French Smuggler - - - - W Barry
Harrington - - - - - - Louis Aldrich
Lady Eveline - - - - - Mrs. CHAS. KEAN
Neville, a page to Lady Eveline - - - Miss Chapman
Maud, - - - - - - Mrs H A Perry

To conclude with the successful local farce, entitled

ASSESSMENTS.

ON SUNDAY EVENING, OCT. 16.

MR. COPPIN, the celebrated Australasian comedian and manager, will make his appearance in three characters.

ON MONDAY EVENING,

Mr. and Mrs. KEAN will appear in the great play of

The Merchant of Venice!

In consequence of the great expense of this engagement, Mr. Maguire finds it necessary to place the prices to the following scale.

Dress Circle, Orchestra, and Parquette, - - One Dollar
Reserved seats, - - - - - Fifty cents extra
Gallery, - - - - - - - - Fifty cents

BULLETIN OF NEW BOOKS,

JUST RECEIVED,

—AT—

A. Roman & Co.'s.

THE TRIAL; or, New Links of the Daisy Chain. By the author of "the Heir of Redclyffe." 12mo.

The Rival Belles; or, Life in Washington. By J. B. Jones, author of "Wild Western Scenes," etc. 12mo.

Victoire. A Novel. 1 vol. 12mo.

Conteola and other Tales. By the author of "Green Mountain Boys," etc. 12mo.

Down in Tennessee, and back by Way of Richmond. By Edmund Kirke, author of "Among the Pines," etc.

The Devoted Bride. By St. George Tucker. 12mo.

The Cruise of the Alabama and Sumter. From the private Journals and other papers of Commander Semmes and other officers. 1 vol. 12mo.

Mirror of Modern Democracy; a History of the Democratic Party from its organization in 1825 to its last great achievement, the Rebellion of 1861. By W. D. Jones. 12mo.

General orders of the War Department, embracing the Years 1861, 1862 and 1863. Chronologically arranged. With a full alphabetical Index. 2 vols. 8vo.

The New Internal Revenue Law, approved June 31, 1864. With a complete Analytical Index and Tables of Taxation. 8vo.

Man and His Relations. By S. B. Brittan, M. D. 8vo.

Golden Leaves from the British Poets. Collected by John W. Howes. 12mo.

Not Dead Yet; a Novel. By J. C. Jeffersoa. 8vo.

Tit-Bits; or, How to Prepare a nice dish at a Moderate Expense. By Mrs. S. G. Knight. 12mo.

Religion and Chemistry; or, Proofs of God's plan in the Atmosphere and its elements. Ten lectures delivered at the Brooklyn Institute, Brooklyn, N. Y. By Josiah P. Cooke, Jr, Professor of Chemistry in Harvard University. 8vo.

Together with an extensive and complete stock of

Choice and Standard Books,

In all the departments of

LITERATURE, ART AND SCIENCE.

A fine collection of Standard authors in fine bindings, suitable for private Libraries.

☞ A full assortment of CHILDREN'S BOOKS, SCHOOL BOOKS, PHOTOGRAPHIC ALBUMS, etc, etc.

All for sale at the lowest Prices, wholesale and retail.

A. ROMAN & CO.,

BOOKSELLERS, PUBLISHERS AND IMPORTERS,

416 and 419 MONTGOMERY STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO.
oc15-1m

LOCKE & MONTAGUE,

IMPORTERS OF

STOVES AND METALS,

Nos. 112 and 114 Battery street,

jy2 SAN FRANCISCO.

MAGUIRE'S ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

THOMAS MAGUIRE - - - - - - Proprietor
PETER RICHINGS, - - - - - - - Manager
GEO. EVANS, - - - - - - Musical Director

☞ The public is respectfully informed that, in deference to the great political demonstration this evening

☞ This Establishment will be closed. ☜

SECOND OPERA SEASON!

Sunday Evening, October 16th, 1864,

THE

Richings' Opera Troupe!

Nightly honored with the surest test of approbation, the applause of enthusiastic audiences, will present for the third time,

Auber's celebrated opera, entitled

THE CROWN DIAMONDS.

Principal characters by
Miss CAROLINE RICHINGS,
Miss JENNY KEMPTON,
Mr. W. J. HILL,
Mr. EDWARD SEGUIN,
Mr. H. C. PEAKES,
Mr. CHARLES.

MONDAY.

Donizetti's opera of

DON PASQUALE.

In rehearsal:

Auber's opera of LA FIANCEE, or THE NATIONAL GUARD;

Boildieu's opera (in French) of LA DAME BLANCHE,

And Meyerbeer's opera of DINORAH;

PRICES OF ADMISSION.—Dress Circle and Orchestra Seats $1; Parquet 50c.; Gallery 25c.

Doors open at 7 o'clock. Performances will commence at 8 precisely. se17

FOURTEENTH ANNIVERSARY

—OF—

KNICKERBOCKER ENGINE CO., No. 5.

GRAND

Promenade Concert

AND BALL!

AT PLATT'S HALL,

On Monday Evening, October 17th, 1864,

On which occasion the following distinguished artistes will appear:

SIGNORA BIANCHI,
MRS. SOPHIE EDWIN,
SIGNOR BIANCHI,
MR. J. DE HAGA,

And others who have volunteered.

Supported by a sufficient orchestra, conducted by Charles Schultz, Esq.

PROGRAMME.

1—Grand Overture by the orchestra.
2—Cavatina from I Lombardi - - - - - Verdi
Mr. JOHN DE HAGA.
3—Cavatina from Poliuto - - - - - Donizetti
Signor BIANCHI.
4—Romanza from Masaadieri - - - - - Verdi
Signora BIANCHI.
5—Waltz: Drops on the Sea (Orchestra) - Strauss
6—Duo from Robert Devereux - - - - Donizetti
Signor and Signora BIANCHI.
7—Cuckoo Polka, by request, Orchestra.
8—Drake's Address to the American Flag.
Mrs. SOPHIE EDWIN.
9—Trio from I Lombardi - - - - - - Verdi
Signor and Signora BIANCHI, and Mr. J. DE HAGA.
10—Song by a Lady Volunteer.

DANCING

Will commence with the Grand Knickerbocker March (new) composed by Charles Schultz, and dedicated to this Company. Quadrille Music by Wilson's celebrated band-Leader of the orchestra, Charles Schultz.

Doors open at 7 o'clock; concert to commence at 8.

TICKETS, - - - - - - - - ONE DOLLAR, to be had of members of the Company, and at the box office on the evening of the performance. oc15

EUREKA MINSTREL HALL,

Montgomery street, near Pine.

T. MAGUIRE - - - - - - - - Proprietor
GEO. H. COES - - - - - - - Stage Manager

GRAND OPENING NIGHT!

MONDAY EVENING - - - SEPT. 5TH.

THE EVER POPULAR

SAN FRANCISCO MINSTRELS!

Consisting of the following well known Artists:

Billy Birch, Charles Backus,
D. S. Wambold, Sig. R. Abecco,
George H. Coes, Martin Simonsen,
Frank Medina, S. Wasburg,
C. F. Shattuck, Signor Pinto,
F. Harris, E. Grob, and
MRS. FANNY SIMONSEN.

A grand CHANGE OF PERFORMANCE EACH EVENING.

NEW SONGS, ACTS, BURLESQUES, DANCES, etc., will be performed in rapid succession.

Dress Circle and Orchestra Seats, 50 cents; Parquet, 25 cents; Private Boxes, $5; Reserved Seats, 25 cents extra.

Doors open at 7 o'clock. Curtain will rise at 8 o'clock, precisely.

GEORGE B. MERRILL,

ATTORNEY AT LAW,

Office, 520 Montgomery street, (over Messrs. Sather & Co.'s Bank,)

SAN FRANCISCO:

Gives special attention to the Probate of Wills and the Administration of Estates.

au20

SAILING DAY, OCTOBER 19TH.

PRICES REDUCED TO SUIT THE TIMES

OPPOSITION TO NEW YORK,

VIA NICARAGUA!

CARRYING THE U. S. MAIL!

650 MILES LESS OCEAN TRAVEL IN THE TROPICS THAN BY PANAMA!

THE CENTRAL AMERICAN TRANSIT COMPANY will despatch the commodious and favorite steamship

MOSES TAYLOR,

J. H. BLETHEN, - - - - - Commander

FOR SAN JUAN DEL SUR, NICARAGUA,

ON WEDNESDAY, - - - - - OCTOBER 19TH,

From Mission street Wharf, at 10 o'clock, A. M., precisely,

Connecting at GREYTOWN with the new and splendid Steamship

GOLDEN RULE,

3,500 TONS, FOR NEW YORK.

The transit over the Isthmus is now in fine order. The coaches on the road, and the steamers on the Lake and River are all new, and built expressly for this route. Particular attention paid to the comfort of ladies and families by a Conductor, who will go through to New York with them.

☞ Note the change in the day of sailing. No Opposition until OCTOBER 19, 1864.

For information or passage, apply to

I. W. RAYMOND, AGENT, Agent,
Northwest corner Battery and Pine streets
oc1 Up stairs, San Francisco.

FAMILY NOTICE.

Bowen Brothers,

COR. MONTGOMERY AND CALIFORNIA STREETS,

SAN FRANCISCO.

Offer for sale:

Barton & Guesten's Salad Oil, the best in the world.
Boneless Sardines; a great luxury.
English Potted Meats.
Anchovy and Shrimp Paste.
Condensed Milk, preserved with refined Sugar hermetically sealed in cans for Army and Travelers' use. Its purity is guaranteed.
Bent's Water, Butter, Milk, Wine and Graham Crackers.
English, Stilton, Cheshire and Holland Cheese.
English Soups, assorted.
Pate de Foie Gras.
French Truffles and Mushrooms.
Spanish and French Olives, in kegs.
Spiced Oysters.
Dutch Herrings and Sardells.
English and American Bloaters.
Stuffed Olives and Mangoes.
Mess Mackerel.
Cider Vinegar.
Teas of every variety, imported expressly for our Family Trade.
Sugars of every kind direct from the Manufactory.

WINES AND LIQUORS,

Direct from Bond, Wholesale or Retail.

au6-tf

GILBERT'S MUSEUM,

Market street, opposite Second street, over the Occidental Market.

F. GILBERT - - - - - - - Proprietor

OPEN EVERY DAY AND EVENING.

HOME AGAIN!

THE SLAVE DWARF.

Who has just returned from the interior.

THE YOUNG HERCULES.

THE GREAT SNAKE-CHARMER.

Notwithstanding the great expense attending this unprecedented array of novelties, the management announces the prices as before.

THE GREAT CEROPLASTIC GROUP OF LIFE-LIKE FIGURES, AND

UPWARDS OF 2,000 CURIOSITIES!

Also, a beautiful set of COSMORAMIC VIEWS, illustrating the PRINCIPAL CITIES OF AMERICA. There is also an AQUARIA GARDEN attached to the Museum.

The admission to the entire Exhibition is only 25 cents. Children, 15 cents. se3-1a1

QUINTESSENCE OF ENGLISH GARDEN LAVENDER FLOWERS,

Prepared from ingredients imported expressly for the purpose by

H. P. WAKELEE, Druggist,

Montgomery street, cor. Sutter, San Francisco.

Lavender has always maintained the highest rank as a perfume in England, but owing to the inferior qualities usually imported, has almost fallen into disuse in the United States. When pure and distilled from the flowers, it is the most delicate and refreshing perfumes in use. This preparation is recommended as the pure essence of Garden Lavender Flowers. se24

The California

"SURELY THERE IS A VEIN FOR THE SILVER AND A PLACE FOR GOLD WHERE THEY FINE IT."

VOL. I.--NO. 22. SAN FRANCISCO, OCTOBER 22, 1864. TERMS { $5 a Year, by Mail, in Advance 50 Cents a Month, by Carrier.

CONTENTS:

ORIGINAL ARTICLES:

Whereas.—By "Mark Twain."
Notes of Mines and Mineralogy.
Scientific Sketches—By "Trismegistus."
An Interview with the Genius of Humor.

DEMON AMOR.—A Translation.

POETRY—

The First Broom Ranger.
The Birds.—By "Emilie Lawson."
My Last Serenade.

EDITORIALS:

Progressing.
A Public Park.
A Grand Carnival of the Grand Commandery.
Unbiased English Thought.

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS:

Minor Topics as They suggest Themselves.

NEW BOOKS:

A Review of New Publications.

SELECTED SKETCHES, STORIES, etc.

Trifles from Ceylon.
Adventures of a Lady in Search of a Horse.
The * * * * in the Closet.
Pictures of Nobody.
An Odd Shaver.
Napoleon's Habitations.
Pompeii in 1864.

POETRY—

Calling the Children.
Duty.
Hay-Makers.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS:

Interesting Items from Exchanges.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL:

A review of the Drama and Lyric Stage, etc.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

WHEREAS.

LOVE'S BAKERY! I am satisfied I have found the place now that I have been looking for all this time. I cannot describe to you the sensation of mingled astonishment, gladness, hope, doubt, anxiety, and balmy, blissful emotion that suffused my being and quivered in a succession of streaky thrills down my backbone, as I stood on the corner of Third and Minna streets, last Tuesday, and stared, spell-bound, at those extraordinary words, painted in large, plain letters on a neighboring window-curtain—"LOVE'S BAKERY." "God bless my soul!" said I, "will wonders never cease?—are there to be no limits to man's spirit of invention?—is he to invade the very realms of the immortal, and presume to guide and control the great passions, the impalpable essences, that have hitherto dwelt in the secret chambers of the soul, sacred from all save divine intrusion?"

I read and re-read that remarkable sign with constantly-increasing wonder and interest. There was nothing extraordinary in the appearance of the establishment, and even if it had possessed anything of a supernatural air, it must necessarily have been neutralized by the worldly and substantial look of a pyramid of excellent bread that stood in the window—a sign very inconsistent, it seemed to me, with the character of a place devoted to the high and holy employment of instilling the passion of love into the human heart, although it was certainly in keeping with the atrocious taste which was capable of conferring upon a vice-royalty of itself such an execrable name as "Love's Bakery." Why not Love's Bower, or the Temple of Love, or the Palace of Cupid?—anything—anything in the world would have been less repulsive than such hideous vulgarity of nomenclature as "Love's Bakery."

The place seemed very complete, and well supplied with every facility for carrying on the business of creating love successfully. In a window of the second story was a large tin cage with a parrot in it, and near it was a sign bearing the inscription, "Preparatory School for Young Ladies"—that is, of course, a school where they are taught certain things necessary to prepare them for the bakery down below. Not far off is also a "Preparatory School for Young Gentlemen," which is doubtless connected with Love's Bakery too. I saw none of the pupils of either of the schools, but my imagination dwelt upon them with a deep and friendly interest. How irksome, I thought, must this course of instruction be to these tender hearts, so impatient to be baked into a state of perfect love!

Greatly moved by the singular circumstances which surrounded me, I fell into a profound and pleasing reverie. Here, I thought, they take a couple of hopeful hearts in the rough, and work them up, with spices and shortening and sweetening enough to last for a lifetime, and turn them out well kneaded together, baked to a turn, and ready for matrimony, and without having been obliged to undergo a long and harrowing courtship, with the desperate chances attendant thereon, of persevering rivals, unwilling parents, inevitable love-quarrels, and all that sort of thing.

Here, I thought, they will bake you up a couple in moderate circumstances, at short notice and at a cheap rate, and turn them out in good enough shape for the money, perhaps, but nevertheless burnt with the fire of jealousy on one side, and flabby and "duffy" with lukewarmness and indifference on the other, and spotted all over with the salæratus stains of a predisposition to make the conjugal cake bitter and unpalatable for all time to come.

Or they will take an excessively patrician pair, charge them a dozen prices, and deliver them to order in a week, all plastered over with the ghostly vines and flowers of blighted fancies, hopes and yearnings, wrought in chilly ice-work.

Or, perhaps, they will take a brace of youthful, tender hearts, and dish them up in no time, into crisp, delicate "lady-fingers," tempting to contemplate, and suggestive of that serene after-dinner happiness and sociability that come when the gross substantials have been swept from the board and are forgotten in soft dalliance with pastry and ices and sparkling Moselle.

Or maybe they will take two flinty old hearts that have harbored selfishness, envy and all uncharitableness in solitude for half a century, and after a fortnight's roasting, turn them out the hardest kind of hard-tack, invulnerable to all softening influences for evermore.

Here was a revolution far more extended, and destined to be attended by more momentous consequences to the nations of the earth, than any ever projected or accomplished by the greatest of the world's military heroes! Love, the master passion of the human heart, which, since the morning of the creation had shaped the destinies of emperors and beggars alike, and had ruled all men as with a rod of iron, was to be hurled from the seat of power in a single instant, as it were, and brought into subjection to the will of an inspired, a sublimely-gifted baker! By some mysterious magic, by some strange and awful invention, the divine emotion was to be confined within set bounds and limits, controlled, weighed, measured, and doled out to God's creatures in quantities and qualities to suit the purchaser, like vulgar beer and candles!

And in times to come, I thought, the afflicted lover, instead of reading Heuston & Hastings' omnipresent sign and gathering no comfort from it, will read "GO TO LOVE'S BAKERY!" on the dead-walls and telegraph poles, and be saved.

Now I might never have published to the world my discovery of this manufactory of the human affections in a populous thoroughfare of San Francisco, if it had not occurred to me that some account of it would serve as a peculiarly fitting introductory to a story of love and misfortune, which it falls to my lot to relate. And yet even Love's Bakery could afford no help to the sufferers of whom I shall speak, for they do not lack affection for each other, but are the victims of an accumulation of distressing circumstances against which the efforts of that august agent would be powerless.

The facts in the case come to me by letter from a young lady who lives in the beautiful city of San José; she is personally unknown to me, and simply signs herself "Aurelia Maria," which may possibly be a fictitious name. But no matter, the poor girl is almost heart-broken by the misfortunes she has undergone, and so confused by the conflicting counsels of misguided friends and insidious enemies, that she does not know what course to pursue in order to extricate herself from the web of difficulties in which she seems almost hopelessly involved. In this dilemma she turns to me for help, and supplicates for my guidance and instruction with a moving eloquence that would touch the heart of a statue. Hear her sad story:

She says that when she was sixteen years old she met and loved with all the devotion of a passionate nature a young man from New Jersey, named Williamson Breckinridge Caruthers, who was some six years her senior. They were engaged, with the free consent of their friends and relatives, and for a time it seemed as if their career was destined to be characterized by an immunity from sorrow beyond the usual lot of humanity. But at last the tide of fortune turned; young Caruthers became infected with small-pox of the most virulent type, and when he recovered from his illness, his face was pitted like a waffle-mould and his comeliness gone forever. Aurelia thought to break off the engagement at first, but pity for her unfortunate lover caused her to postpone the marriage-day for a season, and give him another trial. The very day before the wedding was to have taken place, Breckinridge, while absorbed in watching the flight of a balloon, walked into a well and fractured one of his legs, and it had to be taken off above the knee. Again Aurelia was moved to break the engagement, but again love triumphed, and she set the day forward and gave him another chance to reform. And again misfortune overtook the unhappy youth. He lost one arm by the premature discharge of a Fourth-of-July cannon, and within three months he got the other pulled out by a carding-machine. Aurelia's heart was almost crushed by these latter calamities. She could not but be deeply grieved to see her lover passing from her by piecemeal, feeling, as she did, that he could not last forever under this disastrous process of reduction, yet knowing of no way to stop its dreadful career, and in her tearful despair she almost regretted, like brokers who hold on and lose, that she had not taken him at first, before he had suffered such an alarming depreciation. Still, her brave soul bore her up, and she resolved to bear with her friend's unnatural disposition yet a little longer. Again the wedding-day approached, and again disappointment overshadowed it: Caruthers fell ill with the erysipelas, and lost the use of one of his eyes entirely. The friends and relatives of the bride, considering that she had already put up with more than could reasonably be expected of her, now came forward and insisted that the match should be broken off; but after wavering awhile, Aurelia, with a generous spirit which did her credit, said she had reflected calmly upon the matter and could not discover that Breckinridge was to blame. So she extended the time once more, and he broke his other leg. It was a sad day for the poor girl when she saw the surgeons reverently bearing away the sack whose uses she had learned by previous experience, and her heart told her the bitter truth that some more of her lover was gone. She felt that the field of her affections was growing more and more circumscribed every day, but once more she frowned down her relatives and renewed her betrothal. Shortly before the time set for the nuptials another disaster occurred. There was but one man scalped by the Owens River Indians last year. That man was Williamson Breckinridge Caruthers, of New Jersey. He was hurrying home with happiness in his heart, when he lost his hair forever, and in that hour of bitterness he almost cursed the mistaken mercy that had spared his head.

At last Aurelia is in serious perplexity as to what she ought to do. She still loves her Breckinridge, she writes, with true womanly feeling—she still loves what is left of him—but her parents are bitterly opposed to the match, because he has no property and is disabled from working, and she has not sufficient means to support both comfortably. "Now, what should she do?" she asks with painful and anxious solicitude.

It is a delicate question; it is one which involves the life-long happiness of a woman, and that of nearly two-thirds of a man, and I feel that it would be assuming too great a responsibility to do more than make a mere suggestion in the case. How would it do to build to him? If Aurelia can afford the expense, let her furnish her mutilated lover with wooden arms and wooden legs, and a glass eye and a wig, and give him another show; give him ninety days, without grace, and if he does not break his neck in the meantime, marry him and take the chances. It does not seem to me that there is much risk, any way, because if he sticks to his infernal propensity for damaging himself every time he sees a good opportunity, his next experiment is bound to finish him, and then you are all right, you know, married or single. If married, the wooden legs and such other valuables as he may possess, revert to the widow, and you see you sustain no actual loss save the cherished fragment of a noble but most unfortunate husband, who honestly strove to do right, but whose extraordinary instincts were against him. Try it, Maria! I have thought the matter over carefully and well, and it is the only chance I see for you. It would have been a happy conceit on the part of Caruthers if he had started with his neck and broken that first, but since he has seen fit to choose a different policy and string himself out as long as possible, I do not think we ought to upbraid him for it if he has enjoyed it. We must do the best we can under the circumstances, and try not to feel exasperated at him.

MARK TWAIN.

DUTY.

WHEN Treason lifts its murderous hand,
And strikes against a Nation's life,
A higher law than of the land
Enliste the Nation for the strife,
The fireside of the peaceful cot,
The hivouac within the breach,
Are camps hut more or less remote,
With nohle parts assigned to each.

To save the Nation's life it needs
The aid of every hand and heart—
If not hy martial thonghts and deeds,
Yet in some manner act your part.
So, when the roll shall he revealed,
Each answers to his name with pride:
"Thongh not a hero in the field,
A patriot at the fire-side."

Some breasts may only feel a thrill
At thoughts for which another hleeds.
Some souls may only nurse the will
Which in another grows to deeds;
By chance, they dare instead of us—
By chance, we scatter praise and flowers
On others' graves; Fate rules it thus,
Or they might scatter them on ours.

The will is noble as the deed;
'Tis doomed that some stand idly by;
With hreasts as brave as those that hleed,
And hearts as trne as those that die.
Bnt eqnal fame has death or life
For thoee who share a common lot—
Who tills the fields or braves the strife,
Be each, pray God, a patriot!

[J. T. Goodman, in Territorial Enterprise.

TRIFLES FROM CEYLON.

IN this moist showery isle of verdure, if it happen not to rain for six weeks, people begin to write and declaim about the fearful drought. One man from the Ambegamo district describes the terrible state of things there; it has actually not rained for three whole weeks! Now, in the north of Ceylon, the climate of which resembles in some degree that of India, and on the Coromaudel coast, rain falls at one season of the year, that is, between October and January, and for the rest of the year very little indeed falls—certainly when it does come dowu, it makes up for lost time.

Just at present we have a season of drought, and the wild animals consequently draw towards the rivers; and cheetahs, or panthers rather—for, according to Sir E. Tennent, the cheetah is unknown in Ceylon—have approached the outskirts of Colombo, the capital of the island. A very large one was observed swimming across the Kalany Ganga a few days ago, and was shot.

Later still, while a strongly-built Singhalese man was bathing in the same river, a panther sprang into the water and seized him by the right arm; the man, who was unarmed, grasped his assailant by the throat; and a companion ran up with a knife, and dealt the panther sueh a blow on the head that he quitted his hold on the man's arm, but again seized him by the thigh. The man who had the knife, eut the panther across the throat and rescued his companion—an act of daring for which he ought to receive a medal. The wounded man was conveyed to the hospital, where he lies dangerously ill.

A friend of mine was lately riding in eompany with three others, in single file along the narrow strip of land which connects Jaffna with the rest of the island, when suddenly his horse sprang to one side in a manner so unexpected as nearly to unseat him. It appeared that an alligator which had been lying by the side of the lagoon, had made a spring at the horse's legs as he passed. One of the gentlemen who was riding behind my friend, and who had seen the whole proceeding, was so strongly impressed with the idea that the horse had been touched by the alligator, that he was not satisfied until he had dismounted and examined the horse's legs. This is unquestionably one of the coolest pieces of impertinence I have ever heard of on the part of a tank alligator; and having heard of it I shall certainly be more eautious about going into tanks where alligators are, up to my waist, for a half an hour at a time. I remember onee watching the proeeedings of alligators in a tank in this neighborhood. I espied on the opposite side of a tank two black curlew, birds of most delicate flavor, but very shy. My gun carrier was a good way in the rear, and as the curlew were moving quietly along, I rode into the tank to watch them. There were several alligators about me, and the way they went to work was this: A fellow wonld rise to the surface and look at my pony and me to see where we were. Then he would sink and come np again a little nearer and go down again, and come up and have another look to see where we were. At last my gun was brought and I had my shot at the curlew, and saw no more of the alligators, who always take alarm at the sound of a gun.

I omitted to mention that on his return a day or to after, my friend kept a look-ont for his enemy, and discovered him onee more on the bauk—he gave him a two-ounee rifle ball, which made a long white scar along his back; however, a wound like that does not usually prove fatal at once, and the alligator succeeded in getting away.

The magistrate at Mullativoe one morning found that an alligator had sought the hospitable shelter of his court-house during the night, and a gentleman at Batticaton found another in his stable.

An old sportsman in Jaffna, who had an endless stoek of tales, used to tell how he had once shot several alligators with grains of rice instead of ball! After he had tested the credulity of his hearers to a moderate degree, he would add that the alligators were about ninc inches long. They were young ones which he had killed as specimens.

However loathsome-looking an animal an old alligator may be, the young alligators are uot so very disgusting. In fact, the bright yellow bars which alternate with the black ones, are rather pretty than otherwise. I had one in a vivarium, and the vicious little beast used to nip my fingers when I tried to feed it. It got out one night, and I don't know what became of it.

A moorman caught a young alligator in his fishing kraal in the Matura River, and I went to see it. It was alive, and to all appearanees there was no reason why, if left alone, it should not grow up to alligator's estate—its length was about three and a half feet. Thinking that this would be a good opportunity for testing the correctness of what I had heard in the north of the Island about the remarkable effect of lime npon the alligator, I asked a man to bring me some, on which he procured from a neighboring house a lump of the chunamb or lime prepared from shells, which the natives are in the habit of chewing along with the nut of the arcca-palm, and the leaves of the betel-creeper. The lime had previcusly been moistened with water. Having opened the jaws of our unfortunate victim; an operation to which it submitted with exemplary resignation (when it found it could not prevent it,) we inserted, as far back as the opening into the throat, a lump of chunamb about as large as a pigeon's egg, after which we put the animal into the water. Immediately it turned over on its side and then on its back, and appeared paralyzed; soon its eyes closed, and I thought it was dead. After about five minutes it revived a little. I could not remain longer to watch it, but in the evening I rode to where it had been experimented on, when I found that it was dead, and learnt that it had died within two hours of my leaving. Ou examining its mouth, I found that the lime had not been swallowed, but was still in the throat, just where it had been placed. I do not remember to have read in any work on animals of this antipathy of the alligator to lime; and it still remains to be explained how it is that a substance of that nature, especially prepared for the use of man, and by him daily chewed, should have so powerful and instantaneous an effect upon an animal otherwise so tenacious of life, when merely placed in the mouth, without being swallowed. The experiment may appear to have been a eruel one, aud yet, perhaps, it was the speediest and easiest mode of killing the alligator. I may now venture to state that the Tamuls have an idea that if a bullet be filled with lime before firing at an alligator, it will, wherever it penetrates, cause a wound that will prove mortal. I have, since making the experiment related above, been told that it is not uucommon for the Singhalese to fill the stomach of a bullock with lime, aud to place it near an alligator's haunts; knowing that if he swallowed the lime, death would ensue.

Mullativoe (mentioned just now) is an isolated station, where the magistrate is the only European, and administers justice in a patriarchal way. Close to the court is a tank full of alligators, and as the magistrate sat on his beneh he could see them crawl out and bask in the sunshine. So he used to take his rifle with him to court, and keep it ready loaded beside him. In the middle of the examination of a witness, the clerk of the court would turn round and say, "Sir! sir! there's an alligator." Down would go the pen, up would go the rifle—Bang! and out would rush the clerk and interpreter to see what damage had been done. After a few minutes they would come in again to report, and then business would proceed as before.

A week or two ago, a Tamul man and woman were travelling together all night, when they met an elephant in the road. They tried to avoid it, but in vain. The animal charged them both, killed the woman, and very severely injured the man. Most probably it was a rogue.

Buffaloes are very formidable enstomers. They charge with great fury, and it is not easy to get a good shot when they are coming at one with their hard heads, from which a ball is apt to glance. The best way to shoot a buffalo when there are two sportsmen, is for the two to keep a hnndred yards apart. One should then fire. If the buffalo does not drop, he will probably charge the man who fired, and in so doing will give the other sportsman the chance of a flank shot.

The natives catch the wild buffaloes, and tame them. At certain seasons they are employed in ploughing the paddy-fields; at other times they are allowed to roam about, when they often regather with the wild herds. A half-tamed buffalo, though he yields a sullen obedience to his master, will often prove a dangerous customer to a stranger; in fact, almost more so than a wild one. I was travelling one day with a lady, on the sea road between Trincomalie and Jaffna. I was riding a small pony, when, in crossing a plain, a buffalo charged me. I was unarmed, and as he eame at me with a will, I had no alternative but to dash on as fast as I could, my assailant charging from one side; but with a tired pony escape was not easy, and I was getting the worst of it, when, to my great satisfaction and amusement, my friend went head over heels in a mud-hole which lay between us. This cooled his ardor, aud he gave up the pursuit.

There is a place called Kokalai, in the northern province, where wild buffaloes were almost always to be seen. One of them was exceedingly fierce, and killed several persons. The magistrate went to the spot, and in the capacity of coroner held an iuquest. He had just concluded, when the buffalo emerged from the neighboring forest, and charged down upon his party. Fortunately he had with him a single-barrelled rifle. He dropped on one knee, waited till the buffalo was elose on him, and fired. The ball took effect in the buffalo's forehead, and ran far into his body, and the brute dropped dead at the gentleman's feet.

Bears often attack people, and are seemingly the aggressors; but in all probability it is rather the fear of being attacked themselves that induces them to injure man. I have a friend who had a most terrific tussle with a bear which he had wounded with shot. The bear elosed with him, and he fought the bear with his knife, giving and receiving terrible wounds. At length my friend got away, and crawled for some distance till he obtained assistance But he will bear to his grave the marks of his enemy's teeth and claws.

There is a certain gentlemau in Ceylon who is a great sportsman. I do not know him myself, and therefore do not make more particular allusion to him: but he had the following adventure, and it was related to me by a mutual friend, who authorized me to repeat it: This gentleman was one day erossing some water on foot, to get a shot at an elephant; his gun was in the hands of a man who was going round the shore. As he walked along, something lay in his way which he imagined to be a log of wood, so he stepped over it. No sooner had he placed one leg over it than the log appeared suddenly to beeome imbued with life, and he found himself across the back of an alligator—probably more alarmed even than himself at being thus mounted. The alligator immediately rushed off. The rider, as soon as he recovered his presence of mind, took a header into the water, and escaped.

I alluded in a former paper to an alligator whieh had killed two persous not far from where I write, and who was constantly on the wateh for bathers. I am happy to say he has beeu shot. The particulars of the manner in which he killed the two men have been communicated to me. A gentleman in the public service was bathing within au enclosure. A Singhalese gentleman of rank was also bathing without the euelosure; a native attendant filled a vessel with water and handed it to him; suddenly the man who had brought the water was goue; and the two bathers saw him with half his body in the water, at some distauce, throwing up his arms and apparently articulating something. All at once he sunk. They imagined at first that he had been earried off by the current, but subsequently the body was found in a mutilated state. A few days afterwards, seven pilgrims were standing knee-deep in the same river; the alligator passed six of them, seized the last, and dragged him away from among his eompanions.

At Batticaloa a girl was bathing on her bridal morning, when an alligator seized and carried her off. A friend of mine succeeded in shooting the brute, and found within him parts of the girl, and her bangles, or arm-rings.

Sharks are occasionally caught with the remains of human beings within them. Not long sinee one was exposed for sale in the bazaar at Colombo, in which was found a white hand; a poor soldier had been buried at sea the previous day, and it is believed it had belonged to him. I remember rather a pretty little discussiou arising between two Singhalese men, the one the buyer of a shark, the other the seller. The price paid for it was twenty rix dollars, (one pound ten.) When the purchaser was cntting it up for sale, he found inside the stomach the leg of a man; upon which the people declined purchasing any pieces, and the shark remained on the man's hands. So he demanded that the seller should refund the one pound ten. "No, no," said he: "had you found in the fish a bag full of money, you wonld have claimed it as yours and given me none." He (the purchaser) had to make the best of his bargain, as the bystanders gave a verdict against him. Travels in Ceylon.

ORATORIOS IN ENGLAND.—In Judas Maccabeus occurs the world-renowned "See the Conquering Hero comes," and other grand compositions. This was the most successful of all Handel's oratorios during his lifetime; it was adopted as a glorification of the military conquerors in 1745–6; and it was much patronized also by the wealthy Jewish inhabitants of the metropolis, for the speciality of the story to which it relates. In Joshua there is one of the choruses of Israelites, concerning which Haydn said to Shield that "only one composer ever did, or ever could, produce so sublime a composition." The "Occasional Oratorio" is a mixture of invotion, hymns, and thanks for victory; but the circuuistances under which Handel composed it do not seem now to be well known; it is chiefly noted for its fine overture. Theodora was Handel's favorite oratorio; a taste in which he has not been followed either by the critics or by the world generally. He composed it when over sixty years of age, and when composing was no longer easy to him; he possibly valued it for the labor it had cost him. It is narrated that on one occasion two musical professors asked him for tickets for a performauce of the Messiah, to which he pettishly replied, "Oh, you are tainty! You would not go to Teodora; dere was room enough to tance dere ven dat was perform!" Nevertheless, Theodora contains an air ("Angels ever bright and fair") which is characterized by Dean Ramsay ("Lectures on the Genius of Haudel") as "the most seraphic air that Handel ever wrote, or that auy man ever wrote." The grand old composer declined after his sixtieth birthday; yet his last oratorio, Jephtha, produced in 1753, contains three of his loveliest airs ("Deeper and deeper still," "Waft her, angels," and "Farewell ye limpid streams.") Handel was blind in later years, and in 1759 was taken from a world which he had so often delighted with the productions of his genius. Although there have been mauy other composers of oratorios besides Handel, they occupy, collectively, a comparatively small space in public attention. Haydn takes a place in the list for his Creation. He was employed two whole years upon it, and brought out in 1798, to words written by the Baron von Swieten. The Creation has never been regarded as equal to Handel's greatest oratorios: but it is nevertheless highly appreciated in England, partly on account of the beautiful melodies given to the solo singers ("With verdure clad," "In native worth," "Oh, star the fairest," etc.,) for two or three splendid choruses, and partly for the remarkable instrumental musie deseriptive of the various aspeets and sounds of newly-created nature. Musical theorists dispute with each other touchiug the æsthetic propriety of those descriptive imitations; meanwhile the public admire what Haydn has done, and thank him for doiug it. Beethoven's one oratorio, The Mount of Olives, is very difficult for band and chorus, and has not yet become a favorite work in England. Nearly the same thing may be said of three or four oratorios by Spohr, of which the best known is the Last Judgment. Mendelssohu is the only composer who, in the present century, has produced oratorios striking alike to the musical critic and to the general audience. They are, unfortunately, only two in number—St. Paul, brought out in 1837, and Elijah in 1846. Mendelssohn himself was present at Exeter Hall to hear the first performauce of his Elijah there. The Queen and the late Prince Consort were present on the second performance; and the Prince sent to the great composer, on the following day, the programme which the Queen had used, with a few graceful lines of recognition.—Churchman's Family Magazine.

IT is a remarkable fact that persons losing themselves in the forest, or in a snow-storm, manifest invariably a tendency to turn round gradually to the left, to the extent even of eventually moving in a circle. The explanation of this is found probably in the fact that the limbs and museles of the right side are generally better developed than those of the left side. Shoemakers say that, as a general thing, the right foot is somewhat larger than the left, and that the right boot wears out first. Under the excitement felt when one is lost, and in the absenee of any guiding-line, the superior energy of the right limbs throws the pedestrian insensibly round on the left. It may also be remarked that in the ancient religious eeremonies of every country eircular or choric dances were a prevalent custom.

NELSON'S EXTRACT OF
Roses And Rosemary.

THE FOLLOWING IS A BRIEF NOTICE of some of its principal virtues, as a mild stimulative, corrective and preservative agent for the hair:

Infancy.—It insinuates its balsamic properties into the pores of the head, nourishes the hair in its embryo state, accelerates its growth, sustains it in maturity, and continues the possession of healthy vigor, silky softness, and luxuriant reduudancy, to the latest period of human life. Genial and purifying, it dispels all scurf and impurity, and renders the use of the fine comb unnecessary.

The Beard, Whiskers, and Mustachios.—Its extraordinary power in promoting the growth of the hair is singularly displayed in creating these ornaments of manhood.

Curl and Embellishment.—In dressiug the hair nothing can equal its effect, rendering the hair so admirably soft that it will lie in any direction, producing beautifully flowing curls, and, by the transcendant lustre it imparts, rendering the coiffure inexpressibly attractive.

Grey Hair.—Its nourishing properties are eminently successful in the prevention of Grey Hair, and in numerous instances, in the restoration to its original color.

Baldness.—Its productive powers are constantly and surprisingly shown in cases of Baldness, so that in numerous instances where other specifics have been tried in vain, this celebrated Oil has effected a complete restoration of Beautiful Hair.

Sea-Bathing and Violent Exercise.—After indulging in either of these, so apt to exhaust the nourishing matter secreted at the roots or bulbs of the hair, the Roses and Rosemary will be found most efficacious, both in preserving and in immediately restoring the hair to its usual appearance of health with renovated brightness.

Its invaluable properties have obtained the patronage of every Court of the civilized world; and the high esteem in which it is universally held, together with numerous testimonials constantly received of its efficacy, affords the best and surest proofs of its merits.

Sold by all Druggists, and by H. P. WAKELEE, corner of Montgomery and Sutter streets, and corner of Bush and Montgomery streets. se24

LAWRENCE & COMPANY'S

PATENT IMPROVED

Flesh Gloves and Straps!

For Producing a Healthy State of the System by Friction, Without the Risk of Tearing the Skin, as all the Ordinary Horse-Hair Gloves are liable to do.

THE GREAT VALUE OF THE HORSE-HAIR Renovator as a therapeutic agent, when applied to the human body, is now too well known to every one who has paid the least attention to the importance of a healthy action of the Skin, to require further comment.

The superior advantages of the Patent Flesh Gloves and Straps, manufactured under this Patent, are that, by a peculiar process in the machinery employed in their manufacture, the points of the Hair are brought perpendicularly to the surface, thereby removing the liability to tear the Skin (a very general complaint against the ordinary kind,) rendering them more pleasant to use, at the same time enabling the process of friction to be much more effectually performed; they are, indeed, a positive luxury to use, apart from their salutary effects.

The peculiar fabric manufactured expressly for the use of Ladies deserves their special attention; it has been highly recommended by the most eminent of the medical profession, and given universal satisfaction to those who have used it.

For sale by

H. P. WAKELEE,

se24 Cor. Montgomery and Sutter streets.

THE OXFORD WASHING PAD.

This article, suggested by an Oxford man, for removing Stains from the Hands, being found to thoroughly answer the purpose, has established fair pretensions to become of universal use, which it is rapidly doing.

Manufactured by LAWRENCE & CO., and sold by

H. P. WAKELEE,

se24 Cor. Montgomery and Sutter streets.

PHINEAS BANNING,

FORWARDING AND COMMISSION AGENT,

WILMINGTON & LOS ANGELES,

DEALER IN

LUMBER, COAL, IRON, FLOUR, GRAIN, etc., etc.,

And Proprietor of the United States Mail Stage Line between Los Angeles and Wilmington. se24

REMOVAL.

INSURANCE AGINST FIRE.

THE NORTH BRITISH AND MERCANTILE INSURANCE COMPANY

OF LONDON AND EDINBURGH.

ESTABLISHED, 1809.

Capital, $10,000,000. Accumulated Funds, January 1, 1864, $11,169,140. Deposit in California under State law, $75,000. Limit on single Risks, $100,000. Bankers, Messrs Tallant & Co. Fire Policies on buildings and contents, throughout the Pacific States and Territories, granted on the most liberal terms. Losses promptly adjusted and paid here in U. S. Gold coin.

Office removed to 414 California street, opposite Alsop & Co. WM. H. TILLINGHAST, Agent.

au19-3m

MANHATTAN FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY OF NEW YORK.

Cash Capital and Surplus.....$750,000
Deposit in San Francisco.....$75,000

COLUMBIA FIRE INSURANCE CO., OF NEW YORK.

Cash Capital and Surplus.....$600,000
Deposit in San Francisco.....$75,000

THE ABOVE MENTIONED WELL-KNOWN and responsible Companies, having complied with the law enacted at the last session of the Legislature, and deposited with Messrs. Donohoe, Ralston & Co.

$75,000 EACH,

As additional security to Policy-holders, will continue to insure

BUILDINGS,
MERCHANDISE,
FURNITURE,

And other property in California, Oregon and Nevada Territory, against Loss or Damage by Fire, upon the most favorable terms.

All Losses promptly paid in United States Gold Coin.

R. B. SWAIN & CO., Agents,

ju25-tf 206 Front street, corner of California.

R. G. SNEATH,

408 FRONT STREET, SAN FRANCISCO,

Importer and Wholesale Dealer in

GROCERIES, PROVISIONS, FLOUR, RICE

TOBACCOS, LIQUORS, ETC.

Branch House, - - SNEATH & BOARMAN, - - Red Bluff.

Forwarding Agent, D. W. EARL, Sacramento, who will receive and fill orders for all kinds of Goods on my account, and keep a large stock of Flour, Barley, Potatoes, Ground Feed, etc., etc. No charge for forwarding.

ALMADEN QUICKSILVER!

Orders for Goods not in my line furnished customers without extra charge. Orders for Goods in the Eastern markets attended to promptly. Daily Prices Current furnished when desired.

Orders respectfully solicited. ju11-1m

CONTINENTAL HOTEL,

SAN JOSE.

GEORGE T. BROMLEY.....Proprietor.

As a desirable place of resort for health or recreation, the above Hotel is not surpassed in the State.

Excellent accommodations for families, by the day, week, or month, on reasonable terms.

ju25

REMOVAL.

A. EDDY'S

Dancing Academy,

Platt's (Middle) Hall.

PUPILS TAUGHT IN ONE-HALF THE TIME OF elsewhere.

CLASSES—MONDAYS and FRIDAYS. Ladies at half-past 2 P. M.; Gents at half-past 7 P. M.

CHILDREN'S CLASSES—On SATURDAYS, at 2 P. M.; also, on WEDNESDAYS, at half-past 3 P. M.

Private instructions given separately or to classes, to suit the convenience of applicants.

SELECT SOIREES on alternate weeks. au6-tf

CARRINGTON & CO'S

GENERAL PURCHASING AGENCY,

No. 40 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Personal Orders, small or large, and for articles of every descriptions, PROMPTLY and carefully attended to.

Who wants anything from New York?

THIS AGENCY

Enables Country Residents to make purchases in the City without troubling busy friends, or mere acquaintances.

IF YOU WANT

Books, Prints, Clothing, Instruments, Music, Tools, Weapons, Sporting Implements, Fancy Stock, Jewelry, Silver or Plated Ware, Wines, Cigars, Fine Groceries, Furniture; in short, any Article, large or small, singly or in quantity, for Ladies' or Gentlemen's use or wear,

or for Dealers' Supplies, from a seal-ring to a steam engine—a Cameo or a Cashmere; lace or leather,

SEND ON YOUR ORDERS.

We can fill them on better terms than you could obtain if here; while our commission, even on large orders, is much less than the expense of visiting the city in person.

Orders under $10, from places within reach of our daily Expresses, (except for perishable articles,) can be paid for on delivery by Express; others should be remitted for, either direct, or through some city friend to be paid when filled. Every order should be as clearly worded as possible.

Orders may be given in French, Spanish or German.

COMMISSION CHARGE, - - - FIVE PER CENT.

Address:

CARRINGTON & CO.,

au6 40 Broadway, N. Y.

REOPENED FOR THE SEASON.

THE CRYSTAL SPRINGS HOTEL,

Situated four miles from the San Mateo Railroad depot, in a most splendid valley, surrounded with large, beautiful, natural trees, is now open for the public. The road from San Mateo to the house has been recently macadamized, making it the finest drive in California. The House and Cottages have been refitted and thoroughly renovated. New spring beds and every modern improvement have been added to the sleeping department. The larder, as usual, contains all the delicacies of the season. Stages leave San Mateo depot on the arrival of the trains for Crystal Springs.

A fine stable is now opened at San Mateo by Messrs. Byrnes & Ames, who will furnish horses and carriages, or saddle horses, at low rates, to the public. Parties wishing rooms or meals, on arrival, can engage them by telegraph, via San Mateo.

ju11-tf TONY OAKES, Proprietor.

McRUER & MERRILL,

WHOLESALE AUCTION HOUSE,

204 and 206 California street.

Regular Sale Days - - - WEDNESDAYS and SATURDAYS

(Advances on Consignments.)

NOTICE!

From this date Mr. A. P. EVERETT has an interest in our business. McRUER & MERRILL.

San Francisco, October 20, 1862.

A. P. EVERETT, - - - - - - - - - Auctioneer.

ju11-3m

SQUARZA'S PUNCH.

First Premium, Sacramento, 1862.
First Premium at San Francisco District Fair, 1863.
First and Special Premium, Sacramento, 1863.
Wholesale and Retail.

my28 44 Leidesdorff street, San Francisco.

EDWARD BOSQUI & CO.,

517

CLAY STREET, SAN FRANCISCO.

BOOKBINDERS, PAPER-RULERS, AND ACCOUNT-BOOK MANUFACTURERS.

Blanks of all kinds printed and ruled to any desired pattern. my28

MRS. HENDRICKS.

No. 629 MISSION STREET,

Devotes herself exclusively to

EMBROIDERY, STAMPING AND PINKING,

And she does more work than any other person in her line. She has by far the best collection and the largest assortment of stamps in the city. Her patterns are the most carefully drawn, and her marking is the evenest and the easiest to work, especially for those who are not very skilful. The coloring of all others rubs out, and the figures, if not traced round with thread, are effaced before the work is done; but Mrs. Hendricks' coloring, on all kinds of stuff, is warranted to defy rubbing, though it can be easily washed out. She is an engraver and engraves her own stamps, and thus is enabled to supply herself with all the latest patterns fashionable in Eastern and European cities.

Any customer can get a new pattern cut without charge, if Mrs. Hendricks can use it afterwards. Although there are many others in the same business in San Francisco, all acknowledge the superiority of Mrs. Hendricks, and send the most difficult work to her. Ladies are invited to call and examine her patterns.

☞ Remember the number, 629 Mission street, San Francisco. jy30tf*

DR. J. H. HATCH,

DENTIST,

Graduate of the Pennsylvania College of Dental Surgery.

All operations pertaining to the profession thoroughly and skillfully performed. Entire satisfaction in all cases guaranteed.

Office, 645 Clay street, between Montgomery and Kearny street, San Francisco. au27

SAVE YOUR

E. F. BUNNELL, D. D. S.,

ROOMS, NO. 51 SECOND STREET.

DR BUNNELL WILL SAVE EVERY TOOTH THAT ACHES from exposure of the nerve, or refund the charge for the operation, and extract each tooth without pay in EVERY case of failure. Teeth filled with gold, artificial bone, and golden lithodeon. Plate teeth on vulcanite and gold enameled base, of surpassing beauty and comfort.

☞ All work warranted. Price low. ☜

N. B.—More than 1,000 aching teeth have been saved in succession, without the loss of one. au27-3m

---

REMOVAL.

DR. JOHN HEALD,

DENTIST,

OFFICE AND RESIDENCE: STEVENSON HOUSE,

Montgomery street, corner of California. Entrance on both streets. Rooms 12 and 13. jy30-3m

---

WONDERFUL TRIUMPH

IN AMERICAN DENTISTRY.

DR. BEERS & CO.,

617 Clay street,

ARE NOW MANUFACTURING THE NEW style of ARTIFICIAL TEETH so highly approved at the East, and which to be appreciated only requires to be seen. The Teeth, Gums and Plate are made of one entire piece of Porcelain without seam or joint, combining great strength and beauty with absolute purity and freedom from any metallic taste, while the coloring of the gums and the interior of the mouth are so perfect as to almost defy detection. All interested in the progress of the Arts are invited to examine samples of this work.

Superior Gold and Vulcanite Work also manufactured as usual, but at greatly reduced prices ju18

FARRAND'S OSCILLATING
Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALLED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REduction and amalgamation of Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY.

As a guarantee of what this machine will do, I propose, with any gentleman who will produce an Amalgamator that will work the same amount of ore in the same number of hours, with the same outlay of power, and produce the equal result, to deposit the sum of FIVE HUNDRED DOLLARS each, the money so deposited to be drawn by the person who shall be declared to have produced the best result. The money (the $500) by whichever party won to be paid over to some one of the benevolent institutions in this State, to be named by the party losing. This proposition is not made with the view of detracting from the merits of any Amalgamator now before the public, but for the purpose of placing this valuable improvement before such persons as may be interested in quartz milling, and to whom the matter properly belongs.

I CHALLENGE COMPETITION

CALL AND SEE THE MACHINES WORK!

W. D. FARRAND.

R. L. OGDEN, Agent, Southeast corner of Montgomery and California streets, San Francisco. jy30tf

---

TYLER BROTHERS,

Importers, Wholesale and Retail Dealers in

School Books, Stationery,

PHOTOGRAPH ALBUMS,

PORTFOLIOS JUVENILE BOOKS, CHILDREN'S PICTURE BOOKS, FANCY ARTICLES, etc.,

NO. 632 WASHINGTON STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO.

au27-tf

CARPETS.

WE have just received and are now opening

NEW AND MAGNIFICENT STYLES OF

WILTON

—AND—

Royal Velvet Carpets,

The finest Goods ever Imported into this State, to which we invite particular attention. Also a New Stock of

BRUSSELS CARPETS,

THREE-PLY AND INGRAIN CARPETS,

OIL CLOTHS, ALL WIDTHS AND STYLES,

PAPER HANGINGS, BROCATELLE CURTAIN REPS, SILK DAMASK,

WINDOW SHADES, MATS, ETC., ETC.

House-keepers and others in want of the above goods, will find our stock the most complete, and our

PRICES THE LOWEST IN THE CITY!

KENNEDY & BELL,

Southwest cor. Montgomery and California streets.

se24

NOTICE TO SHIPPERS

—TO—

Red Bluff.

ON AND AFTER TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 20th, the steamers of the California Steam Navigation Company

WILL LEAVE SACRAMENTO

FOR RED BLUFF,

EVERY TUESDAY AND FRIDAY,

At 7 o'clock, A. M.

se24-tf J. WHITNEY, Jr., President.

JOSEPH A. DONOHOE, San Francisco. | EUGENE KELLY, New York.

DONOHOE, KELLY & CO.,

SAN FRANCISCO.

EUGENE KELLY & CO.,

NEW YORK.

Bankers.

EXCHANGE ON

NEW YORK,
BANK OF LONDON, - - - London
BANK OF IRELAND. jy2

LOCKE & MONTAGUE,

IMPORTERS OF

STOVES AND METALS,

Nos. 112 and 114 Battery street,

jy2 SAN FRANCISCO

DEMON AMOR.

[TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN FOR "THE CALIFORNIAN."]

BEFORE the northern deluge destroyed the southern portion of Rugen, (A. D. 1309,) a young prince named Udo reigned over this fertile island, and resided in Arcon, now buried in the depths of the sea. He married Edda, the daughter of one of his vassals, and lived in happy independence, a sovereign in his sea-girt kingdom; he loved his subjects, did what seemed right to him, and cared nought for the department of foreign affairs. Little burdened with government cares, he enjoyed in the bosom of repose the happiness of domestic life, now and then interrupted by hunting and fishing.

Once he was following the hunt on the north coast of his domain, near a promontory which stretched far into the sea. In the shade of an oak tree he rested with his retinue from the fatigue of the day, enjoying the cooling aspect of the smooth and softly-moving waters.

Suddenly the storm arose on rushing wings, the even surface became wrinkled as an angry brow; the high waves splashed and dashed against the rocky crag. And there was a ship battling against the waves, a plaything of the winds, mocking the labor of the anxious pilot, and pushing it to the shore, where on a hidden rock it split.

As long as the struggle lasted Prince Udo had enjoyed, in rest and security, the heart-stirring spectacle of human daring and boldness, bidding defiance to the raging elements. But no sooner was the weaker party in need than he hastened with his retinue to the rescue of the shipwrecked. He promised heavy rewards to the most daring fisherman who should save the few survivors. But the sea had already swallowed its prey when the boat had not yet passed the surge.

One single man floated on the waves as a cork, bestriding a barrel, which, like a well-trained horse, obeyed his slightest motion. A high rolling wave brought him on shore at the very feet of the compassionate prince, who received him kindly, had him provided with dry clothes, and refreshed him with food and drink. Then he offered him his own goblet as a sign that he should be received as a guest, and not be reduced into slavery, according to the law.

The stranger accepted with thanks the boon of liberty, emptied the goblet to the health of the prince, was gay and jovial, and seemed to have entirely forgotten his misfortune. This philosophical equanimity pleased Udo, and excited his curiosity to know more about the navigator. He asked, therefore: "Stranger, who art thou? Whence comest thou? What is thy occupation?"

The rescued answered: "My name is Waidemuth, the Unknown; I am a swimmer; came from the Amber coast of Bruzzia, [the ancient name of Prussia,] and was bound for England."

Udo found in the physiognomy, the surname and the swimming of the stranger something which excited his curiosity more and more. But the Unknown turned his answers in such a manner that the prince could not "find him out." Hoping that a nearer acquaintance would lift the mystery, he abstained from further questions.

The prince continued the hunt, inviting the stranger to partake of the pleasure. He did so with zest, and without the slightest show of fatigue. But just before vaulting into the saddle, he broke the barrel on which he had swam ashore, and took a stave as a memento, it would seem, of his truly memorable escape.

During the hunt he proved to be as good a marksman as he was a swimmer. At last the prince left the wood and trotted home. On the road he saw some partridges flying up, and was sorry not to have his bird at hand to bring them too. The Unknown, as if guessing the prince's wish, threw the stave of the barrel up in the air; a sparrow immediately arose above the head of the prince, brought the partridges too, and obeyed the call of none but the swimmer, on whose hand he returned.

The Prince and his retinue were amazed. Each had his own notion about the stranger. Some said he was a sea-god; others, that he was an enchanter. Udo kept his judgment, but thought him somebody extraordinary. He received him as a guest at the palace, showed him all possible attention, presented him to his wife, the sweet Edda, and recommended him as a friend.

The Unknown justified fully his good opinion. He was an accomplished courtier, possessed knowledge of many things, and amused the ladies with sundry pretty jugglerics. But neither the kindness and friendship of the prince, nor the cup of joy, which he often emptied with his noble entertainer, could loosen his tongue. The sharp-seeing prince perceived sometimes a secret melancholy, more so when Udo made him a witness of his domestic happiness—a thing so rare in the palaces of the great. The prince became suspicious on account of this very thing. He thought him surely in love with his wife, and attributed his gloom to an inward struggle between passion and honesty.

One day he rode out hunting with the suspected favorite. They had left the retinue behind, and the Unknown spoke thus: "My good prince, you have had pity with an unfortunate man who escaped shipwreck; he is not ungrateful. The strand law made me your property; you gave me liberty. I wish to use it and to return to my home, if you give me leave."

The Prince answered "Friend, thou hast freedom to do as thou likest; but thy departure is sudden—tell me what drives thee away?"

"The painful suspicion, which you foster against me," replied the Unknown, "though my heart absolves me from such guilt. You misconstrue my melancholy which has a cause, whereof you suspect nothing, but which you ought not to know, should you desire to make the experience."

Udo was perplexed. How could human penetration discover the most hidden thoughts of his heart? He made the best of it, and said:

"Thoughts are free, my friend. If I have made a mistake, very well! thou hast not suffered; the best defence is, I think, to tell me the cause of thy silent gloom."

"Be it so," replied Waidemuth. "I understand astrology, and in your behalf have studied the aspects of your fate. I found that there is a change forthcoming which gives me uneasiness. That is the cause of my gloom. If you wish to know more, listen —"

"Stop!" interrupted Prince Udo, "the aspects of thy face show nothing good. I thank thee for thy interest in my fate, but abstain from telling me lest I suffer beforehand."

The astrologer kept silence. Udo dismissed him with feelings of true friendship, loaded him with gifts, and he disappeared no one knew where.

—

A few months passed, and a terrible clamor of war arose from the continent. Cruco, the King of the Obotrites, who ruled over Mecklenburg, prepared an expedition against all the tribes of the Obotrites who had left the allegiance of the King, with a view of uniting them again under the same dominion.

Udo was for once obliged to take notice of "foreign affairs" and sent reliable agents to inform. The rumors were but too true. The storm was yet far off, but the wind blew towards his island, and would soon bring it over the sea. He prepared as well as he could, and relied on the protection of the sea, which girded his possessions. But the fickle element turned to the stronger party, and carried on its broad back the hostile fleet to the very shores of Rugen.

The prince, unable to cope with the powerful host in open field, was besieged in his capital of Arcon, assaulted during forty days, until at last the city was taken. In the turmoil of slaughter, a band of faithful followers surrounded the prince, burst the gate, and rushed under cover of night through the hostile camp. They reached the shore, and put to a sea in a small vessel, uncertain where to direct their course. The hills of their native country disappeared, whilst the unfortunate prince gazed with tearful eye at the passing outline of what was once his possession. Yet he regretted not so much his lost dominions as the violent separation from his beloved wife and her sweet little daughter, the image of the mother and the joy of the father. The uncertainty concerning their fate increased his despair. He scarcely thanked his faithful guard for having saved him from the sword, and praised the blessing of the dead, who were freed from sorrow and anguish.

Fate itself seemed to pity the unfortunate prince, and was willing to grant him relief by ending his existence. A raging storm swept suddenly over the Baltic, seized the vessel, tossed it as a feather ball, tore the sail, split the mast, and broke the rudder. The miserable wreck was thrown up to the clouds, then plunged into the abyss, until on a hidden rock it broke to pieces. Udo was the first who at the helmsman's cry, "Each one look out for himself!" sprang with secret joy into the waves to hasten his end.

But an irresistible power drew him, against his will, from the depth, and a rolling wave left him senseless on the shore. When coming to himself he was surrounded by many people, who were busily engaged in restoring him to life; Waidemuth the Unknown was the first whom he beheld, anxiously watching his return to life. But instead of thanking him, Udo spoke with feeble voice and dejected countenance:

"Cruel man, have I deserved that thou shouldst bring me with violence from the blessing of rest to the whirlpool of new sufferings? Have mercy upon me, and let me find in the waves the grave which I so anxiously wish for. Let me glide from thy hand into the angry sea; I shall then recognize the hand of a benefactor!"

Waidemuth the Unknown gave him kindly his hand, and spoke with sadness in his voice:

"Your misfortune, noble prince, has crushed you with its heavy weight. But it becomes a steadfast man not to yield; no! but to exert the remaining strength in order to remove the weight, and to strive anew on high. Before you resolve to die, open at least your heart to a man whom once you esteemed worthy of your friendship, nor despise the comfort of sympathy."

"Ah," said the unhappy prince, "why dost thou wish me to repeat the misfortune of which the mere remembrance causes my heart to bleed: A powerful enemy has robbed me of my kingdom; I have lost my wife and her nurseling, the pledge of our love. Now thou knowest enough to justify my resolve to quit a life which seems bitterer to me than the grimness of death itself."

The Unknown answered: "All that the stars foretold me, when Is aked them your fate, and that caused my sadness when I departed. But the signs may become favorable to you. Therefore do not despair. It is in the power of fate to make you ample restitution for your losses. You are young and active; shall you grieve to death for a woman? Does it not depend upon yourself to find the housewife who will give you children to take care of you in old age? And does not fortune dispense crowns and kingdoms to whom it will? A good husbandman tries to gain back the penny he has lost; the lazy one complains and groans, sits down and gets poor."

Prince Udo sat in deepest grief, looked towards the sea, yet found in this philosophy but little strength for heart and mind. But Waidemuth did not cease to console and encourage him; and at last the prince consented to follow him into a shipper's hut not far from the shore, where he received the care of his host, consisting of ship's provisions.

And therewith Udo lost all the romance which he had imagined, when he had received as his guest the marvellous stranger on the Rugen shore. Now he saw that this adventurer was neither a magician nor a sea-god, but a common skipper, in nothing different from his equals, except by a certain gift of prophecy, which was, as usual, of no account in his own country. Therefore he expected but little consolation from his friendship; although his zeal to render him service for the received kindness naturally pleased him. After a frugal repast, where, however, the cup of welcome filled with sparkling wine was not forgotten, the obliging host showed the wearied guest a resting-place, with the wish that the golden sleep might make him forgetful, for a time at least, of grief and sorrow.

(To be concluded in our next.)

THE ADVENTURES OF A LADY IN SEARCH OF A HORSE.

CHAPTER I.

"Then her cheek was pale and thinner than should be for one so young,
And her eyes on all my motions with a mute observance hung."
[Locksley Hall.

"THERE is nothing like exercise, my dear madam, in a case of this sort; you may depend upon me when I tell you so; and as exercise upon four legs will be even more advantageous than exercise upon two, you must get a horse for your daughter, and let her ride as much as she can: provided always that she is not afraid Eh, my dear?"

This last query was directed by Sir Erasmus Globule, the fashionable physician of the day, to his youthful patient Miss Gloriana Applegarde, who had been brought to him for advice, in one of those difficult cases in which general decline of bodily health takes place, without any ostensible or tangible cause. It had baffled the attempts of the country practitioner utterly to arrest, or even understand it; and it was indeed at his recommendation that the shrewd and affable doctor (who had won a world-wide fame more from quickness and penetration than from any deep learning and research) had been at last consulted by the anxious mother on her daughter's account.

Under his sunshiny influence the most desponding patient would become cheerful and reassured; and in the case in question it was evident that he had hit upon a remedy acceptable to the invalid, for her pale cheek flushed, and her slender frame trembled with eagerness, as she replied, "Afraid! oh no, indeed, Sir Erasmus: I have always had a passion for horses, although I have never had an opportunity of riding. I should like it better than anything in the world."

It was, indeed, just as she said. As a child she had read of horses, and loved horses in that reckless, impassioned sort of way in which little girls are supposed to love only dolls or kittens; as she had grown older, she had never formed in imagination a tale or a romance in which a horse was not a principal hero, the biped being on every occasion entirely subordinate to the glorified quadruped. She had never found any difficulty in learning by heart any piece, prose or poetical, which treated of the all-engrossing subject; she had wept with James Fitz-James over the fate of the gallant horse that lay a-dying in the Highland glen, and believed that nothing in poetry equalled the pathos of the lines—

Then touched with pity and remorse,
He sorrowed o'er the expiring horse:
"I little thought when first thy rein
I slacked upon the banks of Seine,
That Highland eagle e'er should feed
On thy fleet limbs, my matchless steed.
Woe worth the chase! woe worth the day!
That cost thy life, my gallant grey;"

or the majesty of those in "The Battle of the Lake Regillus," describing the noble grief of him who was "the fleetest steed from Aufidus to Po":

But like a graven image
Black Auster kept his place,
And ever wistfully he looked
Into his master's face.
The raven-mane that daily
With puts and fond caresses,
The young Herminia washed and combed,
And twined in even tresses,
And decked with colored ribbons,
From her own gay attire,
Hung sadly o'er her father's corpse,
In carnage and in mire;

or the graphic force of those in the Spanish ballad, when the Cid displays his peerless charger, in the sight of the king and the courtiers, saying—

"But that your Majesty may see him,
And know him to the core,
I'll make him go as he was wont
When his nostrils smelt the Moor."

After which gallant display of horsemanship, the science of the Cid is put to the last test, by the breaking of the bridle when, equal to the occasion, in sight of the wondering crowd, he is seen "proudly ruling" the fiery steed, "with the fragment of his rein."

Although the penetrating eye of Sir Erasmus Globule, aided by his wide experience, could hardly have enabled him to ascertain all this at a glance, it had enabled him, metaphorically speaking, to put his finger at once upon the seat of disease. Some employment, or amusement, which would act as a counterbalance to the mind subject to a brooding and overwhelming thought; some healthful exercise calculated to restore energy and buoyancy to the drooping frame: this was what experience told him was necessary for the recovery of his patient; and such employment and such amusement, experience had also told him, were more often productive of good results, when obtained through the agency of the "four legs" (whose good offices we heard him bespeak in his facetious and amiably patronizing way, in the beginning of this chapter) than by the unassisted efforts of only two. Miss Applegarde's passion for horses, which had never before been in the way of being indulged, made the simple prescription of the great man, in this particular instance, one of his luckiest hits.

Had he not been the most reserved, as well as the most acute of men, he would naturally have questioned so tender a mother as Mrs. Applegarde, as to her daughter's tone of mind, and the circumstances into which she had been thrown; but he trusted to his own instinctive perception; and in that instance, as in most of those which came under his observation, he did not trust in vain. Never was guinea fee more easily, and at the same time more deservedly earned; and before the sound of the wheels of his brougham had died away, and mingled with the rumble of the distant streets, Mrs. Applegarde exclaimed, with enthusiasm, "I am so glad, really, that we came to town; we never should have thought of your riding, should we, my dear?"

"I dare say not, mamma," said Gloriana; "but," she added, with a spark of the old animation in look and voice, "I like the idea very much, now that it is put into my head for me, as a thing that can be done. I have no doubt that I should have thought of it long ago, if it had only seemed to be in the least practicable. As it is, I cannot exactly see how it is to be managed."

"I confess that I foresee a difficulty in the matter of procuring the animal," Mrs Applegarde remarked, deliberately, while a smile, tender, but rallying, played about her daughter's lips, as she answered—

"It is indeed that first difficulty of "catching your horse" which appears to me almost insurmountable: there will be no difficulty about the riding part of it, for that has been my daydream all my life. We have no one to take into our council but Wells; and I do not suppose that he is much of a judge of horses, even should he be willing to help us, which I think more than doubtful."

Gloriana had not uttered so many consecutive sentences, or appeared so much interested upon any subject, since her insidious illness had been gradually but surely gaining ground upon her life, which circumstance Mrs. Applegarde noted with delighted surprise, as she replied, "I had no idea, my dear child, that you would have cared so much about it, or I would have procured you a horse long ago. But, to tell you the truth, such an event as your taking to riding never entered my head; and, with no gentleman to manage anything for us, there must always have been some little difficulty in the matter. Now that riding is ordered for you, however, by Sir Erasmus, for your health, it is a very different thing; and in spite of difficulties, in whatever shape or form they present themselves, the thing must be done."

It will be necessary here to explain, how it came to pass that so lovely a girl as Gloriana herself, and so elegant and attractive a woman as her widowed mother, should have to appear upon the list of "unprotected females," whose difficulties and dilemmas in the great battle of life have afforded a rich vein of amusement for those lovers of the grotesque and the incongruous, who are still chivalric enough to feel that there is a reproach to the male public, conveyed in the words themselves—that it should be possible for a "female" to be made conscious of her unprotected state, when thrown upon the mercy of society in an advanced stage of civilization, is, we presume, the incongruity which excites the risible muscles of the stronger sex.

Hoping that it is so, we hasten to acquit the men of Mrs. Applegarde's acquaintance, and those honored also by relationship to the fair widow and her daughters, from the reproach of want of taste, or want of feeling, which any backwardness on their part might well seem to imply. Mrs. Applegarde's isolated position in the world, had been entirely the result of her own self-chosen line of action. Naturally of a timid and retiring disposition, the great grief into which she had been plunged by the early loss of her husband, had given her an absolute distaste to society of any kind, with the exception of that of her two orphan children, Gloriana and her sister Katherine (commouly called Kate), in whom every thought of her heart was centred. She had withdrawn herself so entirely from the world that the process of forgetting—never a difficult one in that busy quarter—had been very quietly accomplished on either side, and very near male relatives, or friends, Mrs. Applegarde, since her last brother-in-law's death, in the prime of his life, had none.

She had brought up her two young daughters in their cottage home, where they lived like three white doves in a cot, and in the enjoyment of a competence of about twelve hundred a year, which, with their small establishment, and moderate expenditure, might almost have come under the head of wealth.

Although, however, Park Side Cottage was, as we have shown, innocent of any male element whatsoever, in the higher grade of life, that small ménage was ruled with a rod of iron, by a domestic tyrant, in the shape of "the old servant," the treasure of the family, who had lived with Mr. Applegarde from his boyhood, and who while he secretly worshipped every member of the family, manifested his inward affection, principally by the undesirable outward sign of general and indiscriminate intimidation.

Mr. Wells, the faithful and time-honored butler, was, it must be owned, the head of the House of Applegarde. Since Gloriana's spirits and health had failed, indeed, no one had ventured to contradict or to thwart him in any one single particular. She had always been, as he expressed it, the most "spirity" of the three; and, often and sorely as she had tried his domineering and irritable temperament, he would have given the famous receipt for plate-powder, which had gone down an heirloom from father to son in his family for some generations, to have welcomed once again from her lips the bold defiance or the saucy repartee. It was Wells, indeed, who had first suggested to Mrs. Applegarde, that his young lady's lassitude and general debility was assuming an alarming shape, and that, "as far as he saw, Mr. Kempe"—the family apothecary, who had attended at Park Side Cottage on all occasions when juvenile epidemics had awoke the anxious fears of the mother for her little girls—"was no better than an old woman, for anything more out of the common than measles or whooping-cough. It's easy to see," he continued, "that he doesn't understand the case. It's all very well to say, 'I ood, miss,' if my young lady wishes to walk on the downs, with an east wind cutting like a razor, because she thinks it bracing; or 'oodn't, miss,' if she takes it into her head not to go out in mild weather, because she considers it damp. But, without being able to see into a millstone, it's easy enough to see that he is a better judge of port wine, than he is of what's ailing Miss Gloriana—and has been for these weeks past."

But one half, or one quarter of this harangue would have been sufficient to raise in Mrs. Applegarde's anxious breast, a thousand apprehensions for her daughter's health. Her husband, and several members of his family, had died of consumption; and the idea that her eldest child might be already drooping from the effects of that insidious and fatal disease, filled her with horror and dread.

The heart of Wells, indeed, bled inwardly as he saw the thin, transparent cheek of his beloved mistress grow white under the probe of his awakening words; but he steeled it with the reflection, which greater philosophers than he have made before him, there is nothing so blind as the blindness of love. It is one of the most painful things in life to witness that fatal blindness of affection for the danger which threatens its object—to hear a husband, or a parent, or a wife talk calmly of those "to-morrows," which, it is evident fact to the eye of the most indifferent stranger, will never come—to see the eye of the foe in ambush glaring upon the unconscious victim, and know that in a few moments that the terrible spring will be made.

Cruel as the words might have appeared at first sight to be, they were dictated by the honest affection of the old servant for his late master's widow and child; and they did good service in the result, which was the well-timed advice of a sagacious doctor, who saw at a glance the best means of arresting the progress of the morbid and melancholy tone of mind, which was laying its withering finger day by day upon the health of the body. Such cases had doubtless come under the doctor's searching eye before; and the same remedy been prescribed perhaps in the same words; for the idea of "exercise upon four legs being better than exercise upon two" was quite a joke in Sir Erasmus' estimation, and he was fond of a joke, that dapper, affable little man, the idol of the fashionable world.

It certainly sounded like a simple remedy enough; but how about the four legs in question? how about the blemishes, the spavins, the spliuts, ring-bones, the string-halts, the corns, the unsoundnesses, and all the subtle and incurable evils that those four legs in horseflesh are heir to? How was it likely that three lovely and innocent women, and one aristocratic butler—to whom the "noble animal," as we were taught from our infancy to call the horse, was a quadruped unknown—could procure four sound and intact specimens of the article required, against, as it were, a world in arms? How indeed? The experienced in such matters will scarcely be inclined to agree with Mrs. Applegarde on the subject, who, in the exuberance of her maternal solicitude, declared that the matter "would be easy enough, if they only set about it the right way." An easy solution to all the problems which life offers for our consideration, if in that "right way" itself did not lie the pith and the centre of our bewilderment.

"Don't be volatile, Kate," she added, addressing her youngest daughter, a mischievous sprite, who was ready enough to make fun of the council of sages assembled, in congress, to discuss the momentous question; "don't be foolish, my dear, but help us to think what is best to be done under the circumstances. What do you think now of an advertisment in the Greyminster Herald? I can write one out at once;" and taking a sheet of note-paper, and seating herself at the elegantly appointed writing-table, she began to write with much appearance of determination—quoting herself, as she concluded, the first word of the sentence, which was the comprehensive word seen in such endless repetition in the columns of the Times—the word "Wanted."

"There," she said with an air of innocent triumph, in her progress so far in the right road to achievement, "I have written that; and now Mr. Wells," (Mrs. Applegarde thus addressed her butler, in the dignity of office, although the man to her was, for the sake of old associations, sometimes "Wells," but oftener than all simple "James,") now we must consider what it is that we do want."

And at this stage of the proceedings it must be confessed that the right way became less clear, and that Mrs. Applegarde became painfully conscious of an incapacity, which is common to many, of saying lucidly, or even grammatically, what she did want, when that was to assume the dignity of a "local habitation and a name" in the advertising sheet of a newspaper. What terrible confusion of the cases of nouns proper and substantive, and what a reckless disregard of the situation of corresponding adjectives, do not such columns daily present, for the mystification of mankind? Why, for instance, should a respectable divine, of average dimensions, and the usual bulk of well-grown humanity, hold out his own diminutive stature as a recommendation to the tenement which he is anxious to let? Why should he take a sort of imbecile and morbid satisfaction, in appearing in the public chronicles of the day, under the depreciating, and, as it appears to us, "Heep"-ishly "umble" title of "a small clergyman?"

Why did Mrs. Applegarde, who was diffident and retiring to a fault, write down three sentences, each calculated to convey—by implication at least—an unseemly exultation in the charms of her eldest daughter to a supercilious and gainsaying world? "A pretty lady's horse; A quiet lady's hack; A handsome lady's pony;" she read aloud, with unblushing cheek and unfaltering voice, quietly appealing to the daughter so described as to "which she should leave?" "Or shall I say," she continued, warming to her work, and getting vaguely glib upon the subject, "Wanted a horse, for a lady in delicate health, pretty to look at, and not too tall, with a long mane and tail, and must be quiet and well recommended. Price not such an object as a suitable animal. Apply at Park Side Cottage, Ambledown."

"Oh no, mamma, that really won't do at all," said Gloriana, now thoroughly roused from the languor which had taken such a hold upon her, and awakened such anxious fears on her account. "If you send that, we shall have all the screws in the country sent in for our inspection. I don't care, either, about having a regular cantering lady's horse; I should like to have one that I could make myself." Here I must mention that, owing to circumstances, (which I do not feel called upon at this stage of the "Adventures" to explain,) Gloriana had heard more about horses than any of the party assembled. That she had read more about them, too, I mentioned before; but the hero horses, the Austers, the Bevises, and the Bavicas of romance, resembled no more the every-day horses that she was likely to meet in real life, than did their shadowy warrior riders the sporting youths in knickerbockers, with their hands in their pockets, and cigars in their mouths, whom she he had met with "up at the park."

Book knowledge, however, and knowledge confined to mere hearsay, upon any subject, is soon fathomed and exhausted; and in personal experience with regard to them, she was as innocent and as ignorant as the rest of the party. "We need not mention the height," she went on to say; "I have heard people say that a lady always looks better on a horse that is rather high." The reader will observe that the young lady forbore the word tall in describing a horse, which her mother had made use of.

"I would not have a helephant, either, miss," remarked Wells, sententiously, who entertained a well-founded horror of anything too much exalted in the shape of a horse, always taking into consideration the probability of a "fall."

"The Duke has been thrown, I hear," remarked one of the field, to the huntsman of a celebrated pack, and in reference to an enthusiastic sportsman, who could not ride. "His grace fell off," was the short and pointed reply; and it was no doubt with reference to such a contingency, that Mr. Wells delivered his oracular sentence, on the occasion in question. His young mistress had never ridden before. It was more than probable that in the first days of her initiation, she would meet with the catastrophe which befel the unlucky nobleman; and without any particular co-operation on the part of the horse, find it incumbent upon her inexperience to "fall off." "I should say that a good-sized pony would answer all purposes, and would be easier to get on and off."

"So it would, James," said his mistress, who in this case recognized and approved the feelings of the man. "I should not be so nervous about a pony, when Gloriana takes her first rides."

"But is Glorry to ride by herself?" observed Kate, suggesting thereby a new difficulty; for it had not entered into the calculations of this family council that somebody would be required to "ride after" Miss Applegarde, or that somebody must, of necessity, come under the head of a class held in the utmost abhorrence by Mr. Wells, belonging to the genus groom. A respectable full-blown coachman, who had nothing to do but to handle the reins of his equally fat carriage-horses, was the nearest approach to the region of the stable, which that stately official could tolerate between the wind and his nobility.

At Kate's remark, therefore, Mr. Wells experienced that sort of mental revulsion described by the sensation novelist under the type of an earthquake—"if an earthquake had opened under his feet he could not have been more staggered, or his senses been merged into such utter or irremediable confusion," et cetera, et cetera. The effect of this curious mental phenomenon, in this instance, was that it presented to the imagination of the individual most concerned a series of dissolving views, each one more unwelcome and more clearly defined than the last.

The vision of an intruder at all into the precincts of that refined and aristocratic establishment was cruel enough; but when another rapidly took its place, of a saucy upstart, looking upon the lovely housemaid, or the good-natured cook, with the aspiring glance of love; of a low wretch, strengthening by open rebellion, or secret strategy, the scarcely stifled faction existing between the kitchen and the housekeeper's room: of an earthworm who, as reigning monarch of the stable, would beard and defy the autocrat of the pantry—the feelings of the victim are more easily imagined than described. The countenance of the great man, generally so immovable, must have betrayed the contending emotions that were at war in his soul; for the contemplation of it provoked Gloriana into remarking, with one of her old smiles, "You see in what an undertaking we are embarked. 'Exercise upon four legs' is an easy thing to talk about; but in our singularly unhorsey establishment we are involved in a difficulty every way we turn. Fortunately, there are stables; but where shall we find a respectable, trustworthy groom?"

"Where indeed?" said Mrs. Applegarde, nervously, for she had seen the cloud gathering on the brow of the faithful Welles, as the objectionable word had passed her daughter's lips: "this is indeed an unforeseen difficulty."

"And what is he to ride? You must advertise for two horses, whilst you are about it, mother dear," put in Kato suggestively. "Sir Erasmus might have made more of his prescription, and of his joke, for there must be eight legs in it after all, to say nothing of the additional biped."

"Oh Kate! Kate! you are incorrigible. I really do not see through what is to be done, unless you could find some riding companions, my dear."

"What a pity the young Squire and Miss Levision are away," remarked Mr. Welles; and at this speech a crimson flush rushed painfully into Gloriana's pale cheek; to divert attention from which circumstance it was, I have no doubt, that she said so hastily: "Why can't I have a pony, and then surely there could be no harm in my riding about the park, the commons, and these quiet lanes by myself? Let me write the advertisement, mamma, please, and we will see first what comes of that;" and taking the pen from her mother's hand, she sat down, and, after a little meditation, wrote as follows: "Wanted, immediately, a good-sized pony, strong, handsome, temperate; warranted sound; that will carry a lady. Apply to Mr. Wells, Park Side Cottage, Ambletown."

"It is better to imply that there is a man in the case," the young lady added; "we are less likely to be done."

"Certainly, miss," said the now gratified Wells, with a condescending air of lofty superiority; "it is by far the better plan. And smiling the bland smile, which proclaimed that the irascible temperament had accepted and swallowed the sop artfully prepared for its sensitive palate, he condescended himself to be the bearer of the important missive to the post-office in the village, hard by.

(Continued in our next.)

A PROUD man and a cobra di capello hold their heads erect.

THE HAY-MAKERS.

THE sun laughs through, piercing the blue,
And cleaving the red clouds' heart:
Up from the corn, in the sweet June morn
The larks by twenties start.

The wheat's green sea rolls wide and free
For many a pleasant mile,
As row by row the mowers go,
On every face a smile.

Each corn-flower blue wears a jewel of dew,
And over the bright green sea,
The poppies on high their red flags fly,
All fluttering in their glee.

The stalks between, bright-flashing, keen,
Sweeps on each glittering scythe;
Of the sorrel red, and the thistle-head,
They take a royal tithe.

But when the noon, no whit too soon,
Comes with its lessening shadow,
They sit and laugh, and joke and quaff,
Under the oak in the meadow.

Then when sun sets, and cool dew wets
The tawny hills of hay,
Homeward they go, and the after glow
Greets them upon their way.

THE * * * * IN THE CLOSET.

PASSAGES FROM THE JOURNAL OF THE BARON DELAUNAY.

JUNE 3D, 1770: Paris.—The Vicomte de Grandchamps called this morning—splendid as usual, with buttons of Roman mosaic on his velvet coat, and his point-lace jabot the true coffee-color now in vogue. What an age of pretension it is! The dandy conceals his own fine hair beneath a hideous crop of the barber's invention. The ladies cover their fair skins with rouge and little patches of black; the graceful play of their limbs is thwarted by some artificial device to swell out their petticoats and nip in their waists—even the pearly whiteness of their lace must be dyed in coffee to give it a look of age! How preposterous shall we appear to future ages, when a more enlightened education and a higher tone of morality shall enable society to return to nature, consequently to beauty! I can fancy how the students of the next century will contrast their costume of our ladies—their petticoats tucked up to display their legs, attractively set off by colored and embroidered stockings; their little feet distorted by high-heeled shoes; their painted cheeks, their false hair, their little shadeless hats—with the long flowing robes indicating the graceful limbs without displaying them, the chaste wimple, the modest veil of the middle ages. I can fancy what lesson they will deduct from these outward signs, and how they will understand only from pictures the reverential devotion of the knights of St. Louis's time for their noble ladies, and the familiar lewd gallantry of the reign of Louis XV. To return to the vicomte, who suggested this digression. He entered, and threw himself indolently down on the easiest of my arm-chairs, stretching out his legs the better to admire their exquisite proportions.

"Is it true," he asked, "that you are on the eve of giving up your liberty?"

"My liberty! what is that?"

"Ah!" he replied, with a little laugh, stroking his calves the while, "very good; what is his liberty?—cynical as usual. Do not we bachelors come and go at will, order our own dinner, pursue our own pleasure, form our own little acquaintances, not to shock you with tender names, invite our own banquets? Once married, mon cher, some one else rules all that; you may pay the cost—that will be your share of the fun. It is true you may have separate establishments, but that is expensive, and no particular good."

"All that may be the case in your menage, vicomte," I replied; "but I assure you it will not be so in mine. Time only can prove how much marriage may increase or diminish my happiness; but decidedly, I shall remain master of my own house."

"Then you will live in perpetual warfare, and we shall soon see the marks of nails on your grave, sober face. That is a worse condition than the other."

"Neither one nor the other is necessary, I assure you."

"Ah, poor Delaunay, what an infatuation! I had hoped it might not be true, when the fellows at the fencing court told me you had asked the hand of Gabrielle de Vigny of her parents."

"It is true that I have made proposals to the parents of Mlle. de Vigny," I replied, with a stress on the mademoiselle he had so rudely omitted; "but I am not so sure of obtaining it."

